out this sodaine occasion to expresse that vertue that was in him. For hauing apprehended Exechias, who was the prince of those theeues, who ranged ouer all Syria a long time with a great troupe of outlawes, he put him to death with diuers of his complices. Which act of his got him no little estimation and credit among the Syrians: for by that meanes he rid their countrey of all those robbers, according as they desired. He was therfore praised thorow the villages, and Cities for this act, as he that had giuen them peace, and assured possession of their estates. For this cause he was made knowne to Sextus Cæsar, who was vncle to Cæsar the great. Furthermore his brother Phasælus was incited to follow his noble actions, and inforced himselfe to obtaine no lesse reputation then he had; for which cause he stroue to get the good will of the common people in Ierusalem, and gouerned the city with such discretion, that he acted all things to each mans content, and abused not his power to any priuat mans iniury: which was the cause that Antipater was honoured by the whole nation, with no lesse respect then if he had beene their onely Lord and soueraigne. Yet did not this eminencie of estate so farre distract him, that he forgot the loue and duty he ought to Hircanus (as in such like occasions it oftentimes falleth out) notwithstanding diuers of the greatest amongst the Iewes (seeing Antipater and his sonnes so highly aduanced both by the publike fauour of the whole nation, as also by the reuenues, that they drew both out of Iewry, as also by the emploiment of Hircanus money) were grieuously incensed against them. For Antipater had made friendship with the Emperors of Rome, and hauing perswaded Hircanus to send them money, he had appropriated the same vnto himselfe, sending it not in Hircanus name, but in his owne; which though Hircanus knew, yet was he not mooued therewith, but rather well contented. But that which most of all terrified the princes of the Iewes was, to behold the violent and audacious nature of Herod, who gouerned after a royall and tyrannicall manner: For this cause they addressed themselues to Hircanus and accused Antipater openly. How long (said they) will you dissemble and winke at those things that are daily practised? see you not that Antipater and his sons possesse in effect the royall power and authority of the kingdome, and that you haue onely the name? Assure your selfe that you are not out of danger in contemning thus both your selfe and your kingdome. For Antipater and his sonnes are not now your substitutes, neither intend they your profit, or your countries good (whatsoeuer your opinion is of them) but they openly are known for Lords and Commanders. For Herod (Antipaters son) hath already put Ezechias and his complices to death, and therby transgressed our lawes, which forbid to take away any mans life (how wicked soeuer hee be) except he be first of all condemned to death by the councell: and notwithstanding this hee hath been so bold, as to doe iustice without your authority. When Hircanus heard this, he grew wroth (for their mothers, whom Herod had slaine, had incensed him by their continuall exclamations in the temple, exhorting the king and people to call Herod to account before the councell of that which he had done.) So that Hircanus mooued by these women called Herod to answer vnto those accusations which were obiected against him. Who made his appearance, forewarned by his father not to present himselfe after the manner of a priuate person, but well attended and accompanied to withstand all inconuenients. After therefore he had taken order for the affaires in Galilee (according as he thought meet in his owne discretion) and that he himselfe was sufficiently accompanied to make his voiage, with such a guard as neither might terrifie Hircanus with number, nor leaue himselfe vnsecured in danger, he resorted to Ierusalem. Furthermore, Scxtus Cæsar gouernour of Syria wrote vnto Hircanus to absolue him, adding threats to his perswasions, if so be hee should performe the contrary; which gaue Hircanus occasion to deliuer Herod in despite of the councell and their intent; the rather also for that hee loued him as intirely as his sonne. When as therefore Herod presented himselfe before the councell with his retinue all of them were astonished, and none of those that accused him in his absence, durst open their mouthes to speake one word, but all of them kept silence, not knowing what to doe. Now whilest they stood vpon these tearmes, a certaine man called Sameas, who was of vpright conuersation, and for this cause was not distracted with feare, arose and spake to this effect. Drad king, and you honourable assistants, I could neuer yet remember, that euer any man which was called in question to defend his cause before vs, hath appeared in this equipage; and I suppose that none of you can say, that the like hath euer happened: but whosoeuer commeth into this place to receiue iudgement; hee presenteth himselfe with humilitie and feare, with a countenance prepared to implore mercy, hauing his haire long, and his garment blacke: but this gallant Herod accused of murther (and for this occasion called before vs) who could imagine that he should appeare before vs in a purple robe, hauing his haires trimmed, and besides that, a guard of armed men about him? with an intent

A that if we condemne him, according to law, he may put vs to death without law, that after hee hath violated all right, he might eſcape and ſaue himſelfe. But I blame not Herod in this action, for that he hath a more inward regard of his particular profit, then of the law: but I accuſe both you and the King, who haue giuen him ſuch aſſurance. Know therefore, that there is a ſoueraigne God, that will one day puniſh both you and the King, and him whom you will deliuer by the Kings meanes. And ſo generally fell it out as hee had ſaid: For as ſoone as Herod had obtained the kingdome, hee put all thoſe of the councell to death, and Hircanus himſelfe likewiſe, onely Sameas was exempted: for he held him in great eſtimation, becauſe of his wiſedome and iuſtice, and becauſe that at ſuch time as the Citie was beſieged by Herod and Soſius, Sameas perſwaded the people to receiue Herod, telling them that by reaſon of their ſinnes and offences, they might B not eſcape from him; whereof we will ſpeake in place conuenient. Hircanus perceiuing that the iudges were inclined to condemne Herod, deferred the ſentence till the next day, and ſent ſecretly vnto Herod, counſelling him to flie out of the Citie, aſſuring him that there was no other meanes to ſaue his life. Thus poſted he to Damaſco (as if he had fled from the Kings preſence) and preſenting himſelfe before Sextus Cæſar, after hee had aſſured his perſon, hee reſolued with himſelfe that if the councell ſhould call him once more to his anſwer, he would not obey them. But after his departure the councell were diſpleaſed with Hircanus, and laboured to perſwade him, that all theſe things tended to his deſtruction: which he well perceiued, yet knew hee not what to doe, he was ſo negligent and void of foreſight.

For Herod marched forth againſt him with a great army, ſuppoſing himſelfe to be much wronged by the aſſignation hee had ſent him, and in that he was ſummoned to giue a reaſon of his actions before the councell. But his father Antipater, and his brother Phaſælus came forth againſt him to hinder his approch towards Ieruſalem, ſtriuing to appeaſe his fury, and counſelling him not to attempt any thing by way of action; but that contenting himſelfe that he had threatned and affrighted Hircanus, hee ſhould not attempt any further againſt him, who had raiſed him to that high degree. They told him alſo, that it became him not onely to remember that he was cited to anſwer but that he was abſolued alſo, and permitted to depart without danger or any violence. Moreouer, that he ought to thinke, D that God gouerneth the ballance of warre, and that the iſſues of battels is vncertaine, and for that cauſe he ought not to expect the victorie, if hee made warre againſt the King who was his familiar, and from whom he had receiued farre more kindneſſe, and no diſpleaſure: who though hee made ſome appearance and ſhadow of ſeueritie, touching the accuſation intended againſt him, yet notwithſtanding it proceeded not ſo much from him, as from his euill counſellors. Herod in ſome ſort pacified by theſe perſwaſions, obeyed his father, ſuppoſing that it ſufficed him in regard of his future hopes, that he had giuen the people ſo large a teſtimonie of his power. This was the eſtate of the Iewes at that time.

But now at this preſent, I thinke it very conuenient to declare all the prerogatiues, and aſſociations that the Romans and their Emperors made with thoſe of our nation, to the end that all other people might know, that the Kings of Aſia and Europe haue beene well effected towards vs, and haue made great account of our valour and fidelitie. It is lawfull alſo for Hircanus and his ſonnes, and their Embaſſadours ſent by them, to behold the iuſts and combates, and to ſit among the Senators, and that at all and euery time or times wherein they ſhall require to be brought into the Senate by the Dictator, or by the maſter of the horſe, they may haue free entrance; and that within ten daies at the moſt they receiue their anſwer, if there bee any decree ratified by the Senate. The yeere of the world, 3922. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 42.

Caius Cæſar, Emperour, the fourth time Conſull, and the fift time Dictator for terme of life, hath ratified theſe things, as touching Hircanus the ſonne of Alexander, the high Prieſt and Prince of the Iewes: Becauſe that the Generals my predeceſſors haue teſtified as well in the prouinces, B as before the Senate and people of Rome, both of the good deſerts of Hircanus high Prieſt and Prince of the Iewes, and that nation alſo towards vs and our ſtate; and whereas both the Senate and people of Rome haue gratified them for the ſame: wee thinke it conuenient alſo to haue the ſame in memory, and to giue order that Hircanus and his ſonnes may be remunerated by the Senate and people of Rome, according to the meaſure of their loyalties and good deſerts.

Iulius Caius Cæſar Romane Conſul, to the Gouernours, Senate and people of Patræ: Health. The Iewes are come vnto vs to Delos, with ſome of the Colonies of their countrimen in the preſence of your Embaſſadours, and certifie vs of a decree made by you: whereby you forbid them the practiſe and ancient vſe of their ſacrifices and oblations: I thinke it not meete that you make C any ſuch decrees againſt our friends, and aſſociates; neither that you forbid them to liue according to their faſhions and cuſtomes; or to employ their purſes together in furniſhing their feaſts and ſacrifices; ſince in Rome it ſelfe they are not interdicted or forbidden to performe the ſame. For at ſuch time as Caius Cæſar Conſul had prohibited by Edict, that in celebrating the Baccharials, no one ſhould dance about the Citie; yet were the Iewes alone exempted from this inhibition: and neither haue they beene prohibited to contribute, neither to banquet together. My ſelfe alſo in like caſe in the defence I haue made to forbid all other ſodalities, haue excepted the Iewes therein, and haue giuen them leaue and licence to aſſemble and demeane themſelues, according to the cuſtomes, ceremonies, and ordinances of their countrey. If therefore you haue made any ſuch decrees againſt our friends and aſſociates, you ſhall doe well to diſannull them, by D reaſon of the vertue of the Iewes, and the forwardneſſe they haue proteſted in performance of our ſeruice.

After Caius Cæſars death, the Conſuls Marcus Antonius and Publius Dolobella aſſembled the Senate, and hauing brought in Hircanus Embaſſadours, they declared their requeſts, and contracted amitie with them: the Senate likewiſe ordained, that each thing ſhould bee granted them that they required. And Dolobella hauing receiued Hircanus letters, ſent them thorowout all Aſia, and to Epheſus (which is the Metropolitane citie of Aſia) in theſe tearmes. The Generall Dolobella to the Princes, Senate, and people of Epheſus: Health. Alexander the ſonne of Theodore Embaſſadour to Hircanus the high Prieſt and Prince of the Iewes, hath giuen vs to vnderſtand, that his ſubiects cannot goe on warfare, becauſe it is not lawfull for them to beare armes, nor to E trauell on the Sabbath day; as alſo for that they may not ſeeke for their victuals and other neceſſaries (on that day) according to the cuſtome of their countrey: for this cauſe I grant them exemption from the warre in like manner as my predeceſſors haue done; permitting them to vſe the ceremonies and rites of their countrey, aſſembling themſelues to make their oblations and ſacrifices, as their lawes and cuſtomes require, in contributing to the offering of the ſacrifices in the temple. And my will is, that you write to this effect to euery citie of the prouince. See here how Dolobella honoured Hircanus at ſuch time as he ſent his Embaſſadours vnto him. M. Antonius, and P. Cæcilius Bassus murthereth Sextus Cæsar.

Thus haue we sufficiently declared the amity and association, that in times past wee haue had with the Romans. About this time it came to passe, that the estate of Syria was sore troubled vpon the occasion that ensueth. Cæcilius Bassus one of Pompeies partakers, laid an ambush for Sextus Cæsar and slew him, and seizing vpon his army, vsurped the gouernment: whereby there arose great warre nigh Apamea. For Cæsars captaines marched out against Cæcilius, with great force both of foote and horsemen, to whom Antipater sent his sonnes with a power to second them (in remembrance of the benefits he had receiued at Cæsars hands) supposing it to be an act of iustice, that the murtherer should be punished for his so hainous offence. Now whereas this warre continued a long time, Marcus came and succeeded Sextus. Meane while Cæsar was slaine by Cassius and Brutus in the midst of the Senate, after he had commanded three yeeres and sixe moneths, as it is expressed in another place. H

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 20. Cassius commeth into Syria, and exacteth more then 700. talents of siluer from the Iewes.

AFTER Cæsars death, the brand of ciuill warre began to flame, and the greatest men of Rome trauailed the one this way, the other that way to gather men of warre. But Cassius came into Syria, with an intent to take the army that was neere to Apamea: and hauing leuied the siege he drew both Bassus and Marcus to be of his faction; and trauailing from City to City, he gathered a number of soldiers, and much furniture, and imposed huge tributes: but especially he afflicted Iewry, and exacted of that countrey more then seuen hundreth talents of siluer. Antipater seeing the state in so great feare and trouble, committing the exaction of the two parts of this money to his sonnes; the other hee commanded to be assigned to Malichus, who was his enemy, an the other part vnto another. Herod first of all gathered that which was commanded him in the countrey of Galilee, and for this cause was greatly beloued by Cassius: for hee being prudent and discreet, thought it no small policie at that time to win the Romans good will by other mens expence. Vnder the other gouernours the Cities were set to sale, together with their inhabitants: and amongst them these foure were the chiefest, namely, Gophna, Emaus, Lydda, and Thamna: for Cassius sold the people thereof to them that would giue most. Furthermore, Cassius was so much transported with choler, that he had slaine Malichus) so much was he mooued against him) if Hircanus had not restrained his furie, by sending him one hundreth talents of his owne money by Antipater. But as soone as Cassius was departed out of the country of Iudæa, he practised Antipaters death, supposing that his cutting off would assure Hircanus state the more strongly. But Antipater was not ignorant of this his resolution; for hauing an inkling thereof, hee got himselfe on the other side of Iordan, and assembled an armie of souldiers both Iewes and Arabians. Hereupon, Malichus (who was a politique and subtill fellow) denied stoutly that he had intended any treason, purging himselfe with an oath before Antipater and his children, that he had neuer any such intent, especially for that he saw that Phasælus held Ierusalem, and Herod had an armie at command. And in the end, perceiuing the difficultie wherein he was, he reconciled himselfe to Antipater, and they agreed at that time that Marcus gouerned Syria: who perceiuing that Malichus began to raise troubles in Iewry, resorted thither, and there wanted little but that he had slaine him, had not Antipater by earnest request obtained his life. MALICHVS poysoneth ANTIPATER. M

Cassius and Marcus make Herod gouernour of Cœlosyria.

BVT imprudent Antipater saued Malichus to his owne mischiefe: For when Cassius and Marcus had assembled their army, they committed all the charge into Herods hands, and made him gouernour of Cœlosyria, and deliuered him great forces both of foot and horse, and ships by sea: They promised him likewise the kingdome of Iudæa, after they had finished

A shed the warre, that was at that time betwixt them and Anthony and Cæsar the yonger. Whereupon Malichus mightily fearing Antipaters power determined to make him away; and hauing corrupted Hircanus butler with money (with whom both of them celebrated a feast) hee made him away by poyson, and afterwards assembling many men of warre about him, hee made himselfe Master of the Citie. When Herod and Phasælus vnderstood of the traiterous conspiracie attempted against their father, they were grieuously incensed against Malichus. But he denied all, and in especiall abiured the intent or practise of the murther. Thus died Antipater a iust and vertuous man, and such a one as deerely loued his countrey. But Herod, who was his yonger sonne, incontinently resolued to reuenge his fathers death, and came forth with an army against Malichus: But Phasælus, who was the elder, determined to circumuent him by policie, for feare least he should raise a ciuill warre. He therefore accepted of Malichus iustifications, and made a shew
B that he supposed that he had in no such sort sought Antipaters death, and onely intended his fathers monument and funerals. Meane while, Herod resorting to Samaria, and finding it in desperate estate, restored the same, and pacified the dissensions that were amongst the inhabitants. Not long after (by reason of a feast) he came to Ierusalem with his men of warre. Whereupon Malichus being affraid of this his accesse, perswaded Hircanus that he should not permit him to enter into the Citie: whereunto Hircanus condescended, alleadging for pretext of his defence, that amongst the holy people it was not lawfull to intermixe a troupe of polluted men. But Herod made small reckoning of them that brought him this newes, and notwithstanding this command entred the Citie by night: whereat Malichus was much amazed. Whereupon, according to his wonted dissimulations, he openly wept and bewailed the death of Antipater as his especiall friend;
C but vnder hand he prepared a guard for his owne safety. Notwithstanding it was thought meete by Herods friends, to take no notice of this dissimulation; but to make a shew for their parts that they were well affected towards Malichus.

D HEREVPON Herod certified Cassius of Antipater his fathers death, who knowing very well of what conuersation Malichus was, wrot backe vnto Herod that he should reuenge the death of his father: besides, he sent secret letters to the captaines that were in Tyre, commanding them to aide and assist Herod in that so iust execution which hee intended. After therefore that Cassius had taken Laodicea and the inhabitants of the countrey came together, bringing with them crownes and siluer to present him, Herod expected that Malichus in that place should receiue his punishment: but hee entring into suspicion of some practise, at such time as they drew neere vnto Tyre in Phœnicia, attempted farre greater things. For whereas his sonne was an hostage in Tyre, hee entred the City with intent to draw him thence, and afterwards to returne into Iudæa. After this, vsurping vpon that opportunitie which hee had by reason of Cassius troubles (who hastily marched forward to meet with Anthony) he determined to draw the people to an insurrection, and to make himselfe Lord of the countrey: but God dis-
E appointed his vniust purposes. For Herod beeing a man of ripe iudgement, incontinently discouered his pretence, and sent one of his seruants before, as if vnder purpose to prepare a banquet, because he had told him before time that he would entertaine all his followers: but in effect, he sent him to the captaines to command them to issue out with their daggers, and to meete Malichus; who marching foorth and meeting him neere vnto the shore of the City vpon the sea coast, stabbed him in that place with their daggers. Which act did so much astonish Hircanus, that thorow amaze he waxed speechlesse: and finally being much mooued, he demanded of Herods men, what accident had happened, and who it was that had slaine Malichus? Whereof when they certifyed him, and how nothing was done without Cassius command: he answered that all things were well done, for that Malichus was a wretched man and a traytour to his coun-
F trey. See heere how Malichus was iustly punished for the wickednesse hee committed against Antipater.

When Cassius was departed out of Syria, there arose a new tumult in Iudæa: for Felix, who was left in Ierusalem with an armie, marched forth against Phasælus, and all the people were in armes. For which cause Herod speedily repaired to Fabius, gouernour of Damasco, and intending to succour his brother, was preuented by a sicknes: so that Phasælus obtaining the victorie by his owne forces against Felix, enclosed him vp in a tower, whence afterwards hee dismissed him vnder composition. Whereupon he presently and grieuously rebuked Hircanus, for that being forgetfull of diuers benefits which he had receiued by him, hee had giuen aide vnto his enemies. For Malichus brother being at that time reuolted, planted garrisons in diuers fortresses, and namely in Masada, which was the strongest of them all. As soone as Herod therefore had recouered his health, he drew forth his forces against him, and dispossessed him of diuers places that hee held, and after suffered him to depart with his life and goods. With him ioyned Marion (whom Cassius had made Gouernour in Tyre:) For this man hauing occupied Syria by tyranny kept garrison therein: Marion also inuaded Galilee, which confined his countrey; and hauing seized three strong fortresses therein, hee kept garrisons in the same. Herod also marching forth against him, dispossessed him of them all; and gratiously dismissed those Tyrians that had the keeping thereof, bestowing benefits on some of them for the loue hee bare vnto their Citie. And that done, hee came and encountred with Antigonus, and fought with him, and ouercame him before hee had scarcely entred on the marches of Iudæa, and draue him from thence. When hee was come to Ierusalem, Hircanus and all the people honoured him with crownes: for already was hee inserted into Hircanus family, for that by promise hee was his sonne in law; by which meanes, he had more willingly vndertaken his defence, for that hee was to marry Alexanders the sonne of Aristobulus daughter, who was Hircanus neece: on whom hee begat three sonnes and two daughters. Before her also had he married a wife of his owne nation, who was called Doris, on whom he begat Antipater his eldest sonne. I

HEROD meeting with ANTONIVS in Bithynia, giueth him a great summe of money, to the ende hee should not giue eare to those that would accuse him. K

ANTONIVS and Cæsar hauing ouercome Cassius neere vnto the Citie of Philippi; Cæsar went from thence into France, and Antonius into Asia. And being in Bithynia, Embassadours resorted vnto him from all parts: Thither also repaired certaine principall men among the Iewes to accuse Phasælus and Herod; saying, that Hircanus had onely the name, but he the authority of the kingdome. But Antonius greatly honoured Herod, who came vnto him to answer those accusations that they had imposed on him: for which cause they that were his opposites could obtaine no audience: for Herod had bought that priuiledge from them with his money. As soone as Antonius was arriued in Ephesus, Hircanus the high Priest and all our nation presently sent an Embassadour vnto him, with a crowne of golde; requiring him that hee would write vnto the prouinces, that the Iewes whom Cassius had taken prisoners (contrary to the law of armes) might be set at liberty, and that their countrey (which was taken from them in Cassius time) might be restored. Antonius supposing that the demands which the Iewes had proposed, were reasonable, wrote backe presently to the high Priest Hircanus and the Iewes; and sent an edict also to the Tyrians to this effect. A haue had any knowledge of your good and honeſt conuerſation and pietie. For at ſuch time as our aduerſaries and enemies of the Roman nation ſpoiled all the countrey of Aſia, and without regard of their oathes ſpared neither cities nor temples; we haue oppoſed our ſelues againſt them, not onely for our priuate reſpect, but in the quarrell of the commonweale, to the intent to puniſh the authors of ſuch offences committed againſt men, and of ſuch impieties perpetrated againſt God: for which we ſuppoſe that the ſunne hath in a manner obſcured himſelfe, by beholding with vnwilling eies what an hainous offence was committed againſt Cæſar. But wee haue gotten the vpper hand of their impious enterpriſes, which are fallen vpon Macedonia, as on the countrey and ayre, from whence proceede ſuch deteſtable and vngracious deſſeignes: and wee haue likewiſe cut off the courſe of their deſperate reſolution, which made them encounter vs neere to Philippi a city of Macedonia, where we ſeized their places fortified by nature, and en-
B cloſed with mountaines as if it were with walles, as farre as the ſea, in ſuch manner as the paſſage was barred vp, as it were with a gate, had not the gods giuen vs way by reſiſting their vniuſt exploits, and furthering ours. Brutus likewiſe compelled to flie to Philippi, where being incloſed by vs, he ſuffered the like ruine with his conſort Caſſius; and ſince they haue beene puniſhed as they deſerued, me ſeemeth that we are ſeized of peace, and that Aſia hath had repoſe from warre, and all the body thereof is releeued from a grieuous maladie, by the meanes of our victory. For which cauſe remembring vs of you and your nation, to the end to increaſe your good fortunes, we will bethinke vs of that which ſhall be commodious for you: and wee haue already ſent letters from city to city, to the intent that if any one among you, either captiue or free-man, haue been ſold to the vtmoſt by Caius Caſſius, or any of that army, they may be ſet at liberty. And our
C will is, that you make vſe of the bounty which we beſtow vpon you, both in our ſelfe as in Dolabellas right, forbidding the Tyrians to moleſt you, and commanding them to reſtore all that which they haue taken from the Iewes in goods or poſſeſſions. Marcus Antonius Emperour, to the gouernours, Senate and people of Tyre: Health. I haue been informed in Epheſus by Hircanus embaſſadors (who is high prieſt and prince of the Iewes) that you haue ſeized their country, and ſpoyled the ſame, at ſuch time as our aduerſaries held that prouince. But in as much as we haue vndertaken the warre for the Empire, and that in defence of right and pietie, we haue puniſhed theſe ingratefull, diſloyall and perfidious perſons; our wil is, that you ſuffer our allies to liue in peace: and as touching that which you haue obtained by our D aduerſaries, our pleaſure is, that you reſtore the ſame to thoſe that are diſpoſſeſſed. For no one of them hath obtained either prouince or army by the conſent of the Senate; but haue rauiſhed them by force, and afterwards beſtowed them on thoſe who haue been miniſters of their impieties and iniuſtice. But ſince they haue beene puniſhed according to their deſerts, wee require that our allies may enioy their owne, without any impeachment: and if you holde any places at this preſent, which belong to Hircanus prince of the Iewes (that were ſeized ſince the time that Caius Caſſius by vniuſt warre inuaded our prouinces) reſtore them vnto him, without offer of any violence, to hinder him from the poſſeſſion of his owne. And if you haue or pretend to haue any right in them; at ſuch time as I ſhall repaire to thoſe places, it ſhall be lawfull for you to debate your right, and we will ſo iudge as that our allies ſhall receiue no wrong.

Marcus Antonius writeth to the magiſtrates of Tyre to reſtore Hircanus and the Iewes their lands, goods, and liberty.

E Marcus Antonius Emperour, to the Gouernours, Senate, and people of Tyre: Health. I haue ſent you my edict, which my pleaſure is that you carefully looke vnto, and that you regiſter it amongſt your publike records in Romane and Greeke letters, and ſet it vp in writing in an open place, to the end that it may be read by all men.

Marcus Antonius Emperour and Triumuir, in the preſence of the Tyrians aſſembled for their publike affaires, hath declared, that Caius Caſſius during the troubles, by the aſſiſtance of his ſouldiers, hath rauiſhed another mans prouince; and hath in like ſort ſpoiled our allies, and hath ranſackt the nation of the Iewes, who are friends to the people of Rome: and for that by our valour we haue repreſſed his inſolence, by our edicts and iudgements we will correct his offences; to the end that all things may be reſtored to our allies, and that all whatſoeuer hath bin ſolde, and F appertained to the Iewes (whether they be priſoners or poſſeſſions) be reſtored to their maſters, to the end that each man may be at liberty as he was before; and that each mans poſſeſſion may be reſtored to his firſt owner. And my pleaſure is, that whoſoeuer diſobeyeth this ordinance, he may be puniſhed. And he that ſhall be conuicted to haue diſobeyed the ſame, hee ſhall be puniſhed according to his demerit. He wrote to the like effect to the Sidonians, Antiochians, and Arabians, all which we will inſert in a conuenient place, to teſtifie what account the Romans made of our nation.

The yeere of the world, 3924. before Christs Natiuity, 40.

AFTER this, Antonius retyred himselfe into Syria, and Cleopatra came forth to meet him neere vnto Cilicia, and entangled him in her loues. At that time also, one hundreth of the chiefest reckoning among the Iewes came once againe in embassade to him to accuse Herod, and his adherents: who to this end had chosen out the most esteemed Orator that might be found. Messala likewise vndertooke the defence of the yong men that were accused, and made them answer. Hircanus also was there in person, who was already by marriage allied vnto them. After that Antonius had heard both the one and the other in the City of Daphen, he demanded of Hircanus, which of both the parties gouerned the common-weale best? who returned him answer, that they, who were on Herods side were most studious of the weale publike. Antonius (who long since had borne good affection towards them, by reason of the ancient hospitalitie that he had receiued with their father, during the time that Gabinius was in Iudæa) established them both for Tetrarchs, committing to their hands the affaires in Iudæa: And to this effect wrote he his letters and committed fourteene of their enemies to prison; whom had not Herod besought for their liues, he had condemned them to death. This notwithstanding, as soon as they returned from their Embassade, they could not containe themselues in quiet, but resorted once more vnto Antonius to the number of ten thousand, to the city of Tyre where Antonius soiourned. But Antonius (already corrupted by store of money by Herod and his brother, who commanded in that place) ordained that the Embassadours of the Iewes should be punished, for that they had attempted and affected some innouation; where contrariwise he confirmed Herods gouernment. At that time Herod, who walked by the sea side, came vnto them, aduising both them and Hircanus (who at that present was with them) to giue ouer their appeale, for feare least some grieuous misfortune should befall them. Whereunto since they gaue no regard, certaine Iewes and inhabitants of that city, all at once ranne vpon them, who slue some of them, and hurt other some, and the rest taking their flight towards their country, euer afterwards contained themselues and liued in quiet, thorow the feare they had conceiued. But when the people ceased not to exclaime and protest against Herod, Antonius was in such sort displeased, that hee commanded all those whom he held prisoners, should be slaine.

And about this time died Ptolomey the sonne of Mennæus; and his sonne Lysanias raigned in his steed, who plighted friendship with Antigonus the sonne of Aristobulus, who obtained this fauour at his hands by the counsell and solicitation of a certaine Prince of great authority and credit with him.

AFTER this, Antigonus promised the Parthians to giue them one thousand talents of siluer, and fiue hundreth women, if so bee they would depriue Hircanus of the kingdome, and restore it vnto him, and withall put Herod and his friends to death. Yet did hee not deliuer them that he promised, notwithstanding the Parthians led their army into Iury to restore Antigonus, to wit, Pacorus by the sea coast, and Barzapharnes to the landward. The Tyrians locked their gates against Pacorus, but the Sidonians and Ptolemaidans receiued him into their Citie. He sent a troupe of horsemen into Iury to discouer the estate of the countrey, and to giue succours to Antigonus. The chieftaine of these horsemen was the Kings butler; who in like sort was called Pacorus. But for that certaine Iewes (inhabiting about the mount Carmel) ioyned themselues with Antigonus, and were prepared with him to inuade his enemies, he conceiued some hope that he might by their meanes reduce a certaine part of the region vnder his gouernment, which is called Drymæa: and certaine of his wel-willers meeting him in the way perswaded him to presse forward as farre as Ierusalem; where being seconded by others (and his followers already much increased in number) they addresse themselues to assault the Kings Palace. And whereas those of the faction of the brethren brought present supplies, and the skirmish was maintained

But this iniquity of theirs was preſently reuenged by Herod, who in a skirmiſh that he had with them, ſlew a great number of them. And whereas there were daily aſſaults betweene both parties, the enemies expected vntill ſuch time as the people (aſſembled from all parts of the countrey) ſhould repaire to Ieruſalem to celebrate the feaſt of Pentecoſt. Which being come, many thouſands of men aſſembled about the Temple, both armed and vnarmed, who ſeized both the Temple and the Citie; except the Kings houſe onely, which Herod made good with a few men of warre. The wall thereof did Phaſælus his brother keepe. But He-
B rod with a company of his followers ſallied out vpon the enemy, who were planted in the ſuburbes, and fighting valiantly againſt them, he put diuers thouſands of them to flight, wherof ſome retired themſelues into the Citie; other ſome into the Temple; the reſt into a certaine bulwarke neere at hand. Pacorus chieftaine of the Parthians entering the city perſwadeth Phaſælus to go embaſſador to Barzapharnes

But Pacorus conductor of the Parthians came into the Citie with ſome few horſemen at Antigonus requeſt, making ſhew that he came to appeaſe the ſedition; but the effect and ſcope of his comming was, to obtaine the ſoueraigntie for Antigonus. Furthermore, after that Phaſælus was come out to meete with him, and had curteouſly entertained him in his houſe, Pacorus perſwaded him to goe Embaſſadour with him to Barzapharnes, laying a baite vnder this pretence to ſurpriſe him. Hee ſuſpecting no treacheries, was eaſily perſwaded, notwithſtanding that Herod
C miſliked the courſe, who knowing the perfidious manner of the Barbarians, exhorted him rather to aſſaile Pacorus, and to aſſault and oppreſſe his forces, when they were come vnto him. Naitheleſſe Hircanus and Phaſælus vndertooke this Embaſſade, and Pacorus (leauing with Herod two hundreth horſemen, and ten of thoſe whom they call free men) conducted the Embaſſadours. Now as ſoone as they came into Galilee, the Gouernours of the Cities in that countrey, came forth armed to meete them: Barzapharnes alſo at the firſt gaue them friendly entertainment, and honoured them with preſents; but anon after, he began to practiſe treachery. For Phaſælus and his attendants were conducted to a lodging that adioyned the ſea; where hearing tidings that Antigonus had promiſed one thouſand talents, and fiue hundreth virgins to the Parthians, hee be-D gan already to ſuſpect the Barbarians. For a certaine friend of his had giuen him an inkling that there were treaſons intended againſt him that very night, and that his lodging was priuily beſet with a guard. And ſurely they had beene ſurpriſed, had they not expected that the Parthians (who were round about Ieruſalem) ſhould be ſeized of Herod, fearing leaſt he hauing an inkling of their diſaſter, ſhould betake himſelfe to flight. And that this was true, they incontinently gathered by the guard that was ſet about them: For which cauſe there were certaine of Phaſælus friends, who counſelled him, that without any more delay, he ſhould betake him to his horſe and flie from thence: and amongſt the reſt Ofilius was moſt earneſt, who had wrought out of Saramalla a rich Syrian (who offered them his ſhips that road hard by to further their flight) all that which they pretended. But Phaſælus would neither forſake Hircanus, nor leaue his brother Herod in danger, but repairing to Barzapharnes he told him, that he did him wrong to vſe theſe
E ſiniſter practiſes againſt them. For that if he had need of money, he was more likely to receiue it at his hands, then from Antigonus; and howſoeuer he wrought, it was an intollerable iniurie to put Embaſſadours to death, who came vnto him vnder pledge of his honour, and had no waies offended him. But the Barbarian hearing theſe things, proteſted by an oath, that no one point of that which he had ſuſpected, was true; but that he was onely troubled with falſe ſurmiſe: whereupon he preſently departed to Pacorus.

F AS ſoone as he was departed, certaine of the Parthians tooke Hircanus and Phaſælus priſoners, who mightily deteſted their periuries. But the Eunuch that was ſent vnto Herod, had commandement giuen him to entice and traine him without the Citie walles, and afterwards to apprehend him. But Herod was forewarned of this treacherie, by certaine meſſengers (who were ſent by Phaſælus to giue him notice thereof) who being intercepted by the enemie in the way, and Herod getting notice thereof, he addreſſed himſelfe to Pacorus (and thoſe in greatest authoritie among the Parthians) as to them that were the masters: who subtilly dissembled, notwithstanding they knew how all things went, telling him that he should doe well to repaire with them without the wall to go and meete those messengers, who brought him letters, who had not as yet beene seized by their aduersaries, but came to certifie him of Phasælus good estate. But Herod gaue them no credit, because hee was already other waies aduertized of his brothers surprisall, and had also farre greater suspicion of the Parthians by the solicitation of Hircanus daughter, whom he had married. And although the rest made no account of her aduertisements, yet Herod gaue credit vnto her for that shee was a most wise woman. Now whilest the Parthians were in deliberation what were best to be done (in that it was held no policie to make open assault vpon such a man) they deferred the whole matter vntill the next morning. Whilest thus they were debating of their differents, Herod came vnto them, who rather giuing credit to that which he had heard as concerning his brother (and touching the treasons intended against him by the Parthians) then to his aduersaries, as soone as it was night concluded to make vse of the time, and to make away, without staying any longer amongst those vncertaine dangers, which his enemies intended against him. For which cause he fled with those men of warre which hee had with him: and mounting his mother, his sister and his betrothed, whom he was to marry (who was Alexanders daughter, the neece of Aristobulus) and her mother (who was Hircanus daughter) and her yonger brother, with all their family & traine, he departed into Idumæa without espiall or suspicion of the enemy. Amongst whom there was not one so hard or yron-hearted, who seeing such a pittifull spectacle could not be mooued to compassion, beholding the mothers drag away their little children, and abandon their countrey with teares and complaints: and that which was worse, to leaue their friends in bondage, without any hope of comfort or redresse

But Herod mastered these misfortunes by his inuincible courage, and for that hee was a constant man in all fortunes, he exhorted euery one of them whom he met in the way to be of good courage; and not abandon themselues to immeasurable sorrow, for that by such meanes they might hinder his retreat, on which their sole and secureſt conseruation depended: whereupon they for their parts indeuoured themselues to digest their griefes, according to Herods exhortation. Meane while he hardly refrained from laying violent hands on himselfe, by reason of the chariot wherein his mother rode, which ouerturned and had almost slaine her; yea so much did this casualtie terrifie him (for feare least the enemie in pursuit should surprise him during these delaies) as that he drew and prepared his sword to kill himselfe, had not some assistants and followers stept in to him and stayed the stroke, beseeching him instantly not to forsake them & leaue them subiect to the enemies violence: assuring him that it was not the part of a valiant man to respect his owne priuate interest, and neglect his friends perill. By these perswasions he was induced to hold his hands, both by reason of the apprehension of these words, which were spoken vnto him, as also for that he was ouerruled by the multitude of those, who would not permit his hand to execute his will: so that taking vp his mother, and doing her all the seruice that the time permitted, he followed on his way, and with the speediest and neerest meanes he could, he retired toward the Castle of Massada; where in the way, he oftentimes fought against the Parthians that charged and pursued him, and returned alwaies with victorie from them. The Iewes also were not in peace with him during this his flight; for scarcely had he trauelled sixtie stounds out of the Citie, but that they assailed him in the high way: but hee put them to flight and obtained the victorie, not like a desperate man enforced thereunto thorow necessitie, but like a discreet, well furnished and valiant souldier. So that in the very place where he obtained that victorie against the Iewes (after such time as hee was made King) hee builded a most sumptuous palace, and neere vnto the same a citie which he called Herodium. Whilest hee remained at Ressa (a borough of Idumæa) Ioseph his brother came forth to meete him, and to consult with him as touching their whole estate, and to know of him what should become of that great multitude that followed them, considering that they had no souldiers in pay, and the Castle of Massada (whither he pretended to flie) was too little to hold all the people: for which cause he sent away many to the number of nine thousand, willing them to disperse themselues here and there in the countrey of Idumæa; and for the better dispatch of their iourney, he furnished them with victuals. As for himselfe hee tooke with him his most able souldiers and inward friends, and repaired to the Castle of Massada, in which place he left the women and their traine, to the number of eight hundreth or thereabouts: and furnishing the place with corne, water and other prouisions necessary, he went vnto Petra the chiefest Citie of Arabia. As soone as it was day the Parthians sacked all that which appertained to the Citizens of Ierusalem; and among other things they spoyled

They left diuers other things behind them alſo that appertained to Herod, and eſpecially that which had been tranſported into Idumæa by his mature prouidence. Neither were the Parthians content with the ſpoyle of the City, but they forraged all the countrey round about, and raſed Mariſſa a very rich City. Thus Antigonus, brought backe into his countrey by the king of the Parthians, receiued Hircanus and Phaſælus that were priſoners: yet was he vehemently diſpleaſed, becauſe the women had eſcaped, whom according to his promiſe he intended to haue deliuered with the money: and fearing leaſt Hircanus thorow the fauour of the people ſhould be reeſtabliſhed in his kingdome (who was then priſoner in the cuſtody of the Parthians) he cut off both his eares, depriuing him by that meanes from enioying the prieſthood

B any more, by reaſon of that maime, becauſe the law commandeth that they who are in that dignitie, ſhould bee ſound in all their members. But Phaſælus is to be admired for his great courage at that time: for vnderſtanding that hee muſt needly die, hee was no waies diſmaied with death, but that which he held moſt miſerable and diſhonourable was, that he muſt needs die by the hands of his enemy. Seing therefore that he could not diſpatch himſelfe by other meanes, (becauſe he was bound and chayned) he knockt out his owne braines againſt a ſtone, and ſo ended his life) with as great honour as may bee imagined in ſuch a deſperate eſtate) depriuing his enemy of that power which he intended to practiſe in tyrannizing ouer him at his pleaſure. It is ſaid that the wound being very deepe, Antigonus ſent priuily ſurgeons to cure him; and that vnder colour of healing him, they ſhould put poiſon into the ſame, where-through he might die.

C But before Phaſælus gaue vp the ghoſt, he vnderſtood by a certaine woman that his brother Herod had eſcaped from his enemies: for which cauſe he endured his death with far greater cheerefulneſſe and conſtancy, ſeeing that hee left behind him ſuch a man, as would reuenge his death, and puniſh his enemies. Bnt Herod was no waies diſcomforted with the greatneſſe of thoſe aduerſities which enuironed him round about, but was the more whetted on to find out new inuentions, and to aduenture dangerous attempts. For hee went vnto Malchus king of the Arabians (to whom before time hee had ſhewed much curteſie) hoping to receiue the like of him in this time of his great neceſſity, and to draw ſome money from him either by loane or gift, according as he had often and very bountifully pleaſured him. For being ignorant of his brothers death,

D hee endeuoured himſelfe to ranſome him ſpeedily from his enemies, by paying his ranſome (which amounted to three hundreth talents) and for that cauſe he led with him the ſon of Phaſælus, who was onely ſeauen yeeres olde, to leaue him in pledge amongſt the Arabians for the ſumme that was demanded. But certaine meſſengers came to him from Malchus, who charged him in the kings behalfe to retire backe againe, for that the Parthians had enioyned him that he ſhould neither receiue nor retaine Herod. And this colourable pretence vſed he, becauſe hee would not pay his debts: and hereunto was he perſwaded by the aduice of the greateſt in authority among the Arabians, who pretended thereby to make themſelues maſters of that treaſure that Antipater had committed to their cuſtody. Herod anſwered them, that hee repaired not into their countrey to giue them cauſe of any trouble, but onely to conſult with him about cer-

E taine matters of great importance touching his owne eſtate, and that afterwards he was reſolued to depart, and withdraw himſelfe into Ægypt as ſecretly as might be poſſible. Hee returned therefore to a certaine temple, where he had left diuers of his followers; and the next day hee came to Rhinocura, in which place he heard tydings of his brothers death. But afterwards Malchus repented himſelfe of his ingratitude, and ſpeedily ſent after Herod, but hee could not ouertake him: for he had gotten farre onward of his way, and was already arriued in poſt neere to Peluſium: where being denied his paſſage to Alexandria in thoſe ſhips that were there, he addreſſed himſelfe to the magiſtrates of the place, who highly reſpected and honoured him, and ſent him to the City where Cleopatra was; who entertained him kindly: yet notwithſtanding could ſhe not perſwade him to remaine with her. Whereupon he repaired towards Rome (notwithſtanding the winter and thoſe grieuous troubles that at the very ſame time afflicted Italy, as it was reported.) Embarking himſelfe therefore to ſaile into Pamphilia, he was toſſed with a moſt

F cruell ſtorme; ſo that with great danger at laſt he arriued in Rhodes, hauing beene inforced in the tempeſt to caſt into the ſea a good part of his ſubſtance. There met hee with Sappinas and Ptolomey two of his indeered friends. Hee found alſo that the City of Rhodes had ſuffered much miſery by Caſſius warres: and although his meanes were very ſcant, yet profited he them in what he might, and cauſed their walles to be repaired, notwithſtanding that by ſo doing, hee greatly hindred himſelfe. After that, he cauſed a little frigote to be built, and embarked himſelfe with

ANTONIVS hearing all those alterations that had befallen Herod, had compassion of his misery (bethinking himselfe of the estate and condition of great men, who are likewise subiect to no lesse casualties) and the rather was hee induced to doe him good, both in remembrance of the friendship he had with Antipater his father, as also by reason of Herods promises of certaine summes of money, if so be he were made King by his means, as he had beene before time declared Tetrarch. But that which most mooued him hereunto, was the hatred which he bare to Antigonus, whom he accounted to be a mutinous man, and an enemy to I the Romans fortune. On the other side Cæsar was well inclined to succour him, both in regard of those armies which Antipater had brought into Ægypt in his fathers seruice, as also because of the good hospitality and kindnes that he had shewed him in all things; as in especiall to gratifie Antonius who was well affected towards Herod. Whereupon the Senate being assembled, Messala and Atratinus brought foorth Herod, and after they had praised him, and recited the benefits which the Romans had receiued by his father, and the great affection and good will which he bare to the people of Rome; they accused and declared Antigonus for the Romans enemy, not onely for his ancient crimes, but also for that in contempt of the Romans hee had receiued the kingdome from the Parthians. Whilest the Senate was sore displeased at the report of these things, Antonius arose, and declared openly before them all, that in furtherance of the Parthian K warre, it were not amisse that Herod should be made King: which opinion of his was generally allowed, and finally ratified. The principall demonstration of the loue and affection which Antonius bare vnto Herod, was, that he not onely obtained him the kingdome, beyond all hope: for neuer thought he that the Romans would grant that dignity vnto him, who were wont to reserue that honour to those of the kings blood; and therefore he intended to haue demanded it for his wiues brother Alexander, and nephew to Aristobulus by the fathers side, and to Hircanus by the mother (which Alexander Herod afterward put to death, as it shall bee declared in place conuenient) but also for that within the terme of seauen daies, he sent him out of Italy with the vnexpected titles of his felicity.

As soone as the Senate was risen, Antonius and Cæsar issued foorth, leading Herod betweene L them, and being accompanied by the Consuls and other magistrates went vp into the capitoll to doe sacrifice, and to place there this decree the Senate had made as touching this matter. The first day of Herods raigne Antonius feasted him; and after this sort was he established King in the hundreth eighty and fourth Olympiade, in the yeare wherein C. Domitius Caluinus twice Consul and Caius Asinius Pollio were Consuls. Meane while Antigonus besieged those that were in the castle of Massada, who were plentifully furnished with all things necessary (except it were water) for which cause Ioseph Herods brother that was within, and two hundreth of his friends, had concluded to flie vnto the Arabians: for that they vnderstood that Malchus had repented himselfe of the fault he had committed against Herod. But whilest they stood vpon these tearmes, God powred downe a huge raine on a certaine night, that in short time filled their cesternes in M such sort, as that they had no more necessity to flie; and from that time forward they waxed confident: and for that this abundance of water befell them by Gods prouidence, they made a sally vpon their enemies, in which they charged Antigonus soldiers after such a maner, sometime in open field, sometime by couert assault, that they slue a great number of them. At that time Ventidius a Roman captaine was sent into Syria to driue the Parthians from thence, & after their departure he arriued in Iury, making shew that he would assist Ioseph: but in effect al his pretẽce was to draw

CHAP. XXVII.

HEROD returneth from Rome by ſea, and fighteth againſt ANTIGONVS.

B AFTER that Herod was come from Italy by ſea to Ptolemais, and that he had aſſembled no ſmall number of ſoldiers both ſtrangers and his own countrimen, he marched forward againſt Antigonus, and paſſed thorow Galilee. Silo and Ventidius alſo gaue him aſſiſtance in this action, hauing receiued direction by Gellius from Antonius, that they ſhould aſſiſt Herod to recouer his countrey. But Ventidius was emploied in appeaſing the troubles that were raiſed in the Cities by the Parthians: and as touching Silo hee kept in Iudæa, hauing beene corrupted by Antigonus. But the further that Herod daily marched into the country, the more and more increaſed his forces; and all Galilee (except a very fewe) ſubmitted themſelues vnto him. Whileſt therefore hee marched forward toward Maſſada, (beeing vrged thereunto in that hee was to releeue his parents that were beſieged therein) the City of Ioppe would not grant him paſſage: for the Citizens thereof were his enemies: ſo that it behooued him firſt of all to ruinate C the ſame, to the end he might leaue no retreat or place of reſcous for his enemy on his backe, if ſo be he made toward Ieruſalem. Vpon which occaſion Silo laying holde, diſlodged his army and made thitherward: whom when the Iewes did purſue, Herod ſallied out with a ſmall company, and put them to flight, and ſaued Silo, notwithſtanding hee fought very coldly and cowardly. Afterwards being ſeized of Ioppe, he haſted onwards to deliuer his friends that were beſieged in Maſſada; but part of the inhabitants ſubmitted themſelues vnto him for the friendſhip they had borne vnto his father: an other ſort of them, for the honour that they bare vnto him: the reſt admitted his gouernment in acknowledgement of thoſe benefits they had receiued from them both. But the greateſt part was therunto mooued by the hope they had conceiued of their new elected king, and the confirmation of his gouernment. Thus by theſe meanes was his army D mightily increaſed.

Herod returning back out of Italy, leadeth forth his army againſt Antigonus.

Herod aſſaulteth Ioppe, & taketh it.

Many ſubmit themſelues to Herod.

Whileſt thus he marched forward, Antigonus ſeized thoſe places that were fitteſt to lay ambuſhes in, or to fight at aduantages by the way (notwithſtanding that by thoſe meanes and ſtratagems he did but ſmall or no hurt at all to his enemie; ſo that Herod raiſed the ſiege, and diſcharged his friends out of the Caſtle of Maſſada: & after he had taken the fort of Reſſa he approched Ieruſalem being attended by Siloes army, and by diuers Citizens of the City, who were afraid of his power. And when as he had pitched his camp to the weſtward of the City, thoſe that kept the watch and guard on that ſide, ſhot their arrowes and caſt ſtones againſt him: diuers likewiſe trouped foorth and fought hand to hand againſt thoſe that were planted there: For which cauſe firſt of all Herod cauſed proclamation to be made round about the walles, ſignifying vnto them E that he reſorted thither for the common profit of the people, and for the conſeruation of the city without intent of reuenge or memory of any wrongs that his priuate enemies had offered him, promiſing his moſt free pardon to all thoſe whoſoeuer had hainouſly offended him. Hereunto Antigonus made this anſwer (turning his ſpeech to Silo and the Roman ſoldiers) that contrary to all iuſtice they gaue the kingdome to Herod, who was a priuate man, and an Idumæan (that is to ſay, a halfe Iewe) whereas it hath beene a cuſtome to beſtow the ſame on them that are of the line of the Prieſts. For albeit at that preſent they were diſpleaſed with him, for that he was ſeized of the kingdome by the meanes of the Parthians, and had reſolued with themſelues to diſpoſſeſſe him; yet that there were diuers others of that royall race, who might be made kings according to the law, who haue no waies miſdemeaned themſelues towards the Romanes; and F moreouer there are Prieſts, who ſhould not be iuſtly and vprightly dealt withall, if they ſhould be depriued of that honour which appertaineth vnto them. Whileſt they debated the matter after this manner betweene them, and grew to hot and iniurious taunts the one againſt the other, Antigonus commaunded his men to aſſayle thoſe that were neere vnto the wall: who ſhooting many arrowes with great courage againſt them, draue them eaſily from the tower they kept.

At that time Silon gaue manifeſt proofe that he had beene corrupted by money: for he ſubor- G ned diuers of his ſouldiers, who cried out that they had want of victuals, and demanded greater pay for their maintenance, and requeſted that they might be placed in ſome conuenient garriſons to winter in, for that the places round about the Citie were deſolate; becauſe all neceſſaries for maintenance of life had bin taken away and waſted by Antigonus ſouldiers. Thus was the whole army troubled; ſo that each of them prepared themſelues to diſlodge. But Herod importuned and cryed out vpon the Captaines and Souldiers that were vnder Silons charge, telling them that it concerned them not to abandon him whom Cæſar, Anthony and the Senate of Rome had ſent thither: That for his owne part he would giue order that they ſhould haue abundance and foiſon of whatſoeuer they demanded; and incontinently departing from them (after he had preſented them with this requeſt) he depriued Silon of all colour and pretext of flight: for he cauſed an incredible quantitie of victuals to be brought them; and commanded his friends that in- H habited the confines of Samaria, to bring them corne, wine, oyle, cattell, and all other ſuch prouiſion from Iericho, to the end that from that time forward the ſouldiers might want nothing. Antigonus was not ignorant thereof; ſo that he incontinently ſent men thorowout the countrey, who might intercept and ſurpriſe the purueiours and victualers. Who following Antigonus commandement, aſſembled a great number of ſouldiers neere vnto Iericho, and encamping in the mountaines, eſpied and watched thoſe that brought the victuals. Meane while Herod lay not ſtill, but tooke with him ten companies, fiue of Romane ſouldiers, and fiue of Iewes, with whom he intermixed ſome forraine ſouldiers, with ſome few horſemen, and came to Iericho: where being arriued hee ſeized the towne, which was abandoned by the inhabitants, of whom I fiue hundred with their wiues and children were retired into the tops of the mountaines, whom hee tooke, and afterwards ſet at libertie: but the Romane ſouldiers, entring into their houſes, and finding them full of all ſorts of mooueables, they ſpoiled the ſame. And the King hauing left a garriſon in Iericho, returned to his owne place, diſmiſſing the Romane armie to goe and winter in the countries lately ſurrendred vnto him; namely, in Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria. Antigonus alſo purchaſed this fauour at Silons hands by ſtore of bribes, that part of his army was lodged in Lydda, all which he did to currie fauour with Anthony.

Silon ſuborneth ſome of his ſouldiers to take an occaſion to depart from Ieruſalem.

Herod procured and furniſhed the army with victuals and aboundant munition.

Antigonus ſendeth out ſouldiers to ſurpriſe Herods victualers.

The Romans ſent to their garriſons to winter.

Whileſt thus the Romans liued in all abundance and bare no armes; Herod would not be ſtill, but ſent his brother Ioſeph into Idumæa, with one thouſand footmen, and foure hundreth horſe; and himſelfe reſorted to Samaria, where his mother and his other parents kept, who before time K were departed out of Maſſada. After this hee went into Galilee to ſurpriſe certaine caſtles which were held by Antigonus garriſons, and beeing arriued at Sephoris (during a great ſnow) after that Antigonus garriſons were departed out of the foreſaid caſtles, hee found a great aboundance of all ſorts of neceſſarie munition. And there hauing notice of certaine theeues, who inhabited in caues, he ſent a troupe of horſemen, with three companies of footmen, againſt them: whom he commanded to doe iuſtice on thoſe robbers (now the place where they kept, was not farre from a borough called Arbela:) and fortie daies after, he himſelfe with all his armie reſorted thither. Now whereas the enemie iſſued out againſt him with a hardy reſolution, the left wing of his ſquadron retired and fainted; but hee comming on with his maine battell put them to flight, who were already almoſt maſters of the field, and made thoſe of his followers that fled, L to turne their faces; and to purſue their enemies as farre as the floud Iordan: who fled ſome of them by one way, ſome by another; ſo that hee drew all Galilee vnder his ſubiection, except thoſe that inhabited and held the caues. He diſtributed money alſo amongſt his ſouldiers, and gaue each ſouldier a hundreth and fiftie drachmes, and far more vnto their chieftaines, and afterwards ſent them to winter in garriſons neere at hand.

Robbers.

Herod fighteth with his enemies in Galilee, and ouercommeth them, and bringeth all Galilee vnder his ſubiection.

About this time Silon and his captaines, who had paſſed the winter in the ſaid garriſons, came vnto him (for that Antigonus would no more furniſh them with victuals:) for he gaue them maintenance for no more time then a moneth, commanding thoſe that dwelt round about them to ſpoile the countrey, and afterwards to retire themſelues into the mountaines, to the end that the Romans might be deſtitute of neceſſary maintenance, and by that meanes might bee conſumed M with famine. Herod gaue Pharoras his yongeſt brother the charge of that prouiſion, commanding him to incloſe the fort of Alexandrion with a wall; who ſpeedily brought to paſſe that the ſouldiers had all ſorts of neceſſaries at commandement: he reedified alſo the fort of Alexandrion which had beene laide deſolate. About that time Anthony ſoiorned in Athens, and Ventidius was in Syria, who hauing ſent for Silon to accompany him againſt the Parthians, did firſt of all charge him to aſſiſt Herod in that warre: and afterwards to excite the prouinciall confederates

A to further his warre. But Herod diſmiſſing Silon and his company to follow their deſtinated wars with Ventidius, did in his owne perſon lead out his ſouldiers againſt thoſe theeues that liued in dens. Now theſe caues were ſituate in the moſt higheſt and inacceſſible mountaines, impregnable thorow narrow pathes, enuironed with ſharpe rocks, wherein the robbers inhabited ſecretly, with all their families, King Herod cauſed a certaine number of coffers to be made, faſtned to fyron chaines, which he cauſed to be let downe by an engine from the top of the mountaine (becauſe it was neither poſſible by reaſon of the ſteepineſſe of the hill to aſcend the ſame from beneath, neither from aboue to creepe downward againſt them.) Theſe cheſts were filled with ſoldiers, armed with great hookes to draw theſe theeues vnto them, and to breake their necks headlong from the height to the bottome. But the vſe of theſe coffers was dangerous, for it was neceſſary to let them downe an infinite depth into the caues, eſpecially for that the theeues had ne-
B ceſſarie munition among them: notwithſtanding when they had gotten downe, none of the theeues durſt peepe out of the mouthes of their caues, but feare conſtrained them to hold themſelues quiet. But a certaine ſouldier, hauing girt his ſword by his ſide, and taken hold of the chaine with both his hands whereto the coffer was faſtened, ſlid downe as far as the entry of the caue: and being diſpleaſed that no one iſſued out, he ſhot diuers arrowes at thoſe that were within, and wounded them; and after that, with his hooke hee drew thoſe vnto him who reſiſted him, and tumbled them downe headlong from the ſteepy rocke: which done, he ruſhed in vpon thoſe that were within the caue, and ſlew many of them, and afterwards returned and reſted himſelfe in his coffer. Diuers hearing the grones of thoſe that were wounded, were ſurpriſed with feare and deſpaire of their life: but the nights approach was the cauſe that the matter was not fully at-
C chieued, and many of them (receiuing notice of the Kings free pardon by a herauld) ſubmitted themſelues. The next day they renued and continued the ſame manner of fight, and diuers iſſued out of their coffers to fight vpon the outward entrances of the caues, into which they caſt fire, which (for that there was great quantity of wood in the caues) did quickly burne. Within theſe caues there was a certaine old man apprehended, with his wife and ſeuen ſonnes: who being required by them that hee would ſuffer them to goe and ſumit themſelues to their enemies, tooke vp the entry of the caue, and as his ſonnes aduanced themſelues to iſſue out, he ſlew them, vntill ſuch time as he had maſſacred them all, and after them his wife; and finally, when hee had caſt their dead bodies downe the rockes, he threw himſelfe downe headlong after them, preferring death before ſeruitude. Yet before his death, he reuiled Herod in bitter words, and vpbrai-
D ded him of his obſcuritie and ignoble race: and although Herod (who ſaw all that which had happened) ſtretched out his hand vnto him and promiſed him pardon; yet would he not reſpect him; and by this meanes were all theſe caues entered, and the theeues therein taken.

Now when the King had eſtabliſhed Ptolomey captaine ouer the ſouldiers in that region, hee retired himſelfe into Samaria, with ſixe hundreth horſemen, and three thouſand footmen, with a reſolution to fight with Antigonus, and to end their quarrell. But Ptolomey had but very ſlender ſucceſſe in his gouernment: for they that before time had troubled the countrey of Galilee ſallied out vpon him, and ouerthrew him. After which execution they fled into the Mariſhes and vnacceſſible places, where they robbed and ſpoiled all the countrey. But Herod returning and ſetting vpon them puniſhed them: for he ſlew ſome of them, and the reſt were conſtrained to E flie into ſtrong places, where he beſieging them and entring their fortreſſes perforce, ſlew the men, and deſtroied their fortifications: and hauing brought this rebellion to an end, he condemned the Cities to pay him the ſumme of one hundreth talents. Meane while, Pacorus was ſlaine in warre, and the Parthians were diſcomfited with him; which was the cauſe that Ventidius ſent Machæras to ſuccour Herod with two legions and 1000. horſe, and that by the commandement of Antonius. But Machæras was drawen by Antigonus, who corrupted him with mony: and notwithſtanding Herods contradiction and diſſwaſion; yet reſorted he vnto him, alledging that he did it to looke into his actions. But Antigonus ſuſpecting his ſodaine approach, intertained him not but cauſed him to be darted at and driuen thence; giuing him to vnderſtand by his entertainment what opinion he had of him, and how he was affected towards him: who at that time perceiued
F plainly that Herod had giuen him good counſell; and that himſelfe had miſdone in misbeleeuing his aduice: for which cauſe he returned to the Citie Emaus, and ſlew all thoſe Iewes whom he met withall in the way, whether friends or enemies: ſo highly diſpleaſed was he at that which had hapned. Herod ſore mooued hereat, came to Samaria reſoluing with himſelfe to poſte vnto Antonius to complaine of theſe aggrieuances; conſidering that he had no need of ſuch aſſociates, who did him more harme then his enemies; whereas of himſelfe he was able to make good his warre against Antigonus. But Macheras hasted after him, requiring him to stay, and to trauell no further on that iourney; or if he might not be deliuered, he prayed him to leaue his brother Ioseph behind him, who might with them make warre against Antigonus. By these perswasions and instant intreaties of Macheras, he was somewhat appeased: so that he left his brother Ioseph behinde him, with an army; charging him no way to hazzard his fortune, or to fall at oddes with Macheras. As for himselfe hee hasted toward Anthony, who at that time besieged Samosata (a Citie situate neere vnto Euphrates) hauing with him an armie of his associates both horsemen, and footmen. When Herod was arriued in Antioch, he found diuers men assembled there, who were desirous to goe and seeke out Anthony: but they durst not set forward on the way, for feare least certaine Barbarians should set vpon them, and kill them in their iourney: these did Herod assure, and offered himselfe to be their guide vpon the way. Now when they came to their second baite, some two daies iourney off of Samosata, the Barbarians laid an ambush for them, and had barred vp the way with hurdles, and had likewise hidden certaine horsemen thereabouts, who should lie in couert vntill such time as the passengers had recouered the Plaine. Now when the foremost were past, the ambush consisting of about some fiue hundreth horsemen, sodainly charged Herod who was in his rereward; when as therefore they had broken the former ranks whom they had met, Herod with his troupe that was about him incontinently repulsed them; and after he had encouraged his followers and whetted them on to the fight, hee wrought so much, that he made those that fled to turne their faces, and to fight; so that the Barbarians were put to the sword on all sides. The King also pursued them so long, vntill at last hee recouered that which had beene taken by them, which was a certaine number of sumpter horses and slaues. But being charged afresh by others, and they in greater number then those who encountred him at first, he likewise (rallying his forces together) charged and ouercame them; and killing diuers of them, he secured the way to those that followed after, who all of them acknowledged him for their preseruer and guide.

Herod repaireth to Antonius at the siege of Samosata, and in the way killeth many Barbarians.

When hee drew neere vnto Samosata; Anthony sent out his armie in goodly array to meete and honour him, and withall to succour him, in that he had heard that the Barbarians had assailed him. As soone as he came to Anthonies presence, he entertained him kindly; and after hee had heard that which had befallen him in the way, he embraced him in admiration of his vertue, and did him great honor, as to him whom a little before he had raised to a royall dignitie. Not long after this, Antiochus surrendred the fort of Samosata to Anthony, and vpon this occasion the warre was ended. Whereupon Anthony committed the prouince with the armie to Sosius: and after he had commanded him to succour Herod, hee departed into Ægypt. Sosius therefore sent two legions of souldiers before into Iudæa to succour Herod, and afterwards hee followed with the rest of his army.

Herod was honourably entertained by Antonius and his host.

The yeere of the world, 3928. before Christs Natiuity. 36.

Sosius hath the armie committed to his charge by Antonius who departeth into Ægypt.

In the meane while Ioseph died in Iewry on this occasion that ensueth: For forgetting his brother Herods commandement, which hee gaue him at such time as he repaired to Anthony, hee tooke to him fiue companies of souldiers which Macherus had left him; and marching towards Iericho to gather in the fruites of the field, he pitched his tents vpon the mountains: And for that the Romane troups were but newly leuied, & consisted of those men who were vntrained in the warres, and for the most part were gathered out of the countrey of Cœlosyria: the enemies hauing aduertisement hereof, assayled and surprised him in certaine places of disaduantage, where there was a hot skirmish betweene them, in which Ioseph died, fighting valiantly; and all his army was discomfited: for sixe companies of them were slaine. After that the dead bodies were at Antigonus command, he cut off Iosephs head, which Pheroras his brother ransomed for the price of fiftie talents. Which done, the Galileans reuolting from their gouernours, drowned Herods partakers in the lake; so that diuers commotions and troubles were raised in Iewry, Macheras he fortified the Castle of Geth. This misfortune of Iosephs was reported to the king, in a certen suburb of Antioch called Daphne, who before the tidings, had already conceiued some suspicion and feare, grounded vpon certaine dreames, which gaue him certaine intelligence of his brothers death. Departing therefore from thence with all expedition, hee arriued neere to the mount Libanus, where he tooke about 800. men with him, and a Romane legion which he had, and from thence came to Ptolemais; from whence he departed with his army by night, and crossed Galilee with them. Whereupon the enemies came forth against him, and were ouercome by him, and shut vp in a fort, from whence they were departed but the day before; where Herod assayled them by breake of day: But being vnable to offer them any preiudice, by reason of the indisposition of the weather, he led his men into the villages neer adioyning. But when Antonius second

Herod fighteth with the Galileans, and ouercommeth them, and driueth them into a castle.

A second legion was come, and annexed to his forces; they that were within the fort were dismaied, and forsooke the same by night. So that Herod marched with all diligence to Iericho, with an intent to reuenge his brothers death; and beeing encamped neere vnto the same, hee banqueted and entertained the Chiefetaines of his army; and after the feast was ended, and he had dismissed his company, hee withdrew himselfe into his lodging. In which place it appeared, how much God loued the King: for the roofe of the house where hee had solemnized his feast fell downe without hurt to any one whomsoeuer: for no man was left within it. Whence it came to passe, that each one perswaded himselfe that Herod was beloued by God; considering he had auoyded so great and vnexpected a perill. The yeere of the world, 3928. before Christs Natiuity, 36. The house wherein Herod solemnized his feast, fell downe when the guests were gone, without any mans detriment.

The next day, sixe thousand of his enemies came downe from the toppe of the mountaines to fight with him, who affrighted the Romans, and their forlorne hope chased Herods souldiers
B with darts, and stones, who was himselfe also hurt in the thigh with an arrow. Antigonus sent a captaine to Samaria, whose name was Pappus, with some souldiers, intending thereby to signifie vnto his enemies, that he had more men of warre then he needed. Pappus drew neere to Macharas the Romane Captaine: and as touching Herod he tooke fiue cities by force, and put some two thousand of them that were in garrison to the sword; and afterwards (hauing set the houses on fire) he went out to encounter Pappus; who was encamped in a borough called Isanas. Diuers that came from Iericho and Iury, submitted themselues to Herod, who drawing neere the enemy (who marched forward with great hardinesse) fought with him and ouercame him, and beeing inflamed with a great desire he had to reuenge his brothers death, he pursued them that fled and slue them euen within their borough. Herod wounded by his enemies. Antigonus sendeth Pappus to Samaria

These houses were incontinently filled with men of war,
C and diuers fled and hid themselues vpon the tops thereof, who were at last taken; for the roofes of the houses were beaten down, and he saw that all was filled with souldiers, wherby diuers were slaine by stones that were darted at them from aboue, and afterwards cast and killed them by heapes: which was the most grieuous spectacle of all those that had hapned in those warres, to see an infinite number of bodies hidden one vnder another amidst the roomes of the houses. Fight in the houses.

This exploite of Herod did very much abate the courage of his enemy, who hereafter expected farre more worse fortunes at his hands: For a man might haue seene them flie away in heapes; and had not a sodaine and forcible tempest fallen vpon them, the triumphant army of Herod had incontinently entred Ierusalem with assurance of victorie, which had made a finall end of all that warre. For, Antigonus each day bethought him how to flie away, and to for-D sake the Citie. But for that it was already growne darke, Herod commanded his souldiers to refresh themselues; and for that hee himselfe was weary, hee entred into his lodging to bathe himselfe: in which place he ouerwent a mighty misfortune, from which he escaped by Gods prouidence. For (whereas he was naked and accompanied with one only seruant to attend him) at such time as he bathed, there were a certaine number of armed enemies hidden in that lodging, who were fled thither for the feare they had: and during the time that Herod bathed, the first amongst them issued with his naked sword and got the doore; and after him the second; and the third no lesse armed, without offending the King, for the feare that they had of his presence: and content to escape in their owne persons, without the preiudice of other men. The next day he sent Pappus head to his brother Pheroras, who was slaine by his owne sword in reuenge of the iniury of-
E fered to Ioseph. When the tempest was done, he departed from thence, and approched neere to Ierusalem and encamped neere vnto the Citie. This was about the third yeere since he was created king at Rome: and encamping himselfe in the place which was (as he thought) fittest for battery; he addressed himselfe towards the Temple side, resoluing to batter and make breach in that place in like manner as Pompey had done before him. Hauing therefore erected three bulwarks in three places, he builded towers thereon by the assistance of many workemen; and by meanes of a great quantity of wood, which he caused to be cut downe round about the place; and hauing pointed such men as were of ripe iudgement to ouersee these works, hee left his army well prouided, and resorted to Samaria, to marry with the daughter of Alexander, who was Aristobulus
F sonne to whom he was betrothed, according as I haue heretofore declared. The yeere of the world, 3929. before Christs Natiuity, 35. Herod being alone and naked in his house escaped vnhurt amongst many armed enemies. Herod sendeth Pappus head to his brother Phæroras. Herod besiegeth Ierusalem. Herod repaireth to Samaria to marrie Alexanders daughter.

CHAP. XXVIII. G

ANTIGONVS is discomfited by SOSIVS and HEROD.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 26. al. 27.

AFTER this marriage was solemnized, Sosius repaired thither thorow the countrey of Phœnicia, and hauing first of all sent his army thorow the continent, he himselfe also resorted thither with many aswell footemen as horsemen : thither also repaired the King from Samaria, with no small army, to annexe himselfe with the old bands: for he had about thirty thousand men. All these assembled themselues together neere vnto the walles of Ierusalem, and planted their siege nigh vnto the wall of the citie that extendeth towards the northward. The army contained eleuen legions of footmen, with sixe thousand horsemen: besides the succours that came from Syria. Of this army there were two Generals, namely Sosius, who was sent by Antonius to succour Herod : and Herod himselfe, who made war for himselfe, with an intent that hauing H dispossessed Antigonus (whom he had proclaimed enemy to Rome) hee himselfe might be King in his place, according to the Senates decree. Those Iewes that were within the enclosure of the walles (that is to say, almost all the nation) resisted the Herodians with great courage and affection, vaunting and boasting much of the Temple of the Lord, and wishing all good hap and successe to the people, namely, that God would deliuer them from all dangers : and spoiling all prouision without the Citie, that was either behouefull for the vse of man or beast, by their secret thefts and excursions also they made the very besiegers destitute of reliefe and victuals. Which inconuenience Herod so well preuented, that he forestalled their meanes of theft, and laide ambushes in place conuenient to cut them off. As for victuals he sent his footmen to fetch his prouision from farre ; so that within a very little space they had aboundance of all that which was necessary in I the campe. He erected also with no lesse carefulnesse three bulwarks, by the diligent labour of a great number of workemen : for it was sommer time, and neither was the aire incommodious, or negligence of the workemen such, but that they presently furnished and finished them. Afterwards hauing raised their engines vpon them, they battered the wall, with as much violence and diligence as was possible: notwithstanding all this, they did no waies amate those that were within ; who for their parts vsed all the cunning that might bee possible to defend themselues, and by diuers sallies set fire vpon the enemies engines ; and burnt not onely those that were halfe made, but those that were wholly perfected : and when necessity draue them to handy strokes, they shewed no lesse valour then the Romans courage ; but they were inferiour vnto them in skill and martiall discipline. And when as the first wall was beaten downe, they builded vp a new, and coun- K termined against those mines that were made by the enemy ; so that they fought vnder ground hand to hand. Thus vsing despaire rather then courage, they sustained the war to the vttermost ; yea notwithstanding they were besieged by a great armie, and pressed by famine and want of victuals : for the yeere wherein the siege was continued, was the seauenth, in which the earth was vnmanured, which by vs is called the yeere of rest. But finally twenty chosen souldiers first of all mounted vpon the wall ; and after them one of Sosius Centurions : for the first wall was taken in the fortith day after the siege, and the second on the fiftieth, and some galleries were burned, which were neere vnto the Temple : which (as Herod said) were burned by Antigonus, to bring him into more hatred among the Iewes. When the outward part of the Temple, and the lower part of the Citie were taken, the Iewes fled into the Temple, and into the higher towne, for feare they had least the Romans should hinder them from offering their daily and ordinary sacrifices L vnto God : and they sent Embassadours to their enemies, to require that it might be lawfull for them onely to bring in certaine beasts to offer them for sacrifices. Which Herod their King granted them, hoping by this meanes that they would submit themselues and yeeld vp the places But perceiuing that his opinion failed him herein, and that they obstinately resisted him, to continue the soueraignty in Antigonus ; he gaue the assault, and tooke the Citie by force : where all things were incontinently filled with murthers, in that the Romans were displeased because they had so long time continued the siege ; and the Iewes that were on Herods side enforced themselues vtterly to exterminate all those that were of the contrary party : so that continuall slaughters ranged and raigned euery where, both in porches, and in the houses whereinto they entred : Neither did M the religious reuerence of the Temple saue those suppliants that resorted thither for safety, but that without all compassion both olde and yong were slaughtered : Neither did their murthering hand spare or refraine from women ; nay not so much as from yong infants. And although the King besought and requested them to forbeare them, yet no man gaue ouer, but all sorts of per-

A persons were murthered by them, without respect either of sexe or age. Antigonus inconsiderate of that estate wherein he had beene, or the fortune and disaster that at that present attended him, came downe from the tower and humbled himselfe on his knees before Sosius feete; who hauing no compassion of the change of that estate wherein he saw him, outragiously scorned him, calling him Madame Antigona: yet left he him not without guard after the manner of a Woman, but fast bound for his further assurance. But Herod was busied in deuising how hee might moderate his associates and strangers, after he had had the vpper hand ouer his enemies: For the strangers swarmed into the Citie by heapes, and not onely into the Temple, but also into the Sanctuarie. Hee therefore exhorted some, and threatned other some, and restrained the rest by force of arms; and he was more troubled at that present in beeing a Conquerour, then if he had beene conque-

B red: for that those things that were not lawfull to be seene were beheld by prophane men. Hee preuented likewise the spoile of the Citie, as much as in him lay: Beseeching Sosius most instantly, to preserue it to the vtmost, asking him if the Romans would leaue him King of a desart, after they had voided the Citie of men and goods? Alleadging furthermore, that hee esteemed the gouernment of the whole world of no value in regard of the life of one of his Citizens. Sosius answered, that it was reason that the pillage should be giuen to the Souldier; who had borne the hazzard of the siege: whereunto Herod answered, that hee would satisfie euery man out of his owne treasury: and by this meanes, hee ransomed the rest of the Citie by fulfilling those promises: For he gaue many mighty gifts vnto euery one of the Souldiers, and by proportion vnto the Captaines; but aboue all hee royally rewarded Sosius; so that euery one of them departed very rich in Siluer.

The spoile of the Citie hindred.

C This calamities hapned in the Citie of Ierusalem, in the yeere wherein Marcus Agryppa and Canidius Gallus were Consuls, which was in the hundreth, fourescore and fift Olympiade, in the third moneth, on the dayes wherein the solemne fast was celebrated; as if this affliction had iumpt together in one issue and instant with that of Pompeys: for on the same day had the same Citie beene taken twenty and seauen yeeres before. Sosius offered a crowne of golde vnto God, and afterwards departed from Ierusalem, leading Antigonus prisoner with him vnto Anthony. But Herod fearing least if Antigonus should be kept by Anthony, and sent to Rome, hee should debate his title with him before the Senate by protest that hee was descended of the royall line; whereas Herod was but a Plebeian and common person: and that although hee had of-

D fended the Romans, and thereby might not deserue to bee King; yet at least his children, who were of the princely line, were not to bee denied their title: Herod I say, fearing these things, wrought so much by force of his money with Anthony, that hee caused him to put Antigonus to death, so that at that time Herod was truely deliuered from all feare. Thus ended the estate of the Asmoneans, after 120. and sixe yeeres. This family was famous both for their nobility, and also by reason of their Sacerdotall dignity, and for the noble actions and exploits, which their ancestors had atchieued for our nation; but they lost their authority thorow their mutuall factions: which soueraignty was deriued to Herod Antipaters sonne, who was ignoble by birth, and of meane friends; who were subiects and vassals to Kings. See here what wee haue receiued from our ancestors, as touching the end of the race of the Asmoneans.

IN the former booke. I haue declared how Sosius and Herod tooke the City of Ierusalem by force, and with it Antigonus prisoner: now will we also declare that which hath subsequently followed: for after that Herod had obtained the absolute gouernment ouer the whole land of Iudæa, he aduanced all those among the common people, who fauoured his proceedings: as for those who were opposed against him, there passed not a day wherein some one or other of them suffered not punishment. But amongst the rest, Pollio the Pharisee and Sameas his Disciple, were highly honoured by him: For during the time of the siege of Ierusalem, they counselled the inhabitants to receiue and entertaine Herod: for which cause he respected them accordingly, This Pollio in times past (when Herod was found guilty of death) foretold Hircanus and the rest of the Iudges in way of exprobration, that being absolued by them he should one day inflict punishment on them all. Which prediction God in processe of time approoued by the euent: no sooner therefore became he master of Ierusalem, but he gathered together all the rich houshold stuffe that was in the palace; and furthermore hauing spoiled the rich men of their goods, and by this means leuied a great summe of gold and siluer, he sent great presents to Anthony and his friends. Moreouer he condemned fiue and forty of Antigonus principall and noblest fauourites to death, setting straight watch about their doores, that none of them might be carried out vnder colour of beeing dead. The dead bodies likewise were troden vnder foote: and all the gold, siluer, or iewels that was to be found amongst them, was carried to the king, and conuerted to his vse, so that there was no end of these miseries. For the couetousnesse of the conquerour (whose greedy and thirsty desire could hardly be quenched) laid hold on

And for that it was the ſeuenth yeere, it neceſſarily came to paſſe that the land was left vnmanured: for we are forbidden to ſowe in this yeere. Anthony hauing taken Antigonus priſoner, reſolued to keepe him in priſon vntill the time of his triumph: But after he had receiued tidings that the nation of the Iewes were ready to innouate and rebell, and continued their good affection toward Antigonus, in regard of the hatred they conceiued againſt Herod; he concluded with himſelfe to take his head from him at Antioch: For the Iewes could ſcarcely containe themſelues. Strabo of Cappadocia teſtifieth no leſſe in theſe words. Anthony hauing brought Antigonus the Iewe to Antioch, cauſed his head to be cut off; and was the firſt among the Romanes that hath cauſed a King to bee beheaded in this manner: ſuppoſing that the Iewes might neuer otherwiſe be induced to change their opinions, and receiue Herod: yet this opinion B of his was not anſwerable to equity. For notwithſtanding whatſoeuer impulſion hee might deuiſe, yet could they not be induced to call him King: in ſo high eſtimate and account held they their former King. But Anthony ſuppoſed that that infamy would obſcure his renowne, and leſſen the generall hate that they bare to Herod. See here what Strabo writeth.

As ſoone as the high Prieſt Hircanus (who was priſoner among the Parthians) heard that Herod had taken poſſeſſion of the kingdome, hee returned backe vnto him, beeing deliuered after this manner following. Barzapharnes, and Pacorus Princes of the Parthians had taken Hircanus, who was firſt high Prieſt, and afterwards king, and with him Phaſælus Herods brother, and ledde them away priſoners with them into their owne countrey: Phaſælus not able to endure the diſhonour of impriſonment, and preferring an honourable death before a reprochfull and ignominiC ous life, murthered himſelfe, as I haue heretofore declared.

CHAP. II.

How HIRCANVS diſmiſſed by the Parthians, returned vnto HEROD.

PHRAATES King of Parthia, vnderſtanding how nobly Hircanus was deſcended, who was brought priſoner vnto him, entertained him graciouſly: and for this cauſe drew him out of priſon, permitting him to conuerſe in Babylon, in which place there were a great number of Iewes, who honoured Hircanus very much; and no leſſe then their high Prieſt and D King. The like alſo did all they of that nation inhabiting as farre as Euphrates, which did not a little content Hircanus. But after that hee was aduertiſed that Herod was poſſeſſed of the kingdome, he transferred his hopes another way, beeing of his owne nature tenderly affected toward his friends, expecting that one day Herod would requite him for that he had deliuered him from death whereunto hee was condemned, and in danger likewiſe of the penaltie and puniſhment. He began therefore to conſult with the Iewes as touching his iourney; who in way of dutie and loue came to viſite him, and who beſought him, and importuned him to abide with them, offering him all ſeruice and honour; aſſuring him that he ſhould in no leſſe manner be reſpected among them, then their high Prieſt and King; yea in farre higher regard then he might any waies be in his owne countrey, by reaſon of the maime he had in his body thorow *Antigo*E nus tyranny: alleadging that Kings doe not ordinarily call to their remembrance thoſe pleaſures that they haue receiued in their infant fortunes, becauſe that with their eſtates they change both their manners and inclinations. But notwithſtanding all theſe or ſuch like allegations, yet could not Hircanus be withdrawne from the deſire he had to repaire homeward. Herod alſo wrote vnto him, that he ſhould require Phraates and the Iewes that inhabited his kingdome, in no ſort to enuie his felicitie, in that he ſhould partake with him both in dignitie and royaltie, alleadging that the time was now come wherein he might acknowledge the benefits he had receiued, by being heretofore nouriſhed and preſerued by him. With theſe letters he ſent Samaralla likewiſe on an embaſſage to Phraates furniſhed with great and rich preſents, endeuouring by that meanes to winne him, that hee in no ſort ſhould hinder his gratulation and good intent towards one that had ſo highly deſerued at his hands; yet were not his proteſtations anſwerable to his pretence. F For inſomuch as he gouerned not with that vprightnes which became a iuſt king; he feared leaſt ſome alteration might befall him, according to his demerites: for which cauſe he ſought to get Hircanus vnder his power, or at leaſtwiſe to diſpatch him out of his life, which hee afterwards performed. When as therefore Herod had perſwaded the Parthian to diſmiſſe Hircanus, and the Iewes to furniſh him with money ſufficient to beare his expence in his iourney, he receiued him with all honour. In common aſſemblies he gaue him alwaies the higheſt place, and in the time of festiuals, he made him alwaies sit downe before him; and the more closely to deceiue him, he called him brother, endeuoring himselfe by all means wholly to extinguish in him all colour and cause of suspicion of treachery: neither intermitted he any other stratagems, whereby in his opinion he might any waies further or promote his cause; and yet by these meanes occasioned hee no small sedition in his owne family. For carefully prouiding least any one among the nobilitie should be established high Priest, hee sent to Babylon for a certaine man of base condition called Ananel, and gaue him the Priesthood. For which cause Alexandra grew sodainly displeased, not being able to endure that outrage. This woman was Hircanus daughter, and Alexanders wife, who was King Aristobulus son, who had two children by her husband, the one wondrous beautifull who was called Aristobulus; the other was Mariamme, who was likewise faire, and married to Herod. Shee was sore mooued and highly displeased to see her sonne so much indignified, for that during his life another was called to the honour of high Priesthood: for which cause she wrote vnto Cleopatra by the meanes of a certaine Musition, beseeching her to beg the high Priesthood at Antonius hands for her sonne. But for that Antonius made little reckoning of those suits, a certaine friend of his called Gellius, who was come into Iury about certaine of his affairs, and who had seene Aristobulus, fell in loue with him by reason of his beauty: and being abashed likewise at his great and goodly stature, and allured by Mariammes admirable beautie, hee openly protested that hee accounted Alexandra a happy mother in her children: and deuising to this effect with her, hee perswaded her to send the pictures of her two children to Antonius, for that if he should but behold them, he would refuse him in nothing, wherein hee should request his friendship. Alexandra perswaded by these words, sent their pictures vnto Antonius. Gellius also made the matter more wonderfull, telling him that the children seemed rather to be ingendered of no mortall straine, but by some diuine power, labouring as much as in him lay that Antonius might be allured to affection them. Who supposing it to be a matter ill beseeming him to send for Mariamme, who was married to Herod, and desirous likewise to auoide Cleopatras suspicions, wrote vnto Herod that vnder some honest pretext he should send Alexandras sonne vnto him (with this addition, if it might not seeme troublesome vnto him.) Which matter when Herod vnderstood, he thought it no waies incident to his security to send Aristobulus, (who was a faire yong man, and little more at that time then sixteene yeeres old, and so nobly borne: considering that Antonius was at that present in such authority, that no one in Rome was in greater credit then he; and who besides that was very much addicted to his pleasures, which he openly hunted after without feare of punishment in regard of his greatnesse and power. He therefore wrote him this answer, that if the yong man should but only depart out of the countrey, all the land would incontinently be filled with warre and troubles, for that the Iewes pretended alteration in gouernment, and sought to innouate by preferring a new King. When as therefore hee had in this sort excused himselfe vnto Antonius; he resolued to entertaine both the yonger Aristobulus and his mother Alexandra, with more respect. Moreouer his wife Mariamme did continually importune him to giue the Priesthood to her brother, alleadging that by that honour he might preuent the occasion of his trauell. For which cause assembling his friends together in counsell, he grieuously accused Alexandra before them, protesting that she secretly conspired against the kingdome, and that by the mediation of Cleopatra, shee laboured to dispossesse him of the soueraigntie, to the intent that her sonnes by Antonius meanes might gouerne in his steed. Which practise of hers was so much the more vniust, because she depriued her owne daughter of that honour wherein she was inseated, and raised vp troubles likewise in that kingdome which hee had conquered with great trauell, and extreame danger: Yet notwithstanding that he willingly forgat that which was past, and forgaue those wrongs she had vrged against him, and was ready notwithstanding to shew all kindnesse and courtesie both to her and hers. Furthermore, hee gaue the high Priesthood to yong Aristobulus, alleadging that heretofore he had established Ananel in that place for no other respect, then for that Aristobulus was vnder yeeres.

After that he had thus seriously and considerately discoursed in the presence of the Ladies, and the consistorie of his friends; Alexandra almost beside her selfe, not only thorow the ioy she had conceiued by this vnexpected good fortune, but also for the feare she had to be suspected, began to defend her selfe with teares & protestations, saying that all whatsoeuer she had either practised or done, was to prefer her son vnto the priesthood whom she saw dishonored: but as touching the kingdom that she had neuer pretended, neither would (if so be she should be presented therwith) receiue the same, thinking her selfe for the present sufficiently honoured, both for that she saw Aristobulus in that estate, for the assurance that all her progeny should receiue, in that he was lifted

HEREVPON Herod tooke away the Prieſthood inſtantly from Ananel, who was not that countryman borne (as we haue heretofore declared) but was borne amongſt thoſe Iewes that inhabite and were planted beyond Euphrates by the Aſſyrians. For diuers thouſand Iewes inhabite the countrey of Babylon, and from thence tooke he his originall alſo, being otherwiſe of the race of the Prieſts, and intirely affected toward Herod for a long time before, with whom hee had familiar acquaintance. Hee had preferred him to his honour at ſuch time, as he was made King; and degraded him likewiſe to appeaſe the troubles of his family; demeaning himſelfe herein contrary to the law of the countrey: for whereas any one hath once C bin inſtalled in that degree, he is neuer to be diſplaced. The firſt that tranſgreſſed this ordinance was Antiochus Epiphanes, who diſpoſſeſſed Ioſuah, and preferred his brother Onias to his place. The ſecond was Ariſtobulus, who tooke it away from his brother Hircanus, and vſurped himſelfe. Herod was the third, who gaue the Prieſthood to Ariſtobulus, eſtabliſhing him in Ananels place before he was dead: and by this meanes ſuppoſing that he had found out a remedie to appeaſe the diſcords of his family, hee notwithſtanding all this liued not without ſuſpicion what euent would follow after this reconciliation: for he feared Alexandra, leaſt demeaning her ſelfe in ſuch ſort as before time ſhe had done, ſhe ſhould ſeeke occaſion hereafter to raiſe new troubles. He commanded her therefore to containe her ſelfe within the royall palace, and to do nothing of D her owne authoritie. Beſides that he had appointed certaine intelligencers, who ſhould diligently obſerue that nothing ſhould bee done without his knowledge, no not concerning her particular expences and table. All which things exaſperated her hate and encreaſed the ſame againſt Herod; for being full of feminine pride, ſhe diſdained to ſee her ſelfe thus wrongfully ſuſpected, deſiring rather to ſuffer any thing, then to be depriued of the libertie of free ſpeech; and vnder colour to be honoured, to liue continually in ſeruitude and feare. Whereupon ſhee ſent certaine of her truſtie friends to Cleopatra to complaine, and lament vnto her the importable miſeries of her preſent eſtate, requiring her, according to her power, to giue readie and ſpeedie reliefe. Whereupon Cleopatra ſent her word, that both ſhee and her ſonne ſhould reſort vnto her into Ægypt, with as great ſecrecy as might be poſſible. Vpon which aduice and the allowance thereof, ſhee E practiſed this policie. Shee cauſed two coffins to be made, ſuch as men were wont to burie the dead in, in which ſhee hid both her ſelfe and her ſonne, commanding thoſe ſeruants of hers that were priuie to her deliberation to carry them out in the night time, and to bend their courſe directly towards the ſea, where there was a barke in readineſſe prepared to ſhape their courſe, and conuey them into Ægypt. But Eſop one of her houſhold ſeruants declared this enterpriſe of hers to Sabbion one of Alexandras friends, ſuppoſing that he had beene made priuy thereunto: who had no ſooner inkling thereof, but (for that before times he was Herods enemy, by reaſon he was ſuſpected to haue beene one of thoſe that ſought to poyſon Antipater) hee determined by diſcouery of this ſecret flight, to conuert Herods hate into aſſured friendſhip: and preſently diſcouered Alexandras ſecret enterpriſe to the King. Who diſſembling the matter vntill it was vpon the point of execution, ſurpriſed her at ſuch time as ſhe thought to flie, and yet notwithſtanding hee F pardoned her that fault (in that he durſt not decree any puniſhment againſt her, though he could haue found in his heart to haue vſed ſeueritie) for that Cleopatra would not haue contained her ſelfe had ſhe but had ſuch an occaſion offered her to expreſſe her hatred againſt Herod. For which cauſe vnder the colour of a high and magnanimous ſpirit, hee made ſhew to pardon her of his meere clemency: yet inwardly reſolued hee to make yong Ariſtobulus away: yet not raſhly vpon the inſtant, leaſt the act ſhould grow apparant and palpable.

The yeere of the world, 3931. before Christs Nativity 33.

Now the feast of Tabernacles was at hand, which was one of those that was ceremoniously G and solemnly celebrated among vs; for which cause he concealed his intents during the festiuall daies, intending both in himselfe and in the presence and company of the people, to follow all kind of pleasure and delight; yet did his enuie incite him to hasten the execution of his will. Aristobulus was at that time some seuenteene yeere olde, who at such time as hee approched the altar to offer sacrifices, according to the lawe, apparelled in the high priests ornaments to performe the ceremonies, he who for amiable countenance and goodly stature surpassed the yongnes and tenderneſſe of his yeeres) expressing in his countenance the dignitie and nobilitie of his race, drew the eies and good affection of all the people vnto him; so that they openly called to remembrance the noble actions of Aristobulus his grandfather. All the people therefore being surmounted by those their affections, and at that present time being all of them troubled with the ioy they conceiued, they brake out by little and little into happy acclamations, mixed with wishes and H praiers: so that the good will the people bare to Aristobulus discouered it selfe openly, and they manifestly (although too hastily in such a kingdome) declared what euils they generally endured: For all which causes Herod concluded to execute that which he had heretofore complotted, and conceited against Aristobulus. As soone therefore as the feast was ouerpassed, he soiourned in Iericho, where Alexandra entertained him. In that place he vsed Aristobulus with all kindnes, to the end to draw him vnto some place, where he feared nothing, playing also with him, and counterfaiting to sport, after the fashion of the yong men, to gratifie him. Now, for that the place where they disported themselues was by nature too hot, they quickly wearied, left their sport, and went out together to take fresh ayre, and recouering a pleasant shade vnder certaine arbors, and I neere certaine fish-pooles which were largely spread round about, they beheld certaine of their seruants and friends that swomme therein, with whom not long after Aristobulus began to swim, being perswaded thereunto by Herod. Whereupon Herods confederates (who were deputed to execute the murther) laid hands on him and thrust him vnder the water, pretending to duck him in sport, and neuer gaue him ouer vntill such time as they had stifled him in the water. This happened about the euening, and after this manner died Aristobulus, after hee had liued in all for the space of eighteene yeeres, and administred the priesthood one whole yeere: and after this, Ananel presently recouered his former dignitie.

Aristobulus is drowned by Herods direction, Ananell restored to the Priesthood.

Now when this accident was reported to the women, all of them were sodainly deuoured in teares, and transported with strange lamentations, which they spent ouer the dead body. All the K citie also was maruellously amated, neither was there any priuate family that thought not it selfe touched by this inconuenient, but imagined the losse in particular to concerne himselfe, and no other. But aboue all, when Alexandra had notice of this wicked deede, she was more passionate and perplexed then any other, being so much the more discomforted, for that she knew how all things had hapned. But the feare of a farre greater mischiefe constrained her to represse her passion, in such sort, that diuers times she was ready to bereaue her of her owne life, and dispatch her selfe out of miserie with her owne hands. But she contained her selfe, to the end, that suruiuing (and liuing after her sonne, who was so traiterously and fraudulently slaine, and prolonging her owne life without giuing any suspicion or shadow, that she supposed her sonne to be thus cursedly murthered) shee might with more opportunity expect the occasion to reuenge her selfe: For L which cause, shee dissembled all things, gouerned her griefe, and made shew that she knew nothing of that which was either intended, or had hapned. As for Herod, he laboured by all meanes to perswade the strangers, that this death had befallen Aristobulus without his knowledge; and did not only prepare that which was requisite for the funerall, but vext himselfe likewise, anmade shew of a man truely deuoured in his sorrow: and it may be that in remembrance of Aristobulus beauty and flourishing yong yeeres, he was truely touched with compassion, notwithstanding that he imagined that this death of his should be a meanes of his intire security, demeaning himselfe in all things very circumspectly, with intent to purge himselfe of that crime. But especially he shewed his great magnificence in the interring of his bodie, both in the furnishing and preparation of the herse, as in the perfumes and other things thereunto belonging, in such M sort as the griefe which the Ladies had conceiued, was pacified after this manner of consolation.

CHAP. IIII.

The yeere of the world, 3931. before Christs Nativity, 33.

CLEOPATRA thirsting after the kingdome of Arabia and Iewry, laboureth to beg a part of them at ANTHONIES hands.

BVT none of all these things could either mooue or mollifie Alexandra, but that daily more and more shee increased her sorrow, and in the heart of her teares kindled her wrath and heate with a desire of reuenge. Shee therefore certified Cleopatra by her priuate letters of Herods treasons, and hers sonnes most miserable and vntimely death, Cleopatra long before that time desirous to assist her, and hauing compassion of her miserie, vndertooke the matter, and ceased not to encite Anthony to reuenge Aristobulus death, telling him that it was an vnpardonable errour, that Herod being created King in such a state, whereunto he had no right, should bee suffered to practise such conspiracies against the true and lawfull Kings. Anthony perswaded by these her words (as soone as he came vnto Laodicea) sent for Herod, to the end that making his appearance, he might answer that which might be obiected against him, as touching Aristobulus death: for hee disliked the act, notwithstanding that Herod himselfe had attempted it. But although Herod was affraid of this accusation, and did not a little suspect Cleopatras displeasure (for that shee ceased not continually to proucke Anthony against him) yet obeyed he this commandement, and transported himselfe thither (the rather for that he durst not otherwise doe) notwithstanding he left his vncle Ioseph behind him, committing the gouernment both of the kingdome and his priuate estate vnto him, giuing him secret instructions to kill Mariamme, if so bee that Anthony should happen to doe him any mischiefe. For he loued her so extreamely by reason of her beautie, that he supposed himselfe iniured, if after his decease she should be beloued by any other; and he openly declared that all that misery which befell him, proceeded from Anthonies passion, and intire affection, and admiration of her beautie, whereof he had before time heard some report. As soone therefore as hee had in this sort disposed his affaires, notwithstanding he had little hope of good hap, yet repaired he to Anthony.

Herod ready to repaire vnto Anthony, commandeth Ioseph, to whose charge he committed the kingdome to kil his wife.

But Ioseph gouerning that kingdome that was committed to his hands, conuersed diuers times vpon this occasion with Mariamme, and communicated oftentimes with her, not onely for publique profit sake, but also to doe her that honour which so great a Princesse deserued. At such time therefore as hee secretly deuised with her, as touching the friendship and ardent affection which Herod bare vnto her, his speeches were iested at after the manner of Ladies, but especially flouted at by Alexandra. For which cause Ioseph, being ouer-forward to expresse the Kings good will towards her, proceeded so farre that he discouered the commandement that was giuen him; thereby to make manifest, that it was not possible for Herod to liue without her, and that if any inconuenient should happen vnto him, he would not in death also bee disioyned from her. This discourse of Iosephs was not interpreted by the Ladies, as a demonstration of his good will, but rather as a manifestation of Herods malignitie; who dying, desired also that they should perish, and interpreted that which he had spoken, as the testimonie of his tyrannous and malicious heart. At that time there was a rumour spred in the citie of Ierusalem by Herods maligners, that Anthony had in such sort tormented him, that he was dead. Whereupon all those of the Kings house were troubled, and in especiall the Ladies; so that Alexandra incited Ioseph to forsake the palace, and take the Ladies, and to retire himselfe vnder the ensignes of the Romane legion, who at that time were about the citie for the securitie of the kingdome, vnder the conduct of the Tribune Iulius, to the end first of all, that if any trouble should happen in the Kings house, they might be by this meanes in safetie, hauing the Romanes to friend; and afterwards, for that they hoped that if Anthony should see Mariamme, shee might obtaine all things at his hands whatsoeuer shee desired, assuring him that he would restore the kingdome vnto her, and depriue her of nothing that concerned, or was answerable to her royall estate.

A foolish rumour of Herods death.

But whilest they were distracted with these deliberations, there came letters from Herod, contrarie to some few mens report, and all mens expectation. For as soone as hee came vnto Anthony, he compassed his fauour by his many presents, which he had brought with him to that intent from Ierusalem, and sodainly debating the matter with him, he appeased him in such sort, as hee was no more displeased against him: and from that time forward, Cleopatras speeches were but coldly conceited of in regard of his so ample satisfaction. For Anthony said, that there was no reason that a King should be answerable for that which he had done in his kingdome; for that in so doing, he should no more be King: but that when the honour is once giuen him, he hath the authoritie likewiſe left him, to vſe his regall power. Vrging further, that it concerned Cleopatra G likewiſe her ſelfe, not to ſearch too curiouſly into the affaires and gouernment of kingdomes. Herod certified all this by his letters, and ſignified further, what other honours hee had receiued at Anthonies hands in aſſemblies and feaſts, to which he inuited him alwaies; notwithſtanding that Cleopatra ſeemed to be diſpleaſed therewith, detracting him; and being deſirous to get the kingdome of Iewry into her hands, ſtroue by all meanes poſſible to put him to death: but that he had found Anthony alwaies an vpright man, and feared not henceforward that any euill ſhould befall him: and returning preſently vpon this, he brought with him a more ample teſtimony of Anthonies moſt aſſured affection, both in reſpect of his owne kingdome, as of his particular affaires. And as touching Cleopatra, ſhe pretended not to ſeeke any further then that which ſhe had, becauſe that Anthony had giuen her Cœloſyria in ſteed of that which ſhee had demanded, forbearing thence-forward to mention Iewry any more, becauſe that Anthony wholly reiected thoſe H ſuites.

After theſe letters came vnto their hands, the trouble and diſturbance wherein they were, and their deſire to retire vnto the Romans, as if Herod had beene dead, was wholly extinguiſhed. Yet was not this their reſolution hidden from the King; but that Herod after he had brought Anthony on his way (who at that time ſet forward in his warres againſt the Parthians) he returned into Iewry. Vpon his arriuall, his ſiſter Salome, and his mother certified him exactly of Alexandras intent, and the determination of her friends. Salome likewiſe ſpake againſt Ioſeph her huſband, and ſlandered him, obiecting againſt him that hee had Mariammes company. All which ſhe ſpake through the malice ſhe had long time conceiued againſt him, for that in a certaine debate Mariamme had in her rage deſpitefully hit them in the teeth with their obſcure birth. Herod I (who was alwaies inflamed with the earneſt affection which he bare vnto his wife Mariamme) was ſodainly troubled hereat: and although iealouſie preſſed him forward, yet loue reſtrained him and kept him from doing any thing raſhly, thorow paſſion or affection: for which cauſe hee called Mariamme aſide, and demanded of her in ſecret, what familiar company ſhe had kept with Ioſeph? Shee by ſolemne oathes and by all poſſible allegations in her owne defence appeaſed the King by little and little, and pacified his choler. For in ſuch ſort was he tranſported with the loue that he bare vnto his wife, that he beleeued ſhe had ſufficiently purged her ſelfe of thoſe ſlanders, that had beene inforced againſt her; yeelding her moſt heartie thankes for her honeſt affection towards him, and declaring vnto her openly the great eſteeme and loue that he bare vnto her. Finally (as it often falleth out amongſt louers) they fell to teares, and embraced each other with great affection: for that ſhe gaue him no credit, hee endeuoured the more to draw her to be- K liefe. Whereupon Mariamme ſaid vnto him: It is not the act of a louer to haue giuen commandement, that if any thing ſhould befall thee otherwaies then well with Anthony, I ſhould preſently be done to death with thee; notwithſtanding I haue no waies offended thee. No ſooner were theſe words out of her mouth, but the King entred into a ſtrange paſſion, and giuing ouer his embraces hee cried out with a loud voice and tore his haire, ſaying, that hee had a moſt euident proofe that Ioſeph had committed adultery with her: for that he would not haue diſcouered thoſe things which had beene ſpoken to him in ſecret, except they had greatly truſted the one the other: and in this emotion or rage of iealouſie hardly contained he himſelfe from killing his wife. But the force of loue ouercame him ſo much, that hee bridled his rage notwithſtanding it were irkeſome and grieuous vnto him. Yet gaue hee order that Ioſeph ſhould be ſlaine without either audience or iuſtification of his innocency: and as touching Alexandra, who was the cauſe of all L theſe troubles, he kept her priſoner.

Cleopatra very couetous.

Cleopatra murthereth her brother and ſiſter.

About the ſame time there grew certaine troubles and alterations in Syria: for that Cleopatra continually ſollicited and importuned Anthony, and whetted on his diſpleaſure againſt all, perſwading him to remooue all from their gouernments, and to beſtow the ſame on her ſelfe. And for that Anthony loued her extreamely, ſhe was in great eſtimation and credit with him: and being in her owne nature inclined to couetouſneſſe, ſhee abſtained from no kinde of corrupt dealing and wickedneſſe. For knowing that the kingdome ſhould deſcend vnto her brother, ſhee cauſed him to be poiſoned, when as hee was but fifteene yeeres olde: as for her ſiſter Arſinoe, ſhe cauſed her to be ſlaine by Anthonies meanes at ſuch time, as ſhee made her praiers in the Temple M of Diana in Epheſus. Moreouer, in what place ſoeuer ſhee vnderſtood that there was any hope to get money, whether it were in robbing of Temples, or in breaking open ſepulchers; ſhe would be poſſeſſed thereof: neither was there any religious place ſo ſacred, from whence ſhe tooke not away the ornaments. Furthermore, there was not any thing ſo prophane and interdicted, which

A she laid not hands on to satisfie her vnbridled auarice. Neither was the whole word sufficient enough to content this magnificent Lady, who was made slaue to her owne desires; and her disordinate appetite was such, that all the riches in the world were not able to satiate and fill the same. For this cause she incessantly importuned Antonius to take from others, to be liberal towards her: and therefore entring into Syria with him, she presently bethought her selfe how she might get it into her possession. For she caused Lysanias Ptolomies sonne to be put to death, obiecting against him that he had priuate intelligence with the Parthians. She begged Iury also at Antonius hands, and required him besides that, to dispossesse the kings of Arabia. He was in such sort possessed by this woman that he seemed not only to be bewitched with her words, but also inchanted by her poisons, to obey her in whatsoeuer she thought meet: yet was he ashamed to commit so manifest an iniquity, for feare least being so farre ouer-ruled by her, he should happen to offend in matters
B of more consequence. Least therfore either by denying her, he should draw her to discontent; or by condiscending to her demands, he should seeme to be the wickedest man aliue, he deducted a seuerall portion of both their dominions, and presented her with the same. He gaue her likewise those cities that are situate betweene the floud Eleutherius and Egypt, except Tyre and Sidon, which he knew to be free cities of long continuance: although by earnest solicitation she sought to be seized of these also.

C AFTER that Cleopatra had obtained all these things, and had accompanied Antonius as far as Euphrates, who at that time went to make war in Armenia: she returned back againe, and by the way visited Apamea and Damasco, and at last tooke her progresse into Iurie: Where King Herod met with her, and assured that portion which had beene giuen vnto her in Arabia, with all the reuenewes of Iericho vnto her. This countrey bringeth foorth that balme, which of all other ointments is the most precious, and onely groweth in that place, and no other, to the bignes of great Dates. Being arriued in that place, and growne inwardly familiar with Herod, she sought to allure and draw him to her lust, beeing of her selfe naturally addicted to such pleasures and intemperance; and happely also being somewhat touched with loue, or rather (as it seemeth most likely) shee in this sort laid the foundation to intrap him vnder colour to reuenge her selfe of some outrage by that meanes. But in effect she generally manifested, that she was ouercome by her desire and sensuall lust. But Herod was not ouer kindly bent towards Cleopatra;
D knowing of long time how badly she was inclined towards all men; and at that time hee conceiued the greater hatred against her, because by that intemperance of hers she pretended to destroy him: and although that from the beginning he had reiected her sollicitations; yet determined he to reuenge himselfe on her, if so bee by these her subtill vnderminings shee should prosecute and continue her subtill policies to betray him. He asked counsaile also of his friends, whether hauing her in his possession, hee should put her to death. For in so doing all those should be deliuered from diuers euils, whom either in time past she had molested, or hereafter should bring in trouble. Moreouer that it should be profitable for Antonius also, whom without all doubt she would forsake, if any occasion or necessitie should enforce him to make triall of her friendship. But whilest he debated and discoursed vpon this resolution, his friends restrained and disswaded him;
E assuring him that it was a great indignity for him, who was a Prince of high thoughts and haughty resolutions, to cast himselfe into manifest perill, beseeching him to attempt nothing rashly: For that Antonius would not endure the same, notwithstanding it might be approoued that it stood with his profit: nay rather that by this meanes he should increase his desire, for that by force and subtiltie he might seeme to haue lost her. Further, that no one colour of excuse should be left him, in that she was the woman of greatest note and nobility of that time; and that whatsoeuer profit might redound vnto him by her death, should be annexed with Antonius iniury. Wherby it most euidently appeared, how great and remedilesse domages would befall both to the kingdome and the kings family also; whereas nothing letted him by repulsing her vnlawfull demand to dispose
F all things for the present state with great discretion. By these and such like reasons and probable coniectures, they deterred and disswaded him from aduenturing vpon his apparant danger, and attempting so hainous an act: so that contrariwise they induced him to offer Cleopatra many rich presents, and to conduct her onward on her way towards Egypt.

As for the tributes of the countries which Herod was bound to pay vnto Cleopatra, for the lands beſtowed on her by Antonius, hee without deceit iuſtly paid them, ſuppoſing it to be very incident to his ſecurity, to continue himſelfe in her good fauor. As for the Arabians, they ſeeing that Herod had the leuying of ſuch a tribute, paied him for ſome little time two hundreth talents a yeere; but afterwards they grew ſlow and negligent in their paiments, and ſcarcely ſatisfied the halfe, and that alſo very negligently.

ARETAS demeaning himſelfe thus vngratefully, and refuſing to doe that which in right he ought to performe; Herod made a ſhew to take armes againſt him, but deferred his reuenge in regard of the contentions amongſt the Romans. For at that time nought elſe was expected then the Actian warre (which fel in the hundreth, eighty and ſeuenth Olympiade) in which Auguſtus Cæſar determined to trie his title with Antonius for the Monarchie. In the meane while Herod, who had already for many yeares beene maſter of a peaceable and fruitfull countrey, from whence he drew rich reuenues and many forces, gathered diuers companies of men, with the greateſt expedition that he might, to ſuccour Antonius. But he by letters ſignified vnto him, that he had no need of his aſſiſtance: notwithſtanding hee commanded him to make a road vpon the Arabian, whoſe perfidious dealing Antonius had not onely vnderſtood by Herod himſelfe, but alſo by Cleopatras aduertiſements. For ſhee very cunningly conceiued, that it would redound vnto her profit, if one of theſe two ſhould ouerthrow the other. Herod according to theſe inſtructions from Antonius, returned backe into his countrey, and retained his armie alwaies ready about him, and incontinently with the ſame inuaded Arabia, and with his forces both horſemen and footmen came directly to Dioſpolis, where the Arabians (hauing notice of his intended warre againſt them) came out to meete him. In this place fought they a moſt cruell battell, wherein at the laſt the Iewes had the vpper hand. After this, a great army of Arabians aſſembled themſelues at Cana, a certaine place in Cœloſyria. Whereof when Herod was fore-aduertiſed, he marched foorth againſt them, accompanied with the greater part of his forces. As ſoone as he drew neere to Cana, he determined to incampe in that place, and after he had well fortified and entrenched his forces, to ſet on the enemy vpon the firſt opportunity: but whileſt hee imployed himſelfe in the execution hereof, all the armie of the Iewes cried out, requiring him without delay, to lead them forward againſt the Arabians. And thus highly were they incouraged, both in reſpect of the confidence they had in the good adminiſtration and ordering of their army, as in regard of their forwardnes, who had been actors in the former warre, and partakers of the victory; ſo that they ſcarce gaue their enemy leaſure to ſettle themſelues to their weapons. When as therefore Herod perceiued that the heat and forwardnes of the ſoldier could hardly be appeaſed; he thought good to make vſe of the readines of his army, and arming himſelfe he marched formoſt, being ſeconded by his ſouldiers in battell ray, with a ſoldier-like march. This ſodaine approach of his wonderfully abaſhed the Arabians: For although for a while they made head againſt them; yet perceiuing their enemies full of heart, and themſelues vnable to reſiſt them, diuers of them retreated and betooke themſelues to flight; ſo that all of them had beene vtterly defeated, had not Athenio endomaged Herod, and the Iewes. For hee hauing the command of that army which Cleopatra had in that place; and beſides that, bearing a priuy grudge towards Herod, diſpoſed his army in a readines, and expecting the euent of the battell, reſolued with himſelfe to containe his forces if the Arabians ouercame the Iewes; and if ſo be they had the worſt (as indeed it came to paſſe) to ſet vpon the Iewes, who ſhould be ſpent by that time; and ſurpriſing them at vnawares euen in the height of their hope of good happe, to maſſacre and ſlaughter them with his freſh ſupplies. When as therefore the Iewes had ſpent all their ſtrength againſt their profeſſed enemies, and expected nothing leſſe then the aſſurance of the victory, he charged and ouercame them who had retreated into certaine rough and difficult places (whereunto their enemies were better accuſtomed then themſelues (where being grieuouſly wounded and ill intreated by the Arabians, who returned backe and ſet vpon them, diuers

A diuers of them that fled were ſlaine, and died ſundry kinds of death; and of thoſe that eſcaped, few of them recouered the campe. Herod loſing the hope of this battell, poſted on horſebacke as faſt as he might, to bring on freſh ſupplies: but notwithſtanding all his expedition and diligence; yet could he not recouer the place in due time, but that the campe of the Iewes was taken and ſacked, and the Arabians obtained no ſmall good hap beyond their expectation, becomming Lords of that victory which was wholly vnexpected by them, and wherein they ſlew a great number of their enemies. From that time forward, Herod began to make certaine incurſions and roades into Arabia, preying the countrey, and doing them much miſchiefe: He incamped himſelfe likewiſe vpon the mountaines, forbearing to draw his whole forces into the field; notwithſtanding by his diligence and induſtry in trauell, his labours were not fruitleſſe; but that preuailing in ſome exploits, he ſought out all means to aboliſh and put away the ignominy of his former diſcomfiture.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Earthquake that hapned in Iewrie.

AT ſuch time as Cæſar and Anthony made triall of their titles in the Actian warre, and in the ſeuenth yeere of the raigne of King Herod, there hapned ſuch an earthquake in the countrey of Iudæa, that neuer the like was ſeene in any other place: ſo that diuers beaſts were ſlaine thereby, and many men were ouerwhelmed with the ruines of their houſes, and periſhed to the number of ten thouſand. Onely the men of warre receiued no domage, becauſe they encamped in the open field. The Arabians hearing tidings hereof (which were farre greater by report, then they were in effect, by ſuch, who in fauour of the Arabians and hate of the Iewes, reported the ſame) waxed proud: yea ſo much was their courage increaſed hereof, as if all the Cities of Iewry had beene already ouerthrowne, and the men thereof extinguiſhed; and as if they had no aduerſaries remaining aliue to contradict them. For which cauſe laying hold of thoſe Embaſſadours of the Iewes, who came vnto them to intreat of peace in their deſperate eſtates, they ſlew them, and afterwards in the heate of their ſpleene, ſet vpon their enemies campe. But the Iewes not daring to expect or preuent their aſſault, for their preſent miſeries had deiected their minds, ſeemed to neglect their common-weale, and in manner to deſpaire of their ſafetie. Theſe thus affected did the King incourage, and called vnto him their captaines, and (as much as in him lay) awaking and reuiuing their drouping ſpirits; and when hee had reſtored thoſe of better hope, to more ſucceſſefull good hap, at length he attempted to ſpeake vnto all the armie, who in the former ouerthrowes, would yeeld no reſpect or allowance to perſwaſion. Theſe did he both to comfort and exhort in ſuch manner, as followeth;

E FRIENDS and fellow ſouldiers, there is not one of you but knoweth at this time, there are ſo many preſent and impendent misfortunes attending our eſtates, as are able to weary and amaze thoſe men, that are of the greateſt reſolution. But ſith wee muſt needly fight, and that all thoſe things that haue befallen vs vnto this preſent, are of that kinde, that by your owne vertue and magnanitie they may be recouered; I haue reſolued to informe, and confirme you in thoſe meanes, whereby you may retaine and continue your accuſtomed valour and noble courage. Firſt of all therefore I will approoue vnto you (as touching our warre) that it conſiſteth on iuſt grounds, for that we are enforced thereunto thorow the outrage of our enemies: the knowledge whereof ſhould chiefely make you recouer your courage. Secondly, I will apparently approoue vnto you, that our eſtates are not ſo deſperate, but that we haue great and aſſured hopes to obtaine the victorie. Firſt of all therefore, I will diſcourſe of that which formerly I propoſed, and will make your ſelues Iudges of thoſe things which I will diſcourſe vpon. For your

F ſelues are priuie to the Arabians vniuſtice, and how perfidious they are to their friends, and impious and barbarous towards all men; but in eſpeciall, they haue alwaies troubled vs, prouoking vs thorow their extreame auarice and malignant enuie, with perpetuall iniuries. And yet to let ſlip all other our benefits to that nation, who is hee that deliuered them from their imminent perill and thraldome, that was hazzarded by Cleopatras meanes, but our ſelues? For the friendſhip I had with Anthony, and his beneuolence towards me, was the cauſe that their burthen of miſerie

Beſides, after ſhee had wrought him by her ſollicitation to cut off certaine portions of the two kingdomes to be giuen vnto her, the matter was ſo handled by me, that by diuers preſents particularly beſtowed vpon him by my hands, I haue obtained ſecuritie for vs both, and by disburſing
" two hundreth talents of mine owne, and giuing my word for two hundreth more for others, for
" the reuenewes of that very land which in times paſt was ours, and theſe now poſſeſſe and enioy.
" Notwithſtanding, reaſon it were in my opinion, that we that are Iewes ſhould not be tributaries,
" or giue any portion of our countrey to any man; and if we moſt needly doe it, it ill becommeth vs
" to pay it for theſe, who enioy their liues by our meanes. It ſhould not be reaſonable for the Ara-
" bians, who after they had confeſſed with many plauſible proteſtations and thankeſgiuings, that
" they enioy their libertie by our benefit, to haue depriued and thruſt vs from our owne, and to
" haue vniuſtly dealt with vs; yea euen with vs, I ſay, who were not their enemies, but rather on H
" the contrarie ſide their chiefeſt friends in the time of peace. And if fidelitie ſhould bee reſpected
" euen amongſt thoſe that are our moſt hated enemies, much more neceſſarily ought it to be ob-" ſerued by thoſe that are friends. But theſe men ſet light thereby, who thinke nothing honeſt, but " that which is annexed with Lucre; and thinke no wrong vnexcuſable, nor impunitie iniurie that
" hath but a ſhew of profit. Is there any queſtion then, whether wee ſhould chaſtice theſe vniuſt
" men by a iuſt warre? ſith both God commandeth no leſſe, and enioyneth vs alwaies to hate out" rage, and reuenge iniuſtice, eſpecially in that warre, which is not onely iuſt, but neceſſary. For that " which both in the confeſſion of the Græcians, and opinion of the Barbarians is moſt hatefull and " hainous, this haue they perpetrated in murthering our Embaſſadours. For the Greekes ſay, that Legates inuiolable. Embaſſadors are ſacred and inuiolable, and we our ſelues haue receiued our moſt wholeſome and I
" holieſt precepts of the law of God by Angels, that is, from his Herauls and meſſengers: for this
" name can both bring God to mans knowledge, and reconcile enemy to enemy.
" What impietie therefore is more vnpardonable, then to put thoſe Embaſſadours to death,
" who bring tidings of right and iuſtice? or what proſperitie can they expect either in their wars,
" or felicitie in their whole liues, after ſo hainous a crime? Truly I cannot imagine any: But per" haps ſome man will ſay, that right and equitie is on our ſide; but that the greater number of men
With whomſoeuer iuſtice is, there is God alſo. and meanes are with them: but this their ſpeech is vnworthy of my followers. For with thoſe, with whom iuſtice is, with thoſe alſo is God: and where God is, there neither wanteth multitude nor fortitude. But let vs wade further, and weigh our owne forces by themſelues. In the firſt
" battell we had the victorie: in the ſecond, vpon the firſt charge we put them to flight, and found " them vnable to make their partie good againſt vs. Afterwards, when the victorie was ours, be- K
" hold Athenio, not by lawfull warre, but by ſubtill treacherie aſſaulted vs. But ſhall this be called
" their fortitude, or rather their fraud and ſecond iniquitie? why therefore ſhould wee haue leſſe
" courage, who ought to haue the greater confidence? or why ſhould we feare them, who are al-
" waies inferiours, if they fight openly, and without fraud; and when they ſeeme to ouercome,
" they doe it by vniuſtice?
" Moreouer, if any man ſuppoſe them to bee valiant, this ſhould the rather incite them more " and more vnto vertue; for it is no honour for a generous and noble mind to ouercome his inferi-
" our, but to haue meanes and might to conquer his ſuperiour. And if any one be terrified by our " domeſtick and homebred miſeries, and by our late earthquake, firſt of all let him thinke with him-
" ſelf, that he erreth in that which deceiueth the Arabians, by ſuppoſing the ſame to be more grie- L " uous and terrible then indeed it was. And afterwards let him thinke, that it becommeth them not " to draw matter of feare from thence, whence the other tooke occaſion of courage. For as tou" ching themſelues, they conceiue not any hope thorow any good that is in themſelues, but onely
" in the truſt they haue that we are already deiected by our calamities. But when they ſhall ſee vs
" march forth againſt them, their courage will be weakned, and our confidence by this means ſhall
" be awakened, for that we are not at this time to encounter with deſperate men: For neither are
" wee ouermuch afflicted; neither (as ſome thinke) hath this miſerie befallen vs thorow Gods diſ" pleaſure, but theſe are the caſualties of fortune. And if by the will of God theſe things are come
" to paſſe, it is maruell if by the ſame will our calamitie ceaſe not; and that our puniſhment ſhould
" not ſatisfie his diſpleaſure. But that this preſent war is approued by him for iuſt, he himſelfe hath M " euidently declared. For whereas diuers thorow the whole region, haue beene oppreſſed by the " earthquake, none of you that beare armes haue incurred any miſchiefe; but all of you haue beene
" preſerued, which is a manifeſt token of the will of God; and if your children and wiues had generally followed the warres as you doe, none of you ſhould haue beene wanting. When as therefore

A fore you ſhall haue bethought your ſelues of theſe things, and moreouer in regard that God hath at all times an eſpeciall care ouer you: faile not to purſue this iniurious nation with a iuſt war, that neither reſpecteth the lawes of friendſhip, nor keepeth the league of couenant; valiant in murthering ſacred Embaſſadors; and abiect and villanous, where things are to be attempted by valour. The yeare of the world, 3925 before Chriſts Natiuitie. 29.

These perſwaſions of his did not a little encourage the Iewes to the battell, and made them more forward then before. As for Herod, after he had offered ſacrifice, according to the cuſtome, he drew his army foorth, and led them with great confidence againſt the Arabians, and paſſing Iordan he encamped neere vnto the enemy, with an intent to ſurpriſe a fort ſituate between them both: making this account that it would further him much, either if vpon the preſent hee ſhould be drawne forth to fight, or if it concerned him to march onward, for that this place ſhould ſerue him to encampe in with more ſecurity. The ſame reſolution alſo had the Arabians, for which The Arabians are ouercome by Herod.

B cauſe they fell to skirmiſh in that place, wherein the firſt on both ſides that gaue the charge, and afterwards ſome other followers were ſlaine: ſo that thoſe of the Arabians ſide being ouercome, betooke them to retreat. This ſucceſſe of theirs bred no little hope in the Iewes, who ſeeing the enemies army addreſſed to attempt any thing rather then to fight, waxed the more hardy to aſſaile the Arabian in his trenches, and beate him from his campe. They beeing forced by theſe aſſaults, drew forward to their defence in great diſorder, bringing neither courage nor hope of victory with them: yet notwithſtanding they defended themſelues, both in regard of their great number, as alſo in reſpect of that neceſſitie wherunto they were inforced by the Iewes. The skirmiſh on both ſides was hot, and diuers on either party were put to the ſword: but in the end, the Arabians being put to the worſt, turned their backs. The ſlaughter was ſo great, that they not

C onely periſhed by their enemies ſwords, but they themſelues alſo murthered one another in the preaſe, and diſorderly flight, in which they were troden vnder foot, and lay ſlaughtered in a manner by their owne weapons. So that in that diſcomfiture there died ſome fiue thouſand: the reſt haſtily fled on the other ſide of the rampire: but being ouerpreſſed with want of victuals, and in eſpeciall with lack of water, they had not any ground or aſſurance to eſcape. After them poſted the Iewes, and being vnable to recouer the fortreſſe with them, they begirt the campe with a ſiege, and ſhut vp all the paſſages that no ſuccour could come vnto them, and tooke from them all opportunitie to eſcape, although they ſhould affect flight.

When as therefore they ſaw themſelues reduced into ſuch extremity, they ſent Embaſſadors vnto Herod, firſt of all to demand a truce: and afterwards for that they were oppreſſed with thirſt

D to craue ſome remedy for their preſent neceſſities. But he neither reſpected the Embaſſadours, neither the proffered ranſome for the captiues, nor any other whatſoeuer reaſonable demand, deſiring earneſtly to reuenge himſelfe of thoſe iniurious treacheries they had practiſed againſt his Embaſſadours. Being therefore inforced by thirſt (which amongſt other plagues moſt grieuouſly afflicted them) many of them forſooke their trenches, and offered themſelues to bonds, and to be led away captiues; ſo that within fiue daies ſpace foure thouſand of them yeelded themſelues priſoners. On the ſixt day, all the reſt determined to ſally out, and aſſaile the enemy; rather making choice of aſſured death, then thus lingeringly and ignominiouſly to pine away. When as therfore they had all concluded hereupon, they incontinently brake out of their trenches, but like vnapt ſouldiers for a skirmiſh, decaied not onely in body but in mind; reputing their death for aduan-

E tage, to eſcape thereby their extreame misfortunes. For which cauſe vpon the firſt onſet, about ſome ſeauen thouſand of them were ſlaine, and thus the fierceneſſe of this nation being alaied by this ouerthrow, they ſubmitted themſelues to Herod, whom to their owne ſorrow they had approoued to be a valiant ſouldier. The Arabians enforced by thirſt, require truce at Herods hands.

F HEROD puffed vp with his ſucceſſull good fortune, returned backe into his owne countrey, hauing obtained great eſtimation and reputation by his valour and vertue. But at ſuch time as he ſuppoſed his ſtate to be moſt aſſured, he grew in danger both to loſe his dignitie and life, by reaſon of that victory that Cæſar obtained againſt Antony in the Actian war. For at that time he not onely ſuppoſed himſelfe to be vtterly ouerthrowne, but both his friends and enemies that were round about him loſt their hopes, for that it was vnlikely that hee ſhould Hedio & Ruf. finus, chap 7. Herod diſmaied at Antonies ouerthrow.

escape vnpunished, who had been so inwardly vnited in friendshippe with Anthony. Wherby it came to passe, that his friends in no sort concealed their despaire, and his enemies vnder their colourable and dissembled griefes, couered their ioy, promising themselues thereafter a better and more pleasing administration of the common-weale. Heereupon Herode perceiuing, that except Hircanus, there was not any one of the bloud roiall aliue, determined to cut him off, resoluing with himselfe, that if he hapned to escape the danger, that a man who at that time was more worthier the kingdome then himselfe, should not entermeddle amongst his affaires: and if any misfortune should behold him in regard of Cæsar, he desired to dispossesse Hircanus of the kingdome, in regard of the enuy which he bare him, for that he was the onely man who deserued to be aduanced to that dignitie. Whilst thus he was tormented and trauelled in his thoughts, he had an occasion offered him by Hircanus owne followers to execute his intention. For Hircanus being of a mild and gentle nature, during all his life time forbare to entermeddle with state affaires, committing all things to fortune, and contenting himselfe with whatsoeuer condition it pleased her to allot him.

But Alexandra being an ambitious woman, and vnable to conceale with modestie the hope she conceiued of change, sollicited her father that he should not any longer endure the subiection of Herode, who was the very scourge of their familie, but rather that he should stand vpon his owne guard, and reserue himselfe to his better hoped fortunes. She furthermore gaue him counsaile to write vnto Malchus, who had the gouernment of Arabia, requesting him to grant him both protection and entertainment; for that if Herode should chance to be cut off by Cæsars displeasure, doubtlesse the kingdome would returne vnto him, both in regard of his nobilitie, as also of the peoples fauour. These persuasions of hers Hircanus at the first repulsed, but afterwards being ouercome by the importunitie of the woman, who ceased not day and night to sing the same song of future hope, and of Herods treasons, he gaue certaine letters to a friend of his, written to the Arabian, wherin he required him to send him certaine horsemen, who might conduct him to the Asphaltite lake, which lieth distant from the confines of Ierusalem some three hundred furlongs. And therefore especially committed he these letters to Dositheus trust, both for that he fauoured Hircanus and his daughter, and seemed likely for diuers causes to hate Herod: for he was Iosephs kinsman, who was slaine by Herod; and not long before, certaine of his brothers were slaine amongst others at Tire by Anthonies command: yet for none of these occasions continued hee faithful to Hircanus. For he setting more by the present fauour of the king that then raigned, then the rest, discouered the letter vnto the king: who first of all giuing him thanks, required one office of friendship more at his hands; which was, that folding vp the letter, and sealing it, hee should conueigh and deliuer the same to Malchus, and returne his answere, for that it meerely concerned him, if he knew his resolution also. Which when Dositheus had diligently performed, the Arabian returned this answer, that he was ready to entertaine both himselfe and his whole family, and all those Iewes likewise which were of his faction, promising to send him a band of souldiers, who should be able to conduct him safely thither, & should be obedient to his command in all things. Now as soone as Herod was seized of these letters, he called for Hircanus, and demanded of him whether he had any confederacie with Malchus: who denied the same. But Herod protesting and bringing forth his letter in an open assembly, commanded him afterwards to bee put to death. Thus are these matters registred in Herods commentaries: for by some are they deliuered otherwise, namely, that he was executed, not for this crime which hee had committed, but for some treasons against the king. For they write to this effect, that Herod at a certaine banquet (dissembling his suspicion) demanded of Hircanus, whether he had receiued any letters from Malchus: and that he answered, that he had receiued letters, but such as contained nothing else but officious salutations. Further, that another asked him, whether he had receiued any present therewithall: and when he had answered, that hee had receiued nothing but foure coursers for his saddle, the King wrested this to a capitall offence of corruption and treason: and commanded him presently to be led to death. Now that he died guiltles, they alledge this for a most approued argument; namely, his gentle disposition, who euen in his youthfull yeeres neuer gaue signe or appearance of rashnesse, or pride, or signification of audaciousnesse, no not euen then when hee had the roiall gouernment in his hands, but in that freedome of authoritie, disposed the most things by Antipaters aduise. But at that time he was more then fourescore yeeres old, and knew that Herods estate was secured: and passing Euphrates also, and liuing on the other side of the riuer, he left such as held him in great honour, and returned home into his owne countrey, to the end hee might liue vnder Herods gouernment. Whereby it is lesse likely, that he would attempt any alteration

A ſo farre different from his nature; ſo that all theſe things ſeeme to be fained by Herod.

Thus ended Hircanus life, after his variable and aduerſe fortune, wherewith during all his life time he was afflicted. For at ſuch time as his mother Alexandra liued, he was created high Prieſt of the Iewes, and obtained that honour for the ſpace of nine yeeres: and after his mothers death, he had ſcarcely gouerned the kingdome for the ſpace of three moneths, but that he was expulſed by his brother Ariſtobulus; and afterwards reſtored by Pompeys aſſiſtance, and receiuing all his former honours, hee liued in full poſſeſſion of them for the ſpace of forty yeeres. After this, hee was once more diſtaſted by Antigonus; and being maimed in his body, liued certaine yeeres in captiuity among the Parthians: from whence not long after he returned home; and though hee had many things promiſed him by Herod, yet after ſo many alterations of fortune, he obtained
B nothing at his hands, and that which amongſt all the reſt is moſt of all to be lamented, as we haue ſaid, he was vniuſtly put to death an innocent, and in his old age. For he was a louer of iuſtice, and an obſeruer of perpetuall modeſtie: and gouerned his kingdome for the moſt part by other mens direction, being onely guilty in himſelfe of ignorance and the loue of idleneſſe. Truely, Antipater and Herod by this mans goodneſſe obtained their ſo great riches: for which deſerts of his, againſt all law, and right, he was cruelly put to death.

But Herod after Hircanus death addreſſed himſelfe to performe his iourney towards Cæſar: and hauing little hope of any good fortune, in regard of his friendſhip with Antonius, he grew deſperately iealous of Alexandra, for feare leaſt ſhe taking opportunity of the time, ſhould incite the people to rebell, and fill the kingdome with domeſticall ſedition: for which cauſe, committing
C the gouernment of the eſtate to his brother Pheroras, he left his mother Cypros, his ſiſter, and all his kinred in the Caſtle of Maſada, and commanded his brother, that if any misfortune ſhould befall him, hee ſhould retaine the kingdome in his owne hands and maintaine it. As for his wife Mariamme, for that by reaſon of certaine diſlikes betwixt her, his mother, and ſiſter, they might not liue together, he left her with her mother Alexandra in the Caſtle of Alexandrian, and committed them to the cuſtody of his Treaſurer Ioſeph, and Sohemus the Iturian, and with her the keeping of his Caſtles, both which had alwaies beene his faithfull friends, and to whom in way of honour, hee committed the cuſtody of theſe princely Ladies. But hee gaue them alſo this commandement, that if they ſhould be certified that any ſiniſter miſhap had befallen him, they ſhould preſently kill them both, and to the vtmoſt of their power, continue the kingdome in his children,

CHAP. X.

AFTER he had in this ſort giuen order for all his affaires, hee withdrew himſelfe vnto Rhodes, intending there to meet with Cæſar. And as ſoone as hee arriued in that city, hee tooke the Diademe from his head, and laide it apart, but as for his other princely
E ornaments, hee changed them in no ſort; and beeing admitted to Cæſars preſence, hee at that time gaue a more ample teſtimony of the greatneſſe of his magnanimitie and courage: for neither addreſſed he his ſpeech to intreat his fauour (according to the cuſtome of ſuppliants) neither preſented he any requeſt, as if he had in any ſort offended him, but gaue account of all that which he had done, without concealing or miſtruſting any thing. For he freely confeſſed before Cæſar, that he had intirely loued Antonius and that to the vtmoſt of his power he had done him ſeruice, to the end that he might obtaine the ſoueraignty and monarchy; not by annexing his forces vnto his, in that he was otherwiſe imploied in the Arabian warre; but in furniſhing him both with wheat and money, and that this was the leaſt office which it behooued him to performe towards Antonius; for that being once his profeſſed friend, it behooued him not onely to imploy his beſt endeuours on his ſo princely benefactor, but alſo to hazard both his head and happines to F deliuer him from perils. All which (ſaid he) I haue not performed according as I ought to haue done; yet notwithſtanding I know, that at ſuch time as he was ouercome in the Actian battell, I did not alter my affection with his fortune: neither did I reſtraine my ſelfe: for although I befriended not Antonius with my preſence and aſſiſtance in his Actian war, yet at leaſtwiſe I aſſiſted him with my counſaile, certifying him that he had but one onely means left him for his ſecurity, and preuention of his vtter ruine, which was to put Cleopatra to death, for that by cutting her off, he might enioy her estate, and might more easily obtain his peace, and pacifie thy displeasure against him. And for that he gaue but slender regard to these mine admonitions by his owne sottishnesse and indiscretion, he hath hurt himselfe and profited you, because, as I said, he did not follow my counsaile. Now therefore (O Cæsar) in regard of the hate which you beare vnto Anthony, you condemne my friendship also. I will not deny that which I haue done; neither am I affraid freely » and publikely to protest how much I haue loued him: but if without regard of persons, you con- » sider how kindly I am affected towards my benefactors, and how resolute and constant a friend I » am, and how mindfull of kindnesse, the effect of that which I haue done, may make me knowne » vnto thee. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8. Cæsar confirmeth Herods authority.

By these words (which were manifest testimonies of his resolute and noble courage) he so inwardly indeered himselfe vnto Cæsar, who was a magnificent and worthy Monarch, that he conuerted this his accusation into an occasion to win and work him to be his friend: for which cause Cæsar in setting the diademe vpon his head, exhorted him that he should no les respect his friendship, then he had in former time Anthonies: and withall, did him much honour; certifying him moreouer, that Capidius had written vnto him, how much Herod had assisted him in his wars that hee had with the Monarches of Syria. H

Herod seeing that he was thus entertained, and that contrary to his expectation, the kingdome was more surely confirmed vnto him, then before time, both by Cæsars bounty, and also by the decree of the Senate, which he had practised to obtaine for his greater assurance, accompanied Cæsar as farre as Egypt, presenting both himselfe and his friends with many rich gifts, beyond the proportion of his estate: endeauouring by these meanes both to win their fauours, and to shew also the greatnesse of his courage; requiring moreouer at Cæsars hands, that Alexander, who was one of Anthonies deerest friends, might not bee sought out to be punished: yet notwithstanding he could not obtaine the same, by reason of an oath that Cæsar had past before he sollicited him. I

Herod entertaineth both Cæsar & his army very heroically.

That done, hee returned backe againe into Iewry, with more greater honour and assurance, then before; whereby hee strooke them with wonderfull amazement, who expected his contrary successe, as if by Gods especiall prouidence he alwaies ouerwent his dangers, to his great honour. Incontinently therefore, hee prepared himselfe to entertaine Cæsar, who returned out of Syria to take his iourney into Ægypt, and receiued him at Ptolemais, with all royall honour, and gaue his army presents with all abundance of munition: so that he was accounted for one of Cæsars most affectionate friends, and rode about with him, at such time as hee tooke the view of his army: hee entertained him also and his friends with one hundreth and fiftie men, adorned with most rich and sumptuous apparell. K

And for that they were to passe thorow a countrey, wherein there was great scarcity of water, hee furnished them both with water and wine; so that they needed neither of them. Hee gaue Cæsar also eight hundreth talents, and so royally satisfied he all men, that they confessed themselues to haue had farre greater entertainment, then the reuenues and profits of his kingdome could affoord them. By which meanes he gaue the more ample testimony of his forward friendship, and free affection to deserue well: and making vse of the opportunitie of the time, he obtained the reputation of a prince of an heroicke and noble spirit; so that he was held inferiour vnto no man, for the good entertainement that he gaue to the chiefest Romans in their returne out of Egypt. CHAP. IX.

Mariamme & Alexandra displeased with Herod.

BVT as soone as he returned into his kingdome, hee found all his household troubled, and both his wife Mariamme and her mother Alexandra grieuously displeased with him. For they supposed (and not without cause) that they were not shutte vp in that Castle for their securities sake, but as it were in a prison; so that, in as much as they neither might make vse of other mens, nor enioy their own goods, they were highly discontented. M Mariamme also supposed that her husband did but dissemble his loue, rather for his owne profit and commodity, then for any intire affection he bare towards her. But nothing more grieued her, then that she had not any hope to liue after him, if so be he should happen to die, especially for the order he had left concerning her: neither could she euer forget what commandement before that time he had left with Ioseph; so that by all meanes possible, she laboured to winne the affections of those that had the

A the charge of her, and especially Sohemus, knowing very well that her safety depended wholly on his hands. Who in the beginning behaued himselfe very wisely and faithfully, containing himselfe very circumspectly within the bounds of his commission; but after these Ladies had with pretty presents and feminine flatteries mollified and wrought him by little and little, at last hee blabbed out all that which the King had commanded him; especially, for that hee hoped not that hee should returne with the same power and authoritie, which before he had: and for that cause he thought thus in himselfe, that without incurring any danger in regard of Herod, he might greatly gratifie the Ladies; who in all likelihood should not be depriued of that dignity wherein they were at that time; but would returne them the like kindnesse when Mariamme should bee Queene, or next vnto the King. Furthermore, he hoped that if Herod also should returne with all

B things answerable to his desires, that he would performe nothing without his wiues consent; or vpbraid him with the act, if shee contradicted: for he knew too well that the King loued her in such sort, as it was impossible to equall or expresse his affections; and for these causes he disclosed the trust that was committed vnto him. But Mariamme was very sore displeased to heare that there was no end of her miseries, but they were altogether vnited and tyed to the dangers of Herod; and shee oftentimes wished that hee might neuer more returne againe in safety, supposing that her life with him should bee very intolerable: all which shee afterwards dissembled not, but openly confessed that which afflicted her with discontent. For when as Herod beyond all expectation arriued in his countrey, beeing adorned with mighty fortune, hee first of all, as it became him certified his wife of his good tidings and happy successe, whom onely amongst all other his

C friends and wiues, hee embraced and saluted, for the pleasing conuersation and affection that was in her. But she, whilest he repeated vnto her these fortunate euents of his affaires, rather entertained the same with a displeasant attention, then applauding ioy: and these affections of hers likewise she could not conceale. For at such time as he folded his armes about her necke, she vnfolded her sorrow in her sighes; so simple and vnfained were her affections; and seemed rather to be displeased then appeased by his narrations. Whereupon Herod was sore troubled, perceiuing these things not onely suspected, but also fully manifest: but aboue all things hee was distracted, when he considered the incredible and apparant hatred that his wife had conceiued against him, which in such sort incensed him that hee could not resist the loue that had attainted him; so that he neither could continue in wrath, nor listen long to peace; and being vnresolued in himselfe, he

D now was attempted by this; straight distracted by a contrary affection: so much was his minde trauailed betweene loue and hatred, that when as oftentimes hee desired to punish the womans pride, his heart by loues mediation failed him in the enterprise. For nothing did more torment him then this feare, least executing his displeasure against her, hee should by this meanes more grieuously wound himselfe, through the desire he bare vnto his deceased delight. Whilest thus hee was sweltered and deuoured in his passions, and conceiued sinister opinions against Mariamme his wife; Salome his sister and his mother hauing an inkling of his discontents, thought that they had gotten a fit opportunitie to expresse and execute their hatred towards Mariamme: for which cause they conferred with Herod, and whetted his spleene and displeasure with variety of

E slanders, sufficient at one assault to engender hatred, and kindle his iealousie against her. To these reproches of theirs, he lent no vnwilling eares; yet had he not the heart to attempt any thing against his wife, or to giue free credit to their report; notwithstanding his displeasure increased, and was inflamed more and more against her, for that neither shee could colour her cares and discontents, nor hee containe himselfe from exchanging his loue into hatred: and perhaps at that time he had published some fatall doome against her, had not a happy messenger brought him word, that Anthony and Cleopatra beeing dead, Cæsar was become Lord of Ægypt: for which cause hasting forward to meete and entertaine him, hee left his family in that present estate. Vpon his departure he recommended Mariamme to Sohemus, giuing him great thanks for the care he had had of her, and granted him in way of gratuitie a part of Iewry to gouerne.

When Herod was arriued in Ægypt, and had friendly and familiarly conferred with Cæsar, he

F was highly honoured by him: for Cæsar gaue him those foure hundreth Frenchmen that were of Cleopatras guard; and restored that part of his countrey vnto him againe, which was taken away and spoyled by her. Hee annexed also vnto his kingdome Gadara, Hippon, and Samaria, and on the sea coasts the Cities of Gaza, Anthedon, Ioppe, with the tower of Straton: which when he had obtained, he grew more mighty then before: and after hee had accompanied Cæsar as farre as Antioch, he returned into his owne countrey. Vpon his arriuall, he found that fortune which was fauourable vnto him abroad, too forward at home, especially in regard of his wife, in whose full loue of Mariamme, as any other of whom the Hiſtories make report: and as touching her, ſhe was both chaſt and faithfull vnto him; yet had ſhee a certaine womanly imperfection and naturall frowardneſſe, which was the cauſe that ſhee preſumed too much vpon the intire affection wherewith her husband was intangled; ſo that without regard of his perſon, who had power and authority ouer others, ſhee entertained him oftentimes very outragiouſly: All which he endured patiently, without any ſhew of diſcontent. But Mariamme vpbraided and publikely reproached both the Kings mother and ſiſter, telling them that they were but abiectly and baſely borne.

Mariamme a froward woman.

Whereupon there grew a great enmity and vnrecouerable hatred betweene the Ladies; and from thence alſo there aroſe an occaſion of greater accuſations and calumniation then before. Theſe ſuſpicions were nouriſhed amongſt them, for the ſpace of one whole yeere after Herods H returne from Cæſar; and finally this long contriued and fore-imagined hatred at laſt brake out violently vpon this occaſion that enſueth. When as about mid-day the King had withdrawne himſelfe into his chamber to take his reſt, hee called Mariamme vnto him to ſport with her, being incited thereunto by the great affection that hee bare vnto her. Vpon this his command ſhee came in vnto him; yet would ſhe not lie with him, nor entertaine his courtings with friendly acceptance, but vpbraided him bitterly with her fathers and brothers death. The King tooke theſe reproachfull words in very euill part, and was almoſt ready to ſtrike her: but his ſiſter hearing a greater ſtir and noiſe within then was vſuall, ſent in the Butler, who long before that time was ſuborned by her, whom ſhe commanded to tell the king, that Mariamme had prepared a drinke for him to incite and quicken him vnto loue; willing him that if the King ſhould be mooued thereat, I and ſhould demand what hee meant, hee ſhould certifie him, that Mariamme hauing prepared a poiſon for his grace, had dealt with him to deliuer it to his Maieſtie. Charging him moreouer, that if the King in hearing him ſpeake of this potion, ſhould ſeeme to be mooued therewith, that then he ſhould proceede no further in his diſcourſe. He therefore (being in this manner before hand inſtructed what hee ought to doe) at that very inſtant was ſent to diſcouer his treachery vnto the King; for which cauſe with a ſober and ſtaied countenance hee entred in vnto him, being ſeriouſly and well prepared to diſcourſe, and told him that Mariamme had bribed him to preſent his Maieſtie with an amorous cup of drinke. Now when hee perceiued that the King was troubled with theſe words, hee proſecuted his diſcourſe, alleadging that the potion was a certaine medicine which Mariamme had giuen him, the vertue whereof he knew not, which he had receiued according as hee had tolde him, knowing that it concerned both his owne ſecurity, and K the Kings ſafety.

Herod who before this was highly diſpleaſed, hearing theſe word, was ſo much the more incenſed: for which cauſe he preſently commanded Mariammes moſt faithfull ſeruant to be examined by torments, as concerning the poiſon, ſuppoſing that it was impoſſible for her to vndertake any thing whatſoeuer, without his priuity. He being tried and tormented after this cruel manner, confeſſed nothing of that for which he was tortured; but declared vnto the King that the hatred which his wife had conceiued againſt him, proceeded from certaine words that Sohemus had told her. Scarcely had he finiſhed theſe words, but that the King cried out with a loud voice, ſaying, that Sohemus, who before time had beene moſt faithfull both to him and his kingdome, would not haue declared theſe his priuy commands, except there had been ſome more inward familiaritie and ſecrecy betwixt him and Mariamme: for which cauſe he preſently commanded his mi- L

niſters to lay hands on Sohemus, and to put him to death. As for his wife, he drew her to her triall, and to this effect he aſſembled his moſt familiar friends, before whom he began to accuſe her with great ſpight and ſpleene, as touching theſe potions and poiſons aforeſaid; wherein he vſed intemperate and vnſeemely ſpeeches, and ſuch as for their bitterneſſe did ill become him in cauſe of iuſtice; ſo that in the end, the aſſiſtants, ſeeing the butte and bent of his deſire, pronounced ſentence of death againſt her: which being paſt, both he, and all other the aſſiſtants were of this opinion, that ſhee ſhould not ſo ſpeedily be executed, but that ſhee ſhould be kept cloſe priſoner in ſome ſure place of the Palace. the people, if hee ſhould keepe her aliue in priſon. And by this meanes Mariamme was led vnto her death.

Alexandra her mother conſidering the eſtate of the time, and fearing no leſſe miſchiefe from Herods hands, then her daughter was aſſured of; ſhee vndecently changed her minde, and abiectedly laid aſide her former courage, and magnanimitie. For intending to make it knowne, that

A she was neither partie nor priuie to those crimes, wherewith Mariamme was charged, she went out to meete her daughter, and entertained her iniuriously, protesting publikely that shee was a wicked woman, and vngratefull towards her husband; & that she well deserued the punishment that was adiudged her, for that she durst be so bold to attempt so hainous a fact, neglecting to requite her husbands entire loue, with her vnfained loyaltie. Whilest thus dishonestly she counterfaited her displeasure, and was ready to pull Mariamme by the haire, the assistants according to her desert, condemned her generally for her shamefull hypocrisie: but she that was led to be punished, conuicted her by her milde behauiour. For first of all, she gaue her no answere; neither was any waies altered by her reproches; neither would so much as cast her eye vpon her; making it appeare, that she discreetly concealed & couered her mothers imperfections, & was aggrieued
B that she had so openly shewed so great indignitie: expressing for her owne part a constant behauiour; and going to her death without change of colour, so that those that beheld her, perceiued in her a kind of manifest courage and nobility, euen in her vtmost extreamitie. Thus died Mariamme, hauing bin a woman that excelled both in continence and courage: notwithstanding that she defaulted somewhat in affabilitie and impatience of nature: for the rest of her parts, shee was of an admirable and pleasing beautie, and of such a carriage in those companies wherein shee was intertained, that it was impossible to expresse the same, in that she surpassed all those of her time which was the principall cause that she liued not gratiously and contentedly with the King. For being entertained by him, who intirely loued her, and from whom shee receiued nothing that might discontent her, she presumed vpon a great and intemperate libertie in her discourse. Shee digested also the losse of her friends very hardly, according as in open tearmes shee made it
C knowne vnto the King: whereby also it came to passe, that both Herods mother, and sister, and himselfe likewise grew at ods with her, and in especiall her husband, from whom onely shee expected no hard measure.

Alexandra vndecently striueth to acquite her selfe of Mariammes treason.

After her death the King began more powerfully to be inflamed in his affections; who before times, as we haue declared, was already miserably distracted. For neither did he loue after the common manner of married folke: but whereas almost euen vnto madnes he nourished this his desire, he could not be induced by the too vnbridled manners of his wife to alay the heat of his affection, but that daily more and more by doting on her, hee increased the same. And all that time especially he supposed that God was displeased with him, for the death of Mariamme his
D wife. Oftentimes did he inuocate her name, and more often vndecently lamented hee her. And notwithstanding he deuised all kinde of delights and sports that might bee imagined, by preparing banquets, and inuiting guests with princely hospitalitie, to passe away the time; yet all those profited him nothing. For which cause he gaue ouer the charge and administration of his kingdome. And in such sort was he ouerwhelmed with griefe, that oftentimes hee commanded his ministers to call his wife Mariamme, as if as yet she had beene aliue. Whilest thus hee was affected; there befell a pestilence within the citie, that consumed a great sort of the people, and the better part of the nobilitie, and each man interpreted that this punishment was inflicted by God vpon men, for the vniust death of the Queene. Thus the Kings discontents being by this meanes increased, he at last hid himselfe in a solitarie wildernes, vnder pretext of hunting; where afflicting
E himselfe incessantly, at last he fell into a most grieuous sickenesse. This disease of his was an inflamation or paine in the necke: he seemed also in some sort to raue and waxe mad; neither could any remedies relieue him of his agonie; but when as the sickenesse seemed rather to increase, all men at last grew almost desperate of his recouery. For which cause his Physitian, partly in respect of the contumacie of his disease, partly, becaus in so great a danger there was not any free election of diet, they gaue him leaue to taste whatsoeuer best pleased his appetite, committing the vncertaine euent of his health to the hands of fortune.

Herods miserable estate, and moane after the death of his wife.

A plague inuadeth Ierusalem.

Herod falleth grieuously sicke.

Whilest thus hee soiourned in Samaria, which now is called Sebaste, Alexandra inhabiting at that time in Ierusalem, hauing notice of this his estate, sought to reduce all the strong fortresses that were within the City, vnder her subiection: the one of which abutted vpon
F the Temple; the other was situate within the City: for they that are Lords of these, keepe all the rest of the nation vnder their awe; becaus that without these, neyther the vsuall and dayly sacrifices may be performed, neither may the Iews liue without such sacrifices and oblations, who had rather lose their liues then contemne their religion. She therfore laboured those that had the gouernment thereof, to surrender them vp to her and Herods children begotten of her daughter Mariamme, for feare least he being dead, they should be seized by others: and if it should fortune him to recouer his health, in the meane while they might be kept and held by no man more securely, then such as were his domesticall friends. This suite and solicitation of hers was but coldly conceited of: and the captaines who at other times shewed themselues alwaies faithfull, at that time were the rather farre more constant in their dutie, both for that they hated Alexandra, as also for that they thought it a great offence to despaire of the health of their Prince. For these were the Kings old friends, and one of them was Herods owne nephew, whose name was Achiabus. For which cause they sent present messengers vnto him, to certifie him of Alexandras intent: who hauing heard these newes, presently commanded her to be slaine: and at length ouercomming his sicknes, he grew so badly affected both in body and mind, that he waxed hateful vnto all men; so that all those who offended him for how little cause soeuer, were readily sought for to be punished. In this his intemperance he imbrued his hands in the blood of diuers of his inward friends, as Costabarus, Lysimachus, Antipater surnamed Gadias, and Dositheus, for this occasion that ensueth. Costabarus was an Idumæan, and one of the greatest account amongst his country- H men, who was descended from the Priests of Cozas, whom the Idumæans esteeme for a God. Now after that Hircanus had drawen the policie of the Idumæans to the reformed customes of the Iewes, Herod was made King of the Iewes, and appointed Costabarus to be gouernour in Idumæa and Gaza, giuing him Salome his sister to wife, after he had put Ioseph to death, to whom she had bin maried before time, as we haue heretofore declared. Costabarus seeing himselfe in this estate beyond his expectation, grew more elate and proud then his good fortune required, and in a little time forgot himselfe so farre, that he thought himselfe dishonoured, if he should performe that which Herod commanded him, and scorned that the Idumæans should bee vnder the Iewes subiection, notwithstanding they had receiued their maner of gouernment from them. He ther- I fore sent messengers vnto Cleopatra, giuing her to vnderstand, that Idumæa had alwaies beene vnder her ancestors subiection; and for that cause she ought vpon iust cause to demand and beg that countrie at Antonius hands, and that in respect of himselfe he was readie to become her seruant. All which he practised, not to gratifie Cleopatra in any sort whatsoeuer, but to the intent, that if Herods fortunes should be any waies weakned, he might more easily by this meanes both inlarge and obtaine the kingdome of Idumæa. And with these fooliſh hopes was he transported, in regard of his birth and riches, which he had heaped together, by such dishonest meanes, as he continually practised, as he that intended no small matters. But notwithstanding Cleopatras often and earnest petition to obtaine this soueraignitie; yet could shee not obtaine it at Antonius hands. When Herod had notice of these couert and cunning practises, he was readie to kill Costabarus. But vpon the earnest supplications of his sister and her mother, he dismissed and pardoned him; yet held him alwaies in suspicion, by reason of this his practise. Not long after it happened, that Salome fell at debate with Costabarus, for which cause shee sent a libell of diuorce to her husband, notwithstanding it were against the lawes and ordinary customes of the Iewes. For according to our ordinances, it is onely lawfull for the husband to do the same; and as touching the wife, notwithstanding she were separated, yet is it not lawfull for her to marry againe, except her husband first giue her licence. But Salome without respect of the lawes of the countrey, grounding her selfe too much vpon her owne authoritie, forsooke her husband, saying, that she separated her selfe from her husband, by reason of the great friendship which she bare vnto her brother for that she had receiued some notice that Costabarus practised some innouation with Antipater, L Lysimachus and Dositheus. And this accusation of hers confirmed she by Babas children, whom he had alreadie kept with him in all securitie for the space of twelue yeares. All which was true, and at that time beyond all mens expectation wonderfully troubled Herod, as soone as he heard it. For as touching Babas sonnes, he had heretofore resolued to cut them off, for that they had been alwaies badlie affected towards him and all his enterprises; but all that time he had let them passe, because by continuance they were growen out of his remembrance. Now the cause of this enmitie and hatred which he bare towards them, was gathered from this ground. At such time as Antigonus enioyed the soueraignty, and Herod besieged the citie of Ierusalem with an armie: now those incommodities and necessities that ordinarily happen vnto those that are besieged, were the cause that diuers acknowledged Herod, and fixed their hopes vpon him. But Babas sons M beeing in authoritie, and besides that, attended by a great number of men, perseuered in their faithfull obseruation of Antigonus, and blamed Herod continually, encouraging the inhabitants to continue the kingdome in those to whom it appertained by descent: and they themselues followed that course, which in their opinion was most profitable for the common-weale. But after that the citie was surprised by Herod, and he grew master of the estate, Costabarus, who was appointed to keepe the citie gates, and to lie in wait that none of those who were accused to haue

And afterwards when the king had by proclamation promiſed a reward to him that ſhould diſcouer them, and ſought for them by all meanes, neither then alſo would he confeſſe the fact. For being affraid leaſt he ſhould be puniſhed for his firſt deniall, he continued thorow concealement, being not onely now driuen thereunto by friendſhip, but alſo by neceſſitie.

Now when the King had notice hereof by his ſiſters report, hee ſent certaine meſſengers to the place where they were hidden, and ſlew them, and all thoſe that were partakers of the ſame
B crime: ſo that no one of Hircanus kinred was now left aliue; but all of them being ſlaine, who excelled in nobility and dignitie, hee did what himſelfe liſted without any contradiction or controulement: for which cauſe he by little and little forſooke the ceremonies and ordinanies of his countrey, and corrupted the decrees and inſtitutions of their anceſtors, which he ought to haue kept inuiolable, by his new and ſtrange inuentions. In whoſe time there was a very great change and alteration of the ancient and good manner of liuing; for all fell from bad to worſe: and the politike order, whereby the people ought to be gouerned and kept within compaſſe of their duty, went to decay. For firſt of all, he ordained certaine wreſtlings from fiue yeeres to fiue yeeres, in honour of Cæſar; and builded a Theater for that purpoſe within Ieruſalem. He erected alſo a moſt huge Amphitheater within the Plaine, which were two piles worthy the regard and behol-
C ding, by reaſon of the ſumptuouſnes therof; but wholly eſtranged from the faſhions of the Iewes. For neither the vſe, nor the preſentation of theſe ſpectacles hath euer been practiſed or taught by our anceſtors: yet was it his pleaſure to ennoble this aſſembly, to the end it might be continued from fiue to fiue yeeres, and this proclaimed he publikely in the countries round about him, and to this ſpectacle aſſembled he all the Nations. The wraſtlers alſo, and all that which concerned their exerciſe, were ſought out from all corners of the world, vnder the hope to obtaine the propoſed palme and victorie; and all the moſt excellent in thoſe exerciſes that were to bee found, were inuited to that aſſembly. For he propoſed moſt huge rewards, not onely to thoſe that exerciſed wraſtling, but alſo vnto thoſe who are called Muſitians, and to all ſorts of plaiers on inſtruments; labouring to his vtmoſt power, that all the moſt famous in thoſe profeſſions ſhould bee
D aſſiſtant in thoſe paſtimes. Hee appointed alſo a reward of great value for ſuch as ranne vpon chariots of three, foure or of one horſe; and all that which was both ſumptuous and magnificent to behold, for euery one was moſt carefully prouided, in that he ſtroue to haue the honour of a moſt magnificent preparation for his games. The Theater was hung all about with Cæſars titles, and the trophees of thoſe nations, which were ouercome by him, altogether ſet out and ſhining with gold and ſiluer. As for the inſtruments thereof, there wanted neither furniture, coſtly veſtments, or precious ſtones. Thither alſo were drawne certaine ſauage beaſts, as Lyons and other wilde beaſts, which were worthy to be placed in this famous ſhew, beeing admirable both for their force and rareneſſe of nature, who fought the one with the other, and againſt ſuch men likewiſe who were condemned to die: whereby the ſtrangers conceiued, together with the E admiration of his expence, an vncomparable and vnaccuſtomed pleaſure. But his countrymen interpreted this thing for a manifeſt corruption of thoſe diſciplines and manners which before time they had entertained, and honoured amongſt them. For it was an act moſt manifeſtly impious, to hazzard men againſt wilde beaſts, to delight the eyes of other men: It was alſo a matter as impious, to change and prophane the ordinances of the country, for forraine exerciſes: But the moſt hated of all theſe, were the Trophees: for in that they were certaine Images attired in armour, the vſe and veneration whereof were forbidden by our lawes, this diſpleaſed and grieued them more then any thing whatſoeuer: neither was Herod ignorant of thoſe troubles, which they procured. But hee thought it to bee a matter of danger to attempt the ſame for the preſent by F force; and for that cauſe he familiarly debated the ſame with ſome few of them, and diſcourſed vnto them his occaſions, to the end to ridde them of their ſuperſtition, although herein he profited nothing. For all of them with one conſent, cried out againſt the indignitie which they ſaw him commit: telling him, that although all other things were to bee tolerated; yet the Trophees, which were images of men, were vnſupportable, becauſe they were vnuſuall in their countrey. Herod perceiuing that they were diſcontented, and that they would not eaſily bee wrought vpon, except they had ſome contentment, hee called the moſt worthieſt men amongſt

them, and led them into the Theater, demanding of them what they thought these Trophees were: and when they cried out that they were images of men: he incontinently caused all the ornaments to be taken off from them, letting them see that they were nought els but naked stocks of wood; so that sodainly their displeasure was turned into a laughter, and their doubts were pleasantly discussed. Thus appeased he the people, and moderated the fury of their mislikes: so that diuers of them changed their opinions, & were no more displeased. Notwithstanding, there were some of these that persisted in the indignity they conceiued in those vnaccustomed exercises, supposing that the corruption of their ancient discipline was an inducement to their grieuous calamities; and they imagined that it rather concerned them to vndertake all dangers, then to endure any alteration in their policy, by permitting that Herod should introduce new and extraordinary fashions, who onely in word was their king, but in effect an enemy of their whole nation. For this cause there were ten men amongst them, who bound themselues by oath to hazard all extreamities, and to this intent they hid certaine short swords vnder their garments: amongst these there was one that was blind, who vrged and egged on by the strangenesse of those things which he had heard, not for that he was of ability to execute any thing with his hand, but to testifie that he was ready to suffer with the rest, if any misfortune should befall them, by his example the rest of them were not a little confirmed. These hauing mutually vndertaken this their resolution, repaired to the Theater vnder hope that Herod should not escape them, for that they intended to assaile him vnawares: at leastwise if they failed of him, their hope was to fall foule on some of his fauourites and followers, accounting this to be some solace in their expected death, if in regard of their violated religion they might bring the King in hatred with the common people. And these intending to offer themselues as chiefetaines and leaders vnto the rest, resolued to execute these things. But one of those intelligencers that Herod had sent abroad to pry and search into such like actions, hauing discouered all this their conspiracy, signified the same vnto the king, at such time as he was ready to enter into the Theater. Hee knowing full well what hatred was continually hatched against him, betooke himselfe to his palace, and sent for the conspirators by their names: who being apprehended in the fact, and knowing that there was no way for them to escape, resolued to endure their present misfortunes with a valiant courage: for being no waies dismaide, with a constant countenance they drew out their weapons, protesting that their conspiracy was honest and holy, not attempted by them for priuate affection, or their owne profit sake, but in the behalfe of their publike discipline, which no good man would either see or suffer to be violated, no though it cost him his life.

Now when with great confidence they had alleadged these things for their iustification, they were led away by the kings ministers to be slaughtered by diuers sorts of torments. Not long after this, that intelligencer who had betraied them, growing hatefull in all mens eies, was slaine by certaine men, and chopt in pieces with their swords, and afterwards cast vnto the dogs in sight and presence of many men. Yet did no man discouer this act, vntill after long and wearisome inquisitions made by Herod, it was wrought out of certaine poore women (who were priuy to the fact) with diuers torments. Then were all the actors of that murther punished, with their whole families: and notwithstanding all this, the common people was in no sort dismaide, but were ready to defend their lawes, except they were restrained by some greater power. Which when the king perceiued, he resisted their indeuors with all diligence, least happely thorow these alterations in affaires, the people should be drawne to an open rebellion. Whereas therefore he had two strong castles within the City, one wherein his palace was, another called Antonia, that adioyned neere vnto the temple, fortified by him; he thought good to strengthen a third called Samaria, the name whereof he changed, and called it Sebaste (which was distant from Ierusalem some daies iourney) to containe those of the common sort that were abroad, vnder his obedience, and very fit to bridle any vproares that might be raised in the City and fields. And for the whole nation he builded a fort, which in times past was called Straton, and afterwards he named it Cæsarea. He builded also a fort in Galilee, which was called Gabala, in a large Plaine, where by course he kept his horsemen. Besides these, he builded the fort of Esthmonites in the countrey of Peræa on the other side Iordan.

The ten men are executed, and the intelligencer is cut in peeces.

Now when he had fitly disposed all these Castles thorow his whole countrey, for the security and safety of his kingdome, the matter of rebellion was taken from the common people, who vpon euery light cause are subiect to commotions, in that hee had prepared a remedy against all priuy conspiracies, by planting such forces alwaies neere at hand, who might preuent and pacifie all alterations vpon their originall. After this, betaking himselfe to encompasse Samaria with a wall,

Herod planteth garrisons in the fortresses to withstand conspiracies.

A wall,he brought to paſſe that diuers of thoſe,who had born armes with him againſt his enemies, and diuers of the people likewiſe that dwelt round about, came to inhabite it, both in regard of the Temple,which he intended to build in that place,as alſo for that he fortified the ſame for his owne ſecurity (although that before time it was not in the number of famous Cities.) He therefore changed the name thereof, and called it Sebaſte, and diſtributed the lands that confined the Citie among the inhabitants of the ſame (which was by nature a fruitfull and goodly countrey) to the intent that within a little ſpace they might inrich themſelues. He inuironed the Citie alſo with a ſtrong wall,being aſſiſted by the naturall ſtrength and ſteepineſſe of the place: and beſides the whole circuit, hee included ſo much ground, that it was no waies inferiour to any of the famous Cities; for it contained the circuit of twenty furlongs or ſtadia. And in the midſt thereof
B there was a ſacred place, containing a furlong and a halfe, wonderfully adorned; in which there was a Temple builded, famous both for beauty and bigneſſe. And as for the other parts of the Citie,he decked them with all ſorts of ornaments. And ſeeing how neerely it concerned him to prouide for the ſecuritie of his perſon in this walled Citie, hee erected a fortreſſe for himſelfe. And as touching the beauty thereof,his intent was that it ſhould remaine for a monument to poſterity,of his magnificence and liberalitie.

CHAP. XII.

A famine inuaded the land of Iudæa.

C THAT very yeere,which was the thirteenth yeere of Herods raigne,very great calamities hapned in that countrey (either through Gods diſpleaſure, or for that the reuolution of time would haue it ſo.) For firſt of all,there were ſuch continuall droughts, that by reaſon thereof the earth grew barren,and produced not thoſe fruits,which of it ſelfe it was accuſtomed to beare. And after this,the ordinarie courſe of mens diets beeing altered by reaſon of the want of corne, the want of ſuſtenance was accompanied with a bodily ſickneſſe (for that by cuſtome theſe two plagues doe ordinarily entertaine one another:) For this made the plague and ſickneſſe more vehement,for that the ſicke in this great penury,could neither haue care of themſelues as was expedient,nor get conuenient nouriſhment for preſeruation of life: And many died daily; and thoſe alſo that remained aliue were in deſpaire, becauſe they could not relieue their want and neceſſities,what diligence ſoeuer they vſed. For which cauſe,after the old fruits of that
D yeere were wholly conſumed, and all the reſt of their ſtore was vtterly ſpent, there appeared not any meanes whereupon they might hope, namely, for that the miſery increaſed more then was expected; yea and extended it ſelfe beyond that yeere: ſo that they had nothing remaining by them,and the ſeeds they ſowed at that time mouldred away,and the earth for all their labours afforded them no intereſt. The neceſſitie therefore being thus great,conſtrained men to ſearch out many new inuentions to maintaine their life: and the King likewiſe was in no leſſe perplexitie,in that he was depriued of thoſe ordinarie reuenues which he receiued by the fruits of the earth;and the rather, for that he had ſpent his mony in repairing his cities,according as before this we haue declared: and in ſuch ſort were all things waſted by diuers calamities, that a man could conceiue no hope of remedy.Beſides this,the people grew in hatred of their king,for that it is their cuſtom
E ordinarily to accuſe their gouernors,as if they were the authors of all their euils. Yet did the king bethink himſelfe how he might remedy theſe inconueniences,but hardly could he find the means, for that their neighbours had no meanes to ſell them victuals,becauſe they were no leſſe afflicted then themſelues:and although he might haue recouered ſome little meanes for a great ſumme of money,yet wanted he it alſo to defray the charges: notwithſtanding in that he knew,that it behooued him to imploy his vttermoſt indeauours in yeelding a generall remedy to ſuch and ſo violent an oppreſſion, he molted downe all thoſe moueables he had either of gold or ſiluer within his palace, and ſpared nothing either for the matter, the excellencie, or the faſhion; no not ſo much as the veſſels wherein hee was ordinarily ſerued. This money ſent he into Ægypt, where at that time vnder Cæſar, Petronius held the gouernment. This man being Herods friend,in that he F deſired the ſafetie of his ſubiects, at ſuch time as diuers of them retired themſelues vnto him, by reaſon of that their neceſſitie,he permitted them to buy vp corne; and aſſiſted them in all things, both in their bargaines,and in their carriages;ſo that the greater or the whole ſumme of their ſuccours was attributed to him. But after their returne, Herod wrought ſo much, that the care that was taken by him did not onely change the affections of thoſe, which before time were his enemies, but beſide all this, hee purchaſed great praiſe and commendation for his liberalitie and ſingular prouidence. For firſt of all hee diſtributed a certaine quantitie of corne to all thoſe, who were

were not able of themselues to supply their owne wants, vsing herein both great care and diligence. After this, for that there were a great number of such, who in regard of their age, or some other infirmitie, were vnable to prepare their victuals, he tooke order for their reliefe, and appointed them certaine bakers, who should furnish them with bread, both sufficient and meet for their sustenance. Hee gaue order also, that they should not passe the winter disfurnished of cloathing, but prouided for such as were naked sufficient raiment, considering that the sheepe were partly dead, and partly deuoured, and that there was no wooll to set them awork, or other stuffe to make garments of. Now after he had furnished his subiects with these things, he thought good also to shew kindnesse to the neighbouring cities, and stored the Syrians with seede-corne to sowe their lands; which yeelded him no little profit: for the earth incontinently gaue him a large and plentifull tribute for that she had receiued; so that all of them had aboundance of victuals: and as soone as the harueſt was ready, he sent fiftie thousand men into that countrey which hee had relieued: and by this meanes hee with all diligence restored his afflicted kingdome: and comforted his neighbours, who were oppressed with the like calamity. For there was not any man in necessity, that according to his qualitie was not assisted and succoured. G H

The villages likewise and the cities, and those of the common sort who entertained great households, and were in want, hauing their recourse vnto him, receiued that which they had neede of; so that to reckon vp all the corne which he gaue vnto those, who were not his subiects, it appeareth that hee imployed ten thousand Cores of wheate: now the Core containeth ten Athenian bushels: and within the compasse of his Realme he imploied eighty thousand: which care of his, and discreetly imployed fauour, wrought so much in the hearts of the Iewes, and was so highly renowned amongst other nations, that the ancient hatred which they had conceiued against him, for that he had altered certaine customes of their kingdome, was wholly forgotten, and hee was supposed by them to haue made a sufficient recompence, by the diligence hee had shewed in assisting them in their necessities; and no lesse either grace or glory obtained he among strangers: so that by these miseries the Kings honour was not a little magnified, and whatsoeuer damage hee receiued at home, so much honour and reputation atchieued he abroad. For whereas in strangers necessities he had shewed himselfe so full of magnanimitie, each man did not respect what hee had beene before, but such as they lately found him to be. I

About the same time also he sent Cæsar certaine supplies, namely, fiue hundreth chosen men of his guard, whom Elius Gallus led into the wars in Arabia, and had often vse of them in his most dangerous attempts. When as therefore his kingdome was restored to his former felicitie, hee builded a roiall palace in the higher part of the citie, furnished with many large buildings, & decked with gold and marble seates; so as they might receiue a great number of men: hee named also each roome of the house according to their seuerall names, & called on the lodging of Cæsar, and another of Agrippa. After this, being intangled with loue, he married a wife, least he should be distracted by vaine desires, and the cause of this his new mariage was this. There was amongst those that dwelt in Ierusalem, a certaine citizen called Simon, the son of Bœthas the Alexandrine, who was a Priest, and one of the chiefest in nobility amongst them: this man had a daughter, the faireſt and comliest creature of that age, whose beauty renowned by the common voice, it came to passe, that with her fame Herod at one time entertained a good affection towards her, and afterwards obtaining the sight of her, he grew in loue with her; yet would not vse his authoritie, least hee should seeme to behaue himselfe tyrannically, but chose rather to accept her for his betrothed wife. Whereas therefore Simon seemed vnworthy his affinitie, and yet too worthy to be blasted by contempt, he made election of a conuenient meanes to obtaine the fulnesse of his desire, which was, to raise both Simon and his to higher dignities. For which cause he presently deposed the high Priest Iesus the sonne of Phabetes, and established Simon in his place; and that done, he contracted affinitie with him. After the marriage was consummate, he builded a new castle in that place wherein he had ouercome the Iewes, vpon the time and incontinently after the ouerthrow of Antigonus, and when he had taken vpon him the gouernment. A from far with great coſt and expence. The Plaine that adioyneth vpon it, is all full of buildings after the manner of a city, and the top of the caſtle commandeth all the Plaine. As ſoone as therefore he had diſpoſed all his affaires, according to his hearts deſire, he poſſeſſed the kingdome in great quietnes, for that he made his ſubiects obedient vnto him, both by feare, in ſhewing himſelfe inexorable when it concerned him to puniſh; and by liberality, wherby he prouided for their publike neceſſities: he therefore tooke an eſpeciall care of himſelfe, as if the life and ſafety of his perſon had been the ſecurity of his people. He behaued himſelfe officiouſly and fauourably towards all forraine cities: he entertained the Princes by preſents, which according to his occaſions he ſent vnto them, to inſinuate himſelfe into their fauours, being in his owne nature magnificent and fit to gouerne: ſo that all his fortunes increaſed, and all things fell out happily according to his hearts
B deſire. True it is, that the care which he imployed in honouring Cæſar, and other mighty magiſtrates of Rome, cauſed him to outſtrip his cuſtomes, and to falſifie diuers ordinances of his countrey, in building cities, and erecting temples in honour of them, although he builded them not in the land of Iury: for the Iewes would not haue endured it, becauſe we are forbidden to honour Images and figures, formed according to the likeneſſe of a man, as the Greekes are accuſtomed to doe, but he did this in the countrey and forraine cities, and excuſed himſelfe to the Iewes, ſaying, that he did it not of his owne head, but performed that according to the charge and commandement which he had from others, who were greater then himſelfe: and in the meane while gratified Cæſar and the Romans, in that he reſpected their honour more then he did the ordinances of his countrey; although in all things he had reſpect to his particular aduantage, and determined
C with himſelfe to leaue behind him after his death large and ample teſtimonies of his power and greatneſſe: which was the cauſe that he builded cities with great charge and expence.

CHAP. XIII.

The building of the citie of CÆSAREA.

WHEN as therefore he had found out a fit and conuenient place vpon the ſea coaſt, to build a city on, which of long time had bin called the tower of Straton, he both magnificently deſigned and ſet downe the module and forme thereof, and made many
D ſumptuous buildings, both of royall places, and of other priuate lodgings, not builded after a ſlight manner, or of weake and fading matter, but of marble ſtone. But the greateſt and buſieſt worke of all, was the hauen which he made exempt and free from ſtormes and tempeſts, that in greatneſſe reſembled that of Piræus, and was ſo ſpacious that it was able to receiue many great ſhips into the road, and had diuers roomes and warehouſes to lay vp the merchandize therin. And the more admirable was this pile, becauſe the ſtuffe that was fit to finiſh this ſo great worke, was not gathered or gotten in that place, but muſt needly be brought from another place, vpon great charge and expence. This city is ſeated in Phœnicia vpon the coaſt, in the way to Egypt, between Ioppa and Dora, certaine villages ſituate vpon the ſea coaſts, vnfit either for landing or harbour, by reaſon of the Affricke wind, that driuing the ſand of the ſea vpon the ſhore, giueth not any
E quiet road vnto the ſhips, but that the Merchants are enforced for a long time to ride at anchor. To correct this incommodity of the place, he made the circuit round about the port ſo ſpacious, that it was able to receiue a great fleet: and he caſt down to the bottome therof, which was about ſome twenty fathoms deepe, certen huge ſtones, that for the moſt part were fiftie foot long, eight foot broad, and nine foot high, ſome more and ſome leſſe. The pile that was erected vpon this to affront the ſea, was a pane of two hundreth foot, the halfe wherof was oppoſed againſt the waues to breake the furie of the ſtreame, and for this cauſe was called in the Greek tongue Procymation, that is to ſay, Before floud: The other halfe ſerued as a foundation to beare vp a wall of ſtone fortified with diuers towers, the chiefeſt wherof was a faire pile or building, which was called Druſus, in memory of Druſus, Cæſars ſonne in law, who died very young: it had alſo diuers retreates or hoſtries in the ſame, into which the mariners were receiued and lodged.

F The deſcent being hard by, encompaſſed all the port like a round platforme, that ſerued for a pleaſant walking place for whomſoeuer liſted. The entrance and mouth of the hauen was toward the north, which is a wind that of al other moſt purifieth and cleanſeth. The ſupporter & ſtrength of all the circuit on the left hand vpon the entrance to the port, was an ample and huge tower to faſten it the more ſtrongly; and on the right hand, were two huge pillars of ſtone, more higher then the tower that ſtood oppoſite againſt them, erected and faſtned together. All round about the

the hauen there were certaine buildings, abutting one vpon another of poliſhed marble, and in G the midſt there was a little hillocke, on which there was a certaine monument placed in honour of Cæſar, which preſented it ſelfe to their ſight who ſailed to the port, in which there were the figures of the Citie of Rome and of Cæſar. This Citie alſo was called Cæſarea, as much to be wondred at for the matter whereof it was built, as for the arte whereby it was erected : and no leſſe cunning was there ſhewed in the vaults and conduits vnder ground, then in thoſe buildings that were about them ; ſome of them were conuaied toward the port, and diſcharged themſelues into the ſea by certaine compaſſed ſpaces : but there was one that went athwarts, that comprehended all the reſt, to the end that thereby the raine-water, and the cleanſings of the Citie might be conuaied into the ſea, and that when the ſea ſhould flow, it might waſh and cleanſe all the Citie.

The Theater and Amphitheater.

Hee erected alſo a Theater of ſtone, and behind the ſame to the Southward, an Amphitheater, H that was able to receiue a great number of men ; and ſo pleaſantly and fitly ſituated, that from the ſame a man might diſcouer the ſea. This Citie was finiſhed at the end of 12. yeeres ; during which time, the King was neither wearied by intending the worke, nor negligent in furniſhing the neceſſary charges. After this, perceiuing that the Citie of Sebaſta was already inhabited alſo, he reſolued to ſend his two ſonnes Alexander and Ariſtobulus to Rome, to preſent them vnto the Emperour Cæſar ; who no ſooner reſorted thither but they were lodged in Pollios houſe, who amongſt all the reſt was an intire friend of Herods. They might haue lien alſo at Cæſars houſe, who entertained them with as great familiaritie and kindneſſe, as might be poſſible : and gaue Herod licence in like manner to confirme the kingdome in one of his children, which ſoeuer beſt liked him, annexing to his gouernment, the countries of Trachona, Baranea, and Auranita for the occaſion which enſueth. A certaine man called Zenodorus had hired Lyſanias demaines or Lordſhip : and I not contenting himſelfe with thoſe reuenewes which hee gathered, but deſirous to gather more, he liued vpon ſpoiles and robberies in Trachona, which is a countrey, the inhabitants whereof commonly liue by pillage and ſpoile, which they purchaſe from the Citizens and Merchants of Damaſco. And ſo farre was Zenodorus from prohibiting theſe robberies, that hee himſelfe alſo was partaker of the booty ; ſo that the nations neighbouring round about, ſeeing themſelues thus abuſed, ſought for remedy at Varus hands, who was their gouernour, requiring him to certifie Cæſar, of Zenodorus wrongs and outrages. Which when he vnderſtood, he commanded that ſuch lawleſſe rioters ſhould be puniſhed, and that the countrey ſhould bee added vnto the iuriſdiction of Herod, to the intent, that by his vigilancy the inhabitants of Trachona ſhould no more moleſt their neighbours. For it was hard to reſtraine them, conſidering that they were accuſtomed and K traded in ſuch theft, and could not liue otherwaies. For they neither had townes nor lands, neither heritages nor any poſſeſſions, but onely certaine retraits and caues vnder ground, and liued pell mell like beaſts : and hauing made abundant prouiſion of water and victuals, they might eaſily endure warre a long time, and maintaine themſelues in their caues, when their enemies aſſailed them without.

Herod ſendeth his ſonnes Alexander and Ariſtobulus to Rome vnto Cæſar.

Cæſar giueth Herod the dominions of the Trachonites of Baranea and Auranita.

Zenodorus liueth by ſpoile.

The doores of theſe dennes were ſo narrow, that they could be entred but by one at once ; but within it was incredible ſpacious and large : the vpper part thereof was not ſteepie, but plaine, and in forme of a ſmooth earth : for the whole place naturally conſiſteth of a ſharpe and ragged rock, with a hard and difficult paſſage thereon, vnleſſe a man be guided thorow the paths. For the way L was not direct and ſtraight, but full of windles and many turnings. At ſuch time as they wanted opportunitie to ſpoile their neighbors, they robbed one another ; and omitted no kind of wickedneſſe. Herod hauing receiued the gift of this countrey at Cæſars hands, reſorted thither vnder the conduct of certaine guides that knew the waies, and hauing brought their power and prolling to an end, he left the neighbour nations in aſſured peace. But Zenodorus being partly whetted on with enuie, partly incited by the griefe which he conceiued thorow the loſſe of his poſſeſſions, reſorted to Rome to accuſe Herod ; yet could effect nothing of that which he intended.

Agrippa is ſent into Aſia.

Agrippa ſendeth the Gadareans bound vnto Herod, who came to accuſe him.

Zenodorus ſignorie ſold to the Auranites, and beſtowed on Herod by Cæſar, is the cauſe of the warres.

When Agrippa was ſent into Aſia by Cæſar to gouerne the prouinces beyond the ſeas, Herod, becauſe he was his very friend and familiar, went to ſalute him at Mitylene where hee wintered, for that he was one of his inward friends, and afterwards returned into Iewry. But M certaine Gadareans came vnto Agrippa with an intent to accuſe Herod : but he ſent them bound vnto the king, and vouchſafed them no audience. On the other ſide, the Auranites, who of long time hated Herods gouernment, ſtirred vp commotions, and laboured to draw the countrey into rebellion, and that vpon a iuſt ground, as it ſeemed, at that time : for Zenodorus deſpairing of his affaires, went and ſold them a certaine part of the Lordſhip in Auranita (which was comprehended within Cæſars donation to Herod) for the ſum of fiftie talents of yeerely reuenue, where-

A with they grew discontented, for that they were vniustly depriued of their estates: and hereupon they made often incursions, indeuouring themselues sometimes to recouer the same by force; and otherwhile contending for the right of their possession by course of iustice. They drew also vnto them certaine needy souldiers; who according to the custome of wretched men, expected their better fortunes by change and innouation: which though Herod knew, and could haue prouidently preuented them, yet exhorted hee them to maintaine their titles rather by good meanes then open violence, being loath to giue any occasion of new trouble or disquiet. At length in the seuenteenth yeere of his raigne, Cæsar came into Syria: vpon whose arriuall diuers of the Gadareans beganne to exclaime against Herod, accusing him of his seuerity and tyranny: which accusation they the rather attempted, because they were chiefely incited therunto by the instigations B and false suggestions of Zenodorus, who bound himselfe by an oath, that he would neuer giue ouer vntill that deliuering them from Herods tyranny, they were reduced vnder Cæsars protection. The Gadareans, perswaded by these his protestations, began to continue their exclamations, and that somewhat the more audaciously, for that they perceiued that they liued as yet vnpunished whom Agrippa had deliuered into Herods hands: for Herod had set them at liberty without any punishment, notwithstanding that in regard of his owne subiects he was inexorable, as euer man was; and most patient in induring those iniuries that were offered him by strangers, whom he alwaies dismissed without reuenge. When as therefore they accused him of violence and rapine, and for violating and rasing downe their temples, Herod beeing nothing dismaide thereat, presented himselfe before the Emperour to iustifie his actions. But Cæsar entertained him very C kindly, and diminished nothing of the good affection which he bare vnto him, notwithstanding all the vprores and insolent tumults of the people. Thus was the first day spent in audience of their complaints, and in those daies that followed there were no further obiections to bee heard of: for the Gadareans perceiuing both Cæsars disposition and the inclination of his councell, and fearing (as it was most likely) to be deliuered into Herods hands, the next night after some of them slew themselues; othersome for feare of torments brake thir owne necks; and some of them also drowned themselues in the riuer. And thus whereas they seemed to fore-iudge themselues, Cæsar presently absolued Herod.

Cæsar commeth into Syria: before him the Gadareans accuse Herod, and afterwards murther themselues.

The yeere of the world, 3946. before Christs Natiuitie, 18.

And this felicity of his, was seconded with another of no small consequence. For Zenodorus hauing his bowels broken through an extreame fluxe of blood, finished his life at Antioch in Sy- D ria. Whereupon Cæsar gaue Herod his countrey, which was a large and ample signory, and was situate betweene Trachonita and Galillee, containing Vlatha, Paneas, and the countries thereabouts. Hee made him one of the gouernours of Syria also, commanding them to execute nothing without his aduise. At this time attained he to the height of all worldly felicity: For whereas within the huge and ample Romane Empire, all things were disposed by Cæsar, and Agrippa, Cæsar honoured no man more then Herod next to Agrippa; and Agrippa respected him aboue all men next to Cæsar. Whereupon he grew to be so confident, that he begged a Tetrarchie at Cæsars hands: for his brother Phæroras, on whom he bestowed one hundreth talents of his reuenue out of his owne kingdome, to the intent that if he should happen to die, Phæroras estate might be assured and left no waies subiect vnto his children.

Vlatha, Paneas, and other regions are giuen to Herod.

Herod highly esteemed by Cæsar and Cæsar maketh Pheroras a Tetrarch.

E As soone as therefore he had conducted Cæsar as farre as the sea, vpon his returne he builded a goodly temple of white marble in honour of his name, in the countrey which belonged to Zenodorus, neere to a place which is called Panion, which is a goodly caue in the hart of a mountaine, and a place of great pleasure, vnder which there is a wide poole of immeasurable depth, which is full of standing water, and the vpper part of the mountaine is very high. From vnder this caue spring the fountaine heads of the floud Iordan. This place of it selfe so famous and delightful, was chosen out by Herod, and adorned also with a temple which he built in honour of Cæsar. At that time also he released the third part of those tributes which his subiects paid vnto him, to the end (as he said) that he might relieue his subiects after the penury they had endured. But the truth of his intention was, that he did it to that end to win their fauours, who were sinisterly affected to- F wards him. For they had conceiued an hatred against him, because all piety was in a manner abolished, & the ordinances of the country in a sort disanulled by the means of those temples, which he had built, & each man priuily muttered with bitternes against him; so that welny they were addressed to mutiny. But Herod with great discretion preuented the same, and cut off al occasions of insurrection, commanding euery one to intend his labour; forbidding them to make any assemblies in the city, or to talk one with another vnder colour of walking abroad for pleasure or feasts sake. Moreouer, hee had sent out certaine Intelligencers to discouer all that which was done, appointing

The yeere of the world, 3946. before Christs Natiuitie, 18. pointing grieuous punishments for those that misliked, or maligned his gouernment. For diuers of them were led vnto the Castle of Hircania, some openly, some priuately; where they were no sooner imprisoned, but they were put to death; and both in the city and in the country; there were certaine men appointed to take note of all such that vsed any assemblies vpon any occasion whatsoeuer. And so inwardly was he tormented with their dislikes, that as it is reported of him, he took vpon him the habite of a priuate man, and thrust himselfe in the night time into the company of the people, to vnderstand and gather what they thought of his gouernment; and those whom he found to be vntractable and obstinate, and would not be conformed to his will, he dispatched them by one meanes or other, binding the rest of the people by an oath to serue him faithfully, and constrained them to keepe the oath they had sworne, and to acknowledge his soueraignty: whereunto diuers thorow the feare they conceiued, easily condescended. But they who had a more greater courage, and were discontented to see themselues constrained, hee cut them short by all the meanes that he might. He required also an oath of diuers of those sectaries, who followed the Pharisees Pollio and Sameas: and notwithstanding they denied to take the oath, yet did he not punish them as he did the other for their refusall, in respect and reuerence of Pollio their master. From this rigour also were they exempt, who amongst vs are called Esseans, which is a sort of men that liue after that manner that Pythagoras did among the Græcians, of whom I haue more expresly discourssed in another place.

Herod bindeth the people by an oath.

Herod excuseth the Pharises from swearing for Polias and Sameas sakes.

The Esseans not much vnlike the Pythagorists.

At this present I thinke it not a matter to be ouerslipt, neither estranged from the aime of my history, to report for what cause the king had so religious an opinion of those men. There was a certaine Essean called Manahem, who in his sect was accounted an vpright and iust man, and one that had obtained from God the knowledge of things to come. He seeing Herod one day at such time as he was very young and went to schoole, saluted him and called him king of the Iewes. Herod supposing that Manahem knew him not, or that he mocked him, reprooued him sharpely for this his speech, saying, that he acknowledged himselfe to be one of the common sort. Manahem smiling, hit him gently with his hand vpon the backe, and said vnto him, Thou shalt be king, and shalt haue a happy raigne. For such is Gods pleasure; and at that time remember thy selfe of the words that Manahem spake vnto thee, which shall serue for a testimony to put thee in mind of thy mutable estate. For it becommeth thee nothing more, then by iustice, piety, and equity, to winne the hearts of thy subiects: yet know I by reuelation from God, that thou wilt not follow » these instructions; for thou shalt forget and neglect both diuine and humane lawes: though in o» ther respects thou shalt be most fortunate and purchase eternall glory. Yet shalt thou not escape » Gods hands: for he shall chastise thee in the latter time of thy life, with a grieuous punishment.
» At that time Herod gaue small regard to those his words, in that he had no hope that any such » thing should happen: but not long after, as soon as he had obtained the kingdome to the fulnes of his felicity, he in the greatnes of his power sent for Manahem, and asked him how long he should raigne. But he returned him a doubtfull answer. Which when Herod perceiued, he asked him anew if he should raigne ten yeeres. Wherunto Manahem answered, and twenty, and thirty, without setting him down any prefixed terme. Herod contenting himselfe herewith, embraced Manahem, and gaue him licence to depart, and continued his affections towards the Esseans for his sake. I haue thought good to register these things, notwithstanding they may seeme vncredible, to declare that diuers of our nation haue had communication with GOD by reason of their holines.

Manahem foretelleth Herods gouernment.

Herod questioneth with Manahem about the continuance of his kingdome, and loueth the Esseans for his sake.

CHAP. XIIII.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 14 al. 11.

IN the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, Herod, after he had finished these many and admirable actions, conceited in his mind no meane, but a mighty proiect, which was to reedifie Gods Temple of greater bignesse and answerable height, hoping that this worke which was the most admirable of all those he had vndertaken (as indeed it was (in being finished, would eternize his memory. But fearing least the people in regard of the greatnes of the enterprise, would bee hardly drawne thereunto, he determined to sound their intents by his discourse, and for that cause assembling them together, he spake after this manner;

Herod intendeth to reedifie Gods temple.

Herod certifieth the people that he will reedifie the temple.

Men and brethren, I hold it to be a matter both vaine & superfluous, to recount vnto you what things I haue performed, during the time of my gouernment. For they haue beene of that nature,

A that they haue returned me but little honour; and your ſelfe great profit and ſecurity. For you your ſelues know that in thoſe aduerſities that haue befallen you, I haue bin no waies negligent in that which concerned your profit; and in thoſe buildings I haue erected by Gods aſſiſtance, I haue not ſo much regarded my ſelfe, as that which concerneth you all: and my hope is by the will of God that I haue brought the eſtate of the Iewes to that degree of felicity, that they neuer had or expected before this time. As for that which I haue particularly exploited in the heart of the country, & in the cities which I haue augmented, as well with ornament & beauty, as with a number of inhabitants; ſince you your ſelues know, I think it a ridiculous matter to reduce them to your memory. But I muſt at this time aſſure you that the deſign which I will preſently enterpriſe, is far more holy & more excellent, then may be performed by vs. For our pre-

B deceſſors after they were returned from the captiuity of Babylon, builded a temple in honour of our great and mighty God, which in height wanted ſixty cubits of that which Salomon firſt built: yet ought we not to obiect as a blame, or aſcribe this action to any impiety in our anceſtors. For the temple was not at their diſpoſition, but the meaſure of their building was ſet them down by Cyrus and Darius the ſonne of Hyſtaſpes, to whom & their ſucceſſors they haue firſt of all been ſlaues, as after their time they haue been vnder the ſubiection of the Macedonians: ſo that they had not the meanes & opportunity, to raiſe this religious monument, according to his firſt pattern, to that requiſite and conuenient height. But ſince at this preſent by Gods permiſſion, I haue obtained the kingdom; and that for a long time hitherto we haue enioyed a happy peace; and that neither mony nor great reuenewes are wanting; and that which is our greateſt

C good, we are made happy by the fauor of the Romans, who in a ſort are the Lords of the whole world, and in effect are our entire friends: I will enforce my ſelfe to repaire that defect, which hapned in times paſt thorow the miſeries, and weak means of our noble predeceſſors, reſoluing with my ſelfe to perfect that which is requiſite for the ſeruice of God, in acknowledgement of the benefits which I haue receiued from him, by whoſe mercy and meanes I haue obtained my kingdome.

This ſudden and vnexpected ſpeech of Herods, filled all mens eares with wonder, and hearts with expectation, in that he ſeemed to promiſe ſuch a thing, as was beyond their hope, & as they thought far greater then his power: and that which moſt diſtracted them was, for that they had conceiued a feare, leaſt after he had pulled down the old; he ſhould not be of ability to erect a

D new. For which cauſe his counſell ſeemed to be dangerous, and attempt ouer difficult. But the King perceiuing with what doubts they were detained, encouraged them, promiſing in no ſort to deface the old temple, before all that was prepared & poliſhed which was requiſite for the building of the new. And in this he kept his word. For hee appointed a thouſand chariots to draw ſtones vnto the place, & choſe out amongſt the reſt ten thouſand cunning & expert workmen. Hee apparelled alſo at his owne charge one thouſand Prieſts in their accuſtomed veſtments, whereof ſome gaue the maſons inſtructions how they ſhould worke, and the reſt aſſiſted the carpenters. This done, after he had fitly & readily performed & prepared all things requiſite, he cauſed them to fall to their building. As ſoon as therefore the former foundations were taken away, & other meer new were planted in their place, the temple was erected vpon them,

E in length one hundreth cubits, and twenty cubits in height aboue thoſe hundreth cubits which the former contained, which twenty cubits were in ſome ſort ſcantled after that by ſucceſſion of time the foundations began to bee ſettled, and during Neroes raigne our countrimen had thought to haue raiſed it to the firſt height. The building was of white & ſtrong marble ſtones, which were each of them twenty and fiue cubits long, eight cubits high, & about ſom twelue cubits broad. All the ſtructure of the ſame was made after the manner of a princely palace on all ſides, & the middle part thereof was higher then the reſt: ſo that it might eaſily be diſcouered by the inhabitants of the country many furlongs off; and eſpecially it was moſt apparant & ſubiect to their ſight, who dwelt oppoſit againſt it, or repaired vnto the citie. The doores thereof and their tranſomes were correſpondent to the reſt of the magnificence of the temple, gar-

F niſhed with diuers tapeſtries, and azured flowers, which inueſted & adorned the pillers: vnder whoſe chapters a golden vine ſpread it ſelf on each ſide, repleniſhed with many goodly cluſters of grapes hanging down; which was an admirable work to behold, both in reſpect of the greatneſſe, as alſo for the workemanſhip and matter whereof it was made. Hee encompaſſed all the temple with moſt goodly galleries, & porches correſpondent to the magnificence of the ſame, and ſurpaſſing thoſe in times paſt for the coſt; ſo that neuer any man before him ſo magnificently adorned the temple. Two of which were vnder-propped with very ſtrong wals, whoſe workmanship was so exquisite as it is incredible to be reported amongst men. There was a ston- G ny rising or hillocke, and very streight & high, the top whereof towards the eastermost part of the city was somewhat smooth & vpright. The first that incompassed it with a wall was Salomon our King, who by Gods fauour & the mediation and labour of diuers workmen, did first of all build the higher part: Herod also inuested the lower part therof with another wall; vnder which to the southward there lieth a most deep valley. This wall was made of huge stones, close fast-ned the one vnto the other with lead; shutting all within his enclosure, & extending it self very deep; so that the greatnes & height of this foure square building was an incredible thing to be imagined. The greatnes of the stones appeared in the front, but on the inside they were fastned together with clasps of iron, which fortified & strengthned the building for euer against al iniuries of times. This worke hauing been thus continued to the top, & the void space between H the wall & the rising hillocke filling vp the floore aboue, was made plaine & equall. The whole circuit of the tower contained about foure stades or furlongs, a stade or furlong in length to e-uery pane from angle to angle. On the inside and neer vnto the top there was another wall of stone extended along the easterne side; hauing a double porch of equall greatnes with that of the wall, & placed in the midst of the temple, and openeth right vpon the gates thereof, which the kings before time had adorned. Round about the temple were planted those spoiles which were taken frō the Barbarians, which King Herod had placed there, with all those spoiles which he had taken from the Arabians. In a corner on the north side there stood a very strong & de-fenced fortresse, builded by the Asmonians, who were Herods predecessors, and had been both Kings & high Priests, and had imposed a name on that tower which was Baris, in which they I kept the priestly vesture, wherewith the high Priest was wont to be adorned at that time onely when he was to offer sacrifice. King Herod kept the same in that place, & there remained it after his death vntill the time of Tiberius Cæsar: vnder whon Vitellius gouernour of Syria came vnto Ierusalem; where he was entertained by all the people with as great magnificence as was possible: and being desirous to acknowledge the fauours that he had receiued at their hands, being requested by them that they might haue the keeping of the high Priests ornaments, he wrote vnto Tiberius Cæsar to grant then that fauor, & till the death of King Agrippa the Iewes had the same in their possession. But after that Agrippa was dead, Cassius Longinus that gouerned Syria, &

Cuspius Fadus Lieutenant of Iudæa, cōmanded the Iewes to returne the same into the fortresse K Antonia, saying that the Romans ought to be Lords thereof, as they had bin in times past. For which cause the Iewes sent Embassadors to Claudius Cæsar, to request his fauour therein, who arriuing at Rome found the youg King Agrippa there, who besought the Emperor that it might be lawfull for him to haue the keeping of the habit: who cōmanded Vitellius the gouernour of Syria, to deliuer it vnto his hands. Before time it was kept vnder the seale of the high Priest, & the custody of the Treasurers, & on the eeue of a certain solemn feast the Treasurers went vp to the captain, who kept the fortresse for the Romans, & after they had opened their seale they took the habit: and after the feast was past, they returned it back againe vnto the same place, & shut it vp vnder the same seale in the presence of the captain. All which we haue thought good to lay open, to make the diuersity knowne that was vsed in that care. L

The place where the high Priests stole was kept. Vnder whose custody the stole was.

After that Herod had in this sort builded this strong tower for the security and guard of the temple, he called it Antonia, for the loue of Antonius his friend, and one of the chiefest men in Rome. In the westerne part of this porch, there were foure gates, whereof the one opened vp-on the Kings palace, to which there was a direct way through the midst of the valley; the two others led vnto the suburbes: and the fourth opened vpon the rest of the city, and gaue open passage vnto the same, by the meanes of a number of staires, by which men might descend to the foot of the valley; and from thence there was an ascent by other staires to ascend vpwards.
For the citie was situate neere vnto the temple, after the manner of a theater; and was bended to the southward by a deep valley. As touching the fourth side turned toward the south, it had likewise certaine gates in the midst thereof; and vpon the same there was a triple gallery very M royall and princely, the length whereof extended from the orientall valley as farre as the westerne. For it was impossible to extend it any further. This worke was one of the most famous peeces that was euer seen vnder the sunne: For the depth of the valley was so great, that it was impossible for a man to see the bottom, if he looked downward from the higher part: and notwithstanding on the same he erected this porch of so great a height, that but to looke from the top therof, & to cōsider the depth as wel of the valley as the height of the porch, it would make a man giddy, & his eye could not pearce vnto the immesurable bottome of the same. It had in length

The Tower of Antonia.

The porch builded aloft aboue the valley.

A length foure ranks of pillars oppoſed the one right ouer againſt the other (for the fourth pane of the wall was fortified with a wall of hewen ſtone) the thickneſſe of the pillars was ſuch, that it was as much as three men could fadom holding one another by the hand, and the length was of twenty and ſeuen foot, with a double baſe at the bottome. The whole number of them was one hundreth, ſixty and two, and they had Chapters engrauen and damaskt with Corinthian worke. All this building was ſo huge, that it moued admiration in thoſe that beheld the ſame. Betwixt theſe foure ranks there were three porches, whereof two were on either ſide, containing in breadth each of them thirty foot, & in length a ſtade or furlong: & more then fifty foot in height. That in the midſt was in breadth once and a halfe as much as theſe two; and in height twice as much. For it ſurpaſſed the reſt by farre. The floore was made of goodly planks, engra-
B uen with diuers figures; and the roofe therof was farre higher then any of the reſt, in which certaine huge beames were morteiſed, on which there were certain pillars builded, vnited and annexed ſo fitly together, that it is a matter incredible to thoſe that haue not ſeen the ſame, & admirable to him that beholdeth it. Such was the faſhion of the circuit of the firſt porch. In the midſt, and not farre off from the other, ſtood the ſecond; whereunto there was an aſcent made with few ſteps. It was incloſed with a ſeparation of ſtone, with an inſcription, forbidding any ſtranger to enter the ſame vpon paine of death. This inward porch both to the ſouthward and the northward had three gates, in rank equidiſtant the one from the other; and toward the eaſtward had one great gate, by which thoſe men entred who were cleanſed with their wiues. For beyond that place it was not lawfull for the women to haue acceſſe. But the third inward ſpace
C was only acceſſible by the Prieſts. In it was the Temple, & before the ſame the Altar; on which they were wont to offer burnt ſacrifices vnto God. But Herod durſt not enter the interiour ſanctuary, from whence profane men were excluded by the lawe: but by the mediation of the Prieſts he intended the ſtructure and building of the inward porch, and finiſhing in eight yeares ſpace the reſt of the edifice, at length alſo he finiſhed the Temple it ſelfe, by the endeuours of the ſame Prieſts, within the terme of one yeare and ſix moneths. By which meanes the people were repleniſhed with the fulneſſe of ioy, and euery one gaue thankes vnto God for that the whole worke was finiſhed ſo ſpeedily, and wiſhed all happineſſe to the King for his coſt and diligence in the execution and finiſhing thereof: and they celebrated a great feaſt in honor of the D reſtauration of the Temple. Then did the King offer vp three hundreth oxen vnto God, & the reſt of them each one according to his ability offered ſo many ſacrifices, as that ſcarcely they may be comprehended in number, for that their multitude exceedeth their eſtimate.

About the very time of the celebration of this feaſt in the honour of the reedification of the Temple, the Kings day of coronation fell out, which hee was wont to ſolemnize euery yeare with great ioy: and for this twofold occaſion the ſolemnity and ioy was farre more ſumptuous and compleat. The King alſo cauſed a conduit of water to be made, and conuayed by pipes vnder ground, drawing it from the Caſtle Antonia vnto the Orientall gate of the Temple;
E neer to which he builded another Tower alſo, to the end, that by the conduits he might aſcend priuily vnto the Temple, if happely the people ſhould practiſe any inſurrections againſt his royalty. It is reported, that during the building of this temple, it neuer rained by day time, but only by night, to the intent the work might not be interrupted: and our predeceſſors haue teſtified no leſſe vnto vs. Neither is this thing vncredible if we attentiuely conſider thoſe other effects of Gods prouidence. Hitherto concerning the reedification of the Temple.

How Alexander and Ariſtobulus, being returned vnto their father, were aſſailed and calumniated by Salome and Pheroras.

The yeare of the world, 3955. before Chriſts birth, 9.

AMongſt the reſt of the affaires of the Common-wealth, the King thought it behooued him to redreſſe and hinder priuate iniuries, both in the citie & country: for the which purpoſe he made a new law vnlike to the former, that it ſhould be lawful for ſuch as were wal-breakers, to be ſold for ſlaues out of the limits of his kingdom: which law did not ſeem ſo much to intend the puniſhment of malefactors, as the diſſolution of his owne countrey cuſtomes. For to ſerue forraine nations, who liued not after the manner of the Iewes, and to do whatſoeuer they commanded them, was more preiudiciall vnto religion then vnto the parties conuicted of that fact. Wherefore it was ſufficiently already in the old ancient lawes prouided for the puniſhment of ſuch people, to wit, that a theefe ſhould reſtore foure times as much as he ſtole: which if he was not able to do, that then he was to be ſold, not vnto ſtrangers, nor into perpetuall bondage, but only for ſeuen yeares: at which time he ſhould again be ſet free. So that the common people did interpret this new law to ſet downe an vniuſt puniſhment, and rather to ſauour of tyranny, then of princely dignity, and to be enacted not without contempt of their ancient lawes: ſo that for this cauſe all men ſpake very ill of the King.

At the ſame time Herod ſayled into Italy to ſalute Cæſar, and to ſee his children liuing at Rome. A of curteous conditions; and in their very behauiour did ſhew that they came of kingly linage. Which things mooued Salome & the reſt, by whoſe falſe accuſations their mother Mariam was oppreſſed; to enuy them; feating their puiſſance, and verily perſwading themſelues that they would be reuengers of their mothers iniuries. So taking hereby occaſion, they began alſo falſly to accuſe them, as miſliking their father, who had cauſed their mother to be ſlain; & as though they had an auerſion frō him, whoſe hands were imbrued in their mothers blood. For they wel perceiued that by ſuch calumniations they might draw them into hatred, & auert their fathers good will from them. Yet did they not carry theſe their inuentions to the Kings eares, but contented themſelues to bruite them abroad amongſt the cōmon people; which ſo in the end comming to his hearing, would cauſe in him ſuch enmity and hatred againſt his ſonnes, as that it

BVt the King as yet miſtruſting nothing, moued with a fatherly care ouer thē, had them in ſuch eſtimation as reaſon did require, & for that they were now come vnto mans eſtate he married them both: and vnto Ariſtobulus he gaue Bernice the daughter of Salome; and vnto Alexander, Graphyra the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. Which done, vnderſtanding that Marcus Agrippa was returned out of Italy into Aſia, hee went vnto him thi-

Which Agrippa yeelding vnto, Herod omitted nothing that might delight him: for hee receiued him in his Cities newly built, ſhewing him the faire houſes and goodly edifices, entertaining him and the reſt of his friends and followers with all ſorts of delights, pompe and magnificence, as well at Sebaſte, as at the hauen of Cæſarea, and in the Caſtles he built, to wit, Alexandrium, Herodium, and Hircania. He alſo brought him to Ieruſalem, where all the people met him apparelled in ſuch goodly and braue attire, as they were accuſtomed to adorne themſelues withall whenas they celebrated their feſtiuals, & with many ioyfull acclamations receiued & ſaluted him. Agrippa offered a hundreth head of fat oxen to God, and feaſted all the people;

How Herod ſayled vnto Agrippa.

HErod hauing paſt the winter at home, and hearing that Agrippa was now with an army minded to go to Boſphorus, the ſpring time being now at hand, hee ſailed vnto him againe, & taking his courſe by Rhodes & Cous, he came towards Lesbus, thinking there to find Agrippa: but by a contrary wind he was driuen from thence, & forced a while to ſtay at
E Chius; where many priuately coming to ſalute him, he rewarded them with princely rewards: & perceiuing that the citie gate, deſtroied in the wars againſt Mithridates, was not yet repaired, but lay ſtill ruinated for want of money to repaire it, hee gaue them ſo much mony as largely ſufficed to reſtore it to the former beauty & bigneſſe; exhorting them with all expedition to reedifie & adorne the City as it was in times paſt. At laſt the winde changing, hee ſailed firſt to Mitylene, & then to Byzantium; and there vnderſtanding that Agrippa had already paſt the rocks of Cyanes, he followed him with all ſpeed, & ouertook him at Synope a City of Pontus: who contrary to Agrippas expectation arriued there with his nauy: Herods comming was very gratefull vnto Agrippa, & with eſpeciall affection they embraced one another. It was an euident ſigne of friendſhip, that the King omitting his own priuate buſines, would now com vnto
F him in ſo conuenient a time. Wherfore Herod ſtill abode with him in the army, alwaies preſent either to aſſiſt him with counſell, or to beare part of the labour with him. Hee was alſo preſent with him at ſuch times as he meant to be merry, being his only counſellor in difficult matters, for the beneuolence he bare vnto him; & alſo in all his mirth, as being one whom he honored. Agrippa hauing diſpatcht the buſines in Pontus for which he came, it pleaſed him not to return by ſea, but to go by Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and the greater Phrygia, and ſo they came by land to Epheſus: and there taking ſhip they came to Samos. And in all that whole iourney,

And Herod did in the way help many with mony that wanted, and ſpent much vpon his gueſts: and moreouer if any one had any ſuit vnto Agrippa, Herod was the onely man that might obtaine his ſuit for him. And although Agrippa alſo was both nobly minded and eaſily entreated to grant all ſuch things as were not preiudiciall to any man; yet was it a matter of no ſmall moment and importance in King Herode, to incite him to vſe beneficence, being euen of his owne accord forward enough to put the ſame in practice. For firſt of all he reconciled Agrippa being angry againſt the Ilienſians, and himſelfe paid the money that the people of Chius were indebted vnto Cæſars receiuers, obtaining for them an immunity: and hee alſo aſſiſted and pleaſured others in whatſoeuer they needed. CHAP. IIII. H

How the Iewes of Ionia accuſed thoſe countrimen for offering to take from them their priuiledges, granted vnto them by the Romans.

The Iewes of Ionia complaine vnto Agrippa of the iniuries offred them by thoſe countrimen.

WHen they came into Ionia, a great multitude of Iewes inhabiting that countrey being gathered together, expected him to ſpeak vnto him; and finding opportunity, they complained vnto him of the wrongs that thoſe countrimen offered them, not permitting them to liue according vnto their lawes; and that vpon feſtiuall daies they pulled & haled them before their tribunall: and that they would not permit them to ſend ſacred money vnto Ieruſalem, & that they compelled them to do publike buſines, and to ſpend the holy mony in thoſe affaires, contrary to the priuiledges granted vnto them by the Romans. Herod laboured to haue the Iewes complaints heard by Agrippa, and willed one of his friends & followers called Nicholaus, to plead the Iewes cauſe: who made a ſpeech vnto Agrippa, ſitting with the reſt of the Romane nobility, and other Kings and Princes, in their behalfe after this manner: Moſt I

A seuenth day from all labors, we spend that day in learning our religion, & the lawes & customs thereof, esteeming this custome not to be of small force to correct and amend our manners. These our customs hauing in them nothing that any that searcheth them, can iustly reprehend, they are now also, though many are perswaded the contrary, consecrated & cõfirmed by their antiquity: So that we must needs make a conscience of it to forsake our lawes, that haue endured so many ages. These are the iniuries that these people by violence offer vs; they sacrilegiously take frõ vs the mony dedicated to God: they impose tributes vpon vs, who are free: they vpon festiual daies force vs to their tribunals, to law & other profane businesse, without any necessity, but only in contumely & disgrace of our religion, which they knowe well in the meane while that they persecute with vniust & vnlawfull hatred. For your Empire, equally prouiding B for the good of all your subiects, doth not onely nourish the mutuall concord of them all, but also resisteth hatred and malice. These are the iniuries, most worthy Agrippa, whereof we seeke redresse at thy hands, requesting thee that hereafter we may liue according to our religion as before times, & that our aduersaries may haue no more authority ouer vs then wé ouer them: which is not only iustice & equity, but already also granted by your clemency. And there are yet extant to be seen in the Capitoll many decrees & ordinances of the Senate concerning this matter, engrauen in brasse, which are read vnto this day: doubtlesse for our truth and fidelity so oftentimes tried: or at least, though we not deseruing it, yet holy and inuiolate. For you do not only not withdraw from vs & all other nations your former benefites granted vnto vs, but you do rather euery day beside all hope and expectation increase them: all which, time wil not C suffer me to recount. And that we may not seem vainely to boast of our duties & officiousnesse towards you, and also omitting other things that are past; our King now sitting with you can sufficiently testifie it so to be. For what kind of loue & good will hath he omitted to shew vnto your nation? where was he not proued trusty? what hath he not deuised to honor you? where stood you in need, when he was not the first man to help you? Why therefore should not we receiue some fauour for his deserts? I will not omit to put you in mind of the fortitude of his father Antipater, who came with two thousand souldiers to assist Cæsar in the Egyptian warres, wherein he so valiantly behaued himselfe, thar neither by sea nor land any one in those warres deserued more commendations then himselfe. I will not at this time recount how much good D he did Cæsar in those warres, and what & how great rewards he therefore receiued: but rather I should first of all put you in remembrance of the letters that the Emperour writ vnto the Senate concerning this matter, wherewith he obtained for Antipater the honours and priuiledges of the City. For this onely argument had been sufficient to haue declared that we did not obtaine such fauour without desert, and request thee now to confirme the same, of whom wee might iustly hope for new benefits, seeing such friendship & familiarity between thee and our King. For we haue vnderstood by our nation that dwell in Iudæa, how many offerings thou didst there sacrifice vnto our God, & with what vowes thou honoredst him: how thou feastedst the people, & wast delighted in that mutuall hospitality. All which are as it were an argument of the frienship confirmed between so great a Romane Prince, & the nation of the Iewes, euen in Herods house. By all these, we humbly request in the presence of the King nothing but this E onely, that thou wouldest not permit vs deceitfully to bee defrauded of that, which you your selues haue already granted vnto the nation of the Iewes.

Now no one of the Greeks offered to oppose himself against that which Nicholaus did speak: for this was no contention to a Iudge concerning their right, but onely a deprecation & supplication to auoid iniury. Neither did they deny it: onely thus they excused themselues, that the Iewes dwelling amongst them were troublesome vnto them. But the Iewes shewed thẽselues to be free citizens, & to liue according to their religion & lawes of their countrey without any mans molestation or iniury. Wherfore Agrippa vnderstanding that they were wronged, answered thus; that he would not ouly gratifie them for his friend Herods sake, but also for that they seemed to him to demand a reasonable matter. Wherefore though they had demanded a great F ter thing of him, he would haue granted them whatsoeuer he might, without preiudicing the people of Rome. And now seeing they onely demand of him that which already the Romanes had granted vnto them, he would ratifie & confirme vnto them the benefit which they had already receiued at the Romanes hands, & prouide that henceforth no man should molest them for liuing according to the institution & ordinances of their countrey. Hauing thus spoken, he dismissed the assembly. Then Herod arising, thanked him in all their names. And then after mutuall embracing one another, they departed, taking their leaues, from Lesbus.

Herod returned to Ierusalem & made a speech vnto the people, & let them vnderstand the cause of his iniury, and remitted the fourth part of his tribute.

THe King hauing a prosperous winde, within a few daies after arriued at Cæsarea; and from thence he went to Ierusalem; and calling together all the people, as well the citizens as also the countrey people then present, there he told them the cause of his iourney, & how he had obtained immunities for the Iewes liuing in Asia, that they might conuerse there among the Gentiles, without any molestation. Then he recounted vnto them, what felitie they had receiued & enioyed by his raigne, seeing that his greatest care was so to prouide for his subiects, that they might want nothing. And to gratifie them the more, he told them, that H he would freely remit the fourth part of the taxes & tribute they were to pay for the yeer past. The people greatly comforted as well with the Kings speech vnto them, as with his liberality, departed ioyfully, wishing the King all happinesse.

Of the discord in Herods house, betweene him and his sonnes.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 3. al. 7.

Salome persecuteth Mariammes children with naturall hatred.

IN the meane time, the discord of his house was daily increased; for Salome greatly maligned the two yong men, as hauing an hereditary hatred rooted in her heart; and presumed by reason of her good successe in her exploit practised against their mother, to I labour all waies possible not to leaue any aliue, that might reuenge her death, who died, not deseruing it. And she wanted no occasion, for that it seemed the yong men were not very wel affected toward their father, partly for the memory of their mothers death, & partly also for that they desired the kingdome. So that they vpbraiding Salome and Pheroras did renew their olde hatred against them, who daily practised, by all meanes they could, to ouerthrow them: the yong men also hated them, but not with like hatred that they were hated of them. For they for their ingenuous manners & noble race dissembled not their anger, but with lauish tongues declared their mindes. But Salome & Pheroras contrariwise enuiously and craftily prepared themselues a way by calumniations, alwaies prouoking the magnanimous spirits of these yong men, whose fiercenesse might soon bring them into suspicion with their father, to the intent that he K might gather hereby, that they wanted not will to reuenge their mothers death, yea euen with their owne hands, for asmuch as they were not ashamed to be the children of such a mother, & would contend that she was vniustly put to death. And now all the whole city talked of them, euery one pitying the yong mens simplicity: Salome not ceasing to gather by their owne speeches probable arguments of suspicion, that they did not only take their mothers death impatiently, but also raging like young men, did both bewaile her death, & their owne case, who were cõpeld to liue with the murtherers of their infortunate mother, & as it were cõtaminate themselues with liuing amongst them. And the absence of the King greatly increased this their dissension; who being returned & hauing made a speech vnto the people, he presently was admonished both by Pheroras and Salome his sister, that he was in great danger, by reason of the two L yong men, who did openly boast that they would be reuẽged of them that killed their mother: feining moreouer, that they were incouraged, for that they hoped that Archelaus king of Cappadocia would help thẽ, to accuse their father vnto Cæsar. Herod hearing this, was greatly troubled; and so much the more, for that he heard the same also reported vnto him by others: And hereby he was put in memory of that which was past, how that for the dissension of his house he could not long enioy his friends and deerest wife. And as it were foreseeing by that that was past what would ensue, & fearing some greater calamity would befall him, he was altogether amazed. And truly as abroad he was most fortunate aboue al hope; so at home he was most vnhappy and infortunate beyond mens opinion: So that one may well doubt whether his fortunate successe abroad did counteruaile his misfortunes at home; or whether it had beene more M expedient for him to haue had neither the one nor the other, but to haue had onely a common and ordinary fauor at fortunes hands. Deliberating thus with himself, he thought it good to call vnto the court another sonne of his, whom he begat when he was a priuate man, and to grace him with honours, & to oppose him against the other two brethren, to the end, to bring downe and represse their fierce & hauty mindes: (this sonne of his was called Antipater) not minded (which after ouercome by affection hee did) to make him sole heire of all, but thinking

A ing hereby to bridle Mariammes children, and to diminish their arrogancy by letting them see that it was not needfull to keep the inheritance of so flourishing a kingdome onely for them: wherefore he introduced Antipater one opposed against them, that therby the yong men laying their pride aside, might shew themselues more tractable to their father: and so now he thought he had by this meanes prouided for the safety of these yong men. But it fell out far otherwise, then he expected; for the yong men esteemed this fact as an iniury done vnto them: And Antipater was of that nature, that hauing gotten promotion contrary to his expectation, he did endeuour all waies possible to be in greater account with his father then the two yong men; who was now through false accusations alienated from them, and euery day (as he also desired) ready to beleeue any thing that might incense him against them.

B Wherefore this was all his labour: yet had he an especiall care not to be thought an accuser of his brethren, but he vsed others of his accomplices, whom the King nothing suspected; who for the trust the king put in them, might also haue better credit giuen vnto their words. For now this man had many followers and fauourers, as it were gaping after preferment by his meanes, who with a kinde of counterfeit good will made a shew of loue and good will towards Herod. And being many in number and trusty one to another, the young men were euery day entrapped more and more: for many times they shed teares for very griefe of the contumelies and iniuries that they suffered; and many times they mentioned their mother, and complained vnto those who they thought to be their friends, of their father, as one that dealt not wel with them: all which Antipaters partakers maliciously noting, and adding thereunto something of their own C inuention, they did presently tell it vnto Herod; and so did nourish the dissension of his house. For the King being moued hereat, and purposing to humble Mariammes children, did daily encrease and augment Antipaters honors, and at his entreaties at last brought his mother into the court; and many times writing secretly vnto Cæsar in fauour of Antipater, he especially cõmended him in particular vnto him: and being to sayle to salute Agrippa, who was now to depart out of Asia, hauing gouerned that prouince ten yeares, he only tooke with him Antipater of all his sonnes, whom also he committed vnto Agrippa with many gifts, to go with him to Rome, and to be brought into fauour with Cæsar; so that now all things seemed to bee done, as it were by this mans beck, and the young men to be already disinherited.

CHAP. VII.

How Antipater liuing at Rome, Herod brought Alexander and his brothers thither, and accused them before Cæsar.

THis iourney did greatly aduantage Antipater, and increase his honour, and preeminence aboue his brethren: for he became famous at Rome, being by his fathers letters commended vnto all his friends there: yet this was a great griefe vnto him, that hee could not daily calumniate his brethren; for he feared least his fathers mind should change, and so he should affect Mariammes children most. This was his daily cogitation: but though he were absent, yet he ceased not by letters to incite his father against them, as hauing care of his safety; E but in deed for that he thereby through his bad practices hoped to obtain the kingdom: so that hee so increased Herods wrath against them, that he now was become a deadly enemy vnto the young men. But indeuouring to resist this affection, and fearing rashly in his anger to commit any thing to preiudice them, he determined to saile againe to Rome, and there accuse his sons before Cæsar, least he being led away thorow indignation and displeasure conceiued against the young men, should seem to cast off all loue and fatherly affection towards them. And repairing to Rome, & not finding Cæsar there, he followed him vnto Aquileia: and comming to speech of him, and requesting him to take notice of his misfortunes, he presented his two sonnes, and accused them before Cæsar of insolency, and for hauing attempted to poyson him, complaining their hatred to be gone so farre, that now by any wicked and execrable way whatsoeuer they F sought their fathers kingdom; notwithstanding that Cæsar had giuen him full power & liberty to leaue the kingdome to him, whom he found most dutifull and obedient vnto him. And that they, though therby they might not gain the kingdom, yet they could be contented with their fathers death, and that they sought it with danger of their own liues, and that this horrible and detestable hatred was now rooted in their hearts. And that hee hauing long endured this calamity, was now forced to open it vnto Cæsar, and trouble his eares with these complaints. And spake after this manner: Haue I deserued this at their hands? what wrong haue I done them? or how can they think it reason, that I who haue exposed my selfe to so many dangers, and vnder- G gone so difficult labours for a long time to obtain the kingdom, should not peaceably enioy the same, and suffer me to be Lord of mine own dominion, & permit me the liberty to leaue it vnto him who shall deserue such honour in the best performance of a son-like duty? So that the beholders hereof seeing piety so rewarded, might hereby be the more incited thereunto, especially seeing that without violating the law of nature, it is not lawfull to think any such thought: for no man can affect his fathers kingdome, but he doth also desire his fathers death, seeing that it is not permitted men to succeed those in the kingdom who are yet aliue. He alleadged moreouer, that for his part he had had a care that they should want nothing conuenient for a kinde father to prouide for princely children, neither ornaments, nor followers, nor delights: that also he had prouided for them wiues of noble race, and had married one of them vnto his sisters H daughter; and the other vnto Archelaus his daughter King of Cappadocia: and which was the greatest matter of all, he had not vsed the authority of a father against them after these their enterprises, but brought them vnto Cæsar their common benefactor; and that forsaking his owne right of a father, who had bin iniured, or of a King, against whom treason had been wrought, he was now content to debate his matter with them before such a Iudge, as well knew how to decide the thing in question according to right & equity: yet requested he him that that offence of theirs might not be left vnpunished, nor he forced to lead the rest of his life still in perpetuall fear: seeing that it was expedient that they should neuer see light againe after such haynous offences, and to escape vnpunished after the violating of all lawes of God & nature. Herod hauing with a vehement voyce obiected these accusations against his sons before Cæsar; the yong men I were not able to abstain from teares whilest hee was yet speaking, and hauing ended his speech they wholly resolued into tears: not for that they were guilty of those impieties laid vnto their charge, but for that they were accused by their father, against whom it was not decent to speak freely for themselues; nor expedient to refuse to defend their owne cause. Wherein they remained doubtfull what to doe, mouing the auditors to pitie them by their teares & lamentations, and carefull withall least it should be thought that their guilty conscience did so trouble them, that they were not able to speake in their owne defence, seeing that indeed is was their want of skill and tender yeares, by reason whereof they were so amazed. Which also Cæsar wel perceiued, & all that were present were so moued to compassion, that neither their father who was their accuser could long refraine from being moued hereat to compassion. K

Alias, chap. 9. Alexander & Aristobulus moue all that were present, euen their father and accuser to teares & compassion.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Alexanders defence, and how the two brethren were reconciled vnto their father Herod.

WHen the young men perceiuing both their father and Cæsar to relent, and the rest that were present partly to pitie them, partly to shed tears of compassion: the one of them named Alexander, who was the elder, framing his speech vnto his father, began thus to purge himselfe of the crimes obiected against them. My father, how wel & friendly minded thou art towards vs, this present iudgement declareth: for hadst thou determined a- L ny heauy sentence against vs, thou wouldst not haue brought vs before him, who is the preseruer of vs all: for thou mightest being a King, or for thy authority ouer vs as a father, haue punished vs for our offence according to thy power; but in that thou hast brought vs to Rome, and made Cæsar our iudge, it is an argument that thou seekest to saue vs: for no man brings any one to the temple whō he purposeth to destroy: which greatly aggrauateth our cause, who do censure our selues vnworthy to liue, rather then to incurre an opinion of impiety cōmitted against thee such a father. How farre more expedient is it to die guiltlesse, then to liue suspected of such offences. Wherefore, if truth be our patrone, we shall be happy either by thy own iudgement, or for that we haue escaped danger: but if calumniations do preuaile against vs, it is superfluous and to no purpose that we liue. For what good would it doe vs, if we liue in continuall suspici- M on? It is a probable accusation to accuse our yeares, as hauing affected the kingdome; and our vnfortunate mothers calamity maketh it seeme more probable. But consider I beseech thee, if the same crime may not as well be framed against any one whomsoeuer, as against vs. For any King hauing children by a wife that is now dead, may if it please him suspect them, as practising treason against him their father. But suspicion is not sufficient to proue a man impious and guiltie: wherefore bring any one forth that can tell any argument of this crime by vs to haue been attemp-

Alexander speaketh in his owne and his brothers defence.

A attempted,which may adde credit to this calumniatiō;Can any man ſhew that poiſon was prepared by vs for you;or that we conſpired with any;or that we corrupted any ſeruants with mony and gifts; or that we writ any letters againſt thee? yet may calumniation faine euery one of theſe vpon no occaſion.It is a grieuous matter for diſcord to be in a princes court; and the hope of dominion, which your maieſty affirmed to be the reward of piety, doth often impell mens minds vnto hainous offences. But although it be moſt certaine that we cannot be conuicted of any crime; yet how can we cleare our ſelues from accuſations forged againſt vs before them that wil not heare vs? But did we ſpeak ſome inſolent words;yet were they not againſt thee,O my father(for that had been impiety)but againſt them who tell all they heare. We bewayled our mothers misfortunes. It is true: but not becauſe ſhe is dead,but becauſe after her death ſhe
B is euill ſpoken of by thoſe, who ought not to doe it. We affect the kingdome of our father,he being yet aliue. Wherein? Is not that purpoſe of ours vaine and friuolous, we hauing alreadie beene graced with kingly honours? And ſuppoſe we were not; yet might we hope for them. But could we expect them by killing of thee,whom both earth and ſeas would diſdaine after ſo execrable an offence? Or could we haue expected that the loyalty of thy ſubiects,and the laws of our nation would haue permitted vs,hauing gotten the kingdom by murthering our father, to haue enioied the ſame,and entred into the holy temple,which thou didſt repair? Or ſuppoſe we deſpiſed them all;yet could any one that murthered thee eſcape, Cæſar being liuing? Thy children by thee begotten are not ſo impious nor fooliſh,though more infortunate then thy eſtate requireth. And ſeeing thou haſt nothing to accuſe vs of, or nothing to proue any accuſa-
C tion laid vnto our charge, how canſt thou be perſwaded that wee are guilty of ſuch inhumane actes? Is it becauſe our mother was put to death? But her death ought rather to haue made vs more wary then inſolent and raſh. We could ſpeak more in our owne defence, then this; but what need is it to excuſe that which was neuer done? Wherfore we beſeech Cæſar (who is Lord of all,and now our Iudge) only this, that if thou canſt, O my father, put away out of thy mind all ſuſpicion of vs,to ſuffer vs to liue hereafter,how vnhappy and vnfortunate ſoeuer: for what is more miſerable than to be raſhly accuſed without cauſe? But if thou canſt not,we liuing,liue without feare of vs, let vs dye condemned by our owne cenſure. For our liues are not ſo deare vnto vs, that we deſire to keepe them to his moleſtation that beſtowed them vpon vs.

Cæſar with theſe words, though before not greatly crediting ſuch accuſations and ſlanders
D laid againſt them, was now more moued to beleeue that they were guiltleſſe; and the rather, for that fixing his eyes vpon Herod, he perceiued him alſo to be much moued, and all that were preſent were ſorrowfull for the young men: ſo that all courtiers preſent thought hardly of the king, for the abſurd & friuolous accuſation framed againſt them; and the flower of their age, wherin they were now indangered,moued all mens minds what they could to aſſiſt them: And much more were they incited,after that Alexander had ingenuouſly refuted his fathers accuſations,the accuſed remaining ſtill in the ſame habit and place,and for griefe fixing their eyes vpon the ground. At laſt ſome hope appeared,ſo that the king himſelfe ſeemed to need ſome excuſe,for hauing ſo raſhly accuſed his ſonnes,without any certaine proofe of his accuſations. At laſt,Cæſar hauing a while deliberated with himſelf, pronounced that the young men were inno-
E cent,and guiltleſſe of the crimes laid vnto their charge: yet herein they were culpable,in that they had ſo behaued themſelues, that they gaue their father occaſion herein to ſuſpect them. And as for Herod he requeſted him to lay aſide all ſuſpicion, and to be reconciled vnto his children. For it was vniuſtly done of him to beleeue ſuch forged accuſations againſt thoſe whom he had begotten, and that one might recompence another in time to come for their former offences, and renew the good will betweene them in times paſt, if to aboliſh all ſuſpicions either did hereafter ſhew himſelfe more friendly to other then before. Cæſar hauing thus admoniſhed the yonng men, they prepared themſelues to intreat their fathers wonted fauour: he not expecting ſo long, came and embraced each of them one after another, they weeping exceedingly; and all thoſe that were preſent, both ſeruants and others did the like.

F Then giuing humble thanks vnto Cæſar, they departed together;and Antipater with them, counterfaiting himſelf to congratulate their good hap,for that they were now reconciled vnto his father. Within a few daies after, Herod gaue Cæſar three hundred talents, who was now beſtowing his gifts & preſents at Rome,and exerciſing his liberality vpon the people. And Cæſar againe beſtowed vpon him halfe of the reuenues out of the mines of the metall in Cyprus; and the other halfe vnto the ouerſeer thereof, and gracing him otherwiſe alſo, he gaue him leaue to chuſe which of his ſonnes he pleaſed for to ſucceed him in his kingdome; or if he had rather, to distribute it amongst them all: which Herod presently would haue done, but Cæsar would not G permit him, affirming, that during his life he should keepe it all whole and vndiuided, and his sonnes should be subiect vnto him.

Cæsar gaue Herod halfe his reuenues out of the mines of Cyprus.

After this, Herod returned againe into Iudæa, in whose absence the Trachonites that were no small part of his kingdome, were reuolted: yet by the industry of the captaines he left to ouersee all in his absence, they were conquered againe, and forced to do as they were commanded. As Herod and his sonnes were sailing towards home, arriuing at Eleusa a City of Cilicia, which is now called Sebaste, he found Archelaus there, who was king of Cappadocia. Archelaus did curteously entertain Herod, and was very ioifull that his sonnes and he were made friends, and that Alexander his son in law had so well cleered himselfe and his brother of the crimes laid vnto their charge. And so each one bestowing vpon the other princely gifts, they H departed, taking their leaue one of the other. After this, Herod being newly returned into Iudæa, and calling the people together into the temple, told them all that had past in his absence from them, and the courtesie of Cæsar: and told them also of other affaires that he thought meet for them to know; and turning the latter end of his speech vnto his sonnes, and exhorting the courtiers and common people to concord, he told them that his sonnes should raigne after him, and first of all Antipater: and after him his sonnes that he had by Mariamne, Alexander & Aristobulus; in the meane time euery one of them should honour him as King and Lord, notwithstanding his old age, which for long experience was the fitter to gouerne, seeing there was nothing in him wanting to keep both his subiects & children in their obedience; & that the soldiers also if they only respected him, should liue in all happinesse and felicitie without molestati- I on. Hauing thus spoken, he dismissed the people; some thinking he had spoken according to equity; others thinking cleane contrary: For hauing now as it were caused an emulation amongst his children, there was as it were already a shew of some mutation.

CHAP. IX.

ABout this time Cæsarea was finished, the tenth yeere after it was begun to be built, the 28. yeere of Herods raigne, in the 192. Olympiade. In the dedication heereof there K was great pompe and sumptuous preparations: for all musicians were brought hither to striue one with another, who was most excellent in their art; and champions that wrastled being naked and anointed with oyle: there was also a great many that fought with swords, and a great number of sauage beasts; and all things else that at such times were vsed, and in account, either at Rome or in other countries. These sports were also consecrated vnto Cæsar, and were to be renewed euery fift yeere. All this prouision the king at his owne cost and charges prouided to be brought from any place whatsoeuer, to shew the greatnesse of his magnificence. Iulia, Cæsars wife also bestowed much of her owne to the furnishing hereof, and sent many precious things out of Italy; so that the worth of them all amounted vnto fiue hundred talents. And a great company being gathered together to behold these sports, he receiued all L Embassadours sent vnto him from other nations, to thanke him for the benefits he had bestowed on them; and he lodged, feasted and sported them: and being all day long amongst the people to see those sports, at night hee receiued them with banquets, and shewing them his magnificence; and gained great praise and commendations for a worthy king. For, he in all things so prouided, that the last was more pleasing and gratefull then the first, and caused him to be more admired. And it is reported, that Cæsar himselfe and Agrippa often did say, that Herods magnanimity was greater then his present reuenewes could beare, and that he well deserued an empire, as big as all Syria and Egypt. These sports being ended, he builded another towne in a field, called Capharsaba, chusing for it a watery soyle fit for plants: the citie was M compassed with a riuer; and hee also planted round about it a wood full of most goodly trees. This towne he called Antipatris, after his fathers name Antipater. After which he also builded a castle about Iericho, called after his mothers name, Cypron, which was very strongly defenced, and adorned within with rare and sumptuous edifices. And not forgetting his brother, he dedicated vnto him most goodly buildings: for first he built a tower as bigge as Pharo in the city, in remembrance of his dead brother, and called it by his name Phasaelus, which also was the strongest hold and defence in all the city. After this, he builded a towne neere vnto the vally of Iericho, as one goes toward the north, wherby the fields that before almost lay desert were now tilled

A tilled & inhabited by the townſmen; ſo that of them it was named Phaſaelus field. It were hard to recount all his liberality in particular ſhewed both vnto the cities of Syria & Grecia, and all other places whereſoeuer he came: for he helped many either by building publike places; or if there were any new works begun, and not finiſhed for want of mony, by giuing them money to finiſh them: the chiefeſt amongſt all which were, that he builded at his his own coſt & charge the temple of Apollo at Rhodes; and gaue them many talents of ſiluer to build their ſhips. He alſo builded the greateſt part of the publike houſes & places in the City by Actium, which Cæſar built for the Nicopolitanes there inhabiting, and that with his owne proper coſts and charges. Hee alſo for the Antiochians inhabiting the greateſt Citie of Syria, builded porches on each ſide of the greater ſtreet, that goeth quite through the midſt of the Citie, and doth as it B were part it into two: and the ſtreet it ſelfe that lay open, he paued with poliſhed ſtone: which work was as great a commodity to the inhabitants, as a beauty vnto their City. He alſo helped to maintaine the ſports at Olympus with yearly reuenewes, that now for want of maintenance began to decay: ſo that by his meanes there were more ſolemne ſacrifices, and all things more ſumptuous to pleaſe them that came to behold them: for which his liberality he vvas declared perpetuall maſter & maintainer of thoſe ſports. It is admirable to ſee in one man ſuch diuerſity of mindes: for on the one ſide if we reſpect his liberality and beneficence towards all men, we muſt needs ſay, he was of a moſt free and bountifull nature; contrariwiſe, if we conſider the iniuries & crueltie he ſhewed againſt his ſubiects & deareſt friends, we muſt confeſſe him to haue been a hard man, and intractable, and who paſſed all bounds of modeſty; ſo that we would think C him to haue been of two contrary diſpoſitions. But I am otherwiſe perſwaded, and thinke that both theſe did proceed from one matter: for becauſe he thirſted after glory and honour, and wholly applyed himſelfe thereunto, he became liberall whereſoeuer he was, in hope either to reape preſent thankes for his labour, or a future remembrance. Wherefore ſpending aboue his reuenewes for this matter, he was forced to be chargeable vnto his ſubiects: for it was neceſſary that he that ſo laviſhly beſtowed ſuch huge ſummes of money vpon others, ſhould ſome where get it, though with euill means. Laſtly, ſeeing himſelfe for ſuch like iniuries hated of his ſubiects, he thought it a hard matter to get their good wils; which he could do no waies elſe, but by remitting the tribute they paid him. Wherefore he abuſed the hatred of his people for his D owne commodity: for if any one of them did not tolerate that ſlauery wherein they liued, or did endeuour to ſhake off the yoke of his dominion, againſt ſuch he vſed a meruailous cruelty; and outraged them no leſſe, then as if they had been his enemies, neither reſpecting friendſhip nor kinred; for that he deſired alone to be honoured of all men. And how greedy of honour he was, we may gheſſe by the honors he did vnto Cæſar, Agrippa, and others of their friends: for he deſired to be an example to his ſubiects, that as he himſelfe honoured men better then himſelfe; ſo they ſhould all honor him likewiſe: therby declaring what thing he did naturally moſt deſire. But the Iewes religion doth not permit them licence to honour Potentates, who of neceſſity ought to haue greater care and reſpect of right and equity, then of ſuch officiouſneſſe towards ſuperiors: for it was diſprofit enough vnto the Iewes that they could not with ſtatuaes and temples obtaine the Kings fauour, and with ſuch like flatteries ſatisfie the fond appetites of E a vaineglorious man. And this ſeemeth to me to be the reaſon that Herod was vniuſt, and hard towards his friends, and to thoſe whom he made partakers of his counſels and enterpriſes; and franke and bountifull towards ſtrangers.

F THe Aſian & Cyrenian Iewes were greatly afflicted by the citizens of thoſe countries, who hauing had the ſame priuiledges granted vnto them by the ancient kings that the citizens had, were now grealy iniured by the Greeks: as though they carried money out of the country, and were preiudiciall vnto the reſt of the inhabitants. And the Greeks making no end of theſe their iniuries, they were conſtrained by Embaſſadors to complaine of them vnto Cæſar: who wrote vnto euery Prouince, that it was his pleaſure that the Iewes ſhould enioy like priuiledges with the other inhabitants of the countrey. The copy of which writing we haue here ſet downe, that it may the better appeare, how the Roman Emperours of ancient times were affected vnto our nation.

Cæſar Auguſtus Pont. Max. Trib. poteſtatis, thus decreeth. For as much as the nation of the Iewes G hath alwaies been truſty vnto the Rowans, not only at this day, but alſo in all former ages, and eſpecially in the time of our father Cæſar the Emperor, vnder Hircanus their high Prieſt: I haue ordained, that according to the common ſentence of the Senate, they ſhall liue after their countrey lawes, vnder which they liued in the time of Hircanus the high Prieſt of God: and that their temple ſhall retaine the right of a ſanctuary, and that it ſhall be lawfull for them to ſend votiue money vnto Ieruſalem by certaine perſons: and that they ſhall not be compelled to appeare before any Iudge vpon their Sabbath daies, or the day before their Sabbaths, after nine of the clocke vpon the preparation day. And if any one be knowne to ſteale the holy bookes, or holy mony laid vp in their places appointed for religion, he ſhal be guilty of ſacrilege: and his goods ſhall be confiſcate vnto the treaſury of the people of Rome. I alſo decree for the good will I H beare vnto all men, that their memorial or requeſt offered vnto me by C. Marcus Cenſorinus, ſhal together with this my edict be publiſhed in, that famous place, which all Aſia hath dedicated vnto my name, to wit, Argyra. And if any ſhall be ſo hardy as to doe contrary to our decree; he ſhall be puniſhed extraordinarily. This was engrauen in a pillar in Cæſars temple. Cæſar wiſheth health vnto Norbanus Flaccus: Let it be lawfull for all Iewes whereſoeuer liuing, to carry their ſacred money vnto Ieruſalem, according to their ancient cuſtome, and that no man ſhould forbid them ſo to do: and this did Cæſar write in fauour of the Iewes.

Agrippa writ vnto the rulers of Epheſus in the Iewes behalfe, and to Syllanus and the magiſtrats of Cyrenia.

Agrippa alſo wrote in the Iewes behalfe, as followeth: Agrippa wiſheth health vnto the magiſtrates, Senate, and people of Epheſus. I will that the Iewes liuing in Aſia keepe their ſacred money, which according to the cuſtome of their countrey, they are wont to ſend vnto Ieruſa- I lem: and if any one ſhall ſteale their holy money, that the ſame perſon if he flie to a ſanctuary, ſhall be violently taken away from thence, as a ſacrilegious perſon, and deliuered vnto the Iewes to be puniſhed. He alſo wrote vnto Syllanus the magiſtrate, that the Iewes might not be conſtrained vpon their Sabbaths to appeare before a Iudge. M. Agrippa wiſheth health to the Cyrenian magiſtrates and Senate. The Iewes inhabiting amongſt you, for whom Auguſtus hath already written vnto Flauius the preſident of Libya, and vnto other magiſtrates of that Prouince, are not to be hindred from ſending their holy money to Ieruſalem, as their cuſtome is: and they haue now complained vnto me, that they are moleſted by the falſe accuſations of ſome bad people, and forbiden to doe it vnder pretence of a certaine tribute, which notwithſtanding they are not to pay. Wherefore I command that they may be permitted to liue after K their cuſtome, and free from all ſuch matters: and if in any of your Cities any ſacred mony of theirs be intercepted, that by certaine perſons which you knowe to be fit for that purpoſe yee make choyce of them, to ſend it againe vnto the Iewes. Item C. Norbanus Flaccus proconſull, Health vnto the magiſtrates of Sardinia: Cæſar hath written vnto me, commanding that no man hinder the Iewes, according to their cuſtome, to ſend ſacred money vnto Ieruſalem: wherefore I alſo write vnto you of the ſame, that you may not be ignorant both of my will and Cæſars alſo. Moreouer, Iulius Antonius proconſull did alſo write to this effect; Health vnto the magiſtrates, Senate and people of Epheſus. The Iewes of Aſia in the Ides of February, I ſitting in the iudiciall ſeat at Epheſus, ſignified vnto me that Cæſar Auguſtus and Agrippa haue permitted them to vſe their countrey cuſtoms; and euery one, according as he thinketh good, to con- L tribute his firſt fruites for religion ſake, to be carryed without let or hinderance vnto the temple of the moſt mighty God: and they deſired me to ratifie by my conſent, that which they had already granted them by the aboue named Emperours. Wherefore I would haue you to know, that I alſo, according vnto Cæſars and Agrippas decrees and ordinances, do permit and grant them alſo to do all things they pleaſe, according vnto their countrey cuſtomes, forbidding any man to hinder them therein.

I haue thought good to annex theſe decrees, for that I knowe that theſe my writings will come vnto the Grecians hands, that I may ſhew them that in former ages we were ſo eſteemed of the publike magiſtrates that none were permitted to hinder vs from vſing our coũtry rites & ceremonies; and that by their conſent we worſhipped God in our own religion: which I do in- M culcate the oftner, that I may moue ſtrange & foraine nations, and take away their hatred conceiued againſt vs, which is without al reaſonable cauſe. For no nation doth alwaies vſe the ſame cuſtoms, but almoſt whole townes amongſt them do ſomtimes alter & differ from the reſt; yet is iuſtice equally to be diſtributed vnto all men: which is moſt profitable, as well to the Greeks as to other barbarous nations, which is greatly obſerued in our lawes; which if we follow & violate not, are able to make all nations loue vs. Wherfore we requeſt al men not to deſpiſe vs for

A that we differ from them in religion, but fauour vs in that we follow vertue. For this is cõmon to all nations: and without this, mans life cannot ſtand. But I will now returne vnto my hiſtory.

CHAP. XI.

HErõd ſpending lauiſhly much and many ſummes of money, both at home and abroad, hearing that Hircanus who raigned before him, opened Dauids Sepulchre, and took out of it three thouſand talents of ſiluer, and that there was left yet farre more, able to de-
B fray any great charges whatſoeuer, he long time purpoſed to doe the like. And at this time in the night ſeaſon accompanied only with his moſt truſty friends, being very wary that none of the people ſhould know of it, he entred into the Sepulchre: but he found no mony there, as Hircanus did; but he tooke from thence a great company of precious attires & ornaments of gold; wherby he was entiſed to make a more diligent ſearch: and he ſent two of his company for the nonce into the inner part of the Sepulcher, where the bodies of Salomon & Dauid were intombed; who were there loſt, and as it is reported, fire came out of thoſe ſecret places & conſumed them. Whereat Herod being terrified, departed out of it; and mooued with religion to make ſatisfaction, he builded a moſt ſumptuous monument of white marble, at the entrance into the Sepulchre: of which building Nicholaus alſo a writer of that time, maketh mention; but he ſpea-
C keth not how they went into the Sepulchre of Dauid, thinking that therein he ſhould not keep decorum, if he ſhould make mention thereof. Wherein he followed his accuſtomed order: for his writings were to come to the eares of the King yet liuing, wherein he did only curry fauor, mentioning only that, that might redound vnto the Kings credit: ſo that many of his open and wicked pranks, he doth either colour vnder ſom other pretence, or elſe all waies poſſible he endeuoureth to hide them. For he doth as it were tell a tale of Herods cruelty againſt Mariamme, & his ſonnes; as though he did thereby deſerue credit & praiſe, accuſing her of adultery, & them as traytors vnto their father: and this he doth cleane through his works, too much extolling the Kings good deeds, and too diligently excuſing his bad deeds and iniquities. But as I haue
D ſaid, we muſt pardon him, who did not ſo much write to leaue a memory of things done vnto after ages, as to gratifie and pleaſe his King. But I, who come of the linage of the Aſamonian Kings, and execute the office of a Prieſt, account it a ſhame to lie: and doe intend truely to recount the hiſtory of all things that were acted and done, yet with a reuerence of the poſterity of that King, who doe alſo now beare ſway and rule; yet with their pardon and leaue, hauing a greater care to the verity of our hiſtory, then to them.

The deſire of gold.

Herod loſt two of his men in Dauids Sepulchre.

Nicholaus the hiſtoriographer reproued.

Ioſeph came of the prieſtly line of the Aſamonians.

A diſcord in Herods houſe.

After the Sepulchre was thus violated, Herods houſe began to decay, whether reuenge lighting vpon that part which was already ſcarce ſound, or whether by meer chance ſuch calamity at that time befell him, as might iuſtly be thought the reward of impiety. For there was a diſcord in the court not vnlike vnto ciuill warres, euery one ſtriuing againſt other with hatred and forged accuſations: but eſpecially Antipaters politick practice againſt his brethren was to be no-
E ted, who intangling them by other mens forged accuſations, himſelf oftentimes ſeemed to take vpon him their defence, that making a ſhew of good will vnto them he might ſecretly oppreſs them the ſooner; and he did ſo craftily circumuent his father, that his father deemed him to be his onely conſeruer. Wherefore the King commended Ptolomeus his procurator vnto Antipater his ſonne, and did communicate all his ſecrets vnto his mother, ſo that all things were done according as they pleaſed, and they made him diſpleaſed with thoſe againſt whom they knew the Kings diſpleaſure might redound vnto their profit.

But Mariammes children did euery day ſtomack the matter more and more, diſdaining to giue place vnto their inferiour: and for their nobility not enduring to be remooued from their places, and not to keep their dignity alſo: their wiues did the like, and Alexanders wife Glaphyra, F who was the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia, did greatly enuy and diſdaine Salome; and ſhe alſo her againe, both for the loue that ſhe bare vnto her husband, and for that ſhee diſdained (as women are wont) that her daughter maried vnto Ariſtobulus ſhould be in equall honour with her. Pheroras alſo the Kings brother had a hand in this other contention about a priuate cauſe of ſuſpicion and hatred. For he fell ſo farre in loue with one of his maids, that he refuſed the Kings daughter offered vnto him, rather making choyce of his maide. Herod tooke this in very ill part, ſeeing his brother (who had receiued ſo many benefites at his hands, and was almost his fellow in his kingdom by his meanes) not to shew the like brotherly affection to him againe as he then ought, and himselfe to be an vnhappy brother. And seeing he could not dissuade him from that madnesse, hee maried his daughter vnto Phasaelus his sonne: and afterward thinking that now his brothers mind towards his maide was satisfied, he complaining of his iniurious dealing in repulsing his daughter, offered vnto him to wife, he now offered him another of his daughters named Cypros. Then Ptolomeus aduised Pheroras not still to contemne his brothers offer, and persist in such follly; telling him it was meere folly therefore to incurre the Kings displeasure and hatred, and losse of tranquillity. Pheroras vnderstanding this counsell profitable for him, hauing bin once before iniuriously accused, & obtained pardon at the Kings hands, sent away his maid, by whom he now had a son, and promised the King to mary this his other daughter, and appointed the thirtith day after to celebrate his mariage; making a solemn oth vnto the King, neuer after that time to vse the company of that woman whom he had put away. The time appointed being expired, he fell so farre in loue with the former woman, that he would not stand to his promise, but againe companied with his maid.

Then Herod, not able any longer to contain himself, vsed many speeches, whereby he euidently shewed his mind to be alienated from his brother. And there were many who taking hereat opportunity, did by forged calumniations encrease his alienation: so that now there was no day nor hower past, wherein he did not still heare some new alterations & stirs amongst his dearest friends; whom nature willed to combine themselues to maintain concord & amity. For Salome being now offended at Mariammes children, did not permit her daughter maried vnto Aristobulus, one of the yong men, to enioy mutuall loue & comfort of her husband, enticing her to bewray her husbands secret talke: and if she heard any small occasions of offence (as often it falleth out) she should the more aggrauate them with suspicions, wherby she also learned all their secrets, and made the yong woman hate her husband. And she to please her mother recounted how that often when her husband & Alexander were alone, that then they were wont to talk of Mariamme their mother, and vse reprochfull words against their father; and threatning, that if they euer did obtaine the kingdom, they would make the sonnes of the King, whom he had by other wiues, notaries and towne clerkes: and so they might reap profit of their learning which they now studied for: & whensoeuer they saw any of the Kings wiues weare any of Mariammes apparell, that then they vowed in steed of that attire, to cloath them with sackcloth, and shut them vp where they should neuer see Sun. Salome presently told all this to the King: who though he were much grieued hereat, yet he chose rather to seek to amend it, then to punish them: for he was greatly incited against them by suspicion, and euery day waxing worse and worse, at last he beleeued all the reports of any whomsoeuer. But he then contented only sharpely to chide his sonnes, and pacified with their excuses and answeres, he for that time was quiet.

But presently the mischief was againe set on foot: for Pheroras the Kings brother, meeting Alexander, who (as we haue said) was Glaphyra her husband, who was daughter to Archelaus: he told him that he heard by Salome, that Herod was far in loue with Glaphyra: so that he could not shake off this affection. The yong man hearing this, became iealous, and was in a great rage: and now what honor soeuer or gifts Herod for the loue of his son gaue her, Alexander did interpret it in the worst sense, being now made iealous by that which he had heard of Pheroras; and not able to put vp such iniuries, as he thought; he went vnto his father & with teares recounted vnto him what Pheroras had told him. But Herod was hereat the more enflamed, not enduring himselfe falsly to be accused of so shameful a fact, inueighing against the great malice of his friends, who for his great good turnes he did them, so rewarded him. And presently sending for Pheroras, very sharply he began to chide him, saying: O most impious that liueth amongst men! art thou become so vngratefull, either to speake or think such a matter of vs? Thinkest thou that I doe not perceiue thy drift, that thou spakest not these words vnto my sonne to discredit me, but also to the intent by this means thou mightest work some treason against me, and cause me to be poisoned? For who but a good sonne, as this is, would suffer his father, suspected for such a matter, to liue, and not to be reuenged of him for such offence? Whether dost thou think that thou didst put these speeches into his minde, or by them a sword into his hand to kill his father withall? or what was thy intent, seeing thou hatest both him & his brother; and only counterfeiting good will towards me, to belie me, & to report that of me, that without impiety could not be thought? get thee hence, thou wretched imp, seeing thou hast thus abused thy brother, who hath well deserued at thy hands; and do as thou wilt all thy lifetime, my selfwill endeuour to be better vnto my children, then I haue been; and neither will I punish them as they deserue, but

Herod greatly moued against Pheroras for affirming that he was in loue with Glaphyra

A but I will honor them aboue their merits. The King hauing diſcharged his choler againſt his brother Pheroras; and be being taken in a manifeſt fault, anſwered, that that report was firſt deuiſed by Salome, of whom he heard it: which ſhe (being then preſent) hearing, began to exclaim, ſaying, it was not her deuice, & that they all laboured to make the king hate her, & put her to death, being one who did eſpecially wiſh him well; and what in her lay, ſeeking his ſafety, & that now he was in danger of more treaſon then euer before: for (ſaid ſhe) I was the only cauſe that you did put away the woman, whom you ſo doated after, perſwading you to marry the Kings daughter: and this is the cauſe that you hate me. With theſe ſpeeches tearing her haire, & ſtriking her breſt, ſhe made a ſhew of innocency: but this her geſture was a colour to hide her bad entent. So Pheroras was left in great perplexity, not knowing what to ſay or do; and finding
B no pretence to excuſe his fact: for on the one ſide he confeſſed, that he told it vnto Alexander; & on the other, he could not make Herod beleeue, that he heard it of Salome. This contention endured a good while: at laſt the King being wearied ſent away his brother, and his ſiſter: and greatly commending his ſons moderate mind, and that he had giuen him intelligence of thoſe ſpeeches, very late in the night, he went to ſupper.

Salome excuſeth her ſelfe.

After this contention, Salome was hardly thought of, becauſe ſhe was iudged to be the author of this ill report, & the kings wiues wiſhed euil vnto her, becauſe they knew her to be of ſtrange qualities & hard to pleaſe, and ſo variable, that according to the time, one while ſhe would profeſſe friendſhip, and preſently after hatred. Wherfore they ſtill had ſomthing to enforme Herod of againſt her, taking occaſion hapning by chance, which was this. There was a King of the A-
C rabians, named Obodas, a ſlothfull man, and one giuen to idleneſſe: and there was one Syllæus that did gouern all his affaires; this man was a crafty fellow, & in the prime of his youth, and very beautifull. This Syllæus comming vnto Herod about ſome buſineſſe, & viewing Salome, who then ſate at ſupper with him, began to ſet his mind vpon her: and finding ſhe was a widow, he entred into talke with her: and ſhe finding her brother now not ſo friendly vnto her as before he had been, & alſo entangled with the beauty of this young man, did not greatly deny to marry him; and many feaſts being made at that time, they ſhewed euident ſignes of their mutuall conſent, and loue one vnto another. The Kings wiues told the King of this in ſcoffing ſort: Herod herewith not contented, demanded of Pheroras how the matter ſtood, & willed him at ſupper time
D to note if he could eſpy any tokens of familiarity betwixt them: And Pheroras told him that by ſignes and mutuall viewing one another, they ſufficiently ſhewed their intents. After this the Arabian being ſuſpected, departed into his own country. But two or three moneths after he came againe into Iudæa, only for this purpoſe, & talked with Herod touching this matter, requeſting him to let Salome be his wife: affirming that that affinity would be profitable vnto him for the trafick between his people & the Arabians, whoſe Prince he was to be, and did already enioy a great part of the dominion. Herod tolde all this vnto his ſiſter, and asked her if ſhee would marry him: and ſhe anſwered, ſhe would. Then they requeſted that Syllæus ſhould become a Iew in religion, or elſe it was not lawful for him to marry her. He would not condeſcend hereunto, affirming that he ſhould be ſtoned to death by his people, if he did it; and ſo he departed without obtaining his purpoſe. From that time forth, Pheroras, and eſpecially the Kings wiues
E accuſed Salome of intemperancy, affirming that ſhe had had the company of the Arabian. Now Herod determined to marry his daughter vnto Salomes ſon, whom Pheroras refuſed for the loue of his maid, which ſon of Salomes was her eldeſt that ſhe had by Coſtabarus; and that to ſhew his good will toward Salome his ſiſter. But he was diſſwaded by Pheroras, who told him that the yong man would neuer loue ſuch a father in law, becauſe of his fathers death, perſwading him rather to marry her to his eldeſt ſon, who was to ſucceed him in his Tetrarchy: which he eaſily perſwaded the King vnto, & ſo obtained pardon for his former offence. Wherfore the ſpouſals being changed, the maid was maryed vnto the young man, who had an hundred talents in dowry with her, more then otherwiſe ſhould haue been giuen with her.

Syllæus the Arabian deſiring Salome to wife was denied.

Herod marryed his daughter to Pheroras ſonne.

But all this while the diſſenſion of Herods houſe did not ceaſe, but rather increaſed, he hauing F a ſhamefull beginning, and comming to a ſorrowfull end. Herod had three Eunuches, whom he greatly eſteemed for their beauty: one of them was his butler, the other his cook, and the third his chamberlaine, whom alſo he was wont to employ in ſerious affaires of his kingdome. Some one or other enformed the King, that theſe three Eunuches were corrupted by his ſon Alexander with great ſummes of money, and being vpon tortures examined if they had accompanied with him, they cõfeſſed all: yet they affirmed that they knew no practice of his attẽpted againſt his father. But their torments being encreaſed by Antipaters fauourites, they were forced to confeſſe that Alexander ſecretly hated his father, and hee exhorted them to forſake Herod, who G was now good for nothing; who diſſembled his age by painting his face to make himſelfe ſeem younger then he was, and coulouring his head & beard black, which were already growen very white through age: but rather ſet their mindes vpon him who would in deſpite of his father enioy his kingdom due vnto him, and that then he would aduance them to the higheſt honours of the kingdome: for he had not only title vnto it by his birth, but alſo was now prepared like-wiſe to inuade it; and that he had many of the captaines, of the ſouldiers, and many of the Kings friends on his ſide, who were prepared to do or endure any thing for his ſake.

Herod hearing this, feare and anger did inuade him, by reaſon that his ſonnes words ſeemed both contumelious & threatning: and being for both theſe cauſes in a rage, he feared ſom great-ter matter to be put in practice againſt him, which he could not ſuddenly, and hauing ſo little H warning, auoid; and not daring to make open inquiry, he ſet ſecret ſpies awork, to tell him how all matters ſtood, himſelfe now miſtruſting all men, and accounting it his ſecurity to miſtruſt all, euen them that deſerued it not: and not moderating his ſuſpicious mind, now whoſoeuer was the neareſt vnto him, was the more ſuſpected, as of moſt power to iniure him. As for others that were but only named by his ſpies, he preſently eſteemed it his ſafety to put them to death.
Herod crediteth all tales, and ſo puteth many to death vniuſtly. Then they of his houſehold, euery one being carefull to ſaue himſelfe, were one turned againſt another, euery one deeming it his owne ſafety to preuent others, by accuſing them vnto Herod:
which done, preſently they incited other mens enuy againſt them, and euery one of them to deſire ſuch meaſure as they had meaſured vnto others: and thus they alſo reuenged their pri-uate quarrels; and preſently after, they themſelues were taken, and did by other mens meanes I ſuffer the like, being entrapped in the ſame trappe they ſet for their enemies. For the King did quickly repent himſelfe, becauſe he had put very many to death, who were not conuicted: yet for all that, hee was not hereby admoniſhed to beware of the like hereafter; but on his repentance for their death, raged ſo farre, as to cauſe him to inflict the ſame puniſhment vpon their accuſers, which he had done vpon them. So great trouble & feare then fell vpon all the whole

he had before times experienced, not to come in his ſight, nor within his court gates. For hee did now ſhake off the friendſhip between Andromachus and Gemellus and himſelfe, who were his ancient friends, and oftentimes had gone Embaſſadors for him, & alwaies been of his coun-him vp, and had aboad with him at his being at Rome. And no doubt but he had cenſured them at that time he was contented to haue baniſhed them, and depriued them of all their authority, father to be fearefull and ſuſpicious, ſtil after that ioyned with him as counſellor, and as it were increaſed his rage and cruelty; and then he gallantly played his part, endeuouring, that who-ſoeuer would reſiſt him ſhould be made away. Wherfore Andromachus & the reſt of his friends L being now baniſhed the court; the King preſently tortured all that he imagined any way to fa-uour Alexander, to ſee if they were guilty; or if they knew of any treaſon to be practiced againſt him: but they knowing nothing to inform him of, died amidſt their torments. Where he ſo much more tortured others, for that cõtrary to his opinion, he found not ſo much as an euill thought againſt him; Antipater craftily interpreting it, that they had rather in torments conceale the truth, then to ſhew themſelues not truſty to their maſters and friends: wherefore many being taken he cauſed them to be tortured to get ſome thing out of ſome of them. At laſt one amongſt his body together, leſt his father ſhould perceiue the taleneſs of his ſtature; and that when hee went a hũting with him, he vpon purpoſe did miſſe the mark he could haue hit, becauſe he knew his father could not endure that he ſhould be cõmended. And whilſt theſe his words were cõ-ſidered, & pondred, & his torments intermitted; he again accuſed Alexander to haue conſpired

A Rome, and beg the kingdome of Cæsar. There were also found some of this young mans letters written vnto his brother, complaining of the iniurious dealing of his father, who had giuen certaine grounds vnto Antipater, the yearly reuenues wherof amounted vnto two hundreth talents. Then Herod thinking himselfe to haue probability enough, his former suspicion was now confirmed, and so he tooke Alexander and cast him in prison: and againe he began to rage, notwithstanding that himself did scarcely beleeue the informations against him: neither could he himselfe deuise any cause wherfore they should seek to worke treason against him. And those complaints seemed childish: neither was it probable that hauing openly killed his father, he would afterwards haue gone to Rome. Wherefore endeuouring to finde some stronger argument of his sonnes impiety, and because he would not be thought rashly to haue committed his son to B prison, he caused the most noble & eminent of all Alexanders wel-willers to be torture, and they confessing no such matter as he expected, he put them to death.

Alexander being in prison his friends were tortured. One accused Alexander to haue sent letters to Rome against his father.

Whilest thus all the court did resound with feare, torments, and contentions, a certaine man accused Alexander to haue sent letters to his friends at Rome, to entreat them to cause him to be sent for by Cæsar thither, that he might accuse his father of certaine conspiracies against Cæsar, & how he more esteemed the friendship of Mithridates King of the Parthians, then the friendship of the Romans: affirming also, that he had poison ready prepared at Ascalon. Herod hearing this, was comforted by the parasites about him, as hauing not done any thing rashly, and so he gaue now full credit vnto all: yet the poyson was diligently sought for, but could not be found. Alexander being now oppressed with this calamity, he yet took courage, and because he would C more incite his fathers displeasure against him, he did not deny it: perhaps meaning to make his father ashamed of himself, for giuing credit so easily vnto forged tales; or at least, if he could not effect that, entangle all the court & him too in calamity and misery: Which that he might the better do, he writ foure little bookes, and sent them vnto his father, telling him that it was needlesse to vse any more torments, for indeed treason was intended against him, and that Pherorас and his most trusty friends were herein conspirators: And that in the night time Salome came secretly vnto him, and as it were forced him to lie with her; and that all of them aymed at this mark, to haue him made away, that so they might enioy their wished liberty. He also accused Ptolomeus & Sapinnius of this conspiracy, who were more faithfull vnto their King, then all D others: so that now these men, who before were most friendly one to another, began like mad men to rage one against another: and punishment so hastily pursued euery one, that they had no leasure giuen them to speake in their owne defence: neither was their punishment deferred till their cause was tryed, and the truth knowen, that some were bound & imprisoned, other some presently put to death, other laughed in their sleeues to see that day, yet discontented for that any delay was vsed for their punishment: so that the Kings court was now greatly defaced with sorrow, and heauinesse, wherewith the wonted felicity thereof was destroyed. Herod himselfe amidst these calamities, could not but be weary of his life, who not daring trust himselfe in any bodies hand, he was tormented with a daily and hourely feare of some vntimely death, that would befall him: and many times perswaded himselfe, that he did see his sons before him with a drawen sword, ready to kill him; and this was his cogitation night and day, so that herewith E he almost ran mad.

WHilest Herod was thus troubled in his mind, Archelaus King of Cappadocia carefull for his daughter, and the young man his sonne in lawe, and pitying his friend Herod entangled in such calamities; hee thought it his duty to make a iourney vnto him. And finding him so affected as it was reported vnto him before his comming, he thought it an vnfit way F to argue him of too much credulity and rashnesse; perceiuing that thereby he would be rather exasperated, so much the more labouring to excuse himselfe. Wherefore Archelaus deuised another way to appease these troubles. Wherefore hee counterfeited indignation against the young man, approuing all the Kings actions for good; affirming that he would breake the band of wedlock between his daughter and Alexander, and that if she knew of the conspiracy, and did not informe the King thereof, himselfe would punish her. Then Herod contrary to his expectation, seeing Archelaus so angry for the offence commited against him, began to remit his anger:

anger: and now with iuſt conſideration waighing what he had done, by little & little, he began to haue a fatherly affection, & to be hereby moued to compaſſion; yet ſo oft as any one ſought to excuſe the yong man, he grew to be very angry thereat: but when Archelaus alſo began to accuſe him, then Herods heart relented, and he with tears beſought Archelaus not to yeeld too much to anger, nor for the yong mans offence breake off the marriage. Then Archelaus perceiuing him to relent, began to turn the matter againſt Herods friends, as the cauſers of all this miſchiefe, who had corrupted the yong man, who of himſelf was void of malice; and eſpecially he aggrauated the matter againſt Pheroras the kings brother. Pheroras hauing now incurd the kings diſpleaſure, perceiued that none could ſo ſoon reconcile him vnto the king, as Archelaus; wherefore cloathed in black, and making other ſignes as though he deſpaired of his life, he went vnto him; who did not deny to help him what he could: yet he told him that it was no eaſie matter for him to pacifie the King ſo highly offended, perſwading him rather himſelfe to go vnto the King his brother, and craue pardon of him, confeſſing himſelfe to haue beene cauſe of all this miſchief; by which confeſſion of his the Kings wrath would be greatly appeaſed, & ſo he alſo ſhould haue better occaſion to entreat for him. Pheroras followed his counſell, which fell out happily for them both: for the young man contrary to any ones expectation, was freed from all his troubles; & Archelaus made Pheroras & Herod friends; & he himſelf hauing now gotten great friendſhip of the king in thoſe his aduerſe and troublous times of his, he returned ioyfully into Cappadocia, being rewarded with rich gifts, and being accounted of as Herods chiefeſt friend. They alſo agreed amongſt themſelues, that Herod ſhould goe to Rome, becauſe he had already written vnto Cæſar, cõcerning this matter, & they both went together vnto Antiochia, & there Herod reconciled Titus the Preſident of Syria vnto Archelaus, and ſo he returned into Iudæa.

The yeare of the world,3958. before the birth of Christ,6.

WHileſt Herod going to Rome was abſent from his kingdom, the Arabian warres be[illegible] hereby taking an occaſion. The inhabitants of Trachon, whoſe country Cæſar ta[illegible]g from Zenodorus gaue it vnto Herod, being forbidden & hindred from ſtealing, were now forced to frame themſelues to liue like husbandmen in more ciuility, then before: but this kind of life pleaſed them not; neither did their countrey yeeld fruits worth their labours; yet at firſt Herod compelling them thereunto they abſtained from iniuring the inhabitants bordering vpon them, which did greatly redound vnto Herods credite, by whoſe diligence they were brought vnto it. But when Herod was ſayled into Italy to accuſe Alexander, and to commend Antipater vnto Cæſar; the Trachonites hearing a bruit of his death, reuolted and turned to their accuſtomed robberies: Yet were they at that time again ſubdued in the Kings abſence by the captains that he left at home; and forty of the chiefeſt of the theeues amongſt them being taken, the reſt terrified by their example left their own country, and fled into Arabia, where Syllæus receiued them in reuenge that he could not obtaine Salome for his wife; and receiuing of him a ſtrong hold to dwell in, they did not only make incurſions, and rob & ſpoile the borders of Iudæa, but alſo of Cœloſyria, and draue away the preies they got into the place allotted them, Syllæus protecting them and their villanies. Herod returning from Rome, found that his people were greatly endomaged by theſe theeues: and ſeeing hee could not ſubdue them by reaſon the Arabians did protect them, not enduring that iniury, and entring into Trachon, hee killed all their families: whereby they were ſo much the more enraged againſt his country; for they had a law amongſt them, whereby they were commanded to reuenge the death of their families, and ſo contemning all dangers they came and waſted all Herods countrey, with continuall incurſions. Then the King complained hereof vnto Saturninus and Volumnius then Preſidents ſent thither by Cæſar, requeſting that he might haue the theeues to puniſh them. They hearing this newes, with as much ſpeede as they might, gathered their forces together, and making themſelues ſtronger then they were before, with ſudden incurſions waſted all where they came, deſtroying both the fields & villages, and killing all they could finde; ſo that now this reſembled a war, rather then a robbery: for now they were a thouſand in number. Wherefore Herod required theſe theeues and robbers to be deliuered vnto him, and required the debt that Obodas ought him, for Herod had lent Obodas threeſcore talents, and ſent them vnto him by Syllæus, and now the time was expired wherein the money was to be repayed. But Syllæus who had taken all the rule from Obodas, and himſelfe now gouerned all, denyed that thoſe theeues were in Arabia,

How Herod went into Arabia with an army.

B WHen the day was come that was appointed, Syllæus not minded to ſtand vnto the agreement made, went in the mean time to Rome: But Herod exacted his mony, and the theeues to be reſtored vnto him, Saturninus & Volumnius permitting him with force of armes to perſecute thoſe obſtinate people: ſo he leuying an army, went into Arabia, in three daies ſpace going as far as ordinarily men are wont to march in ſeuen, and comming vnto the caſtle wherein the theeues kept, at the firſt onſet he took it and deſtroyd it, being called Repta, & did no other harm vnto the inhabitants. And a captain of the Arabians named Nacebus came to ſuccor the theeues, & ſo fought with Herods army, in which battell a few of Herods men were ſlain, but of the Arabians were ſlain fiue & twenty, with their Generall, & the reſt were put to flight. Being thus reuenged vpon the theeues, he led 3000. Idumæans into Trachon to keep the C inhabitants from robbing, and ſent letters vnto the Roman gouernors, who aboad in Phœnicia, that he had only vſed the authority which they gaue him againſt the rebellious Arabians that reſiſted him, and nothing elſe: which afterward alſo, they making enquiry, they found true.

D BVt then were meſſengers haſtily ſent vnto Syllæus at Rome, & informed him otherwiſe, aggrauating euery thing according to their faſhion. Syllæus being new before inſinuated into Cæſars acquaintance, by chance was then alſo about the palace; & hearing theſe newes, he preſently change his apparell, and cloathing himſelfe in black he went in this maner vnto Cæſar, informing him how Arabia was afflicted with wars, and that the whole kingdome was waſted by Herod, who had entred into the country with an army, and with teares complained that 2000. & 500. of the Arabian nobility were ſlain, and amongſt them his friend & kinſman Nacebus, and great riches were taken away, which were laid vp at Repta, & that all this was done in contempt of Obodes who had no army ready, nor a fit captaine for his forces, he being not there. Syllæus hauing thus ſpoken, adding moreouer that he would not haue come to Rome, but that he was perſwaded that Cæſar would haue had a care of the common peace, & tranquillity of his ſubiects, & that had he bin at home Herod to his coſt ſhould haue violated that peace:

Syllæus accuſed Herod vnto Cæſar.

E Cæſar hereat was greatly moued, and enquired of ſome of Herods friends, who were then preſent, & of certain men that were lately come out of Syria alſo, whither Herod had led an army out of the limits of his owne kingdom. Which they not denying, and Cæſar not vouchſafing to heare the cauſe why, his diſpleaſure againſt Herod was greatly encreaſed, ſo that he writ threatning letters vnto him; telling him that hitherto he had vſed him as a friend, but hereafter he would vſe him as a ſubiect; which alſo Syllæus ſignified vnto the Arabians. By which letters of his they were made proude, and would neither render vnto him the theeues that were eſcaped, nor reſtore the mony he lent their King; nor pay him rent for the paſture ground that they hired of him; boulſtering themſelues herewith, that the King had offended Cæſar. Moreouer, the Trachonites hearing this, rebelled againſt the garriſon of the Idumæans; and ioyning with the F Arabian theeues, who waſted their countrey, not ſo much reſpecting their owne gaine as their reuenge & particular profit, they did many miſchiefes & exerciſed great cruelty againſt them. Herod did put vp all iniuries, and durſt not once mutter, Cæſar being offended at him; for the which cauſe he was not ſo couragious nor valiant as before: For firſt of all, Cæſar would not admit his Embaſſadours, whom he ſent to plead his cauſe before Cæſar; and Herod againe ſending other Embaſſadours, Cæſar ſent them back againe, their buſineſſe vndone.

did easily perswade Cæsar any thing; for that Cæsar was now very credulous; and Syllæus aymed G at some greater matter. For Obodas dying, Æneas succeeded him in the kingdom of Arabia, who changing his name, called himselfe Aretas: whom Syllæus by forged calumniations did seeke to depose from the crowne, and vsurpe the kingdom vnto himselfe; giuing great summes of money vnto the courtiers, and promising great summes vnto Cæsar; whom he now perceiued to be angry against Aretas, for that without his cõsent he presumed to take vpon him the gouernment of the kingdom. But at last he also sent letters & gifts vnto Cæsar, and amongst the rest a crowne of gold worth many talents, and in those letters he accused Syllæus, who as an impious & disloiall seruant, had poisoned his King Obodas; in whose life time he had also inuaded the gouernmẽt of the kingdome, committing adultery with the Arabians wiues, getting together other mens money, thereby to obtaine the kingdom. Cæsar would not permit these Embassadours to haue H audience; but refusing their gifts, suffred them to depart without obtaining that they came for. In the mean time the affaires of Iudæa & Arabia euery day became worse & worse, euery one seeking to trouble the estate of both kingdoms, and no man endeuouring to quiet them. For the King of Arabia was not yet established in his kingdon, & therfore could not controule his subiects. And Herod feared that if he did defend himself, he should so much the more incite Cæsar against him; and so was forced to put vp all iniuries that were done vnto him: & finding no end of his miseries, he finally determined to send again to Rome Embassadors, to see if by the help of his friends Cæsar might be perswaded to think better of him, and so commited that Embassage vnto Nicholaus of Damasco, and sent him to Rome.

Herod sent Nicholaus Damascene to Cæsar.

CHAP. XVI. I

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 11. al. 17.

AT this time the dissension of Herods house was much increased; and although at all other times his court was neuer void of suspicion, which is a pernicious euill to Kings & Princes, yet at that time especially this mischief was in his principal vigor & force. For one Eurycles a Lacedemonian & a noble man of his country, but hauing a turbulent wit giuen ouer to flattery & pleasure, yet cunningly dissembling both vices, coming vnto Herod & giuing him gifts, & receiuing greater gifts at his hands, was by him curteously entertained; and familiarly conuersing with him, brought it so to passe that he was receiued amongst K his especiall friends. This Eurycles lodged at Antipaters house, being also familiar with Alexander for their often meeting one another: for he said that Archelaus king of Cappadocia & himselfe were great friends, & therfore he counterfeited himself to reuerence Glaphyra very much; and all men iudging him indifferent vnto all parties, he diligently noted whatsoeuer past, and euery word that was spoken, seeking by all meanes he could, matter to gratifie others by carrying of tales; and with such flattering fair speecs he insinuated himself into euery mans friendship, that he seemed as Alexanders sole trusty friend, & to vse other men as it behooued a friend. And by this his deceit he so insinuated himself into Alexanders fauour, that the young man thought him him to be his only friend, vnto whom he might impart his secrets; so that Alexander opened vnto him his grief, for that his father was somthing alienated frõ him, & recounted vnto him his L mothers misfortune, & that Antipater had now gotten all authority & dignity from him, and his brother: and was the onely man that could doe all; and that these iniuries were no longer tolerable, their father being now so incited against them, that now hee would neither admit them vnto his counsels, nor banquets. And he committed his griefes (as he then thought) into his friends bosome. But Eurycles told Antipater all, affirming that though it nothing concerned him, yet he could not but speake of it for the greatnesse of the danger then imminent, willing him to beware of Alexander, who did not sticke openly to shew what minde he bare, but did as it were manifestly shew that he desired to make away his father. Which done he receiued of Antipater most rich gifts, as pledges of his good will towards him; and finally hee was by him perswaded to relate this newes himselfe vnto Herod. The King lent a greedy eare whilest he re- M counted Alexanders malice; and was so moued with the circumstances of his speeches, that hee conceiued a deadly hatred against his son, which also without further delay he did make manifest: for he rewarded Eurycles for his paines with 50. talents. Which he hauing receiued went vnto Archelaus, and talking and speaking well of Alexander, recounted vnto him in what steed he had stood him in reconciling him vnto his father: and receiuing of him also a summe of money, hee departed before his malice was discouered; and returned into his countrey, and vsing the Eurycles by craft got mony of Archelaus.

A the like ſhifts there alſo, hee was finally by his countrimen baniſhed from Lacedemonia. Furthermore, Herod not content now, as before he was, to heare onely that which was told him of Alexander & Ariſtobulus, did now himſelfe alſo conceiue a proper hatred againſt them, himſelfe obſeruing all things, and making diligent inquiry though no man accuſed them, and permitting all men to ſpeake what they liſt againſt them. And amongſt the reſt, Euaratus of Cous had conſpired with Alexander, and he ſeemed now to heare no talke more willingly then this, and ſuch like. But then greater misfortunes then all the reſt befell the yong men, falſe accuſations neuer ceaſing to be forged againſt them, & euery one as it were, ſtriuing to accuſe them of ſome crime or other vnto the King, pretending the care they bare of his ſafety. Herod had two champions, Iucundus and Tyrannus, both acceptable and gratefull vnto him, for their ſtrength & tall ſtature
B and bignes of body: theſe two for ſome offence were baniſhed the court, and receiued into Alexanders ſeruice, and placed amongſt his ſtipendary horſemen, & for that they were very actiue he beſtowed many gifts & much money vpon them. Whereat the King preſently conceiuing ſuſpicion, began to torture them, & after many torments they cõfeſſed that Alexander had hired them to kill Herod as hee was a hunting wilde beaſts: for ſo it might eaſily be bruited abroad that he falling off his horſe, fell vpon his owne lance; and ſo was ſlaine: which once before had almoſt hapned vnto him. They alſo declared vnto him, that certaine gold was hidden and buried in the ſtable: and they alſo accuſed Herods chiefe huntſman, that at Alexanders command he had giuen Alexanders ſeruants the Kings launces and his armour. After them the prefect of the Caſtle of Alexandrium, was taken and examined vpon tortures, and it was obiected a-
C gainſt him, that he promiſed to receiue them into the Caſtle, & to deliuer vnto them the Kings treaſure there. But hee denying it, his owne ſonne affirmed all to bee true, and brought forth letters to teſtifie the ſame, reſembling Alexanders hand, written to this effect: So ſoone as by Gods aſſiſtance we haue done that which we entend to doe, we will preſently come vnto you: be carefull therefore, that according to your promiſe you do receiue vs into your Caſtle. Herod hauing had a view of theſe letters, did now without any heſitation beleeue that indeede ſome treacherous practice was plotted againſt him by his ſonnes. But Alexander affirmed, that Diophantus the ſcribe had counterfeited his hand, and that the letter was Antipaters deuice. For Diophantus was accounted cunning in ſuch matters, and afterward being taken with the like, he was
D therefore put to death. And the King produced them that had been tortured at Iericho before the people to accuſe his ſonnes, where they were ſtoned to death, and the people hereat moued, would alſo haue killed Alexander and Ariſtobulus with the ſame death. But Herod, by the means of Ptolomeus and Pheroras did reſtraine them, and commanded the young men to be caſt into priſon, and there to be kept ſo ſtreight that no man was admitted vnto them; but many ſpies were ſet, who ſhould narrowly marke all their actions and words: and now they were accounted as condemned men both by other mens opinions and alſo by their owne. One of them, to wit Ariſtobulus, for griefe inuiting his aunt, and mother in lawe to compaſſionate his preſent calamity, and to hate him that was the author hereof, affirmed that ſhee alſo was in great danger, being accuſed, in hope to marry with Syllæus, to haue ſignified vnto him by letters all that paſt in Herods court. Which words the woman preſently came and recounted vnto her brother
E Herod. The King no longer able to bridle his fury, commanded them both to be bound & kept in ſeuerall places one frõ another, & each of them to write what they had plotted againſt their father: & being thus cõmanded, they wrote that they neither prepared treaſon, nor yet thought of any treaſon againſt him, only they purpoſed to fly, becauſe they perceiued that they could no lõger liue here, becauſe they were ſo ſuſpected & in cõtinual care. At that time a prince of Cappadocia came Embaſſador from Archelaus, named Mela, who was one of the greateſt Lords of the country: and Herod willing to ſhew his ſons malice, he ſent for Alexander out of priſon, cõmanding him to recount how & after what order, or whither they meant to flie: he anſwered, vnto Archelaus, who had alſo promiſed them to ſend them to Rome; but that they had no further F intent or purpoſe to effect any vnlawfull practice againſt their father, & that all other accuſations were falſe. And that he requeſted that Tyrannus & the reſt might haue been better examined; But Antipater preuented that, who by his owne forged rumors ſpread amongſt the people did cauſe them to haſten their deaths. Which being ſaid, Herod commanded both him & Mela to be led vnto Glaphyra, that ſhee might be asked whether ſhe were any way priuy to the conſpiracie againſt Herod: and comming vnto her, the woman ſeeing her husband bound, preſently tore her haire, and being amazed, with great compaſſion cryed out amaine. The young mans cheekes were alſo bedewed with teares; ſo that a long time after, thoſe that were preſent amazed amazed and moued to compaſſion at this miſerable ſight, could neither ſpeake nor do the Kings command. At laſt Ptolomeus, to whoſe charge Alexander was commited, willing him to ſpeake whether his wife was priuy to his intent: he anſwered, how could it be otherwiſe, who is dearer vnto me then mine owne life, being mother of her and my children? then ſhe anſwered, crying out aloud, that ſhe was priuy to nothing that was any harm; yet (quoth ſhe) if it will auaile you any thing, or help to ſaue your life, I am ready to tell any lie whatſoeuer ſeeing I muſt die, and will deny nothing you would haue me to ſay. Alexander anſwered, neither did I purpoſe any impiety againſt my father, as ſome ſuppoſe, who ought not to thinke ſo: neither doeſt thou know of any one: this thou knoweſt, that thou and I purpoſed to flie vnto Archelaus thy father, and that he promiſed to conuay vs to Rome, which ſhe alſo affirmed. G

Archelaus excuſeth himſelf to Herod. Cæſar & Herod made friends.

Herod now thinking that Archelaus was conuicted of euill will towards him, deliuered letters vnto Olympus and Volumnius, commanding them in the way as they went, to paſſe by Eleuſa a towne of Cilicia, and deliuer certaine letters vnto Archelaus himſelf to the ſame effect: and that from thence they ſhould go to Rome; and if ſo be when they came there they found that Cæſar had bin reconciled vnto him by Nicholaus his meanes, that then they ſhould alſo deliuer certain letters vnto him, declaring all that was paſt between him and his ſonnes, and the proofes alleaged to connince the young men. Archelaus writ againe vnto Herod, that indeed he would haue entertained the young men, for feare that any greater miſchance ſhould befall them or their father, by reaſon of the ſuſpicion againſt them; yet was he not minded to ſend them to Cæſar, nor to haue confirmed them in any malicious courſe. The meſſengers comming to Rome found Cæſar reconciled to Herod, and deliuered the letters vnto him. For Nicholaus his embaſſage was to this effect: So ſoone as he came vnto Rome and had entred the palace, beſide the charge he had giuen him, he did alſo vndertake to accuſe Syllæus. For he perceiued the Arabians at variance amongſt themſelues, and that ſome of them had declared all Syllæus his bad practices, and that by his means & procurement many of Obodas kinſmen were murthered, as his aduerſaries manifeſtly prooued by certaine of his letters which they intercepted. H I

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 12. al. 18. Nicholaus accuſeth Syllæus and excuſeth Herod.

Now Nicholaus deſirous to reconcile Herod vnto Cæſar, omitted not this occaſion by chance offred him; for he wel knew that if he began with the Kings defence, he ſhould then find a hard & heauy iudge againſt him; but if he began to accuſe Syllæus, he ſhould find alſo fit occaſion to plead his Kings cauſe. Wherefore Nicholaus taking vpon him to prooue the accuſation againſt him at the day appointed, he accompanied with the King Aretas Embaſſadors, accuſed Syllæus as a murtherer of his Lord & King, and many other Arabians; and that he had borrowed much money to trouble the peace of the common-wealth; and that he had corrupted many women and honeſt matrons both at Rome and in Arabia. Hee added hereunto a moſt grieuous crime, to wit, that he by his lies and falſe reports had deceiued Cæſar, whom in all things hee had miſinformed concerning that which Herod had done. Which when hee once mentioned, Cæſar commanded him to omit the reſt; and only to recount the matter concerning Herod, whether Herod did not enter into Arabia with an army, and did ſlay two thouſand & fiue hundreth men, and carry away captiues and robbe and ſpoile the countrey? Nicholaus anſwered, that to theſe demands himſelfe was able to anſwer, that Herod did none of theſe, or at leaſt very little hereof, which hee did recount; and that hee did not deſerue any diſpleaſure. Cæſar, contrary to his expectation, hearing this, began to giue diligent eare to what Nicholaus ſayd: and hereupon Nicholaus recounted vnto Cæſar how Herod had lent 500. talents, and that hee had a writing in pawne wherein he was permitted after the day appointed if then it were not repaied him again, to prey vpon all the whole country, and ſatisfie himſelfe: and that this was no hoſtile inuaſion, but according to law & equity a requiring of his right & debt due vnto him. And that this was not raſhly done, though by the writing he was ſo permitted to doe, but by the conſent of Saturninus and Volumnius preſidents of Syria, in whoſe preſence Syllæus ſwore by Cæſars good fortune at Berytum, that within 30. daies after both the debt & alſo certain fugitiues frō the King, ſhould be reſtored vnto him, and that Syllæus performed none of theſe: and ſo Herod went again vnto the preſidents, and they permitted him to go and take pledges for his mony; and that ſo by their permiſſion he went into Arabia. And this (quoth he) is the war that his aduerſaries haue ſo tragically exaggerated, and yet (quoth he) how can it be called a war? ſeeing that it was done by the conſent of the preſidents, and that by couenant after periury, wherwith both other gods and alſo Cæſars name was violated. It now (quoth he) remaineth that I ſpeake ſomething concerning the captiues. There were forty theeues of Trachon, and afterward more that fled from Herod for feare of puniſhment, and fled vnto Arabia, whom Syllæus protected and ſuccoured K L M

This his forged tale concerning the captiues being thus refuted, heare, O Soueraigne Cæsar, the lying inuention, which to prouoke thee to wrath himselfe deuised. For I am well able to affirme this, that when the Arabian army assaulted vs, and one or two of our men were slaine; then at last Herod forced to make resistance, hee slew Nucebus and with him fiue and twenty, and no more: for euery one of which Syllæus falsely recounted vnto Cæsar a hundreth, and so told him that two thousand and fiue hundred were slaine. Cæsar hereas greatly moued, with an angry countenance looking vpon Syllæus, he asked him how many Ara-
B bians were slaine in the fight: he amazed and knowing not what to reply, answered, that he erred in the number. Presently Cæsar commanded the writings to be read, containing the conditions between them, and the writings of the presidents, and the letters of the cities containing the cõplaints of the robberies. And so the matter was brought to passe, that Cæsar was reconciled vnto Herod, & condemned Syllæus to dy; & repenting himselfe to haue written so threatning letters vnto Herod, he obiected that also vnto Syllæus, affirming, that by his false enformations he had caused him to passe the limits of friendship in vsing his friend so hardly. And so he sent Syllæus into his country, that after he had satisfied his creditors he might be punished according to the sentence. But he still continued angry with Aretas, for that without his authority he had v-
C surped the crowne & kingdom, and he was minded also to bestow Arabia vpon Herod; but the letters which Herod sent him changed his minde. For Olympus & Volumnius so soone as they vnderstood that Cæsars wrath towards Herod was pacified, presently they deliuered vnto him the letters as they were commanded: wherein was contained the arguments wherby his sons were cõuicted of treason against him. Which Cæsar hauing read, he thought it not cõuenient to trouble the old man (infortunate with his sons) with another kingdom; and so he admitted Aretas Embassadours: and chiding them that their King had rashly vsurped the kingdome without his authority & knowledge, not expecting his pleasure: he receiued their gifts, & confirmed him in the kingdom by his authority. This done, being now reconciled vnto Herod, he writ vnto him that he was sorowful for him, that had such children; & that he shold if they had attempted any treason against him, punish them as men that sought to murther their father: for he gaue him
D free and full authority; but if they onely attempted to fly, he should also be sufficed with a lesse punishment. Wherefore he counselled him to call a consistory at Berytum; and together with the Romane Presidents, and Archelaus King of Cappadocia, and the rest of his friends, and the nobility thereabout, according as they should aduise him, so to doe. And this was the effect of Cæsars letters.

E Herod receiuing this letter, reioyced aboue measure, both for that he had againe obtained Cæsars fauour; and also for that Cæsar had giuen him full authority to do what he pleased vnto his sons. And yet I know not how it came to passe, that he who in his prosperity was a hard father, did yet shew himselfe not rash in putting his sons to death: and now his estate being better then it was, and he recouering his wonted assurance; he now began a new hatred. Wherfore by letters he called together all those whom Cæsar appointed, only Archelaus excepted, either for that he hated the man, or els for that he feared he would haue withstood that his purpose: and when they were all come together, as well the presidents as the rest who were called out of diuers cities, he would not bring his sons into the coũcel, but kept them in a village of the Sidonians, named Platan, not far distant from the citie, to the intent, that if they were called for, he might bring them forth. Then Herod himself alone entring into F the councell before an hundreth & fifty men there assembled for that purpose, began to accuse his sonnes before them, and vsed a speech not only pitifull for his own calamities, but also little becomming a father. For he was very vehement and vnheedy in inueying against their offence; neither did he sufficiently expresse his minde, shewing many signes of fury, and anger; neither did he deliuer in writing any proofes of the accusations vnto the Iudges: but vndecently himselfe alledged there the father against the sonne, himselfe also reading before them certain letters written by them, wherein was contained no impiety nor treason, but onely a consultation to fly away, and certain hard ſpeeches wherby they ſhewed themſelues offended. Which when G he came vnto, he exclaimed as though hereby they cõfeſſed their treacherous practiſes, greatly exaggerating the matter, and proteſting that he had rather die then heare ſuch ſpeeches. Laſtly, affirming that both nature and Cæſar permitted him authority againſt them; and his countrey

"lawes ſo cõmanded, that if any one being accuſed, his father or mother ſhould lay their hands
"vpon his head, & the ſtanders by muſt preſently ſtone him to death: which though he might ea-
"ſily do in his owne country & kingdom; yet he thought good alſo to expect their cenſures. Yet
"he came vnto them, not for that they were to iudge his ſonnes, who were taken in a manifeſt
"crime, but that by this occaſion they might adde their ſuffrages to the iuſt indignatiõ of a father
"offended, & that they might leaue an example vnto al poſterity, that ſuch treaſons ought not to "be left vnpuniſhed. The king hauing thus ſpoken, & not permitting the yong men to be brought H
"vnto their anſwer, all ſeeing what the king intended, & that there was now no hope to reconcile the yong men vnto their father, or ſaue their liues, they all confirmed his authority. And firſt of all Saturninus, one that had been Conſul, & had been graced with many honors, pronounced an indifferent ſentence, limited with circumſtances, to wit, that he condemned Herods ſons, yet not to die: for (quoth he) my ſelfe haue ſons, and I would not adde this calamity to Herods misfortune paſt. After him alſo his three ſonnes, who were their fathers legats, pronounced the ſame ſentence. But Volumnius pronounced, that they had deſerued death, who were ſo impious towards their father; whoſe ſentence after him the moſt part followed: ſo that it ſeemed that they were now ordained to be put to death. Preſently Herod caried them with him to Tyre, where he met Nicholaus, who was now there arriued, returning from Rome: vnto whom the king firſt re- I counting what was done at Berytum, he asked of him what his friends at Rome thought of his ſonnes. He anſwered that they iudged the yong mens intents impious, & that they alſo iudged that they ought to be bound & impriſoned; & then after due cõſideration, if it were ſo thought expedient, to be put to death, leſt the king might be thought rather to haue giuen place vnto his choler then vnto reaſon: yet if it might ſo pleaſe him they thought it beſt to acquit them, leaſt otherwiſe he do that which hereafter he may repent when it is too late. And this was the opinion of moſt of his friends at Rome. Then the king a long time pondred theſe his words, & made no reply, but commanded him to ſaile along in his company. At his arriuall at Cæſarea all men were carefull what ſhould becom of his ſons, expecting an end of that tragedy, for they greatly K feared that by reaſon of the old diſcord he would now cut them off; yet notwithſtanding they were ſorrowfull for them: yet it was dangerous either to ſpeak raſhly, or to heare any thing ſpoken frely cõcerning them, but in their hearts cõpaſſionating them they concealed their griefs.
Only one amongſt all the reſt, an ancient ſouldier of the Kings named Tyro, others diſſembling their griefe, ſpake freely what he thought: this Tyro had a ſon of Alexanders age, and beloued of him, whom Alexander much accounted of. This fellow many times amidſt the multitudes exclaimed, that truth & equity was now baniſhed from out of the world, and that in their ſteed malice & vntruth reigned: wherby there was ſuch a miſt & a fog cauſed ouer the whole world, that no man could ſee his owne errors. This his free ſpeech though it was not without danger, yet al men hereat were moued, for that he had ſom reaſon to ſhew his fortitude in ſo dangerous L a time; & euery one was willing to heare this ſpeech: and though theſelues for fear were ſilent, yet did they not reprehend him for ſpeaking freely. For the expectation of the euent of ſo great miſchief was able to haue wreſted from euery one of them words of commiſeration. Tyro with great audacity alſo came vnto the king, and beſought him that he might talke with him alone:
which the king granting, hee vſed theſe words with great lamentation. I can no longer, O my king, ſuppreſſe this my grief, which cauſeth me ſo boldly to ſpeak though with my owne peril;
yet if it pleaſe thee my king, that which I intend to ſpeake ſhall be for thine aduantage.

Where now my Lord are thy wits? where is that thy courageous mind euer hitherto able to match al difficult buſineſſes whatſoeuer? how hapneth it that thou haſt ſo few friends & kinred? M for I account not them kinſmen or friends, that permit ſuch wickednes & hatred in thy court, which earſt was moſt happy & fortunate. And what art thou vnto thy ſelfe? wilt thou not looke wife, who abound in all vertue; and commit thy ſelfe now in thy old age vnto one only ſon, who nouriſheth impious hopes & deſſeignes? and to thy kinred, who by thy own cenſure haue often deſerued death? Doſt thou not perceiue, that the people keeping themſelues quiet & ſtill, doe both condemne the errour of thy friends, and alſo pity and compaſſionate the two yong men?

Tyro ſpeaketh to Herod, and not obſeruing modeſty he & the captaines were impriſoned.

A authors of this infortunate calamity. The King at firſt took theſe words of Tyro in good part, as being admoniſhed of the perfidious dealing of them about him, & his owne calamity. But Tyro immodeſtly & ſouldier-like vrging the King, & for his own ſimplicity not able to diſcern what fitted that time, the King at laſt thought this rather a turbulent vpbraiding him, then a friendly admonition: & asking who thoſe captains & ſouldiers were, he cõmanded them all & Tyro alſo to be bound & kept in priſon. Then one Tripho the kings barbar, taking hereat occaſion told the king that Tyro had often ſollicited him, as he ſhaued the king to cut his throat with his razor, promiſing him for a recompence great rewards, and that he ſhould be one of Alexanders chiefe friends. Hauing ſpoken theſe words, the king cõmanded him to be apprehẽded, & the Barbar, & Tyro & his ſon to be tortured. Tyro his ſon ſeeing his father in moſt miſerable torments, & that

B he ſtill perſiſted in them (and by the kings diſpleaſure, coniecturing that there was no hope of life) told them that tortured his father, that he would confeſſe all the truth conditionally, that his father & himſelf might be no more tormented: and hauing his requeſt granted, he told them that it was agreed, that Tyro with his own hand ſhould haue killed the king: for he could get opportunity to come vnto the king when no man elſe was with him, & ſo he would kill him, & for Alexanders ſake endure any torments whatſoeuer. This ſpoken, he deliuered himſelf & his father from further tortures: but it is incertaine whether the tale he told was true, or whether he deuiſed it to free them both from torments. Then Herod now laying all doubt aſide (if before he were in any) thought what death his ſons ſhold dy, & leauing no place to repentance & mercy, he haſtned to execute his purpoſe: and producing 300. captains, & Tyro & his ſon, & the Barbar

C his accuſer, he accuſed them all before the people, & the people throwing any thing that came to their hands at them, they ſlew them euery one. And Alexander & Ariſtobulus were caried vnto Sebaſte, and there by their fathers command were ſtrangled: and their bodies caried by night into the caſtle Alexandrium, where their grandfather by their mothers ſide, and many of their progenitors lay buried. But perhaps ſome wil nothing maruell that a hatred ſo loug a breeding ſhould in the end ſo preuaile, that it ouercame naturall affection. But one may iuſtly doubt whether the fault were in the young men, who exaſperated by a hard father ſo long time, fell into ſuch hatred of him: or whether it is to be imputed vnto his vnkindnes & immoderate deſire of honor & rule, who could not abide any to be his equall, but rather chuſing to do all at his owne pleaſure: Or rather vnto fortune, whoſe power the wiſeſt liuing is not able to reſiſt. Wherfore I

D am perſwaded, Fortune hath predeſtinated all humane actions, ſo that they muſt haue a neceſſary euent. And this ineuitable force we cal fate or fatal deſtiny, for that there is nothing which it effecteth not. But it ſufficeth briefly to haue touched this high matter, which is of it ſelf very difficult, which attributeth ſomthing vnto our actions, & examineth the cauſes of the variety of our actions, which ſpeculation is already cõpriſed in the two volumes of our law. Furthermore touching the yong mens fault, we may accuſe their youthfull arrogancy, & their free king-like pride, who did giue too great eare to their fathers accuſers, & for that they were vniuſt ſearchers into his life & actions, & that they malicioufly ſuſpected him, & could not rule their tõgues: but hereby gaue double occaſion vnto their aduerſaries, & matter vnto thoſe tale-bearers that ſought to get the kings fauour. But their fathers ſhamefull fault cannot be excuſed, who ſuffred

E himſelfe ſo to be ouer-ruled with paſſion, that he put them to death that were begotten of his own body, without any proofe or argument of the crimes laid vnto their charge: yea two yong men of excellent feature of body, not onely beloued of their owne nation but alſo of ſtrangers, not ſlouthfull in hunting, & cõmendable in military affaires, & eloquent in ciuil diſcourſes. For in all theſe things they were excellent, & eſpecially Alexander the eldeſt of them. It had been enough for him, ſuppoſe he had condemned them, either to haue kept them in perpetual priſon, or baniſhed them into ſome far country; ſeeing that he was aſſured of the Roman power, vnder whoſe protection he neither needed to haue feared inuaſion; nor ſecret treaſon againſt him. For ſo ſoon to put them to death only to ſatisfie his own furious wil, what elſe doth it betoken, but only an impious liberty caſting off all fatherly humanity & kindnes: eſpecially, ſeeing that he

F was aged, whoſe yeares could neither plead ignorance, nor that he was deceiued. For neither was he the more excuſed by the delay he vſed: nay, it had bin leſſe offence if amazed with ſome ſudden newes, he had bin incited to ſo hainous an offence; but after ſo long delay & deliberation at laſt to effect ſuch a matter, betokens a bloody mind & obdurate in wickednes, as he well ſhewed himſelf afterward to haue, not ſparing the reſt, whom before he held moſt deare: who though they were leſſe to be pitied in that they iuſtly ſuffred, yet was it an argument of his like cruelty, in that he abſtained not from their deathes alſo: but we will ſpeake hereof hereafter.

The yeare of the world, 3961. before Chriſts Nativity, 3.

AFter that Antipater had made away his brothers thorow the extreame impiety and vnbridled fury, wherewith Herod their father was incenſed and whetted againſt them; yet incontinently obtained he not that which vndoubtedly he hoped for. For being deliuered and diſcharged of that feare he conceiued, leaſt his brethren ſhould be partakers with him in the kingdome, he found a difficult and dangerous matter for himſelfe to finde the meanes how hee might obtaine the kingdome: ſo ſtrange and haynous a hatred had all the nation conceiued againſt him. On the other ſide, in ſhewing himſelfe proud and lofty, he more and more whetted and increaſed that hatred which the ſouldiers had foreconceiued againſt him, in whom notwithſtanding, the ſecurity of the kingdome conſiſted, if it ſhould fortune ſo to fall out that the people ſhould attempt any alteration. All which miſchiefes were begotten by his owne ſinnes, and the vnnaturall murther of his brothers. Nathelеſſe he gouerned the kingdome with his father, liuing in no leſſe authority then himſelfe: Herod alſo repoſed more confidence in him euen in thoſe things, for which he was worthy to loſe his head. For the King conceiued that in confirmation of his good affection towards him, Antipater had accuſed his brethren, as vnder reſolution to continue his father in ſecurity, & not for any hatred he bore as well vnto them, as to his father; though indeed he hated them for his fathers ſake, being tranſported with fury. But all theſe were but as ſo many ſubtill ſtratagemes to inſinuate himſelf into Herods counſels & fauours: and theſe did he craftily make vſe of, to cut off the occaſion leaſt any ſhould preuent or accuſe him of that which he pretended to doe, and that Herod might be depriued of all meanes & manner of reliefe, if ſo be Antipater ſhould bend his forces againſt him. For the treaſon he complotted againſt his brothers, proceeded from the hatred he bare vnto his father: but at that time he was the more egged on to proſecute his intended purpoſes, without any delay or procraſtination. For if Herod ſhould happen to die, it was a matter moſt aſſured that the kingdom ſhould be his; and ſhould his life continue any longer time, Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 1. Antipater after he had made away his brothers, grew hatefull both to the ſoldiers & the people.

Antipater gouerned the kindome with his father.

Antipater wiſheth his fathers death.

A time, & the practice Antipater went about ſhould be diſcouered, ſeeing himſelf inuironed with theſe dangers, he ſhould be inforced to make his father his enemy. For which cauſe he vſed very great bounty and liberality to all thoſe that were about his father: & thorow the great largeſſe he beſtowed vpon them, he ſtrangled and extinguiſhed that hatred which all of them bare vnto him: and aboue all things he continued himſelfe in credit with thoſe friends, which Herode had at Rome, by ſending them diuers preſents, and namely to Saturninus, who was gouernor of Syria. He hoped alſo by bribes and rewards to draw his fathers brother into his faction, and to corrupt the kings ſiſter alſo, who was maried to one of the kings moſt eſteem'd friends in court. Furthermore, hee was a ſubtill and politike man in entertaining thoſe men with colourable and cloaking ſhew of friendſhip, with whom he conuerſed, and to draw himſelfe into credit with
B them: contrariwiſe, he was ſufficiently practiſed to diſſemble his malice and diſcontents, which he had conceiued againſt any man. Notwithſtanding all this, he could not deceiue Salome his aunt, who of long time before had ſounded his inclination, and who was not ſo ſimple as to ſuffer her ſelfe to be deceiued; but had already by all cunning means that might be, preuented his malice; although ſhe had a daughter married vnto his vncle, by the mothers ſide. This daughter was firſt of al wedded to Ariſtobulus, and afterwards by Antipaters meanes eſpouſed to his vncle: For Callaas her husbands ſon had married the other. But neither could this affinity colour the matter ſo much, but that his malice was diſcouered; neither could that former conſanguinitie extinguiſh the deſerued hatred conceiued againſt him. Herod conſtrained Salome (who thorow amorous paſſion had thought to haue married her ſelfe to Syllaus the Arabian) to marrie with
C Alexas, and that by the mediation and perſwaſion of Iulia Cæſars wife, who aduiſed Salome not to refuſe that marriage, for feare leſt he ſhould proue her vtter enemy; for that Herod had made an oath, that if Salome condeſcended not to marry Alexas, hee would neuer make account of her: For which cauſe ſhe followed Iulias aduice, who was Cæſars wife, and counſelled her alſo to her profit and preferment.

Antipater ſpared no coſt to winne his fathers friends.

Antipater could not deceiue his aunt.

Herod compelleth Salome to marry Alexas.

At the ſame time Herod ſent his daughter to king Archelaus, who had beene married to Alexander; preſenting him a dowrie out of his owne treaſurie, leſt there ſhould any difference ariſe betweene them, and he himſelfe moſt carefully brought vp his ſonnes children. For Alexander had two ſonnes by Glaphyra; and Ariſtobulus begat on Bernice, Salomes daughter, three ſonnes and two daughters. Theſe ſometimes would he preſent and commend vnto his friends, and bewailing the misfortune of his ſons would beſeech God that no ſuch ill fortune might befall their
D children, but rather that they might encreaſe in vertue and acknowledge their education and bringing vp, with all dutifull reſpects vnto their parents. He prouided them alſo each of them with a wife, at ſuch time as they were ready for marriage, namely, the daughter of Pheroras for the eldeſt of Alexanders ſonnes; and the daughter of Antipater for Ariſtobulus eldeſt ſon: and one of Ariſtobulus daughters was married to Antipaters ſonne; and the other hee eſpouſed to Herod his owne ſonne, whom he had begotten of the daughter of the high Prieſt. For it is lawfull in our countrey, and according to our cuſtome, to haue diuers wiues at one time. The king procured theſe marriages thorow the compaſſion hee had of thoſe Orphelins, thinking by theſe mutuall alliances to cauſe Antipater to be their friend. But Antipater conceiued no leſſe hatred
E toward the children, then he had done malice towards their father. For the care that Herod had of them, increaſed his hatred, in that he pretended to be the greateſt among the brethren; and he eſpecially feared leſt when they ſhould grow to mans eſtate they would reſiſt his power, being aſſiſted by king Archelaus, as his ſons in law; and Pheroras who was a Tetrarch ſhould do the like, for that he had married his ſonne to Alexanders daughter. And ſo much the more was he incited, becauſe all the people had compaſſion of theſe Orphanes, and had conceiued a hatred againſt him, who neuer ceaſed to expreſſe his malice againſt his brethren. He therefore deuiſed all the meanes that were poſſible to diſannul the decrees which his father had reſolued vpon to this effect, being very loth that they ſhould euer liue to be partners with him in the kingdom. So that at laſt Herod condeſcended to Antipaters demand, which was, that he might marry Ariſtobu-
F lus daughter, and his ſonne be eſpouſed to Pheroras daughter, and thus were the promiſed and forementioned marriages wholly cut off; yea euen againſt Herods former decree. At that time Herod had nine wiues, namely Antipaters mother, the high prieſts daughter, by whom he had a ſonne that bare his name, and a daughter of his brothers, and a couſin of his owne, by whom he had no children. He had another wife alſo, that by nation was a Samaritane, by whom hee had two ſonnes, Antipas, and Archelaus, and a daughter called Olimpias, who was afterwards married to Ioſeph the kings couſin. As for Archelaus and Antipas, they were brought vp at Rome, with a

CHAP. II.

Of Zamaris the Babylonian Iewe.

Herod buildeth a caſtle in the region of the Trachonites, and maketh Zamaris the Iew that came fro Babylon gouernor therm.

AFter this, intending to aſſure his eſtate in the countrey of Trachonite, hee reſolued to build a borough of the bigneſs of a City in the midſt of the country, as well to warrantize his country as to be in better readineſs to repulſe his enemies, and to repulſe them with more expedition. And hauing intelligence that a certaine Iewe was come from Babylon with 500. Archers on horſeback, and about one hundreth of his kinſmen, and had aduentured to paſſe Euphrates, and was in the countrey adioining Antioch neere vnto Daphne in Syria, where Saturnine generall of the Roman army had giuen him a Caſtle, called Valatha to inhabite, he ſent for him and his followers, promiſing him to giue him both lands & lordſhips in the figniory of Batanea, which confineth on Trachonite, intending that he ſhould make head againſt thoſe that would aſſaile him, and promiſing him that both his land & his ſouldiers ſhould be exempt from all tributes, and paiments of cuſtomes. This Babylonian Iew was induced by theſe offers of his to come, and take poſſeſſion of the place, where he builded a borough, called Bathyra. This man oppoſing himſelfe againſt the Trachonites defended them of the countrey, and thoſe Iewes that came from Babylon to Ieruſalem to offer ſacrifice, from all incurſions and robberies of the Trachonites: and diuers that obſerued the religion of the Iewes reſorted vnto him from all places, ſo that this countrey was very well peopled, by reaſon of the enfranchiſement of the Tribute, which continued during Herods life time.

But Philip, who ſucceeded him, exacted afterward ſome ſmall tribute of them, and that but for a little while. But Agrippa the great, & his ſon of the ſame name, vexed them very grieuouſly with taxations; yet permitted them to enioy their liberty, whoſe ſucceſſors the Romans impoſed many grieuous tributes vpon them, yet continued their freedome, of whom hereafter we will more particularly and largely diſcourſe in due place, and in proceſſe of my hiſtory. Now this Iew Zamaris, to whom Herod had giuen the poſſeſſion of his countrey, died, after he had liued vertuouſly, and left a vertuous ofspring behinde him, amongſt whom was Iacim renowned for his dexterity on horſeback, who with his troupe of horſe was of the king of Babylons guard.

Iacim and Philip the ſons of Zamaris.

This Iacim died when he was very old, and left his ſon Philip to ſucceede him, a man valiant in armes, and addicted to all ſorts of vertue, as much as any one that hath beene renowned in writing: for which cauſe king Agrippa loued him and put his truſt in him, and committed the truſt and trayning of his ſouldiers vnto him, who led them alſo foorth if any occaſion of ſeruice was proffered.

CHAP. III.

Antipater conſpireth againſt Herod.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 3.

WHil'ſt the eſtate and affaires of Herod were thus diſpoſed, all mens eyes were fixed vpon Antipater, after that Herod had permitted him to intend his particular profit. This permiſſion was granted him vnder the hope that his father had, that he would behaue himſelfe faithfully, and affectionately towards him: but he abuſed his authority more audaciouſly then could be expected; for he traiterouſly coloured his conceiued malice, and eaſily drew his father to beleeue him in whatſoeuer he ſaid. He was feared by all men, not onely for his force and authority, but for his ſubtilties and policies. But aboue all the reſt, Pheroras reſpected him moſt, and was in like maner as greatly eſteemed by him. For Antipater had circumuented him by the meanes of certain women, who fauoured his faction: for Pheroras was commanded by his wife, his mother & ſiſter in law, notwithſtanding that he hated them, by reaſon of the outrage they had offered to his daughters who were virgins; natheleſſe he was enforced to diſſemble all things, becauſe he could doe nothing but that they were alwaies round about him, and had ſuch maſtery of his affaires, that they wrought him to performe whatſoeuer they pleaſed. To theſe likewiſe was Antipater neerly tyed, both of himſelfe and by his mother: for Pheroras deceiued by women.

A for these foure women were of one mind and affection in all things, and spake as it were by one mouth: yet was Pheroras at ods with Antipater vpon some slight mislikes, and she that wrought this debate betwixt them was the kings sister, who had of long time espied all their drifts, knowing well, that their mutuall friendship tended to the ouerthrow of Herod: neither refused she to expresse what her opinion was therein. And they knowing well that the king disliked this their inward familiarity, and that he was priuy to that which they pretended, which was his vtter ruine, resolued between themselues to refraine their publike familiarity, and to make a shew that they were at ods one with another: to which intent they reproched one another, especially at such time as they were either in Herods presence, or there was any one with them, who (as they thought) would certify him therof. But in secret they intermitted not their accustomed friend-

The yeare of the world, 3961. before Christs birth 3.

B ship, and continued their intercourses with more priuy affability, and such was their ordinary demeanor and behauiour: yet was not Salome ignorant hereof, neither when they first deuised this drift, neither afterwards when they put it in execution: for she diligently noted all things, and aggrauated the same in her reports to her brother, whom she informed of their secret assemblies and banquetting, vrging their secret consultations, which (as she said) had no other issue but his ruine, except vpon their discouery he sought to represse them in time. Further, that for the present they behaued themselues like enemies in outward shew, and all their speeches tended to disgrace one another; but that in secret they were friends, and that in priuate they entertained their amity, and promised each other their mutuall assistance to strengthen themselues against those to whom they were loth their friendship should be discouered. These things obserued, she with all

Salome discouereth to Herode the conspiracies of the Ladies & others.

C diligence signified the same vnto her brother, who of himselfe had already many probabilities thereof. But he durst not make shew thereof, because hee knew that his sister was a woman too much addicted to reproachfull accusation. There was amongst the Iewes a sect of people that were called Pharisees, who were too much addicted to selfe opinion, and boasted themselues to be the exactest obseruers of the law in all the country, to whom these women were very much addicted, as to those who were much beloued of God, as in outward appearance they made shew for. These were such as durst oppose themselues against kings, full of fraud, arrogancy, and rebellion, presuming to raise war vpon their motions, and to rebell and offend their princes at their pleasures: whereas therfore all the nation of the Iewes had sworne to be faithfull to Cæsar, and to the estate of the king; these onely refused to take the oath, and of this sect there were to

D the number of six thousand. For which cause the king hauing imposed an amercement vpon them, Pheroras wife paid it for them; for which cause they pretending to gratifie her, and being esteemed for such as were skilfull in foretelling such things as were to come, by reason of their often communication with God, foretold her that God had decreed to bring the kingdome of Herod and his posteritie to an end, and would bring to passe that the crowne should descend to Pheroras and his sonnes. Salome had got an inkling hereof, and had told Herod no lesse: and how they likewise corrupted euery one of his Courtiers; for which cause he put those to death amongst the Pharisees, who were the principall authors of this aduice, and with them also the Eunuch Bagoas, and Carus who was his darling, and one of the goodliest men of that time. He afterwards cut off all those amongst his houshold seruants, who were of the Pharisees faction:

Pheroras wife payeth their fine, for which benefit they promise her the kingdom. Bagoas, Carus and others are put to death by Herode.

E For Bagoas was bewitched with that hope by them, that he suffered himselfe to be called the father and benefactor of the king, who should be established according to their prediction, and haue the gouernment of all things, and should be strengthned by mariages, and descent of his lawfull and naturall children.

But after that Herode had punished those amongst the Pharisees, who were conuicted to haue beene of the conspiracie, hee assembled a councell of his friends, before whom he accused Pheroras wife, and ripped vp the outrage that was done vnto his daughters, as it hath beene declared, ascribing the same to the pride of this woman, obiecting it for a crime against her, for thereby she had iniuried his honour. Besides this, he accused her that she had of set purpose stird vp mutinies, and by all meanes possible both in word and in effect, contrarie to all law of nature, shee

F stirred vp debate betwixt him and his brother; and that the fine that he had imposed vpon his aduersaries was satisfied at her charge: so that no iot of that conspiracie was contriued without her priuitie and consent. For which causes (said hee) brother Pheroras, it shall not bee amisse for you of your owne accord to driue such a wretched woman from you, before you be requested, and the sentence be pronounced against her, otherwise she wil be the cause to kindle a warre betwixt you and mee. For if at this present you will continue the friendship and brotherhood betwixt you and me, separate your selfe from her: in so doing I will account you for my brother, and you ſhall loſe nothing by the affection which I beare vnto you. For the bond of brotherlie loue cannot continue ſafe and vnuiolate, vnleſſe you put her away. Now although Pheroras was moued with the importance & waight of this diſcourſe; yet ſaid he, that for the loue he bare vnto his wife, he would forget nothing of that dutie which conſanguinitie required at his hands in regard of his brother: but that he had rather die then liue without her company, whom he loued more deerly then his life. Herod although he tooke this anſwere of his brothers for a moſt grieuous iniurie, yet forbare he to diſcouer his diſpleaſure towards him: hee onely forbad Antipater and his mother, and in like manner Pheroras, to frequent the one with the other any more. Hee commaunded the women likewiſe that they ſhould giue ouer their familiar entertainements the one with the other, which all of them promiſed to performe. Yet this notwithſtanding vpon fit opportunites and occaſions, they viſited one another, and Antipater and Pheroras feaſted one another by night. The report alſo went that Antipater had the company of Pheroras wife, and that his mother was the meanes and miniſter of their priuie meetings.

The ſeare of Pheroras refuſall to put away his wife. Herod interdicteth Pheroras and Antipater their priuie meetings, and forbiddeth the Ladies no leſs.

Herod ſendeth Antipater vnto Cæſar.

Herod ſendeth Antipater to Cæſar.

ANtipater ſuſpecting his fathers diſlikes, and fearing leaſt his hatred ſhould by increaſe bring him into hazard, he wrote vnto his friends in Rome, requiring them to write their letters vnto Herod, requeſting him to ſend Antipater vnto Cæſar, with all expediton as was poſſible. Which beeing brought to paſſe, Herod ſent him thither with diuers royall preſents, and gaue him his teſtament & will with him; wherein he had bequeathed the kingdome to Antipater. And if it ſhould happen that Antipater ſhould die before him, then bequeathed he the ſame to his ſonne Herod, whom he had by the high Prieſts daughter. About the ſame time Syllæus the Arabian repaired to Rome, notwithſtanding hee had neglected thoſe things that Cæſar had giuen him in charge. Him did Antipater accuſe before Cæſar, for the ſame defaults wherewith he was charged by Nicholaus. Syllæus alſo was accuſed by Aretas, for murthering diuers of the beſt account in the citie of Petra, contrarie to his mind: amongſt the which was Sohemus (a man of much vertue and honour) and Phabatus, Cæſars ſeruant, of which crimes Syllæus was accuſed vpon that occaſion which enſueth: There was a certaine man of Corinthus, who was one of the kings guard, and ſuch a one as he put very great truſt in: him did Syllæus perſwade by ſtore of money and bribes, to kill Herod; which hee promiſed to performe. Phabatus made priuie to Syllæus mind, he preſently told it to the king, who cauſed him to be apprehended and tortured; who confeſſed the whole matter. He laid hands alſo on two Arabians, perſwaded by this Corinthians confeſſion; one of which was a man of commaund in his countrey, and the other was Syllæus chiefeſt friend. They being examined, confeſſed that they came thither to ſolicite and egge forward with many exhortations the Corinthian to execute the murther, and to aſſiſt him if he ſtood in need of them. Which being fully approued by Herod before Saturnine, he ſent them to Rome, there more amply to be proceeded againſt, and ſo to be puniſhed.

HErod perceiuing that his brother Pheroras did conſtantly continue his affection towards his wife, hee commaunded him to retire himſelfe into his owne dominion: whereupon hee willingly departed to his Tetrarchy, proteſting by many ſolemne othes that he would neuer more returne into the Citie, vnleſſe hee were aſſured that Herod was dead. Not long after it hapned, that the king falling ſick, hee was ſent for to receiue certaine ſecret inſtructions, as from the mouth of a dying man; but Pheroras would not obey him in regard of his oath. This notwithſtanding Herod dealt more kindly with him, and continued his loue & affection towards him: for he came vnto Pheroras as ſoone as hee heard of his firſt ſickneſſe, and beeing vnſent for alſo; and after hee was deceaſed, hee ſent his body to Ieruſalem, and honourably entombed him in that place, and grieuouſly lamented his death. This was the beginning of Antipaters miſhaps, who at that time was departed to Rome. For it was Gods pleaſure that at laſt hee ſhould bee puniſhed for the murther of his brethren. This matter will I diſcourſe of at large, that it may ſerue for an example vnto many kings, how they ought to practice and follow vertue in all their actions.

AFter Pheroras death, two of his freemen, who were Taphnites by birth, and such as Pheroras in his lifetime both inly trusted, and dearely loued, came vnto Herod, requiring him not to suffer his brothers death to passe vnpunished, but to make diligent enquiry of that vnfortunate and vnexpected misaduenture. Herod lent a willing eare to their sute, perceiuing that the matters they importuned him in, were likely & very credible. Wherupon they told him, that Pheroras, the day before his vnexpected sicknes, had supt with his wife, and that hauing receiued an vnaccustomed poyson with his meat, he was dead. That this poyson had been brought thither by a woman of Arabia; who in her speech protested that it was some potion to increase loue, but in effect it was to bring Pheroras to his end. For the women of Arabia amongst all others ase skilful in poisons, & are great sorcerers, and she that was charged with this fact, was esteemed a great friend & fauourer of Syllæus best beloued. That Pheroras mother & his wiues sister went into those quarters vpon purpose to buy that poyson, and returned backe, and brought this woman with them the day before the supper. The King moued by these words of theirs, tortured both those maide-seruants of theirs, who were their bondwomen; as also certain other of their free seruants. Now when the fact could not be extorted, by reason that none of them confessed the same; at length, she that was last of all put to her tryall, ouercome by the paines she endured, said nought else, but that she prayed God that Antipaters mother might feele the like torments, sith shee was the cause of all those mischiefes which they endured.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 5. Pheroras freemen accuse his wife for poisoning him

Herod torturreth the Ladies bondwomen, & foundeth out Antipaters & their secrets.

These words of hers made Herod the more eager & inquisitiue, so that by force of tortures he wrought out all the secrets of these women, their banquets, their secret assemblies, & those very words that Herod had spoken apart betwixt his son and himselfe; which had been reported vnto the women that Pheroras entertained: namely, that hee would giue him one hundreth talents, prouided he would vse no conference with Pheroras. Moreouer, they reckoned vp the hatred that Antipater bare vnto his father, the complaints that he made vnto his mother of the too long life and continuance of his father: for that in regard of himselfe hee was already wexen old; so that although the kingdome should fall into his hands presently, yet could he receiue but very little contentment thereby. Moreouer he alleadged, that diuers brothers & brothers children were brought vp together with him, so that he might not securely hope for any thing, for that already if he should fortune to die, the kingdome was to descend not to his son, but to his brother: besides this, he was accustomed to accuse the King of diuers cruelties cõmitted by him, and of that murther which he executed vpon the persons of his children. That for feare least he should practice his tyranny against those that remained, Antipater had found out the deuice to be summoned to Rome, and Pheroras withdrew himselfe into his Tetrarchy.

These words, which as he knew had reference to that which his sister had often informed him of, were not by him held incredible; so that being pressed with the malice of Antipater, he sequestred Doris his mother frõ his presence, spoiling her before her departure of all her iewels, which were valued at many talents: and from that time forward he shewed himself more fauorable towards those women of Pheroras household. But nothing did more whet Herods displeasure against Antipater, then did a certain Samaritane, who was also called Antipater, who had the ordering of the affaires of Antipater the Kings son. For he being brought in question & tortured, declared amongst other things, that Antipater had mixed a mortall poyson, and deliuered the same to Pheroras his vncle, commanding him to practice the Kings death in his absence, and by that meanes least suspected. That this poyson was brought out of Egypt by one called Antiphilus, Antipaters friend. That it was sent to Pheroras by one called Theudion, Antipaters mothers brother. That this poyson was kept by Pheroras wife, & was committed by her husband to her custody. She being examined by the King hereupon, confessed no lesse, and hastning forth as if she intended to fetch the same, she cast herself dwon headlong frõ the top of the house: yet did she not murther herselfe, because she fel vpon her feet. Now after she was recouered out of her swoune, and the king had promised all security both to herself & her family, if so be she would discouer the truth; & contrariwise threatned her with extream torments, if she obstinately cõtinued in concealing these treasons, she sware she would discouer all things according as they were were acted, and as many men thought at that time ſhe told nothing but the truth. That poyſon (ſaid ſhe) was brought by Antiphilus out of Egypt, and bought there by the meanes of a brother of his, who was a Phyſition. After this, Theudion brought it to our houſe: and I hauing receiued it from Pheroras hands, kept the ſame, but bought by your ſon Antipater to poyſon you that are his father. Now therefore after that my husband fell ſicke, and you in kindnes came to viſit and comfort him, he being mooued with compaſſion, and conquered by your brotherly kindneſſe, by your good affection and louing care in giuing order for his health, called me vnto him, and ſaid; O wife, Antipater hath circumuented me, whil'ſt by his peſtilent counſels and poyſoning practices he deſireth to cut off his father, and depriue me of a kinde brother. Now "therefore, ſith as I perceiue there is no part of my brothers louing and naturall affection dimi- "niſhed towards me, wherewith he was wont to entertaine me, and that my lateſt houre of life "approcheth, God forbid, that being ready to ſleep with my fore-fathers, I ſhould preſent them "with a ghoſt ſoiled and ſweltred in my brothers blood: Diſpatch therefore, and burne this poi- "ſon before mine eyes. Hereupon ſaid ſhe, I preſently brought it forth according as my husband "commanded me, and burnt the greateſt part of the poiſon, and the reſt I reſerued, that if after "my husbands death your Grace ſhould vſe me vnkindly, it might ſerue mee to eſcape thoſe ex- "treamities that would betide me.

Pheroras wife cõfeſſeth that ſhe hath the poiſon, & caſts her ſelfe down headlong frõ the roofe.

After ſhe had ſpoken thus, ſhe brought forth before them all the poiſon, & the box wherein it was kept. After her, another of Antiphilus brothers, & the mother to them both, confeſſed no leſſe, being conſtrained thereunto by force & violente of torture, and acknowledged the box. The Kings wife alſo, who was the daughter of the high Prieſt, was accuſed for confederacy & concealement of all theſe treaſons. For which cauſe Herod put her away from him, & raſed his ſons name out of his teſtament, wherein he had bequeathed him the kingdom after his deceaſe. He diſplaced alſo his father in law Simon the ſon of Boëthus from the prieſthood, & placed Matthias the ſon of Theophilus, who was borne in Ieruſalem, in his ſteed. In the meanſpace Bathillus, Antipaters freeman returned from Rome; who being tortured, confeſſed that he brought a poiſon with him to deliuer it to Antipaters mother, and Pheroras, to the end that if the firſt poiſon were not effectuall enough to diſpatch the King, they might make vſe of this other, to cut him off ſpeedily. There came letters alſo to Herods hands from his friends in Rome, written & deuiſed by Antipaters means, to accuſe Archelaus & Philip, for very often they had refreſhed the memory of Alexander & Ariſtobulus death, contriued by their father; and for that they lamented the miſerable fate of them, who were innocently betraied; and that now alſo they themſelues were called back into their country for no other cauſe, but vpon their arriuall to be made partakers of their brothers miſerable deſtiny. Theſe things did Antipaters friends certifie Herod of, in that by many & mighty preſents he wrought them thereunto. He himſelfe alſo wrote vnto his father colourably, after a manner excuſing the young men, and imputing their words to their indiſcretion & yong yeeres. Meane while, he buſied himſelfe in accuſing Syllæus, and courted the chiefeſt Romans, buying diuers ornaments & iewels to preſent them with, to the valew of two hundreth talents. And it is to be wondred at, that ſo great matters being brought on foot againſt him ſeuen moneths at leaſt before his returne into the country of Iudæa, that no inkling thereof came vnto his ears. But the cauſe partly was, the diligent ſearch & watch that was kept vpon the high waies, and partly the hatred that all men had conceiued againſt Antipater. For there was not any that would put themſelues in hazard to procure his ſecurity.

CHAP. VII.

Antipater is condemned, and caſt into priſon.

Herod concealing his diſpleaſure, anſwered Antipater his ſonnes letters (wherein he gaue him to vnderſtand, that as ſoone as he had diſpatched his affaires as it behoued him, he ſhould returne) charging him to haſten homeward, for feare leaſt during his abſence, ſome vnexpected inconuenience might betide him. He likewiſe after a temperate maner complained vnto him of his mother, promiſing notwithſtanding to remit the fault vpon his returne, and by all meanes he made ſhew vnto him of much kindnes, fearing leaſt he apprehending any ſuſpicion ſhould deferre to haſten his returne homeward, & lingring too long at Rome, ſhould cõtriue ſome traiterous ſtratageme, to the preiudice of himſelfe, & the ouerthrow of his kingdome. Theſe letters did Antipater receiue in Cilicia, and already had he receiued others at Tarentum,

A rentum, by whom he vnderstood of Pheroras his vncles death, whereat he was sore grieued; not for the loue he bare to Pheroras, but for that he died before he had murthered his father; according as he had promised him. As soone as he came to Celenderis a Citie of Cilicia, hee grew doubtfull whether he should return or no, and grieuously was he distracted by his mothers disgraces, who was banished from the Court. Sundry also were the opinions of his friends in this behalfe: for some of them counselled him to stay, and expect the euent of these troubles in some place: other some, on the other side, aduised him to delay no longer his return into his country, for that vpon his arriuall he might easily satisfie all those obiections and accusations that were inforced against him, because his accusers had nought else to strengthen their cause with, but his absence: This latter aduice liked him best; so that he betooke himselfe to sea, and at last arB riued in the port of Sebaste, so called, and builded by Herod, to his great charge in honour of Cæsar.

Celenderis in Cilicia.

Sebaste a hauen builded by Herod in honor of Cæsar.

And now already it manifestly appeared that Antipater was vpon his downfall: For no man came out to salute him, no man entertained him, as they did vpon his departure, when as all of them accompanied him with praiers and happy acclamations: but contrariwise they boldly and openly spake against him, and bitterly cursed him, telling him that he was iustly punished for the wickednesse he had committed against his brothers.

Antipater vpō his returne is saluted by no man.

About the same time Quintilius Varus, who was sent to succeed Saturnine in the gouernment of Syria, was at Ierusalem, & drew thither at that instant vpon Herods request, to assist him with his counsailes in his present and weighty occasions. Now whil'st these two sate and consulted Quintilius Varus gouernor of Syria.

C together, Antipater came in before any man expected him, and in that purple garment and royalty that he was accustomed to vse, entered the palace. The guard of the gates suffered him to enter in, but they excluded all those that were with him. This first of all affrighted & appauled his spirits, in that he already perceiued into what calamities he was fallen; and now also when he drew neere his father, he thrust him from him, accusing him of the murther of his brethren, and reproching him with that intent he had to poison him, telling him that the next day Varus should both heare and iudge all his misdemeanours.

He altogether amated at the greatnesse of that vnexpected mischiefe, which he both heard and saw, departed presently from them wholly amazed, and in the way met with his mother and his wife (which was Antigonus daughter, who had been king of the Iewes before Herod) by

D whom he was aduertised of all that which had hapned, and for that cause more diligently prepared himselfe for his triall. The next day Varus & Herod sate in iudgement, accompanied by their friends on both sides; thither also were cited the kings kinred and his sister Salome, and certaine others, who could discouer his secret practices; some of which had bin tortured, and namely Antipaters mothers seruants, who a little before his arriuall, had been apprehended with a letter to this effect: That he should take heed that he returned not into the country, because his father was made priuy to all his practices, and that for the present he had no other refuge but onely to Cæsar, and to take care likewise lest he should fall into his fathers hands.

Hereupon Antipater humbling himself on his knees before the king his father, besought him not to condemne him before his cause were heard, but to suspend his iudgement vntil such time

E as he had heard his iustifications. But Herod after hee had commanded him to withdraw himselfe into the midst of the court & assembly, deplored his infelicity in begetting such children, and bewailed his mis-hap, that in his old age he was reserued for an Antipater. After this he reckoned vp the cares he had spent in their education and institution, and how bountifully he had bestowed vpon him as much riches as he required: he furthermore alleaged, that none of all these fauors could preserue him from falling into the lapse of the loss of his life by their policy, to the intent that they might iniuriously possess the kingdom before either the law of nature, or the will of their father, or their own rights could challenge the same. But aboue all the rest, he wondred at Antipater, with what hope he could possibly be puffed vp to attempt so audacious and wicked an enterprise. For by his testament he had made him the heire of his kingdom, and Antipater accused by Herod.

F in his life time also had made him equall partaker of his dignity, glory and power: that he receiued annually fifty talents of reuenewe, and to furnish his voyage for Rome, had 300. talents giuen him. Moreouer, he accused him for his slanderous accusations against his murthered and slaughtered brothers: who if they had been wicked, why did he imitate them? but if they were innocent; why without cause produced hee his slaunderous accusations against those, who were his naturall brethren? For in his owne respect he had neuer found any thing against them, but by his report: neither had he giuen sentence against them, but by Antipaters aduice, aduice, who for the preſent were abſolued by him, becauſe he was becom the heire of their patricide. In vttering theſe words he began to weepe, being vnable to vrge his griefes any further; for which cauſe he beſought Nicholas Damaſcene, who was his deere friend, and conuerſed ordinarily with him, and was priuy to all that which had paſſed, to proſecute the reſt that appertained to the inqueſt and approbation of his crime. G

Antipaters anſwer to his fathers obiectiō.

But Antipater turning himſelfe towards his father, began to iuſtify himſelfe, vrging the ſame teſtimonies & fauours that his father had ſhewed vnto him, and the honors he had receiued at his hands, which he would neuer haue ſhewed him if he had bin vnworthy of the ſame, and had not by his vertue deſerued theſe fauors. He alleaged alſo, that by his vertue he had preuented all that which might haue hapned, and that where the cauſe required his labor or diligence, he diſpatched all things with his owne induſtry; that it was vnlikely that he, who had deliuered his H father from thoſe treaſons, which were intended againſt him by other men, ſhould himſelfe attempt the like: and as far from probability that he ſhould goe about to extinguiſh that vertue (wherof euen vntil that day he had giuen teſtimony) to th'end that alwaies hereafter he might be defamed for ſuch an indignity. For long before this time he was named and entitled to ſucceed him, and to enioy thoſe very honors wherof already he partooke no ſmall part; whereby he proteſted that it was vnlikely, that he, who might enioy the halfe of all that his father had, in all ſecurity, vertue & honor, ſhould deſire the whole with infamy and danger; yea and with incertitude to obtaine the ſame; conſidering in eſpeciall, that the puniſhment which had befallen his brothers (whom he had both diſcloſed and accuſed at ſuch time as they were hidden) was procured by him, who, if he had liſted, might haue concealed them in ſecret, and whoſe wic- I kednes toward their father (after it was approued) he himſelfe had reuenged vpon them: neither (as he ſaid) repented he himſelfe of that which he had done: for that action of his might be an argument to approue how incorruptly he loued his father. And as touching that which he had dealt in at Rome, Cæſar himſelfe was witnes thereof; who could bee no more deceiued then God himſelfe: whereof thoſe letters bore record, which were written by him; which in equity ſhould be of no leſs force, then the ſtanders of thoſe who ſought to ſet them at oddes: the moſt part of which obiections and reproches had bin complotted and deuiſed by his enemies, who haue had the leiſure to purſue the ſame during his abſence, which they could not haue performed in his preſence. Finally, he auowed, that all thoſe confeſſions were falſe which K were extorted by torture, in that it ordinarily falleth out, that ſuch as are put to the tryall, confeſſe many things by force of torment that are vntrue, to ſatisfie them that put them thereto: briefly without all fauour, he offered himſelfe to the rack in iuſtification of his innocencie. Vpon theſe his proteſtations, all the councell and aſſiſtants were confounded. For all of them had great compaſſion of Antipater, who was wholly drowned in his teares; ſo that his very enemies began to pittie him. And Herod himſelfe made it appeare, that he ſeemed in ſome ſort to be altered in his opinion: notwithſtanding he endeuoured to conceale the ſame.

But Nicholaus, according as he was requeſted, proſecuted that accuſation which the king had begun, vrging all things to the vttermoſt; and producing all the witneſſes, and thoſe manifeſt proofes, that were gathered from their examinations that were tortured. In eſpecial, he amply L diſcourſed of the kings vertue, which he had fatherly expreſſed in the education & inſtruction of his children; for which he had been ſo vnkindly and vnnaturally requited. Moreouer, that his firſt childrens fooliſh raſhneſſe was not ſo much to be wondred at, for that being yong, they had bin corrupted by the malice of their counſellors, and had blotted out of their hearts all the lawes of nature, rather through ambition of rule then deſire of riches: But that Antipaters boldneſſe was both wonderfull and wicked, who more cruell then the cruelleſt beaſts (who toward their benefactors acknowledge each good turne) was nothing mollified by his fathers ſo great indulgence; nor terrified by his brothers calamity; but muſt needs emulate them in their cruelty. And thou thy ſelfe (ſaid he) ô Antipater, wert the Iudge of their attempted treaſons, by thy M inquiſition they were indited, thou didſt execute the iuſtice againſt them being conuicted. Neither doe wee diſallow that thou didſt proſecute them with iuſt indignation, but rather admire thee for that thou imitateſt their intēperance: and we eaſily gather that thoſe acts of thine were not attēpted for thy fathers ſecurity, but intēded for thy brothers ouerthrow, that by deteſting their malice, thou mightſt inſinuate thy ſelf into the allowance & good liking of their father & thine, that afterwards thou mightſt more cunningly & ſecurely bring him to his end, which at length thou haſt attēpted to perform. For whil'ſt thou adiudgeſt thy guilty brothers to death, and ſpareſt their confederats, thou mak'ſt it manifeſt in al mens eies, that thou art in good liking

liking with them, whose assistance thou mightest hereafter vse in oppressing thy father. Thou hast therefore taken a double pleasure worthy thy manners; the one openly as if reioycing and glorying, that by thy brothers death thou hast atchieued a matter of honor: the other secretly, with endeuoring by greater wickednes, but more secret fraud to make an end of thy father; the reuenger of whose iniuries thou pretendedst to be. For if thou hadst truly detested their malice, thou hadst neuer esteemed the same to be worthy of thy imitation: For thou hast not cut them off for committing such capitall offences, as were answerable vnto thine, but for that they had a more iust & rightfull title to succeed in the kingdom then thou hast: And thou hast thought good to mix the murther of thy father with the slaughtered bodies of thy brothers, for feare least thou shouldst be suddenly conuinced in thy conspiracies against them, and to the end that the punishment which thou well deseruest to suffer, should light vpon thy infortunate father, projecting with your selfe such a paricide, and so rare & hainous a murther, that to this day the like thereof hath not been heard of amongst men. For thou being his sonne hast practised these treasons, not only against thy father, but against him that loued thee aboue measure, & did thee good beyond hope, whith whom thou hast actual participation of the gouernment of the kingdome, and who had appointed thee his heire in the same, being no waies hindred, either for the present, or in times past, to participate the pleasure of soueraignty, & being assured of the hope of succession both by the will and writings of thy father. But you haue measured the course of your affaires, not according to Herods vertue, but according to your owne appetite and malice, intending to depriue such a father of his part, who granted you the whole; and seeking in effect to murther him, whom in words you pretended heretofore to protect from iniury. And not cõtent of your self to practice these treacheries, you haue poisoned your mother also with no lesse corruption, and in steed of loue that should haue been amongst brethren, you haue filled your familie with mutinies & hatreds: And after and besides all these things, thou hast been so audacious, as to call thy father beast; being of thy selfe more malignant then those beasts that are most venemous, vsing thine owne venome against thy dearest friends, and such as haue best deserued at thy hands, strengthning thy selfe with his guard, and diuers treacheries both of men and women against one old man, as if thy cursed minde alone were not sufficient to satisfie thy hatred. And now after so many men and women slaues and free men tortured for thy cause, after the open & manifest testimonies of thy parties in the conspiracy, thou art so impudent as yet to contradict the truth: and thou that lately hopedst to depriue thy father of his life, dost now as much as in thee lieth, endeuour to abolish that law that was instituted against malefactors in thy kind, herewithall Varus equity, and all whatsoeuer iustice is in the world. Doest thou therefore accuse them of falsehood, who were examined in torments, to the end thou mightest endanger their credit, who were the preseruers of thy fathers life? shal we beleeue thee more then them in their tormeents? Wilt thou not (O Varus) deliuer the king frõ the iniuries of those, who are his own flesh & blood? wilt thou not put this wicked beast to death, who hath murdered his brothers to pretend a loue towards his father, and who hath at last beene discouered to be the most mortall enemy of them all, to the intent that at one instant he might establish the kingdom in himselfe? Thou knowest that Patricide is no priuate crime, but a publike iniury to life and nature, which is no lesse loathsome in the thought, then it is in the act: which who so punisheth not, is of himselfe guilty of an iniury offered to our common mother nature.

Patricide that publike iniury of life and nature.

After these speeches, he annexed certaine points as touching Antipaters mother, which thorow feminine frailty had been blabbed out by her, to wit, that she had asked counsell of soothsaiers & diuiners, to whom the kingdome should befall: And that she had offered sacrifices, & made prayers for the death of the King. And moreouer, he declared what lasciuious prankes Antipater had plaied with Pheroras women, in banqueting and amorous and wanton dalliances. The informations likewise that were presented by such as were tortured, with sundry testimonies of diuers men, some suborned; the other found out to be incontinently produced & confirmed. For each man seeing that Antipater was exposed to the accusations of those men, who had the gouernment in their hands, and that the good fortune that had long time accompanied him, had openly deliuered him into the hands of his enemies, they manifestly discouered the insatiable hatred which they had conceiued against him, whereas before time the feare that they had of him inforced them to be silent: yet was he not so much burdened with other mens hatreds, as with his own wickednes, namely his deadly hatred against his father, his breach of amity amongst his brethren, whereby he filled the Kings household with seditions & murthers, of some complotted, and acted by other some; neither giuing place to hatred according to iuſtice, nor to amity according to good affection, but acording as it might ſtand with his profit. G Which for that diuers men perceiued long before that time, they iudged of euents according as they had reaſon, & the rather becauſe that being void of hatred, they ſpake but their opinions. And whereas heretofore they had cried with a loud voice againſt him, at ſuch time as they were ſhut vp; at this time when they were depriued of their feare, they declared all things, that they knew. And whereas there were diuers produced of the miſchiefes committed by him, yet ſeemed there nothing to be fained, for that the accuſers neither ſpake in fauour of the king, neither concealed any thing for feare of perill, but condemned all Antipaters wicked actions, and iudged him worthy of death & puniſhment, not ſo much for his fathers ſecurity as of his owne demerit. Neither did they only accuſe him, who were by iuſtice tyed thereunto, but diuers voluntary witneſſes alſo brought in their euidence; ſo that although hee was a very cunning diſ- H ſembler, and colourer of his lies, and moſt impudent in his aſſertions, yet durſt he not once open his mouth or mutter againſt the ſame.

Antipater accuſed by all men.

As ſoon as Nicholas had finiſhed his diſcourſe & accuſations, Varus commanded Antipater to anſwer to thoſe crimes, that were obiected againſt him, if he had any thing to alleadge, that he was not guilty of thoſe forfaits or hainous crimes that were laid vnto his charge. For of himſelf he deſired nothing more, & knew wel that Herod his father deſired no leſſe; then that he ſhould iuſtifie himſelfe, and maintaine his innocency. But he humbling himſelf vpon his face, & lowly bending his body to the ground, beſought God, who was the ſearcher of all hearts, to approue his innocency by ſome euident ſigne, how he had neuer attempted any thing to his fathers preiudice. For this is the cuſtome of all wicked men, that as often as they attempt any hai- I nous act, they engage themſelues in all wickednes, without any reſpect of Gods iuſtice; & when as by their miſdeeds, they are fallen into perill, then call they God to their minds, by whoſe inuocation & teſtimony they deſire to be deliuered, making a ſhew that they cõmit all things to his determination. The like whereof at that time happened in Antipater: who, whereas before time he diſpoſed all his actions in ſuch ſort, as if there had bin no God that had the ouerſway of humane affaires; at ſuch time as iuſtice ouertook him, and he was diſfurniſhed of the benefit of the law, had his recourſe to Gods power, alleadging that he was reſerued by God to this end, that he might diligently intend his fathers ſafety. Hereupon Varus, when as by often queſtionings he could wreſt nothing from him, but that he only cried vpon God, ſeeing that otherwiſe there would be no end of theſe debates, he commanded the poiſon to be brought forth before K them all, that he might make experience of what force it was: which being preſently brought vnto him, & miniſtred to one that was condemned to die, it preſently killed the man. Which done, he aroſe & departed out of the councell & the next day went to Antioch, where for the moſt part he was wont to haue his reſidence, for that it was the chiefe city of the Aſſyrians. But Herod preſently commanded his ſon to be put in bonds, no man knowing what talke had beene between him & Varus vpon his departure, but all mens opinion was that the king did nothing in impriſoning him, but by his counſell. When as therefore he had faſt bound him, he ſent vnto Cæſar, and wrote his letters vnto him, as touching Antipater, ſending certain appointed meſſengers, who by word of mouth might certifie him of his curſed treaſons.

Varus giueth Antipater licence to iuſtifie himſelfe. Antipater ſtriueth by his proteſtations, and inuocations of God to iuſtifie himſelfe.

The poiſon is miniſtred to a condemned man, and it killeth him. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 7.

Herod impriſoned his ſon and ſent Embaſſadors to Cæſar to certify his abuſes.

At the very ſame time there was a letter intercepted, ſent by Antiphilus to Antipater, which L Antiphilus remained in Egypt: which letter being opened by the king, was written to this effect. I haue ſent you Acmes letter, hazarding therby mine own life: for you know that I am in danger of the diſpleaſure of two mighty families, if I ſhould be diſcouered. As for your ſelfe, bethink you well of your affairs in this reſpect. Such were the contents of this letter. The King made diligent ſearch for others alſo, but he could finde none: for Antiphilus ſeruant, who had broght that which was read, denied that he had any other. But while the king was in this doubt, one of his ſeruants & friends perceiued that the inſide of the meſſengers vnder-coat was newly ſewed: for he had two garments the one vpon the other: & coniecturing that the letters might be hidden in the fould thereof, as indeed they were, he ripped the ſame, and found them. The tenour thereof was this: Acme to Antipater, Health: I haue written the letters to your father, ac- M cording as you gaue me inſtructions, and haue counterfeited the copy of my leter, as if it had been ſent by Salome my miſtris. I aſſure my ſelf, that when he hath read the ſame, he will puniſh Salome as one that hath practiſed treaſon againſt him. But that letter that was ſuppoſed to haue been written by Salome to Acme, was of Antipaters inuention, and written in Salomes name, according to his inuention, and in Acmes ſtile. The contents were theſe: Acme to King Herod, Health: Whereas I haue an eſpeciall care, that nothing be concealed from thee that cõcerneth thy Teare this copy, leaſt thorow the knowledge of the ſame, I grow in danger of my life. Now in that which ſhe had written to Antipater, ſhe had diſcouered that ſhe had written theſe words to Herod, according to that commandement he had giuen her, as if Salome had conſpired to work ſome treaſon againſt him. She ſent alſo the copy of thoſe counterfait letters in the name of Salome, and ſent them vnto her miſtris to work treaſon.

Acmes letters to Herod.

This Acme was a Iew born, and chambermaid to Iulia, Cæſars wife, and did that which is aboue written for the loue which ſhe bare to Antipater, whom he had hired by great ſummes of mony, to the end, that ſhe ſhould aſſiſt him to execute the miſchiefe, which he practiced againſt his father and againſt his aunt. Herod made almoſt deſperate by the great miſchiefes of Antipater, was ſtirred vp on the ſudden to ſhorten his daies, for that he was the only meanes that ſtirred vp theſe great tempeſts of ſedition in his kingdom, and who not only practiced againſt his father and his aunt, but againſt his ſiſter alſo; and had in like ſort corrupted Cæſars family. Salome alſo incenſed him the more, beating her breaſts and offering herſelfe to all deaths, if any ſuch like matter might be duely prooued againſt her. For which cauſe Herod ſent for Antipater, commanding him to ſpeake freely all that which he had to ſay without feare. But hee hauing not one word to anſwere for his defence, Herod ſaid vnto him: Since that on all ſides thou art conuicted, and ſurpriſed in thy wickednes, delay not, but diſcouer thoſe that are of thy confederacy. Whereupon he laid all the fault vpon Antiphilus, & named none other. At that time Herod being wounded by extreame griefe, would haue ſent Antipater to Rome vnto Cæſar, that he might receiue his iudgement from him, but afterwards he feared leaſt by the intereſt of his friends he ſhould eſcape the danger, for which cauſe he kept him bound and fettered in priſon, as he had done before. And in the meane while ſent certain meſſengers with letters to Cæſar, to accuſe his ſonne, and to declare wherein Acme had been his confederate, producing the copy of the letters. Theſe Embaſſadors therefore reſorted to Rome, inſtructed in thoſe things they were to anſwere to thoſe interrogatories that ſhould be offered them, and with them he ſent theſe letters.

Herods ſickneſſe and the ſedition amongſt the Iewes.

MEane while Herod fell ſicke, and made his will, and appointed his yongeſt ſonne to ſucceed him in the kingdome, for that through Antipaters inſtigations he had conceiued a hatred againſt Archelaus and Philip. He ſent alſo one thouſand talents vnto Cæſar, and fiue hundreth to his wife, and to his children, friends and freemen. Hee beſtowed alſo money, rents, and lands vpon his owne children: hee gaue his ſiſter Salome an ample poſſeſſion for that ſhe had alwaies perſeuered in louing him, and had neuer offended him. And hauing loſt all hope of recouery, for that he was about 70. yeares old, he became very tutchie and froward in whatſoeuer his affaires. The cauſe hereof was, that opinion he had conceiued, that he waxed contemptible, & that the whole nation tooke pleaſure in thoſe miſhaps which befortuned him: which ſome of thoſe who were fauoured by the people, made him the rather beleeue vpon this occaſion which enſueth. Amongſt thoſe that were moſt learned, amongſt the Iewes, Iudas the ſon of Saripheus, and Matthias the ſon of Margalothus, the moſt excellent interpreters of the lawes and ordinances of the countrey (and for this cauſe were in greateſt eſtimation among the people, by reaſon that they inſtructed and trained vp the youth; for all thoſe that deſired to obtaine vertue, ſpent all their time with them) vnderſtanding that the Kings ſickneſſe was dangerous, they incenſed the yonger ſort, counſelling them to ouerthrow all thoſe works that the King had cauſed to be made contrary to the law and cuſtome of the countrey; to the end, that they fighting for piety, might obtaine the reward that attendeth the ſame. For in that the King had enterpriſed and done many things contrary to the law, diuers vnaccuſtomed miſeries had befallen him, and namely that ſicknes wherewith he was detained. For Herod had done diuers things contrary to the ancient law; againſt which Iudas and Matthias exclaimed openly. For he had erected ouer the portall of the great temple, an Eagle of gold of great value. Now the law prohibiteth that they, who pretend to liue according to the ſame, ſhould in any ſort erect any image, or repreſent any figures of liuing creatures whatſoeuer. For this cauſe theſe doctors counſelled them to pull downe that Eagle: telling them, that although the matter ſeemed to want no perill, perill, yet ought they rather to prefer an honeſt death before a pleaſant life,if ſo be it be imploied for the defence of their country lawes and religion. For in ſo doing they ſhould obtaine immortall praiſe for the preſent,and a memorable and eternall glory in time to come; neither that they ſhould protract the execution therof for fear of danger, ſince death was a thing that might not be auoided; ſo that ſince by the general courſe of nature,they muſt needly die,it ſhould become them brauely to forſake their liues with praiſe and honor in imbracing vertue. For to die in the execution of ſome noble exploit(which cannot be atchieued without hazard or danger) their children ſhould be richly rewarded with the fruits therof,& their other parents that ſhuld outliue them (of what ſex ſoeuer) ſhould reap the fruits of that glory which was honorably atchieued by them. In theſe or ſuch like words incouraged they they yong men. G

The yong mẽ pull ng downe the golden eagle hew it in peeces with their axes. Iudas and Matthias with forty other young men being broght to the kings preſence iuſtifie their actions with ioy,& the king ſendeth them bound to Iericho.

About that time there was a rumour ſpread, that the King was dead, which gaue very great furtherance to the Doctors reſolution. For at high noon they went vp into the temple,they pulled and hewed down the Eagle with their axes, in the ſight and aſſembly of a great number of people that were in the temple. Now when the tydings hereof came vnto the ears of the Kings captain, he fearing leaſt ſome further and more fatall tumult might be raiſed, drew out a ſtrong company of ſouldiers with him, to repulſe thoſe that were aſſembled to hew downe the Eagle: and charging the rude and diſarmed multitude,who were gathered together, he eaſily ſlew and diſperſed the moſt; as for thoſe forty yong men that valiantly addreſſed themſelues to reſiſt, he apprehended them,and with them the authors of this ſedition Iudas and Matthias, who thought ſcorne to ſubmit themſelues,and led them to the King;who demanding of them how they durſt deface the ſacred image: they anſwered,that long before that time they had reſolued it,and that now according as they had reſolued,they had like valiant men performed the ſame. For we(ſaid they) maintaine the honour of God and the doctrine of our law,whereof we are diſciples: neither ought you to admire that with contempt of your ordinances we haue preferred the lawes of our forefathers,which Moſes hath left vs in writing,according as he was ſuggeſted and taught them by God: neither doe we refuſe any death or puniſhment which thou ſhalt inflict vpon vs, being aſſured in our conſciences,that we ſuffer not for our impiety, but piety ſake. Thus ſpake they all of them, continuing the like conſtant boldnes in their anſweres, as they had ſhewed in their actions, being alſo ready,conſtantly to endure any puniſhment for that which they had attempted. Hereupon the King cõmanded them to be bound,and ſent them to Iericho: then calling before him thoſe principall Iewes,who had the gouernment vnder him;and being brought into their aſſembly vpon his pallat, by reaſon of his weaknes, he recited vnto them the numberleſs trauels he had endured for their ſakes: in like maner, how vpon his great charges he had repaired & reedified the temple;whereas the Aſmoneans for the ſpace of 125. yeers, wherin they raigned,could not performe ſuch a building in the honour of God. Moreouer,he ſignified vnto them,how he had adorned the ſame with precious gifts,for which he hoped that after his death his memory & glory ſhould ſuruiue. After this he expoſtulated with them for what cauſe they abſtained not from offering him that outrage during his life time? And why at noon daies and in the ſight of all the people, they had laid hands on thoſe preſents which hee had dedicated vnto God,and had taken thoſe things away violently which though in words they appertained to him,yet in the effect if the act were well examined,they had taken from God. The Gouernours ſuſpecting his cruelty,and fearing leaſt his vnbridled paſſion ſhould vrge him further, by which meanes they migh be aſſured of ſome ſeuere puniſhment, anſwered him: that thoſe things were not done by their conſents,and that in their opinion the iniury ought not to be let ſlip without puniſhment. At that time Herod ſhewed himſelfe more fauourable towards the reſt, but he cauſed Matthias to be depriued of the prieſthood,as one in part who had bin the cauſe of that which had hapned;and in his place ſubſtituted Iozar one of his wiues brethren. During the prieſthood of this Matthias it hapned alſo,that another high Prieſt was elected that very day, wherein the Iewes did vſually celebrate their faſt. For Matthias the night before the day of the faſt, ſeemed in his dream to haue had the company of his wife;and whereas for this cauſe he was vnfit to offer the diuine ſacrifice, he had Ioſeph the ſon of Ellemus appointed him to be his aſſiſter and ſubſtitute,by reaſon of his alliance. Herod therefore depoſed Matthias: and as touching the other Matthias, who had mooued this trouble, both he & his companions were by his commandment conſumed with fire. The Eclipſe.

This very night the moon was eclipſed, & Herods ſicknes grew more vehement. For God puniſhed thoſe ſins which he had cõmitted. For he was inflamed with a lent or ſlow fire, which to the outward ſenſe ſeemed not ſo vehement, but inwardly ſearched & afflicted all his entrails: he had

His members rotted and were full of crawling wormes, with a filthy & no leſſe troubleſome Priapiſme, accompanied with an intolerable ſtench: beſides all this he had a ſtrong conuulſion of his nerues, and ſhortneſſe of breath. For which cauſe it was a generall opinion amongſt holy men, and ſuch as had the knowledge of prophecy, that the King was thus puniſhed for his infinite impieties & ſinnes committed againſt the maieſty of God. And although he was tormented with an vnſupportable ſicknes, yet had he hope to eſcape: and for that cauſe he ſent for Phyſitions from all places, and refuſed none of thoſe remedies which they thought behoofefull for him. Being there it was thought good by his Phyſitions, that he ſhould refreſh himſelfe in thoſe waters: There being ſet by them into a bathing tubbe filled with oyle, he waxed ſo ſick, that they held him for dead. Whereupon all his houſhold ſeruants wept and grieuouſly lamented; and all his familiar friends crying out & bewailing him, with their great noiſe cauſed him to come to himſelfe: and ſeeing himſelfe wholly out of hope to eſcape, hee gaue order that there ſhould a diſtribution be made to euery ſouldier the ſumme of fifty drachmes, & he offred great preſents to their captains & his friends. C ſeeing that he muſt needly die, hee bethought him of this facinorous action that followeth. For the nobleſt men among the nation of the Iewes, reſorting vnto him from all parts (vpon his commandement vnder the expreſſe penalty of loſſe of life, to whoſoeuer ſhould neglect the ſame) the King ſhewed himſelfe to be diſpleaſed, as well againſt thoſe whom he thought guilty, as againſt them who had giuen him no occaſion of diſcontent. For he cauſed them to be ſhut vp in a place called the Hippodrome, which was the tilt-yard to run horſes in, and ſent for his ſiſter Salome, and Alexas her husband; telling them that his end was at hand, for that his griefes did inceſſantly torment him: which as he ſaid he ought to bear patiently, becauſe it was an end that ſhould happen to all men. D mournings and lamentations, which a King deſerued. For he was not to ſeeke of the Iewes affections, neither how his death was deſired and longed for by them, ſince that in his life time they preſumed ſo farre as to reuolt, and diſhonour & deface thoſe gifts, which he had beſtowed vpon the commonweale. It therefore behooued them to afford him ſome ſolace in that his bitter anguiſh, for that if they refuſed not to performe that which hee had contriued in his mind, the lamentation of his death ſhould be magnificent, and as great as any King euer had: and the pleaſure & laughter that might accompany his death, ſhould be abated by their ſorrow, who ſhould vnfainedly lament for the whole nation. He therfore willed them that at ſuch time as he ſhould giue vp the ghoſt, they ſhould cauſe the Hippodrome to be inuironed by his ſouldiers, as yet vnaduertiſed of his death (which he would not haue publiſhed before this execution were ended) and to command them to ſhoot their arrowes at thoſe that were ſhut vp therein. And that when

E they had ſlaine them all after this manner, they ſhould make him triumph & reioyce in a double ioy; firſt, for that in his death his commandement ſhould bee ratified by effect; ſecondly, for that he ſhould be honoured by a memorable lamentation. Thus weeping, he beſought his kinſfolke for the loue they bare vnto him, and for the faith they bare vnto God, that they ſhould not ſuffer him to die fruſtrate of this laſt honor: and they proteſted that they would not tranſgreſſe any point of this his commandement. Hereby a man may coniecture what his nature was, who took pleaſure in theſe aboue named impieties, & who through the deſire he had of long life, hath after this ſort dealt with thoſe of his blood: and it may be coniectured by theſe his laſt cõmandements, that he had nothing in him that ſauoured any humanity: for that departing out of the world he had ſuch a mind, that all the nation and all ſuch as were moſt affectioned towards him,

CHAP. IX.

Antipaters death.

Letters are sent frō Rome that Acme was executed by Cæsars command, & that he had authorite to vse Antipater at his pleasure.

WHilest hee deliuered these instructions to his kinred, he receiued letters from those Embassadors which he had sent from Rome vnto Cæsar: the effect whereof was, that Acme was put to death by Cæsars command, who was displeased with her for that she had bin of Antipaters conspiracy, who was remitted to Herods pleasure like a king and father to vse him, as best pleased him; either to exile and banish him; or if it so pleased him, to put him to death. Herod receiuing these newes, recouered his spirits a little thorow the pleasure he receiued in the contents of those letters, both of Acmes death, as of the power that was granted him to punish his son. But being assailed afresh with greeuous dolours, and vrged with a desire to eate, he called for an apple & a knife: for before time he was accustomed to pare his apples himselfe, and to cut a little; and afterwards to eate it: when as therefore he had gotten hold of the knife, he looked round about him, determining to giue himselfe a mortall wound therewith, and had surely done it, had not Achiabus his nephew hastily stept within him, and staid his hand, & call'd for assistance. At that time the sorrow and lamentation was renewed in all the palace, as if the King had beene already dead: and Antipater certainly beleeuing that his father was departed, began to hope (and confirmed no lesse in his words) that being deliuered out of prison, hee should obtaine the possession of the kingdom without any difficulty: and deuised with the Gaoler as touching his deliuerance, offering him great presents both in hand & hereafter, as if there had bin no other question but of that. But so farre was the Gaoler from obeying that which Antipater demanded, that he presently went & certified the King what his intent was, and what offers he made him. Herod, who had already conceiued a sinister opinion of his son, hearing what the Gaoler had said, began to exclaime, and to beat his head, although he was almost at the vttermost gasp: and lifting himselfe vp vpon his elbowes, he commanded that one of his guard should presently haste and kill him; and that done, he should be buried in the Castle of Hircanion without any honour.

Hedio & Russinus, chap. 10.

AFter this, hauing changed his mind, he made a new testament. For he appointed Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee & of Peræa, whereas before that he had instituted him for his successor in the kingdome. Hee created Archelaus King; hee gaue the prouinces of Gaulonites, Trachonites, Batanea and Paneade to Philip his son, and Archelaus brother by the mothers side, to be Tetrach ouer those places. He gaue his sister Salome Iamnia, Azot & Phasaelis, with fifty thousand crownes of gold. He prouided also for his other kinsmen, all whom he left rich in money, which he gaue them, and reuenewes which hee assigned them. He gaue Cæsar ten millions of drachmes in siluer, amounting to the summe of eleuen hundreth thousand francs, besides a great quantity of gold and siluer plate, & of precious moucables. To Iulia Cæsars wife, and to certaine others, he bequeathed fiue millions of drachmes, amounting to fiue hundreth and fifty thousand francs, or thereabout. After he had in this manner disposed all things, some fiue daies after he had caused Antipater to be executed, he departed this life: hauing reigned after Antigonus death, for the space of thirty and foure yeares, and thirty and seauen yeares after he was elected & approued King by the Romans: a man without respect cruell, and seuere towards all men, slaue to his wrath, Lord of the lawes: yet so fauoured by fortune, as no man more; for from a priuate man he became a King, and being inuironed with many perils, hee alwaies happily escaped, and he liued also a very long time. And as touching his family and children, in this also in his owne opinion was he happy, in that he ouercame his enemies and aduersaries: but in my opinion, he was most vnfortunate.

Herods mutable & strange fortune.

But before the Kings death was thorowly knowne, Salome and Alexas discharged those that were locked vp in the Hippodrome, and sent euery one of them home vnto his owne house, telling them that the King commanded them to depart and follow their household affaires, and till their land: wherein they performed a most noble action, and benefited the whole nation with an especiall good turne. After that the Kings death was bruted abroad, Salome & Alexas caused all the men of warre to be assembled in the Amphitheater in Iericho, and first of all they caused

That done, Ptolomy, to whom the King had committed the cuſtody of his ſeale, recited his teſtament, which was to take no effect except that Cæſar approued the ſame. Thereupon all of them began to applaud and honour Archelaus for their King. D they had blotted out of their remembrance the iniuries, that his father had done vnto them; proteſting in his owne behalfe, that he would enforce himſelfe to requite their kindneſſe, with an intire affection. He likewiſe told them, that for the preſent he accepted not the ſtile of King, becauſe the honour was bequeathed him with this condition, that Cæſar ſhould ratifie his fathers teſtament. For this cauſe although the ſouldiers that were in Iericho enforced themſelues to ſet the diademe vpon his head, yet would he not accept that vncertaine honour, becauſe it was not reſolued whether Cæſar, who was the principall party in the gift, would grant him the gouernement or no.

He alleadged likewiſe, that if his affaires ſucceeded according to his deſire, he would not according as his honour commanded him, forget their loue, or leaue their good affection vnrequited. And that in the meane while, hee would enforce himſelfe by all means to further thoſe

Some of them cryed out vnto him, that hee ſhould cut off ſome part of their taxes and tallages, which they paied annually: Otherſome cried vpon him, to deliuer thoſe priſoners that were committed by Herod, of whom diuers had pined a long time in priſon: Others inſtantly vrged him to cut off thoſe tributes which had been impoſed by him vpon bargaines and ſales, which was to pay the halfe of the bargaine. Wherunto Archelaus did not in any ſort contradict, ſtriuing to the vttermoſt of his power to pleaſe the people, for that

MEane while, certain men among the Iewes that were desirous of innouation, in their priuate conuenticles bewailed Matthias and his confederates, whom Herod had put to death, and condemned for rasing and defacing the golden Eagle: for that incontinently after their decease, they had neither been publiquely honored, nor lamented for, by reason of the fear that the people had conceiued of Herod. For which cause at that time they required with lamentations and great cryes, that their obsequies might be solemnized; and as if the dead bodies had receiued some contentation by their teares & tempest of exclaimes, they vttered many hainous & disgracefull speeches against Herod; and assembling themselues together, they required Archelaus to do them iustice against those, that during Herods life were in authority; and especially they demanded, that the higst Priest, who was aduanced by his father, should be deposed, and that another more lawfull & vpright might be placed in his steed, to offer and exercise the high Priests place. Now, though Archelaus was sore displeased at these their violent proceedings: yet notwithstanding, hee conformed himselfe to their good likings, in that he was with all expedition to repaire vnto Rome, to vnderstand and attend Cæsars pleasure. He therefore called for the General of his army, willing him to perswade them not to seeke a reuenge for those men, who were dead, notwithstanding they were their friends; because whatsoeuer was done, was done according to law; and that no enquiry might be made therof, except to the great preiudice of his reputation, and hazard of his state, in regard of the incertainty of the time: that it was more expedient for him to study for the maintenance of peace, vntill such time as being established in the kingdome by Cæsars consent, hee should returne backe againe vnto them, and that then he would consult with them for the comman profit, according to their iust demands, wishing them for the present to containe themselues, and to take heed least they stirred vp sedition.

When he had thus instructed his Generall, he sent him vnto them. But they cryed out with a loud voice, and would not suffer him to speake: but for feare of danger & death, they put him to silence. And if any other were so forward as to speak vnto them, & perswade them to some moderation, and to alter their sinister resolutions, he was also in danger; for that they had this perswasion, that all things ought rather to be ordered according to their pleasures, then by the authority of their superiours: supposing that although during Herods life time they had beene depriued of their deerest friends, it should be now a matter vnworthy their courages, after his death to bee cut off from the priuiledge to demand their reuenge. For they were transported with their owne opinions, and held all that for lawfull and vpright, which was in any sort conformable to their pleasures, without foreseeing the danger that might happen thereby: so much were they pleased to be reuenged on those, whom they reputed to bee their enemies. Now, whereas diuers were sent by Archelaus, to consult with them; and diuers came vnto them, not as messengers from him, but as friends and louers of peace, of their owne motion, with an intent to pacifie them, they would not permit any of them to speake; and thorow their rage there arose a great tumult, which had growne to a further extreamity, if a greater number of people had ioyned themselues with them.

At that time fell the feast of vnleauened bread, which is called Pascha, which is a memoriall of their deliuerance out of Egypt, at which time all men do most willingly present their sacrifices, and a greater number of beasts are slaine at that feast, then at any other time. To this solemnity also an infinit number of people assembled from all parts, to honor God: whereby the seditious (supposing that they had gotten a fit opportunity) lamented Iudas and Matthias, who were the Expositors of the law, and kept themselues within the temple, whither they had gathered good store of victuals, which they were not ashamed impudently to begge for. But Archelaus, fearing least their rage should produce some more grieuous effect of mischiefe, sent out a band of armed men, with a captaine, and a regiment of a thousand men, to represse their head-long fury, before the rest of the people were infected with their follies; and to bring them likewise vnto him, whom they found to be the forwardest in that commotion. Against those the seditious cryed out, with great clamours, and incensed the people against them, so that all of them rushed in vpon the men of war, and slew diuers of them. The rest of them escaped with their captaine, yet not without diuers wounds. That done, they which were within the temple returned againe to their diuine seruice.

Now

A Now Archelaus ſuppoſing that his whole fortune was endangered, except hee repreſſed the rage of the multitude, he ſent out all his footmen with a certain number of horſemen, to preuent leaſt they that were without ſhould yeeld aſſiſtance to thoſe, who had taken vp their lodging in the temple, and to put thoſe to the ſword, who hauing eſcaped the violence of the footmen, ſuppoſed themſelues to be in ſecurity. Theſe horſemen ſlew about three thouſand men, the reſt retired themſelues into the mountaines that were neer adioyning. Hereupon Archelaus made proclamation, that each one ſhould repaire vnto his owne houſe. For which cauſe they departed & abandoned the feaſt, for feare of greater miſchiefe; notwithſtanding they had ſpleen enough, as it is the ordinary cuſtome of the ignorant multitude.

After this, Archelaus accompanied with his mother, betook himſelfe to ſea, and led with him B Nicholas and Ptolomy, with diuers other his friends, committing the gouernement of all his houſhold and kingdome to his brother Philip: with him alſo departed Salome Herods ſiſter, leading with her her children. There went alſo diuers other of his kinred, who ſaid that they would all of them labour for Archelaus, that he might obtain the kingdom, but ineffect it was to contradict him with all their power: and in eſpeciall, to vrge that againſt him with great vehemency, that was done in the temple. Sabinus, Cæſars Viceroy in Syria, poſting into Iewry to take charge of Herods money, met with Archelaus in Cæſarea. But Varus arriuing in the meane while, detained him from finiſhing that voyage; for Archelaus had ſent for him to come thither by Ptolomy, and Sabinus willing to doe Varus a pleaſure, would not ſeize the fortreſſes of Iury; neither ſealed vp Herods treaſures, but left them in Archelaus poſſeſſion, vntill ſuch time as Cæſar had giuen order C for the eſtate; and after he had made this promiſe, he ſtaied in Cæſarea.

Hedio & Ruffinus 2. chap. 13. & 14.

After Archelaus had ſet ſaile towards Rome, and Varus was departed for Antioch; Sabinus went to Ieruſalem, where he ſeized the Kings palace: and calling before him the Kings Agents, and the captaines of his garriſons, he required them to deliuer vp their Caſtles into his hands. But they, according as Archelaus had commanded them, continued the poſſeſſion in their accuſtomed manner, according to the Kings direction, pretending to keep the ſame in Cæſars behalf. At the ſame time, Antipas Herods ſon trauailed to Rome likewiſe, vnder the hope to be elected King, in regard of Salomes promiſes; and for that hee better deſerued the ſame then Archelaus, conſidering that in the firſt teſtament, which ſhould be of more force then the later, he had been D apointed king. He led his mother alſo with him, & Ptolomy the brother of Nicholas, who had bin one of Herods moſt eſteemed friends, and was well affected to further and ſet forward his title. But eſpecially he was ſtirred vp to ſeek the kingdom by Ireneus, a man very eloquent, & to whoſe charge in regard of his ſufficiency, the affaires of the kingdom had been committed. For which cauſe, although he were perſwaded to giue ouer the kingdome vnto his elder brother, who was confirmed in the kingdome by his fathers teſtament; yet would he not giue eare thereunto. But Antipas no ſooner arriued in Rome, but all his kinsfolke reuolted from Archelaus, vnto him, not ſo much for the loue they bare him, as for the hatred they had conceiued againſt Archelaus: and aboue all, for the deſire they had to recouer their liberty, & to draw themſelues vnder a Roman Gouernour. For they thought that if there were any contradiction, that Antipas, for whom they endeuoured to procure the royalty, ſhould be more profitable vnto them then Archelaus. Sa- E binus alſo by his letters accuſed Archelaus to Cæſar: but Archelaus by Ptolomy exhibited vnto Cæſar a ſupplication containing his right and title to the kingdome, his fathers teſtament, and the account of the money which Herod his father had ſealed vp, together with his ring, and expected the iſſue.

Sabinus repaireth to Ieruſalem, with an intent to ſeize Herods treaſures and caſtles.

Antipas vnder hope to recouer the kingdome, ſaileth to Rome.

But when he had read theſe letters, and thoſe which Varus and Sabinus had ſent him, and vnderſtood what ſummes of money he had left, and what the annuall reuenue was, and how Antipas challenged the kingdom, and appropriated it to himſelfe, according as his letters made mention: he aſſembled all his friends to haue their aduice thereupon. Amongſt them was Caius the ſonne of Agrippa and his daughter Iulia, adopted by him, whom he cauſed to ſit in the chiefeſt place: which done, he commanded the aſſiſtants to ſpeake what they would touching this mat- F ter. At that time Antipater Salomes ſonne, a man very eloquent, and a great aduerſary to Archelaus, ſpake firſt ſaying, that it was a mockery for him at that time to ſpeake of the kingdome, conſidering that before Cæſar had granted it him, hee had already ſeized the forces of the ſtate, when as vpon a feſtiuall day he had ſlaine ſo many: who although they had deſerued that puniſhment, yet ought the iuſtice thereof to haue been reſerued to a lawfull power, and not to haue bin vſurped by him, either being King with Cæſars preiudice, whoſe authority hee had contemned; or by being a priuate man, which was a greater ouerſight. For which cauſe hee vndeſeruedly at this

this time hoped for his approbation, whom already as much as in him lay, hee had depriued of G the title and authority of his allowance. Moreouer, hee obiected against him, that of his owne authority he had changed certaine chieftaines of the army, and that hee had seated himselfe in the royall throne, and like a King had determined certaine causes, and had granted certaine de„ mands of the people: finally, that he had left nothing vndone, which he might haue performed,
„ had Cæsar confirmed his title. He alleaged also, that they who were inclosed in the Hippodrome,
„ were dismissed by him, and diuers other acts, partly true, partly probable, in regard of the ambi„ tion of young men, who desirous to gouerne doe ordinarily commit such things: besides this,
„ his neglect in mourning for his father, and withall, his reare banquets all night long at that very „ time his father died; whereat the people began to mutine, seeing the small regard he had of his „ fathers death, from whom he had receiued so great goods and honors. How all the day long he H
„ made a shew of his sorrow and tears in his pauillion, but all the night took pleasures like a King;
„ and being such, if Cæsar should grant him the kingdom, he would behaue himself no lesse vnkind-
„ ly towards him, then he had done towards his most kinde father. That it was no lesse then a hay-
„ nous crime in him, to delight himselfe with songs & dances at his fathers death, as if he had bin
„ his enemy: That he now came to Cæsars presence, to the intent to obtaine the kingdome by his „ consent, whereas already he had behaued himself no otherwise then if he had already been esta„ blished King by his authority. But most of all he exaggerated the slaughter he had committed
„ in the temple, and the impiety perpetrated so neere to the feast of Easter, at which time diuers „ both strangers & citizens had been slaughtered after the manner of sacrifices, and the temple fil„ led with carcasses, not by a stranger, but by him, who vnder the colour of religion desireth the I „ gouernement of the kingdom, to the end he might satisfie the vniustice of his nature, in exerci„ sing each way his tyranny towards all men: for which cause his father neuer thought, nor euer „ dreamt to substitute him King in his place. For he knew both his life and disposition, and by his „ former testament (and that of greatest force) had ordained his aduersary Antipater to be King.
„ For he had been alloted the kingdom by his father, not when his minde was dead before his bo„ dy, but when both his iudgement was sound, and his body in health. Yea although at that time
„ Archelaus father had such a conceit of him, as in his later testament & bequest he pretendeth; yet
„ that he had already declared what kind of King he was like to be, who contemned Cæsars autho„ rity in confirming the kingdom, and being as yet a priuate man, doubted not to murther the ci„ tizens in the temple. This said, Antipater (to giue greater credit to his words, bringing diuers of K his kinred as witnesses of that he had said) ended his Oration.

Nicholaus excuseth Archelaus.

Whereupon Nicholas arose, and alleadged in Archelaus behalfe as touching the slaughter, that it was to be imputed to their impiety, who could not be restrained from their tumults and vp-rores, before Archelaus was enforced to appease them by force; alleadging that they were so „ much the more guilty, for that they had not only exercised their malice, but also had enforced „ others to attempt so hainous a reuenge against them: for their insolency seemed in apparance to „ concerne Archelaus; yet in a sort their contumacy pertained to Cæsars ruine. For those that had „ been sent by him to appease & redresse their sedition, were against all law and right charged and „ slaine by them, without respect of God, or regard of the solemne feast: whose defence Antipater
„ was not ashamed of, without respect of equity, so that he might satisfie that hatred which he bare L „ vnto Archelaus. That therefore it was their fault, who first of all abstained not from iniury, but „ whetted those swords, which were drawne in maintenance of the peace, against their owne bo„ somes. He enforced all other things also, wherof they had accused Archelaus, against themselues, „ saying that none of these things were done without their consents: and that the offence was not „ so grieuous, as they intended it should be esteemed, to the end they might discredit Archelaus.
„ So great a desire was in them to hurt their kinsman, a man both well respected, and affected by „ his father, as also kind & officious towards them in all things that concerned them. As for the „ testament, that it was made by the King when he was in perfect estate of mind and body, and of „ greater force then the former, because the authority and confirmation thereof was ascribed to „ Cæsar the soueraigne of the world. M

„ Further, that Cæsar would not imitate them in that wrong they did vnto Herod, who (being du„ ring his life time bountifully graced by him, by many benefits) do now after his death, go about
„ to violate his last and truest testament: but that rather like a friend & confederate he would con-„ firme his will, who like his faithfull & sworne welwiller had cõmitted all things to his trust. For
„ that there must needs be a great difference between their malice & Cæsars vertue & faith, which „ was renowmed thorow the whole world. For which cause he would not iudge his decree to be incon-

A inconſiderately paſt, who left his ſucceſsion to his well deſeruing ſon, and referred all things to his truſt. For that it was vnlikely that he ſhold erre in the choiſe of his ſucceſſor, who had ſo diſcreetly ſubmitted all things to Cæſars iudgement. After this maner Nicholas alſo finiſhed his diſcourſe. Hereupon Cæſar courteouſly raiſed Archelaus, who lay proſtrate & humbled before his feet, telling him that he was moſt worthy to be king, by giuing an apparant teſtimony, that hee was conſtant in his reſolutions; pretending that he would do nothing but that which ſhould be anſwerable to Herods teſtament, & Archelaus profit; and ſeeing the yong man was confirmed in ſom good hope with this his promiſe, he determin'd nothing more for that time: but diſmiſſing the councell, he debated with himſelfe whether he ſhould ratifie the kingdome to Archelaus only, or diuide it amongſt Herods kindred, eſpecially ſince all men had need of his aſſiſtance.

CHAP. XII.

The Iewes mutiny againſt Sabinus, and how Varus puniſheth the authors of the ſedition.

BVt before Cæſar had determined any thing certainly in this behalfe, Marthalce Archelaus mother died of a ſickneſs, and Varus the preſident of the Iewes in Syria, had ſent letters, which certified the Emperour of the rebellion of the Iewes. For after Archelaus departure, all the nation were in an vprore. To pacifie which, Varus reſorted thither, and puniſhed the authors of the ſame: and after he had in this ſort appeaſed all things, he returned to Antioch, leauing a regiment of ſouldiers in Ieruſalem to reſtraine the factious innouations amongſt the Iewes: yet preuailed he nothing by this his policie. For as ſoon as Varus was departed, Sabinus

Marthalce Archelaus mother dieth. Varus pacifieth the ſeditions at Ieruſalem.

C who intended Cæſars affaires, remaining in that place, grieuouſly burthened the Iewes, truſting to that power that was left him, and ſuppoſing that hee was already enabled to withſtand the multitude. For he armed diuers ſouldiers, and made vſe of them to oppreſſe the Iewes, and to prouoke them to ſedition. For he enforced himſelfe to ſurpriſe their fortreſſes, and forcibly to make ſearch after the Kings treaſures, for his priuate lucre and couetouſneſſe ſake. When as therefore the feaſt of Whitſontide was come (which is one of our feſtiuals) diuers thouſands from al parts repaired to Ieruſalem, not only for religion ſake, but alſo for deſpite & hatred they had conceiued againſt thoſe violences and iniuries, which Sabinus had offered them. And not only were thoſe of Iudæa grieuouſly offended (but diuers alſo reſorted out of Galilee and Idu-

And diuiding their camp into three bands after this maner, the one part of them took vp the Hippodrome, & of the other two the one ſeiſed the ſoutherne quarter of the temple, and the other the eaſtern, and the third, which was in the Hippodrome were planted to the weſtward, where the kings palace ſtood; and thus prepared they all things that were neceſſary to ſet vpon the Romans whom they had beſieged on all ſides. At that time Sabinus fearing their number, & reſolution, who were reſolued either to die or to ouercome, ſent preſent letters vnto Varus, requiring him with al expeditiõ to ſend him a ſupply, becauſe the regiment that was left by him, was in great danger; and muſt needs vtterly periſh without his ſpeedy reſcous: as for himſelfe he withdrew into the tower and dungeon of the caſtle Phaſaelus, which was a fortreſſe which was builded and ſo called in honour of Herods brother, who was ſlaine by the Par-

E thians; and from the top thereof made a ſigne to the Romans, that they ſhould ſally out vpon the Iewes; being afraid to truſt himſelfe to his own friends, and ſuppoſing that the reſt ought to expoſe their liues to danger in maintenance of his ſafety. The Romans hauing made this ſally, there aroſe a deſperate skirmiſh, wherin the Romans diuers waies had the vpper hand; yet were not the Iewes any waies diſcomforted, notwithſtanding they had loſt many men, but wheeled about ſo long till at laſt they ſeized the outward galleries, and thoſe that encompaſſed the temple, & in that place there was a hot aſſault: for they flung down ſtones with their hands & ſlings, & there were certain archers mixed among ſt them; who in that they had recouered a place of aduantage, grieuouſly gauled the Romans which were below, in that they had no means to auoid their ſhot, but were in ſuch ſort expoſed thereunto, as their enemies had the better. And some shot at and slain by those that stood round abouts; othersome despairing of their liues, and G amazed at the mischief, either cast themselues into the fire, or slew themselues with their own swords; & all those that retired vnder hope to saue themselues by that way they ascended, were encoũtred by the Romans, who slew them all in that they were discouraged & disarmed, thogh furiously desperate: so that not one of them that ascended the porches escaped with life. Afterward, the Romans thrusting forward one another by those waies, where the fire was slaked, en-tred the treasure house where the sacred mony was kept, by which meanes a great part thereof was stolne away by the souldiers, and Sabinus to all mens knowledge carried away 400. talents.

But the Iewes being afflicted with a double calamity, first of all with the losse of their friends in that fight: and lastly, with the spoile of the treasury; yet assembled they a troupe of the most valianteſt souldiers, and besieged the palace, threatning to burne the same, with Sabinus & all other H
the Romans that were therein, except they speedily departed; and in so doing, they promised both them & Sabinus all assurance and security: whereby it came to passe, that diuers of them that were in the palace, issued out & submitted themselues vnto them. But Rufus & Gratus hauing three thousand of those valiant souldiers vnder their charge, who had serued Herod, ioyned themselues with the Romans. The like did those horsemen which followed Rufus, who in like manner submitted themselues to their direction: yet for all this, the Iewes continued & intended their siege, vndermining the wals, and exhorting their aduersaries to depart, & not to exempt them of their liberty, which they had long time enioy'd vnder their predecessors. Sabinus was willing to depart from thence with his souldiers; yet durst hee not trust them in regard of their former attempt, and he suspected ouer-much the ouer-liberall offer his enemies had made I him: but neglected the same, because he expected Varus.

At the same time infinit other troubles were raised in diuers other places of Iudæa, according as each man either was incensed with a desire of gain, or a will to reuenge. For two thousand men of warre (who had somtime serued vnder Herod, and being at that time cashierd, liued at home) assembling themselues together assailed those of the Kings faction, who made head against them, vnder the conduct of Herods nephew Aciabus: who neuer daring to encounter them in a place of equall aduantage, in that they were old souldiers, and well exercised in warre, defended himselfe, in that he held and kept himselfe as neer as he could in the mountaines & places of aduantage. Moreouer, Iudas the son of Ezechias the Archtheefe, whom Herod ouercame with so much difficulty, at Sephoris a citie of Galilee, gathering vnto him a band of desperate K men, made incursions vpon the Kings dominions. And hauing taken all those Armes and weapons, which he might recouer in that place, he armed from the first to the last all those soldiers that were with him: he took away all that mony which was reserued for the king, in that place:
and affrighting the inhabitants round about him, he spoiled all those with whomsoeuer he met;
aspiring to the kingdom, and affecting the same, not by lawfull meanes of which he was vnskilfull, but by a liberty to do iniury.

Whilest these troubles ranged in euery place, Simon also, who had bin one of Herods seruants, and both for his shape, stature & strength, was esteemed amongst all men, vndertooke the kingdome: and being atended by a mighty army, and proclaimed king by them, who were a wicked and vnbridled multitude, and perswading himself that he was worthy to be King aboue any o- L ther, he first of all set fire on the palace in Iericho, and spoiled all that which was therein. Hee burnt also diuers other royal palaces, belonging to the king, which were in diuers places of the country, giuing them free licence, who were his followers in the action, to bear away the prey that remained: and far more licentious pranks had he plaied, had not his practices bin speedily and wisely preuented. For Gratus who with the Kings souldiers had coupled himselfe with the Romans, and gathered all the forces that he had, went out against this Simon. And after a fierce battell, they on the other side of Iordan, were put to flight, and fighting rather vnder courage then military discipline, they were ouercome. And whilest Simon in trauersing a valley sought to saue himselfe by flight, Gratus met with him, and cut off his head.

About the same time also, the royall palace of Amatha, that was fast by Iordan, was burnt by M men of as bad disposition as Simon was. And thus thorow the whole nation raigned this raging rebellion, for that the country had no King, who by his vertue might gouerne & moderate the people, for that the strangers, who were sent to represse these mutinies, did rather incense them thorow their violence & auarice. For a certain obscure & base man (neither esteemed for ver-tue, nor worthy regard for his riches, but being a shepheard vtterly vnknown before time, and onely famous for his huge stature and strength) called Athronges, was so audacious to aspire to royall

A royall dignitie, and tooke pleasure to offer violence setting light by his life, and exposing himself to al hazards for the onely vnbridled affection he bare to soueraignty. He had foure brothers of as goodly stature as himselfe, who were esteemed for men of valour and execution, whereby they imagined they had the meanes offered them to occupy the kingdom. Each one of these had the commaund ouer a company. For a great company of people resorted dayly vnto them; the charge of whom was committed vnto his brethren, at such time as any occasion of war was offered, and hee in the meane while wearing the diadem on his head, ordered, counsailed, and commaunded all things. The power of this Gallant endured a long time, who was not called king for nought: for he disposed all things according to his owne pleasure, and both hee and his brethren were flesht with the slaughter of the Romans, and those of the kings side, whom he ha-

B ted alike; these, by reason of the insolence they had vsed during Herodes life time: the other, in regard of those iniuries, which lately they supposed themselues to haue receiued by them. This hatred of theirs daily increased more and more, and there was no man that could escape their hands, both in respect of the gaine they sought, as for the custom they had to shed blood. They therefore at that time set vpon the Romans and supriſed them on the sodaine neere to Emmaus, at such time as they caried victualls and munition vnto their campe; and hauing enclosed the Centurion Arius with forty of their most valiant footmen, they shot him thorow with their darts. The rest that expected nothing lesse then life, were saued by Gratus, who came in vpon them with the kings souldiers: whereupon leauing the dead bodies, they retired. Continuing their war after this maner a long time, according as occasion was offered, they had done much

C mischiefe to the Romans, and farre more iniury to the nation of the Iewes. Finally, they were surpriſed; the one in an encountrie betwixt them and Gratus: the other in fighting against Ptolomey. The eldest was taken by Archelaus, and the last being dismaid with these accidents, and seeing no meanes to escape (for besides his other mishaps, his souldiers were afflicted with sicknes) he with the rest vpon Archelaus faith and oath submitted himselfe vnto him. But this was done some little while after.

At this time was all Iudæa full of robberies, and as many seditious assemblies as drew togither, so many kings were there elected, who were raised to the vtter ruine of the common-weale. Amongst the rest, the Romans were they that smarted least, but the murthers were executed against those that were out of the country. But Varus vnderstanding by Sabinus letters, in what dan gers they were, and fearing the vtter ouerthrow of his third legion, hee tooke with him the two

D other (for to the vttermost, in Syria there were but three) and with the assistance of the kings and Tetrarches hee hasted into Iewry, to relieue those that were besieged, commanding those that were sent out before he dislodged, to meet him at Ptolemais, & passing by the Citie of the Berythians he receiued a thousand, & 5. hundreth souldiers at their hands, to attend him in his war. Aretas also, who was Lord of Petra, drawing himselfe into confederacy with the Romans, in regard of that hatred he bare toward Herode, sent him horsemen and footemen. When all these forces were assembled at Ptolemais, he deliuered a part therof to his son, and one of his friends; commanding them to make war vpon the Galileans, who bordered vpon that Citie; who entering that region, and putting all those to flight, whosoeuer durst make head against him, he took

E Sephoris, and selling the inhabitants vnder the speare, hee consumed the Citie with fire. Varus himselfe marching towards Samaria with his army, violenced not the Citie, in that hee knew it was free from the contagion of the seditious, but he pitched his camp in a certain village, which was Ptolomies possession called Arus. The same did the Arabians burne, reuenging themselues on Herods friend for his sake, and marching onward the Arabians spoiled also an other village called Sampho, and for that it was strongly fortified burned the same. Besides, in that iourney nothing escaped their hands, but they put all to fire and sword. For both Emmaus was burned by Varus commaund, and in reuenge of his souldiers that were slaine in that place, it was left desolate and voide of inhabitants. From thence drawing neere to Ieruſalem, those Iewes that besieged the legion on that side, vpon the sodaine view and approach of the army of the Romans, VARVS repaireth to Ieruſalem, and deliuereth the legion that was besieged.

F fearefully fled, giuing ouer that siege which they intended. But those Iewes of Ieruſalem, being grieuously reproued by Varus, alleaged in their excuse, that the people in regard of the feast were assembled in that place, and that the warre was not begun by their consent, but vndertaken by their bouldnesse who resorted thither from diuers places: and that they were so far off from assayling the Romans, as they rather seemed to bee besieged by them. And long before this, Ioseph king Herods nephew, Gratus and Rufus, with their souldiers were gone out to meet Varus, and those Romans that had sustained the siege, had done no lesse. But as touching Sabinus, hee would not appeare in Varus presence, by stealing away priuily out of the Citie, hee fled vnto the seaward. Then Varus sending a part of his army thorow the whole region, sought out the authors of this sedition, and those that were noted men in the action; some of which, who were most guiltie, were punished: the rest were deliuered. Now of those that were punished for this occasion, there were about two thousand crucified; and that done, seeing that his army stood him in little steed, hee dismissed them. For diuers disorders and outrages, contrarie to Varus expresse commaund, were acted by his souldiers, who sought after nothing more then to increase their meanes by other mens miseries. And hearing that ten thousand Iewes were assembled together, he hasted to apprehend them: but they not daring to hazard their fortune in a fight with him, by Achiabus aduice submitted themselues. But Varus hauing pardoned the people for this their rebellion, sent all those that were the ringleaders thereof to Cæsar, who discharged diuers of them. But hee chastised certaine of Herodes allies, and such as bare armes with them: for that neither in regard of kindred, nor respect of iustice, they had abstained from rebellious insurrection. After that Varus had in this sort appeased all the troubles in Iewrie, and left the first legion in garrison in Ierusalem, he returned to Antioch.

But Archelaus was crossed in Rome by another occurrent that arose vpon this occasion: Certaine Embassadors of the Iewes resorted thither by Varus permissiō, requiring that it might be lawful for them to liue according to their owne lawes: these presented themselues, to the nūber of fiftie, and were backt by eight thousand Iewes, that inhabited the Cittie. And when as Cæsar had assembled the councell of his friends, and chiefest citizens in Apolloes temple, which he had builded to his mightie charge, thither resorted the Embassadours, who were follow'd by a troupe of Iewes; and Archelaus also attended by his friends. But the kings kindred neither stood by Archelaus in regard of the hate they bare him, & yet disdained they to assist the embassadors, for that they were ashamed in Cæsars presence to oppose themselues against their neerest friend, and kinsman. Philip also was present at that time, who by Varus persuasion resorted thither out of Syria; especially to the intent to pleade for his brother, to whom Varus wished all god fortune: besides that, hoping not a little that if the Iewes should obtaine the libertie to liue according to their lawes, it might come to passe that the kingdom being diuided amongst Herods children, he might also light on some part thereof. After therfore the Embassadors of the Iewes had obtained licence to propose their demaunds, pretending with themselues wholly to extinguish the royalty: they began to rippe vp Herods disgraces, alleaging how onely in name he had beene a king; wheras otherwise he had vsed all the tyrannous practices that the wickedest person could haue inuented toward the destruction of his nation; and that not content with these, he had of his owne head practised & inuented new. Neither that it needed them to reckon vp how many hee had depriued of life, when as the estate of those that were aliue was farre more desperate; whom hee not onely affrighted with perpetuall terror and seueritie, but also with iniurious hands had not abstained from their goods. By which meanes it came to passe, that he not onely builded, but beautfied forraine Cities inhabited by forraine nations, to the ende hee might the rather vtterly spoyle those by exaction; which were situated and seated in his owne Countrey: and that he inforced his nation to extreame pouertie, which hee receiued in most happy estate, whilest he spoiled those nobles of their estates, who vpon weake probabilities were condemned to die, or granting them life depriued them of their possessions. Furthermore, whereas yeerely tributes were imposed on euerie one; yet seuerally was the rauenous & couetous desires of his friends and courtiers to be satisfied, yea & of his seruants also, who had the authority to exacte these things, that by this meanes they might redeeme their iniurious vexations. As for the deflowring of virgins, and the scornefull betraying of a matrons chastitie, they couered them vnder silence, for that it is a great comfort to those that suffer such outrage, if their disgraces bee but knowne to a fewe. In briefe, that Herod had in no other sort gouerned, then as if the gouernment of them had been committed to a most sauage beast. For which cause, whereas in times past that nation had been afflicted with many calamities and murthers, yet that there is no example extant amongst their monuments of antiquitie, that may be compared with their present calamitie vnder Herod. For which cause vpon iust respects they had with one consent named Archelaus their king, supposing that whatsoeuer king might befall them, he would alwaies demeane himself more affably then Herod had done; and that to honour Archelaus they had mourned with him for his father, to gratifie him in other things, to the intent they might tie his good affection vnto them: But hee without delay & all at once had made manifest to the whole nation, what opinion they were to conceiue of him, notwithstanding that as yet he was not confirmed king (for that it lay in Cæsars hands

For in the temple it ſelfe he hath cauſed three thouſand of his owne countrimen to be ſlaine. And how can he chooſe but be iuſtly hated, who beſides his other cruelties, obiecteth againſt vs the crime of rebellion and murinie? The effect of their requeſt therefore was this, that they might not anie more bee gouernd by a king, nor any ſuch like gouernment, but that they might be annexed vnto Syria, and ſubmit themſelues vnto thoſe gouernours that ſhould be ſent thither. That in ſo dooing it ſhould truly appeare whether they were ſeditious, and addicted to chaunges, or whether they would liue in peace at ſuch
B time as they had fauourable gouernours. After the Iews had ſpoken to this effect, Nicholas diſcharged the kings of thoſe accuſations that were obiected againſt them, & namely Herod, who (as he ſaid) had neuer beene accuſed all his life time: and that it was no reaſon that they who iuſtly accuſing him, might haue cauſed him to be puniſhed during his life time, ſhould now addreſſe their acuſations againſt him after hee was dead. And as touching thoſe things that were obiected concerning Archelaus actions, it ought to bee imputed to their inſolence, for that engaging themſelues in matters contrary to lawe, and hauing begun to murther thoſe who ſought to appeaſe the tumult, they accuſed ſuch as had kept them in obedience. Beſides this, hee obiected againſt them, that they were addicted to alterations, and tooke pleaſure to ſtirre vp ſeditions, for that they knew not what thing it was to obey iuſtice and the lawes, and that there was no nation
C in the world ſo headſtrong as that of the Iewes; for that they would haue the vpper hand ouer all. Thus ſpake Nicholas.

As for the other moitie, he diuided it between two, giuing a ſeuerall part thereof to each of Herods ſonnes, Philip and Antipas, who debated with his brother Archelaus for the whole kingdom. The ſame Antipas alſo had the countrey on the other ſide of Iordan, and Galilee, with two hundreth talents of annuall reuenue. As for Ppilip he had Bathanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, and part of the palace that was called by Zenodorus name, with one hundreth talents. As for Archelaus, hee had Idumæa, Iudæa & Samaria, which were diſcharged of the fourth part of the tributes by Cæſar, for that they had not ioined themſelues with the reſt of the people during the time of the ſedition. Of the counterfait Alexander.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 18. Alias, chap. 17. The false Alexander.

AFter these things were in this sort disposed by Cæsar, a young man and a Iew borne, brought vp in the Citie of Sidon, by a certaine Romane libertine, intruded himselfe into Herods kinred, for that all those that beheld him, reported he resembled Alexander Herodes sonne, who was slaine by him; and by this meanes, hee began to aspire vnto the kingdome: wherupon calling to him a companion, who was his owne countriman and a long beaten courtier, and his craftsmaster, and fit to execute any dangerous or desperate actions, he by his instructions fained himselfe to be that Alexander Herods son, who was deliuered from death by the meanes of a certaine friend, who had the charge to see him executed: who executing others in their steeds, deliuered both him and his brother Aristobulus, and that they were both escaped in this manner. Beeing puffed vp by these toyes, hee failed not to deceiue other men; and as soone as hee came to Creet, as many Iewes soeuer as hee fell in conference with, he perswaded them no lesse; and getting much mony at their hands, he sailed into the Isle of Melos, where hee gathered a great summe of money vnder pretext that hee was of the kings bloud. And now hoping that he should recouer his fathers kingdome, and that he should remunerate those who were beneficiall vnto him, hee hasted towards Rome, accompanied with his friends in great pompe. And being arriued at Puteol, he there also was entertained with no lesse fauour by those Iewes whom he deceiued hy his colourable title; and diuers others, who had bin Herods friends and familiars came vnto him, and entertained him as their king. The cause hereof was the natural disposition of men, who take pleasure in false reports, togither with the report of his resemblance. For they that had frequented very familiarly with Alexander, held it for a matter most assured, that he was the man, and none other, and affirmed vnto other vpon their oathes that it was he; so that this rumor at last came to Rome. And all the Iewes that dwelt there came forth to meet him, saying, that it was Gods handy work, that he was after that sort preserued beyond all mens expectation: and they greatly reioyced in his mother Mariammes behalfe, from whom he was descended; and he was carried in a litter thorow the streets with all the apparell of a king, the charge wherof was defraied by those who were his friends. He was attended with a great multitude of men, and honoured with great applause, as it ordinarily falleth out at such time as beyond all expectation any one is found to haue bin miraculously preserued. When this newes was brought to Cæsars eares, he gaue small credit thereunto, perswading himselfe that it was a hard matter to deceiue Herode in a cause of so great importance: notwithstanding, conforming himselfe in some sort to the opinions of men, he sent a certaine free-man of his called Celadus, who had very familiarly conuersed with Alexander and Aristobulus during their infancy, giuing him in charge to bring Alexander vnto him, to the end he might see him; which he did, and was neuer the wiser in discouering him. This notwithstanding, Cæsar was not fully deceiued. For, although he resembled him somewhat, yet was not he so neerely like him, that he could deceiue those who narrowly obserued him. For this counterfaite Alexander had hard hands, in that he had beene accustomed to labour, which the true Alexander could not haue in regard of his tender & delicate education: and contrariwise this man was of a rough skin and hard flesh. Cæsar therefore discouering the trechery both of the counterfait scholler and lying master, and how they accorded in their confident iustifications, he enquired of them what was becom of Aristobulus who was secretly hidden with him, & for what cause he presented not himselfe to enioy the honor that appertained to those, who were so nobly descended? It was answered him, that he remain'd in the Isle of Cyprus, for feare of dangers, to which they are exposed who saile by sea, to the end that if any misfortune should befall them, all Mariammes race should not be extinguished, but that at least wife Aristobulus might be left aliue. Whilest hee auowed these things, and the author of this fable iustified no lesse, Cæsar drawing the young man aside, said vnto him: My friend, if thou wilt not deceiue me, thou shalt haue this recompence, that thou shalt not be punished. Tell me therefore what thou art, and who hath emboldned thee to practice this fraud: for this malice is so great that it surpasseth thine age: wherupō being vnable to conceal the truth, he discouerd the trechery to Cæsar, how & by whom it was contriued. At that time Cæsar being loth to falsifie his promise that hee had past to this false Alexander, & seeing that in times past he had traueild with his hands, he caused him to be enrouled among the number of his saylers to row, & caused the other that induced him to this fraud to be put to death, contenting him selfe

Archelaus is accused anew, and afterwards banished, and sent into Vienna.

AFter that Archelaus had taken possession of that Souerainty that was allotted him, hee came into Iudæa, where he deposed Ioazar the son of Boëthus from the high priesthood, accusing him to haue fauoured the seditious, and established Eleazar his brother in his B place. After this he reedified the Palace in Iericho, and sumptuously adorned it, drawing away the halfe of those waters which serued the borough of Neara: and conuying them thorow a field which hee had planted with palme trees; hee builded a borough in that place, which he named Archelais, and contrary to the the lawes of his country he maried Glaphyra Archelaus daughter, who had been his brother Alexanders wife, by whom also he had diuers children, notwithstanding the lawe of the Iewes forbiddeth a man to marry his brothers wife. Neither did Eleazar enioy the priesthood any long time: but during his life time, Iesus the sonne of Sias was substituted in his place.

The tenth year of Archelaus gouernment, the cheefest gouernours among the Iewes and Samaritanes, vnable any longer to endure his cruelty aud tyranny, accused him before Cæsar, C and especially after they had vnderstood that he had transgressed Cæsars commaund, who had charged him to behaue himselfe gratiously towards them. Which when Cæsar vnderstood, hee was sore displeased, and caused Archelaus agent to be called before him, who was then at Rome, and sent for Archelaus also: and esteeming it too base an indignity for him to write vnto him, Go (say he) vnto him with all expedition, and bring him vnto me without delay. He posting forward with all diligence, at length arriued in Iudæa, where he found Archelaus banqueting with his friends, and hauing certified him of Cæsars pleasure, he incited him to hasten onward of his way. As soone as he came to Rome, after that Cæsar had heard certaine of his accusers and his iustifications, he banished him, and confined him in the Citie of Vienna in France, and confiscated all his goods.

Archelaus banished and confined.

But before Archelaus was sent for to Rome, hee reported vnto his friends this dreame which D ensueth. Him thought that hee sawe tenne eares full of wheate, and very ripe, which the oxen browsed vpon, and as soone as he awoke he conceiued an opinion that his vision presaged some great matter. For which cause he sent for certaine soothsayers, who made it their profession to interpret dreames. Now whilst they were debating one with another (for they differed for the most part in their exposition) a certaine man called Simon an Essean, hauing first of all obtained security and licence to speake, said that the vision pretended, that a great alteration should befall in Archelaus estate, to his vtter disgrace. For the oxen signified afflictions, in respect that those kinde of creatures do ordinarily trauell; and as touching the change of estate it was signified by this, in that the earth being laboured by the trauell of the oxen, retained not the same estate: & E as touching the ten eares of corne, they signified the like number of yeers. And therfore when as one sommer should be ouerpast, that then the time of Archelaus soueraigntie should bee at an end. Thus interpreted he this dreame. And the fift day after the vision thereof, Archelaus his factor by Cæsars commandement came into Iury to summon him to Rome. Some such like matter hapned to Glaphyra his wife also, the daughter of king Archelaus: she (as we haue said) married Alexander Herods sonne, when she was a maide, and brother to this Archelaus; who being slaine by his father, she was married the second time to Iuba king of Mauritania: and he also being dead, she liuing with her father in Cappadocia was married to Archelaus, who put away Mariamme his wife for the loue he bare vnto Glaphyra. She liuing with Archelaus, was encountred with such a dreame. She thought that she saw Alexander fast by her, who cherishing and em- F bracing her, checked her, saying: Glaphyra, Thou approuest the truth of that prouerbe, which saith, Women haue no loyalty. For hauing giuen me thy faith, and maried with me at such time as thou wert a virgin, and born children by me, thou hast forgotten and neglected my loue, thorow the desire thou hast had to be maried the second time. Neither hast thou contented to haue done mee this wrong, but hast taken vnto thee likewise a third husband, lewdely and impudently intruding thy selfe into my family; and being maried with Archelaus, thou art content to admit my brother for thy husband. This notwithstanding I wil not forget the loue that I haue borne thee, but will deliuer thee from him, who hath done thee this reproach, by retaining thee for mine owne, as heretofore thou hast been. After that she had tould this vision to certaine women that were her familiars, she died very shortly after. Which accident I haue thought good to register in this place, in that I was to intreat of those kings; and otherwise the matter seemeth to be a signall example containing a most certaine argument of the immortalitie of soules, and Gods prouidence. And if any one deeme these thing incredible, let him reserue his opinion to himselfe, and no waies contradict those, who by such euents are incited to the study of vertue. CHAP. I.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 1. Cyrenius is sent by Cæsar into Syria to execute iustice in that place. Coponius Prefect of Iudæa.

CYrenius the Roman Senator hauing executed all degrees, offices, and dignities vntill such time as hee obtained the Consulship (a man of great reckoning and estimation) was sent into Syria by Cæsars direction, to doe iustice among the people, and to sesse and taxe each mans goods: with him was sent Coponius a captaine of a company of horsemen, who was appointed to haue the commaundement of all Iewry. Cyrenius therefore came into Iudæa, which was already annexed vnto Syria, to taxe the goods of the inhabitants thereof, and to confiscate Archelaus substance. And although at the first the Iewes thought but hardly of this description, yet notwithstanding without contradiction they submitted themselues, being perswaded thereunto by the counsell of the high Priest Ioazar the sonne of Boëthus, by whose aduice they suffred themselues to be taxed without contradiction. But after this there arose a certaine Iewe called Iudas the Gaulanite, borne in the towne of Gamala, who hauing a certaine man called Sadoc the Pharisee confederate with him, laboured to stir vp the people to rebellion: alleaging that the description was no other thing, but a manifest confession of their seruitude, exhorting all the nation to maintain their libertie, and putting them in hope that they thereby should happily establish their estates, and enioy their goods with security: and besides Theſe ſpeeches of theirs were entertained by the people with great pleaſure, & by the ſame they were the more confirmed & heartned to rebellion. So that there was no kind of euill which theſe men ſet not abroach, yea the whole nation was repleniſhed with ſuch miſeries, that it is impoſſible to recount them: for the wars therein continued with ſuch fury, that it was impoſſible to reſtraine the violence therof; ſo that they neyther ſpared friends, nor reſpected enemies, but were wholly giuen ouer to the ſpoyle. The Eſſeans life and maners.

They haue one cuſtom which is worthy admiration, & ſuch a one as is not to be found amongſt any other, either Greeks or Barbarians, that make any reckoning of vertue, which they haue not practiced for a little while, but euen from all antiquitie; which is, that they poſſeſſe their goods in common: neither doth the richeſt among them make more vſe of his poſſeſſions then he that hath leaſt of all. They are at leaſt foure thouſand in number, who neither haue wiues nor ſlaues; ſuppoſing that women are the occaſion of iniuſtice, and that ſlaues do ariſe by mutinies: and liuing apart by themſelues, they ſerue one another: and chooſe out certaine vpright men among their prieſts to gather the fruits and reuenews of their lands, to the end they may be ſuſtained & nouriſhed therby: In a word, they follow the ſame courſe of life that they do, who are called Piſti among the Danes. The fourth ſect was founded by Iudas of Galilee, which accordeth altogether and in all things with the Phariſees, but that they are extreamely zealous of their liberty, acknowledging but one onely God, Lord and maſter of all things, and had rather both themſelues with their deereſt children and kinsfolk endure the moſt grieuous & bitter torments that may be imagined, then call any mortall man their Lord. Of which conſtancy of theirs I forbeare to diſcourſe any further at this time, for that it is ſufficiently knowen vnto diuers, who haue beene eie witneſſes, thereof: neither feare I leaſt any one ſhould ſuppoſe thoſe things to bee incredible, which I haue ſaide of them; but contrariwiſe, that I haue ſpoken leſſe then they themſelues make euident in contemning their grieuous tortures and puniſhments; which courage and magnanimity of theirs increaſed very mightily amongſt our nation, being kindled by the moſt hainous iniuries which were offered vs by Geſſius Florus our gouernour, by which means at length it came to paſſe that they reuolted and rebelled againſt the people of Rome. Thus much as touching the ſects among the Iewes.

AFter that Cyrenius had confiſcated Archelaus goods, and finiſhed the valuation of euery mans eſtate (which hapned 37. yeeres after Antonies ouerthrow by Cæſar in the Actian battel) he depoſed Ioazar from the prieſtly dignity, by reaſon of that ſedition which the people ſtirred vp againſt him, and eſtabliſhed Ananus the ſonne of Seth in his place. But Herode and Philip tooke each of them the poſſeſſion of their Tetrarchy, and diſpoſed of the affaires therof. Herod incloſed Sephoris with a ſtrong wal, & made it the chiefeſt Citie and ornament of Galilee: he fortified alſo another Citie called Betaramphtha, and named it Iulias in honour of Iulia the Emperour Cæſars wife. Philip repaired Paneada ſituated neere vnto the ſourſe of Iordan, and called it Cæſarea: he repaired alſo the borough of Bethſaida neere vnto the lake of Genazereth, and gaue it the dignity of a Citie, both for the number of the inhabitants as for other preheminences, and called it Iulia by Cæſars wiues name. As for Coponius the gouernour in Iudæa, who (as we haue ſayd) was ſent with Cyrenius, in his time there hapned that which followeth. At the feaſt of vnleauened bread, which we call Paſcha, the cuſtome was that the Prieſts opened the temple gates about midnight: at which time certaine Samaritans, who ſecretly entred into Ieruſalem, as ſoon as the gates were open, ſpred mens bones amidſt the porches, and ouer all the temple: wherby it came to paſſe, that the Prieſts began to keepe a more diligent watch, then they had done before time.

Some little while after, Coponius returned to Rome, and Marcus Ambiuius ſucceeded him in the gouernment. In his time Salome king Herods ſiſter departing out of this life, bequeathed vnto Iulia the Citie of Iamnia and all the lands and countrey round about: ſhe gaue her alſo Phaſaelis ſituate in the Plaine, and Archelais where there are diuers date trees, bearing moſt excellent fruit. After Ambiuius, Annius Ruphus had the commaund, vnder whom died Cæſar the ſecond Romane Emperour, after he had raigned fifty ſeuen yeers, ſixe moneths and two daies, and had Antonius his copartner in the monarchy for the ſpace of fourteen yeers. After Cæſar ſucceeded Tiberius Nero the ſon of Iulia his wife, who was the third Roman Emperour. He it was that ſent the fift gouernour into Iudæa, whoſe name was Valerius Gratus, who ſucceeded Annius Rufus. This Gratus depoſed Ananus, and appointed Iſmael the ſonne of Fabius high Prieſt: and after his deceaſe (for he liued but a little whiles after) Eleazar the ſon of Ananus was made high Prieſt. A yeere after this, this Eleazar alſo was depoſed, and the Prieſthood was giuen to Simon the ſon of Camithus: who continuing in this dignitie for a yeers ſpace & no longer, Ioſeph called Caiaphas ſucceeded after him. After Gratus had behaued himſelf thus, he returned to Rome, after he had remained in Iudæa for the ſpace of 11. yeeres. After him came

Pontius

A Pontius Pilate and ſucceeded him in the gouernment. But Herod the Tetrarch being entertained into Tiberius friendſhip, builded a City in honor of his name, and called it Tiberias. He planted it in the fruitfulleſt part of Galilee, hard by the lake Genazereth, and neer vnto the naturall bathes in the borough called Emmaus. This City was peopled by ſtrangers, who reſorted thither from all parts; and by diuers, of the countries of Galilee, ſome of which were conſtrained to inhabit the ſame. Some of thoſe likewiſe, who were in authority repaired thither, and from all countries there flocked many, who were not aſſuredly held for men of free condition; all which hee infranchiſed, and gaue them great gifts, vnder that condition, that they ſhould not abandon the Citie. To ſome of them he gaue houſes already builded; to other ſome lands very apt to be tilled, knowing that the habitation of ſuch a place was contrary to the lawes and cuſtomes of his B country, and the ordinances of the Iewes; for that Tiberias was builded in a place full of ſepulchers: and our law ſaith, he that conuerſeth in thoſe places is held vncleane and defiled for the ſpace of ſeuen dayes.

Tiberias builded.

At that very time died Phraates king of Parthia, being traiterouſly ſlaine by his ſonne Phraataces, for this cauſe. After that Phraates had gotten many lawfull children, hee took vnto him an Italian woman to his concubine, called Thermuſa, whom with other preſents Iulius Cæſar had ſent vnto him. After he had begotten on her his ſon Phraataces, hee was ſo much beſotted with hir beautie, that he tooke her to his wife, & held her in high eſtimation. She that might perſwade him vnto all that whatſoeuer ſhe liſted, enforced herſelfe to the vttermoſt to make her ſon king of Parthia: and ſeeing that ſhe might not attaine thereunto, except ſhee had firſt found out the C meanes to deliuer her ſelfe of Phraates lawfull children, ſhee perſwaded him to ſende them hoſtages to Rome. In a word, they were preſently ſent away, becauſe Phraates in no ſort had the power to contradict Thermuſas will, and onely Phraataces was brought vp in the affairs of eſtate; who thinking the time too tedious and long if he ſhould expect the kingdome whilſt his father were dead, conſpired againſt him by the inſtigation and furtherance of his mother, with whom (as it is thought) he committed inceſt. In effect, being equally attainted of theſe two hainous crimes, both for the murther of his father, as his inceſt committed with his mother, he was generally hated by his ſubiects, who rebelled againſt him before ſuch time as he was ſettled in his kingdom. By this meanes was his fortune ouerthrowen, and he died. The noble men among the Parthians perceiuing, that it was impoſſible for them to maintaine their policy without a king, and that their king ought lineally to deſcend of the race of the Arſacians (becauſe by cuſ-D tome they might not chooſe any out of another ſtock (& ſuppoſing that their ordinances had too much already bin broken, & that it would redound to their great diſhonour if the kingdom ſhold be continued in the hands of ſuch a man, who was deſcended from an Italian concubine, they ſent Embaſſadors to require Herod to come and bee their king, who otherwiſe was in hatred with all the people, and accuſed of extream cruelty. In a word, he was an vnſociable man, & extreamly cholericke, notwithſtanding he were of the bloud of the Arſacides: they therefore flocked about him, and killed him at a banquet made at a certaine ſacrifice (for the cuſtom of the Parthians was, that euery one bare his weapon) or as the common report was, that he was ſlain at ſuch time as he was a hunting. For this cauſe, they ſent embaſſadors to Rome, requiring that E one of thoſe that were hoſtages there might be their king, and one Vonones was ſent vnto them, who was preferred aboue all his brethren. For hee ſeemed to be capable of that high degree of honour, as to commaund two of the greateſt ſoueraignties that were vnder the ſunne; the one of his owne nation; the other of a forraine dominion. But the Barbarians, who are by nature mutable and moſt impatient of indignitie, ſhortly after repented themſelues: for they diſdained to execute the commaund of a ſlaue; for ſo called they a pledge, ſaying, that the Parthians had not a king giuen them by right of warre, but that which was the moſt outrage that might befall them, by iniury offered them in time of peace. For which cauſe they ſpeedily ſent for Artabanus king of Media, who was of the race of the Arſacides. To this requeſt of theirs hee willingly condeſcended, & came vnto them with his army. And Vonones marched forward to make F head againſt him. At the firſt encountry, although the common ſort among the Parthians fauoured Artabanus; yet was hee ouercome and fled to the mountaines of Media. But not long after, hauing aſſembled a greater army, he once more ſet vpon Vonones and diſcomfited him, at which time Vonones retired himſelf with ſome horſemen of his into Seleucia. But Artabanus hauing made a great ſlaughter of thoſe that fled, and wholly abaſhed the minds of the Barbarians, he retired himſelf to the Citie of Cteſiphon, with thoſe people that accompanied him, and was afterwards made king of Parthia. Vonones arriued in Armenia, and at the firſt ſought to make himſelfe himselfe king ouer that nation, sending to this effect certaine Embassadours to Rome: but Tiberius repulled his suite in respect of his cowardice, but the rather for that Artabanus by an expres Embassage had threatned him with warre. For they of greatest power among the Armenians (who are those that dwell about the floud Niphates) maintained Artabanus title; and Vonones, distitute of all hope to obtaine the kingdome, yeelded himselfe to Syllanus, who was Gouernour of Syria, and in regard that he had bin brought vp at Rome, he was kept in Syria: and Artabanus gaue Armenia to Orodes one of his sons. Antiochus king of the Comagenes dyed also at that time, and there fell a debate betwixt the commons and the nobility; so that both parties sent their Embassadours to Rome. The nobles required that the forme of their gouernment might be changed into diuers signiories; and the people requested that they might be honored by a king, as they had beene accustomed. The Senat decreed that Germanicus should bee sent to settle the affaires in the East, fortune thereby presenting him with the occasion of his ruine. For, at such time as he arriued in the East, and orderly disposed all things, he was poisoned by Pise: whereof he died, as it is declared in another place.

CHAP. IIII.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 6. al chap. 8.

Pilate Gouernour of Iudæa led his army from Cæsarea to Ierusalem, where he wintered them with an intent to bring in Caesars statues, and standards into the City, in contempt of our lawe which forbiddeth vs to make images. For which cause, those Gouernours that were before him, were wont to make their entries into the Citie without such pictures or paintings. Pilate was the first, who vnawares and by night entred Ierusalem, bringing with him his images. Which when the people vnderstood, in great multitudes they resorted to Cæsarea, beseeching him for many dayes, that hee would transport those images into some other place. But when as Pilate denied them to perform their request, because the matter would redound to Caesars dishonour, and the Iewes also ceased not to sollicite him; some fixe dayes after commanding his souldiers to lie in ambush in a readinesse, he sate him downe in the Tribunall within the Hippodrom, making vse of the opportunity of the place, for that it was most fit for a stratagem. There being vrged once more about the same businesse, hee gaue a signe to his souldiers to beset them, threatning them with death, except they would presently giue ouer their suite, and repaire euery one of them with all speed to their owne houses. But they prostrating themselues vpon the earth, and offering their naked throats, tolde him that they rather desired to die, then to see their lawes violated, which were with so great iudgement and reason proposed vnto them. Pilate amazed at the confidence they shewed in the conseruation of their laws, sodainly caused Caesars images to be transported out of Ierusalem into Cæsarea, and out of the sacred treasury he made certaine conduits of water, that had their fountaine heads more then two hundreth stades off. But the people took no pleasure in those conduites, & diuers thousands of men assembled themselues exclaiming against Pilate, endeuouring thereby to make him giue ouer his enterprise. Some of them also vttered diuers iniurious speeches against him, as it ordinarily falleth out amongst an vnbridled multitude. But he causing them to be hemmed in by a great number of his souldiers, attired in a popular habite, as soone as they began to exclaime against him, gaue a signe to his souldiers: they as it was before time commanded them, made vse of their maces; and without distinction either of the persons or the offenders, fell on all those whom they had encompassed; and so vnmercifully laide on them, who were naked and disarmed, that some of them were slaine, othersome grieuously hurt: and after this manner was the tumult and sedition appeased.

At that time was IESVS, a wise man, if it be lawfull to call him a man. For he was the performer of diuers admirable works, & the instructer of those who willingly entertaine the truth: and he drew vnto him diuers Iewes and Greeks to be his followers. This was CHRIST, who being accused by the princes of our nation before Pilate, and afterwards condemned to the crosse by him; yet did not those who followed him from the beginning, forbeare to loue him for the ignominie of his death. For he appeared vnto them aliue the third day after, according as the diuine Prophets had before testified the same, and diuers other wonderfull things of him: and from that time forward the race of the Christians, who haue deriued their name from him, hath neuer ceased.

At that time also there fell out another accident, which very sore troubled the Iewes, and in the

A the temple of Iſis at Rome there were many ſhameful acts committed. But I will firſt of all recount the accident in the Temple of Iſis: and then will I declare that which befell the Iewes. There was in Rome a Lady called Paulina, renowmed both for the nobility of her houſe, as alſo thorow her ſtudy and exerciſe in vertue. Beſides this, ſhee was verie rich, and with her riches beautifull, and in her flowring yeeres; and notwithſtanding a verie mirrour of chaſtitie. Shee was married to a certaine noble man called Saturnine, that equald her in all thoſe her excellent perfections. A certain young man called Decius Mundus, one of the knights of greateſt account at that time, fell in loue with her. But ſhe was of that diſpoſition, that it was impoſſible for him to corrupt her by preſents: And the more ſhe refuſed thoſe infinite preſents which he ſent vnto her, the more was Mundus heart inflamed with ardent affection; ſo that to enioy her but onely
B one night, he offered her two hundred thouſand drachmes, amounting in our engliſh money to ſome ſixe thouſand pound; yet for all this he could not ouercome her. For which cauſe being vnable to indure this his vnfortunate loue, he thought beſt to pine himſelf away for want of ſuſtenance, thereby to deliuer himſelfe from the tyranny of that paſſion, wherewith he was afflicted: Finally, that he confidently reſolued, he conſtantly put in execution. Now there was a certaine freewoman that belonged to Mundus father, whoſe name was Ide, expert in all ſorts of ſubtilties, who being ſore aggrieued to behold the yong mans reſolution, whom ſhe ſaw wholly addicted to a deſperate death, ſhe addreſſed her ſelf vnto him, and encouraged him with hope, promiſing him to bring him to Paulinas ſpeech, by the meanes of a certaine bribe which ſhe intended to offer. He reioicing very much at her motion, demanded what ſumme would ſerue her:
C who requiring nothing more then fifty thouſand drachmes to obtaine Paulina, he furniſhed her preſently. When as by this means ſhe had quickned the young mans ſpirit, and receiued all that which ſhe demanded, ſhe ſhaped not the ſame courſe which others had kept that had the ſolicitation of the matter before, ſeeing ſhe ſaw that mony would not tempt her; but knowing that ſhe was deeply deuoted to the ſeruice of Iſis, ſhe practiced this ſubtill and vnexpected policy. She addreſſed her ſelfe to certaine prieſts of the temple, and vpon great hopes, and offer of greater preſents, and paying them downe vpon the preſent, twenty & fiue thouſand drachmes, and promiſing them asmuch more vpon the performance of the bargaine, ſhe diſcloſed vnto them the paſſionate loue which the young man bare vnto Paulina, exhorting them to work ſo wiſely that he might enioy her. They bewitched with this huge preſent they had, and hoped to receiue, promiſed her to work the feat. Whereupon, the eldeſt among them reſorted to Paulina, and ha-D uing free acceſſe vnto her preſence, he required that he might haue conference with her in ſecret: which when he had obtained, he told her that he was ſent vnto her by God Anubis, in that the God was ſurpriſed with her loue, and deſired that ſhe would come vnto him. Paulina, tooke great pleaſure in this his diſcourſe, and tolde her familiars how ſhe had been honoured with the amorous ſolicitation of a God, and certified her husband how Anubis would banquet and lie with her. Whereunto he conſented, knowing how great his wiues chaſtitie was. She therefore repaired to the temple: & after ſhe had ſupt, and the time was come vvherein ſhe was vſually accuſtomed to lay her downe to reſt, and the gates were lockt vp by the prieſt that were therein, and the lights likewiſe were taken away; Mundus, who was hidden within, failed not to accoſt
E her: who thinking that it was God Anubis, ſatisfied his deſires all the night long; and in the morning betimes before the prieſts, who were priuie to this trecherie, were ſtirring, he retired himſelfe: Paulina alſo early in the morning repaired to her husband, and certified him how Anubis had appeared vnto her; and boaſting her ſelfe among her familiars what conference hee had vſed with her. But ſome of them beleeued her not, in regard of the manner of their entertainment; the reſt were altogether amazed, ſuppoſing thoſe things to be no waies incredible, at ſuch time as they bethought themſelues of the Ladies chaſtitie. Some three dayes after this act was committed, Mundus meeting with Paulina, ſaid vnto her: You haue ſaued mee two hundreth thouſand drachmes, wherewith you might haue augmented your treaſure, and this notwithſtanding you haue not failed to ſatisfie my requeſt: neither am I greeued that you haue
F contemned mee vnder the name of Mundus, ſince that vndertaking Anubis name I haue accompliſhed my deſire, and this ſaid hee departed. But ſhe preſently amated with the mans audacious impudence, tore her garments, and hauing told her husband of all this ſubtill circumuention, ſhe requeſted earneſtly his aſſiſtance, and that he would not forſake her in the proſecution of her reuenge: who preſently certified the Emperour of each particular thereof. Now when Tiberius had diligently vnderſtood, how all things had happened, by the inquiſition and examination of the Prieſts, he condemned them and Ida, who had beene the inuenter and complotter of this.

this treason against Paulina, to be hangd: he pulled downe the temple also, and cast Anubis statue into Tyber, and banished Mundus; supposing that he ought not to be more grieuously punished, consydering that the fault which was committed by him, proceeded from extreame loue. Behold here the insolence committed in the temple of Isis, by the priest that appertained to that temple. Now intend I to declare that which hapned to the Iews that were at that time in Rome, according as heretofore I both purposed and promised. G

CHAP. V.

Of that which befell the Iewes that were at Rome in Pilates time.

Fuluia Saturnines wife deliuereth gold and purple to foure Iewes to be sent to the temple in Ierusalem, they conuert it to their own vses, which when Tiberius knew he cõmanded all the Iewes to be thrust out of Rome.

THere was a certaine Iewe, that hauing beene accused for the breach of the lawes of his countrey, and fearing to be punished for the same, fled from thence, being without respect, a man of a most mischieuous behauiour. He dwelling at that time in Rome, professed himselfe to be an expounder of Moses lawe, and drawing to him three other no lesse reprobates then himselfe, he followed his ordinary profession. Fuluia a Lady of much honor became their scholler; and had embraced the religion of the Iewes, whom they had perswaded to send certain purple and gold to the temple of Ierusalem: which after they had receiued at her hands, they conuerted it to their owne vse, as before that time they had determined to doe. Tiberius, who was informed hereof by Saturnine his familiar friend, and Fuluias husband, who had discouered the same vnto him, commanded all Iewes whatsoeuer to depart out of Rome. Of these the Consuls chose out & enrouled to the number of foure thousand men, whom they sent into Sardinia: and punished diuers of them that refused to beare armes, for feare they should transgresse the ordinances of their countrey. So that by reason of the loose behauiour of foure wicked persons, all those of our nation were driuen out of the City of Rome. H I

Neither was the nation of the Samaritanes exempt from this trouble: for a certaine subtill companion, who sought by all the means he might to incroche vpon the peoples fauour, perswaded them to withdraw themselues with him to the mount Garizim (which they supposed to be the holiest amongst all their mountaines) in which place, he auowed he would shew them the sacred Vessells buried in a certaine place, where Moses had laid them: and at that time they being gathered together in armes, by his perswasion encamped themselues in a borough called, Tirathaba, where they entertained those that repaired thither to adioin themselues with them, to the end they might ascend the mountaine with the greater companie. But Pilate preuented them, and got vp before them with his horsemen and footmen: who charging those that were assembled in the borough, put them to flight; and slaying some, and putting the rest to flight, led away a great number of them prisoners with him. Pilate executed the chiefest ring-leaders amongst them, and those also of greatest force amongst the fugitiues. The tumult of these Iews being published abroad, and their misfortune made knowne, the Senate of Samaria addressed themselues to Vitellius who had bin Consul, and who at that time gouerned Syria, before whom they accused Pilate for the murther of those whom he had slaine, saying, that they assembled not in Tirathaba to rebell against the Romans, but to wartantize themselues against Pilates tyranny. Whereupon Vitellius sent Marcellus his friend, to take charge of Iudæa, commanding Pilate to returne to Rome, and to satisfie the Emperor in those things wherof the people had accused him. Hereupon Pilate, after he had soiourned ten yeers in Iewry, repaired to Rome, hauing no means to contradict that commandement that Vitellius had giuen him. But before hee arriued there Tiberius was departed and dead. K L

AS soone as Vitellius came into Iudæa, he went vp to Ierusalem and celebrated there the feast of the passeouer, and after he had been magnificently entertained in that place, he forgaue the Citizens the tribute of all those fruits which were sold. He deliuered them also the ornaments of the high priests, with all the rest of the priestly furniture within the temple, committing the charge thereof vnto the priests, according as in times past they had the same. But at that time they were laid vp in the castle of Antonia for this cause which followeth. Hircanus the high priest the first of that name (for diuers haue been so called) hauing builded a tower neere vnto the temple, did for the most part make his residence therein, and there kept his M

His ſonne and his ſonnes ſonnes entertained the ſame cuſtome, till ſuch time as Herod being exalted to the kingdom, and ſeeing this tower to be ſtrongly ſited, builded the ſame moſt magnificently, and called it Antonia, in honor of Antony his great friend. And hauing found theſe veſtments in that place, he retained them with him, aſſuring himſelfe, the people would attempt nothing againſt him. Archelaus his ſonne and ſucceſſor in the kingdom, kept the ſame courſe that Herod had done. But after that the Romans had obtained the ſouerainty thereof, they kept the high Prieſts ornaments in their hands, and reſerued them in a place builded for the purpoſe, vnder the ſeale of the Prieſts: and the Prefect of B thoſe that kept the ſacred treaſure, lighted the lampe euery day in that place. This euery ſeuenth day before the feaſt, doth the Prefect deliuer into the high Prieſts hands, and after it was purified hee put it on to doe diuine ſeruice, and the next day after the feaſt he returneth it againe to the ſame place where it was kept before: which cuſtome was obſerued thrice euery yeare in the time of a faſt. But Vitellius returned thoſe ornaments into the hands of the Prieſts, according to the ancient orders, leauing them to be vſed at ſuch time as need required, commanding the Prefect to trouble himſelfe no more about the place where they ſhould be kept. After hee had done this fauour to the nation of the Iewes, hee depoſed the high Prieſt Ioſeph ſurnamed Caiapas, and aduanced Ionathan the ſonne of Ananus to that dignity, and afterwards returned to Antioch.

Vitellius aduanced Ionathan the ſon of Ananito the prieſthood & degradeth Ioſeph ſurnamed Caiaphas

C At that time he receiued letters from Tiberius, by which hee commanded him to capitulate and conclude a friendſhippe with Artabanus the King of the Parthians (whoſe hatred hee ſuſpected, and feared, leaſt being ſeized of Armenia, hee ſhould worke further diſpleaſure to the ſtate of Rome) willing him to aſſure the league by hoſtages, and namely with Artabanus ſonne. After Tiberius had written theſe letters aboue mentioned vnto Vitellius, he perſwaded the Kings of Iberia and Alania by great ſtore of money, that with all expedition they ſhoud make warre againſt Artabanus. But the Iberians would not bre drawen thereunto, yet ſuffered they the Alaines to march through their countrey, and opened them their gates of the mount Caſpius, to giue them paſſage to inuade Artabanus. Thus once more was Armenia conquered, and the D countrey of the Parthians was filled with warre, whereby the chiefeſt among them were ſlaine, and all their eſtate was ſpoyled and diſordered. The Kings ſonne alſo was ſlaine in thoſe conflicts, with diuers thouſands of his men of warre. Moreouer, Vitellius hauing ſent money to a certaine kinſman and friend of Artabanus, pretended to corrupt him to make Artabanus away. But Artabanus perceiuing the plot that was intended againſt him, and ſeeing that hee could not eſcape, becauſe it was attempted by a great number of the beſt accounted nobles within his court, ceaſed to paſſe any further: and ſeeing himſelfe moſt apparantly inuironed, and thinking that vnder colour of friendſhippe he was fraudulently betrayed, he thought it better to retire himſelfe into the prouinces of the higher countrie, and there to ſaue himſelfe, rather then to put himſelfe in hazard, and reſort vnto them who had already betrayed and forſaken him. Arriuing in that place hee aſſembled a great number of ſouldiers of the countries of Danes, and Swethi-
E ans: and hauing fought againſt them who oppoſed themſelues againſt him, hee recouered his eſtate. When Tiberius had tydings hereof, he wrought the meanes to draw Artabanus into friendſhip with him: which when Artabanus had notice of, hee willingly admitted; ſo that Artabanus and Vitellius met together neere Euphrates, and by the meanes of a bridge that was builded vpon the riuer they debated the matter together, being each of them attended by their guards. After that they had concluded the peace, Herod the Tetrarch feaſted them in a very magnificent Pauillion, erected in the middeſt of the ſtoud, not without his great coſt. And not long after, Vitellius ſent Darius, Artabanus ſonne in hoſtage to Rome, with diuers preſents; amongſt which there was a man ſeauen cubits high, a Iew borne, who was named Eleazar, who was called a Gyant by reaſon of his greatneſſe. That done, Vitellius returned to Antioch, and Artabanus to Ba-
F bylon. But Herod deſirous to be the firſt who ſhould aduertiſe Caſar of the receite of theſe hoſtages, ſent expreſſe meſſengers with letters, by which hee fully ſatisfied him of all that which had happened, omitting nothing for the Conſull to certifie: ſo that after Vitellius letters were brought vnto him, and that Caſar had already certified him of the true information that Herod had giuen him, Vitellius was ſore troubled: and ſuſpecting leaſt hee had receiued a greater iniury then the matter made ſhew for; hee conceiued in his heart a ſecret deſpight, which continued vntill ſuch time as Tiberius was dead, and Caius obtained the Empire.

At that time also died Philip Herods brother, in the twentith yeare of Tiberius raigne, after hee G had raigned himselfe for the space of seuen and thirty yeeres, in Trachonitis, Gaulonitis, and Bathanæa. During all the time of his gouernement, hee behaued himselfe very peaceably, and farre from businesse. For he made his ordinary abode within his owne dominion. Hee walked being accompanied with a small number of his chosen seruants; and had that seat carried after him wherein he was accustomed to sit and doe Iustice: and therein sate he to the end that if any one presented himselfe, and required his assistance, hee might without delay doe him right. For vpon the first motion the seat was placed in that part wherein the plaintiffe met him; and being seated therein, he examined the cause, punishing those that were guilty, and absoluing the innocent. He died in Iuliade, and was buried in the sepulcher which he himselfe had caused to be built, and his obsequies were performed with great solemnity and maiesty. And for that hee H left no heires males behinde him, Tiberius seized his estate, which hee annexed to the gouernement of Syria, ordaining that the tributs that were gathered in his Tetrarchy, should bee kept within the bounds of the same region.

CHAP. VII.

The warre of Herod the Tetrarch against King Aretas, and his ouerthrow.

Herod the Tetrarch putteth away Aretas daughter and marrieth Herodias his brother Herods wife.

MEeane while Aretas King of Arabia Petræa, and Herod fell at strife, the one with the I other, for this cause that ensueth. Herod the Tetrarch married Aretas daughter, with whom hee had liued maried a very long time. Afterwards taking his iourney towards Rome, hee lodged with Herod his halfe brother by the father side (for Herod was the son of Simons daughter, which Simon was the high Priest) and there being surprised with the loue of Herodias his brothers wife, which was the daughter of Aristobulus their brother, and sister to the great Agrippa, hee was so bold as to offer her some speech of mariage: which when she had accepted, the accords were made betweene them, that at such time as hee should returne from Rome, hee should displace her, and lead her away with him, with conditions that he should banish Aretas daughter far from him. After he had ratified those couenants, he made his voiage to Rome, from whence he no sooner returned & performed that for which K he went, but his wife (who had some priuy notice of the conuentions which were made betwixt him and Herodias) before he suspected that shee knew thereof, required him to send her to the castle of Macheron, which was the frontire towne betwixt Herods and Aretas countries, without certifying him any waies of her intent. Herod without suspect easily condescended vnto her request, thinking shee was ignorant of his drift: but she long before that time had taken order with the Gouernour of Macheron (which at that time was vnder her fathers gouernement) to prepare al things for her iourny, where being arriued she speedily posted into Arabia, vnder the conuoy of those Gouernours, who receiued & conducted her the one after the other. As soone as she arriued in her fathers court, she incontinently certified him of Herods resolution, whence arose the beginning of this discord betwixt them. As soone as therefore they had both of them L assembled their armies vpon the confines of the country of Gamalite, they fought together vnder the conduct of the two Generals, to whom they had committed their armies. In this battell Herods army was wholly discomfited thorow the treason that was complotted against him by certaine banished men of Philips Tetrarchy, which were in pay with Herod. Tiberius was certified of all this by those letters which Herod had written vnto him: and being sore displeased with Aretas for his proud attempt, he commanded Vitellius to make warre against him, willing him that if he could take him aliue he should send him bound vnto him: but if dead, hee should send him his head. Such was the commission that Tiberius sent to the Gouernour of Syria.

Tiberius commandeth Vitellius to make warre against Aretas.

Diuers Iewes were of the opinion, that Herods army was ouerthrowne by the iust vengeance of God, who punished him most iustly, because of the execution which he caused to be done on M Iohn surnamed Baptist: For hee had done this man to death, who was replenished with all vertue, and who exhorted the Iewes to addict themselues thereto, and to execute iustice towardes men, and piety towardes God: exhorting them to bee baptized, and telling them that baptisme should at that time be agreeable vnto God, if they should renounce not onely their sinnes, but if to the purity of their bodies they should annex the cleanness of their soules repurified by iustice. And whereas it came to passe that diuers flocked and followed him to hear his doctrine,

A Herod feared leaſt his ſubiects allured by his doctrine and perſwaſions ſhould be drawen to reuolt. For it ſeemed that they would ſubſcribe in all things to his aduice; hee therefore thought it better to preuent a miſchiefe by putting him to death, then to expect ſome ſudden commotion, which he might afterwards repent. Vpon this ſuſpicion Herod cauſed him to be bound, and ſent to the caſtle of Macheron, whereof we haue ſpoken heretofore, and there was hee put to death. The Iewes were of opinion that in reuenge of this ſo grieuous a ſin, Herods army, againſt whom God was diſpleaſed, had been ſubiect to their vtter ruine and ouerthrow. But Vitellius being addreſſed to make warre againſt Aretas, gathered together two legions, and all thoſe horſe or foot that he could aſſemble amongſt thoſe Kings, who were the Romans allies, and marching towards Petra he ſtayed at Ptolemais, becauſe he pretended to paſſe by Iudæa. Which when the
B principall nobles amongſt the Iewes had notice of, they went out to meet him, beſeeching him that he would not paſſe thorw their countrey, becauſe it was a cuſtome amongſt them not to ſee any images borne, ſuch as he had of diuers colours in his army. Whereunto hee condeſcended, and hauing changed his purpoſe, hee cauſed his army to march through the great Plaine: as for himſelfe he came to Ieruſalem accompanied with Herod the Tetrarch and his friends, to offer ſacrifice to God vpon the next feſtiual day, where he was moſt magnificently receiued by al the people of the Iewes. There ſoiourned hee for the ſpace of three dayes, during which time hee depoſed Ionathan from the high prieſthood, and inueſted Theophilus his brother. The fourth day letters came vnto him that aduertiſed him of Tiberius death, for which cauſe he commanded the oath of fidelity ſhould be miniſtred to the people, in the new Emperour Caius behalfe. Caius Caligula ſucceedeth after Tiberius.

It is ſaid, that Aretas hearing newes of Vitellius expedition or voiage, & after he had taken coũſell of the Augurs, ſayd, that the army ſhould not finde engines to pearce as farre as Petra, becauſe the chieftaine thereof, or he that had the command of the expedition, or he that obayed his ordinance in conducting the ſame, or he againſt whom the army was conducted, ſhould die. Vitellius therefore retyred himſelfe to Antioch. A yeare before the death of Tiberius, Agrippa Ariſtobulus ſonne came to Rome, to intreate with the Emperour about certaine affaires, according to the power which hee ſhould obtaine at his hands. But before I ſpeake any thing hereof,
D I will relate Herods progeny, both for that it is pertinent to this preſent narration, as alſo that the greatneſſe of Gods prouidence may appeare, to the end that a man may knowe that neither the number of children, nor any other humane force whatſoeuer it be, can bee auaileable without the feare of God; conſidering that within the ſpace of one hundreth years or ſomewhat leſſe, it ſo fell out, that all Herods line, which was very populous and fruitfull, was extinguiſhed, a very few excepted. Whereby we are giuen to vnderſtand, what the miſery of mankinde is, and learn to moderate our owne ſelues. It is alſo expedient to ſpeake ſomething of Agrippa, who amongſt al other deſerueth admiration, in that being a man wholly drowned in obſcurity & baſe in birth, hee was exalted to ſuch greatneſſe, as no one of thoſe that knew him, would euer haue thought his fortune ſhould haue ſuch ſucceſſe and mightineſs. And although heretofore I haue ſpoken ſomewhat of this matter, yet it is requiſite that I ſpeake ſomething more expreſly therof
E in this place. Herod the great had two daughters borne by Mariamme Hircanus daughter. The one of them which was called Salampſo, was maried by Herod to Phaſaelus the ſonne of Phaſaelus, who was Herods brother. The other called Cypros was eſpouſed to Antipater her Couſin, who was Salomes ſonne, who was Herods ſiſter. Phaſaelus had fiue children by Salampſo: Three ſons, Antipater, Herod, and Alexander; and two daughters, Alexandra and Cypros, whom Agrippa the ſonne of Ariſtobulus married, and Alexandra was married to Timæus of Cyprus, who was a man of great dignity, and with whom ſhe died without iſſue. Cypros had by Agrippa her husband two ſonnes and three daughters: Bernice, Mariamme, and Druſilla: their two ſonnes were called Agrippa and Druſus. Druſus died very young: but Agrippa was brought vp by his grandfather amongſt his other brethren, Herod, Ariſtobulus and Bernice. Theſe were Herods children, ſonne
F vnto him who was ſurnamed the great; Bernice was Coſtobarus daughter, begotten on Salome Herods ſiſter: Ariſtobulus died leauing his children ynder age, vnder his fathers charge with Alexander his brother, as we haue already recounted. Theſe attaining their full age were in this ſort married: Herod brother to Agrippa was matched with Mariamme Olympias daughter, who was Herod the Great his daughter, and of Ioſeph Herods brother: By her hee had his ſonne Ariſtobulus: Ariſtobulus Agrippas third brother married Iotape the daughter of Sampſigeram King of the Emeſenians. They had a daughter which in like ſort was called Iotape, which was deafe.

These were the children begotten by Herods three sonnes. But Herodias their sister maried Herod the sonne of Herod the Great, whom hee begot on Mariamme the daughter of Simon the high Priest, by whom Salome was begotten. After her birth, Herodias in contempt of the lawes of the countrey, maried herselfe with Herod her husbands brother begotten of the same father, being separated from him during his life time, who was Tetrarch of Galilee. His daughter Salome was maried to Philip the Tetrarch of Trachonitis Herods sonne: who dying without children, Aristobulus married her, who was Herods sonne and Agrippas brother. They had three sonnes, Herod, Agrippa and Aristobulus. See heere the posterity of Phasaelus and Salampsion. Antipater by Cypros had a daughter that in like sort was called Cypros, which was married to Alexas Selcius the sonne of Alexas, of whom hee begat a daughter called likewise Cypros. As for Herod and Alexander, who (as I sayd) were Antipaters brothers, they died without issue. Alexander Herods sonne, who was slaine by his father, begate Alexander and Tigranes on the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. Tigranes being King of Armenia died without issue, after hee had beene accused at Rome. Alexander had a sonne called Tigranes, after his brothers name, who was sent by Nero to raigne in Armenia, who had a sonne called Alexander, who married Iotape the daughter of Antiochus King of Comagena. This Alexander by Vespasian was elected King in Lesis a Citie of Cilicia. As soone as Alexanders posterity began to multiply, they fell from their countrey religion to followe the customes of the Greekes. All the rest of King Herods daughters died without issue. Hauing after this manner reckoned vp Herods posterity, which continued vntill such time as Agrippa the great began to raigne; it remaineth at this time to declare what aduentures befell this Agrippa, and how hee escaping his dangers obtained at last so great power and diguity.

CHAP. VIII.

Agrippas voyage to Tiberius, where he is accused and shut in prison, and is deliuered after Tiberius death by Caius his successor.

Agrippa liuing at Rome thorow his lauish liberality groweth into necesity.

SOme little time before the death of King Herod, Agrippa conuersing at Rome, grew into great familiarity and acquaintance with Drusus, Tiberius the Emperours son, and was beloued by Antonia the wife of Drusus the elder, by the means of his mother Berenice, whom Antonia held in great estimation, and to whom shee had recommended her son. And whereas by nature he was of a liberall & high spirit, as long as his mother liued hee would not discouer his intent, least hee should prouoke her displeasure against him. But incontinently after Berenice was dead, and hee became Lord of himselfe, partly by his daily and bountifull entertainement and liuing, partly by his immoderate liberalities, but especially by his lauish prodigality towardes Cæsars freemen, whose fauour hee hunted after, hee was brought into extreame pouerty, and could no more liue at Rome; the rather for that Tiberius hauing lost his sonne, forbad his friends to come into his sight, for feare least their presence should refresh and encrease the sorrowe hee conceiued for the losse of his sonne. For these causes hee returned backe into Iudæa, hauing but badly ordered his estate, spent his money, and left himselfe no meanes to satisfie his importunate and many creditours. For which cause incertaine how to dispose himselfe, and ashamed of his present estate, he withdrew himselfe into a Castle called Malatha in Idumæa, bethinking himselfe after some sort to cut off his miserable dayes. Which purpose of his, when Cypros his wife perceiued, shee endeuoured by all meanes to preuent his resolution: shee wrote also to his sister Herodias, who was married to Herod the Tetrarch, certifying her both what Agrippa had decreed, as also by what necessity he was enforced thereunto: and shee exhorted her, that in regard of affinity she would assist him, and imitate her in this, who, as much as in her lay, relieued his misery, although her fortunes were farre weaker then hers. Being therefore sent for by his sister and wife, hee was commaunded to dwell in Tiberias, and had a certaine summe of money assigned him for his maintenance, and for his greater honour was appointed Magistrate of that Citie. Yet did not Herod continue long time in that minde, although by the meanes hee had giuen him, hee had not satisfied his kinsmans necessities. For being in the Citie of Tyre in a certaine company, where he dranke immoderately, Agrippa esteemed it for an extreame iniury that Herod had vpbraided him with his pouerty, and hit him in the teeth that hee maintained him at his charge. For which cause he withdrew himselfe to Flaccus, who had sometimes been Con-

A sol at Rome, and for the present was President of Syria, with whom at Rome he had fallen into familiarity, who entertained by him lived with him, who long before that time had entertained Aristobulus, who though Agrippas brother, yet was he his enemy; yet notwithstanding this dissension betweene them, Flaccus entertained them both with equall fauour. But Aristobulus remitted nothing of his hatred hee bare his brother, neither euer rested hee before he had drawn Flaccus into dislike with his brother, vpon this occasion. The inhabitants of Damasco, contending with the Sidonians about their demaines, and being to debate their cause before Flaccus, knowing what interest Agrippa had in him, they besought him that he would further their cause, promising him a great summe of money: whereupon he addressed himselfe in what he could to further those of Damasco. But Aristobulus, who had an inkling of this conclusion and promise, B accused his brother to Flaccus: and after inquisition was made, and hee found guilty of the fact, Agrippa grew out of the Presidents fauour, and falling againe into extreame pouerty, he came to Ptolemais, and for that he had no means of maintenance, he determined to saile into Italy. And for that he wanted money, he commanded Marsyas his free-man, that by all means whatsoeuer he should seek to take vp money vpon interest. He spake vnto Protus (who was Agrippas mothers free-man, who by the testament of his deceased Mistris was left vnto Antonias protection) that vpon his Masters bill and promise, he would lend him some money. But hee alleaging that Agrippa before that time ought him mony, extorted from Marsyas a bill of his hand, for twenty thousand Attique drachmes, deducting out of that sum two thousand and fiue hundreth, which Marsyas took for himselfe: which he might the more easily do, for that Agrippa could not otherC wise chuse. Hauing therefore receiued this money, hee went to Anthedon, where getting shipping he prepared himselfe for the iourney.

But when Herennius Capito, who was treasurer of Iamnia, vnderstood of his being there, hee sent his souldiers vnto him, to exact three hundreth thousand siluer drachmes at his hands, for which he stood indebted to Cæsars Treasurer during his being at Rome, by which means he was enforced to stay. Whereupon he made a shew that he would obey their demande; but as soone as it was night, hee caused the cables of the ship to be cut, and cast off, and sailed to Alexandria: there requested he Alexander Alabarches to lend him two hundreth thousand drachmes in siluer. But he protested that he would trust him with nothing. But admiring Cypras his wiues constant D loue towards her husband, and her many other vertues, hee vpon her promise accorded to doe him kindnesse: whereupon in present money hee payed him fiue talents in Alexandria, and promised to deliuer him the rest of the money at Puteol, fearing Agrippas vnthriftinesse. Thus Cypros hauing furnished her husband for his iourney into Italy, returned her selfe and her children into Iudæa by land. But Agrippa, as soone as he arriued at Puteol, wrote vnto Tiberius Cæsar, who lined at Capreas, signifying vnto him that hee came to doe his duty, beseeching him that hee would grant him free and fauourable accesse. Tiberius with all expedition returned him a very kinde answere, certifying him that he would be very glad to see him safely arriued in Capreas. In a word, as soone as hee was arriued, Cæsar expressed and made it knowen, that his affection was answerable to his letters, and both embraced him and lodged him. The next day Cæsar receiued letters from Herennius Capito, who aduertized him that Agrippa ought three hundreth E thousand drachmes of siluer, which he borrowed and paid not at the time prefixed, and that at such time as the appointed time of payment was come he was fled out of the country, and place of his procuration, and by this occasion had depriued him of the meanes to constraine him to make satisfaction. When Cæsar had read the letters, he was sore displeased, and cõmanded those of his chamber, that they should not admit Agrippa to his presence, vntill such time as hee had discharged that debt.

But he, nothing dismaied at Cæsars displeasure, required Antonia, Germanicus and Claudius mother, who was afterwards Emperour, to lend him the summe of three hundreth thousand drachmes, to the end he might not lose Cæsars friendship. Who remembring her Berenice Agrippas mother, and with what familiarity they had conuersed together, and how Agrippa likewise F had been brought vp with Claudius her sonne, lent him that money: Whereupon he paying the debt, without any contradiction enioyed the Princes fauour, & was so reconciled to Cæsar, that he committed his nephew to Agrippas charge, commanding him to attend him alwaies, whither soeuer he went. Being by this benefit bound and tyed to Antonia, he began to reuerence her nephew Caius, who was gracious in all mens eyes, and honoured in memory of his parents. At that time by chance there was one Allius a Samaritane, Cæsars free-man, of whom hee borrowed ten hundreth thousand drachmes of siluer, and paied Antonia her due, and kept the rest the more honohonourably to attend and wait on Caius. By whom being entertained with most inward familiarity, it hapned one day that riding in the same Coach with him, Agrippa wisht (for they two were alone) that Tiberius might shortly surrender the kingdom and Empire vnto Caius, who was each way more worthy then he. These words of his were ouerheard by the Coachman called Eutychus, who was Agrippas freeman, who for that time spake not a word thereof. But being afterwards accused for stealing Agrippas garment (as he indeed had done) and brought backe againe after he had fled away to Piso (who was the prefect of the citie) he asked him why he fled: who answered, that he had certaine secrets which he desired to reueale vnto Cæsar, that appertained to his profit and safety: for which cause he was sent by him in bonds to Capreas. Tiberius according to his dilatory manner, wherein no King or tyrant euer equalled him, held him prisoner. For neither did he presently admit any Embassadours, neither sent he successors to those, who were gouernours, and prefects of his prouinces, when the former were dead; and no lesse negligent was he in yeelding audience to his prisoners. But when his friends at any time questioned with him, why he vsed these accustomed delayes; he answered them, that he deferred the Embassadors after that sort, for feare least if he should speedily dispatch them, they should instantly returne with new; whereby it should come to passe, that hee should be continually troubled in entertaining and dismissing them.

And as touching his offices, he left them in their hands, to whom he had committed them, in regard of his subiects welfare. For naturally all magistracy is subiect to auarice: but in especiall strangers induce those, who exercise the same to gather, and ingrosse the more instantly, when as the time of their authority is short and of small assurance; whereas if they should continue in the same for a long time, in regard of the gaine they had made, and the much profits they had raised, they would be afterwards lesse greedy to extort further. Now if he should send others to succede them on a sudden, it were impossible for him to content them, notwithstanding their many bribes: whereas in giuing them time to fill their purses, when they had gotten well, they would abate the furious desire of lucre which they affected before. And to this purpose he told them an example of a poore man that was a Lazar, to whose wounds a great number of flies assembled themselues, and couered the same: at sight whereof some by fortune arriuing there, and hauing compassion of his misery, and supposing that the cause why he repulsed them not, proceeded from his disability, approched neere to help him: but he required them to let him alone. Wherupon they demanding the cause wherfore he that was hurt refused to be deliuered from so irksome an euill, he answered them, for that they should do him more wrong, if those flies were driuen away; for that being already full of blood they prick me not (said he) neither suck me so earnestly, but giue me some ease; whereas if new should alight on my wound which were hungry, and should seize my flesh in that desperate estate that I am, they would procure my death. For these causes he said, that seeing his subiects already consumed by so many exactions, he thought it a good policy in him, and a better prouision for them, not to send them new gouernours continually, who might after the manner of flies sucke them to the quick, especially if to their innated couetousnes hee should annex the feare of their sudden displacing. Now to approue that to be true which I haue declared of Tiberius disposition, this action of his may suffice to iustifie me. For hauing beene Emperour, for the space of twenty two yeares, all those gouernours which he sent into Iury were two, namely Gratus and Pilate his successor; neither demeaned he himselfe otherwise towards the rest of his subiects of the Empire.

And as touching his prisoners, the reason why hee delayed so much to giue them audience, was to the end, that they who had been condemned to death, should not speedily be deliuered from those torments, wherewith he threatned them, and which they had deserued by their wickednes. For whilst he kept them in that paine, their mishap increased the more. For this cause Eutychus could not obtaine audience at his hands, but was long time detained prisoner. Afterwards in processe of time, Tiberius transported himselfe from Capreas to Tusculanum, which was distant from Rome some hundreth furlongs. There did Agrippa sollicite Antonia, to cause Eutychus to be called to his answer, as touching the accusation which he pretended against him. Now Antonia was in great fauour with Tiberius, both in regard of the affinity that was betweene them (in that she was Drusus wife, who was Tiberius brother) as in respect of her modesty. For she being young continued in her widowhood, and would not marry with any other, notwithstanding Augustus importuned her to wed; but liued alwaies in honour without blame. Besides that, shee had done Tiberius a great pleasure: for at such time as Seianus his friend, and a man in great account in those daies (by reason he had the gouernment of the army) practised a conspiracy

A racy against him, whereunto diuers of the Senate, and of his freemen, and his men of warre likewise were accessary: yet brought she all their intents to nothing. This attempt had taken a great head, and Seianus had finished his purpose, had not Antonia vsed more aduised courage, then Seianus did in executing his treason. For hauing discouered the danger that threatned Tiberius, she wrote and sent her expresse letters by Pallas one of her trusty seruants vnto him to Capreæ, certifying him in particular the whole processe of the conspiracy. Cæsar hauing true vnderstanding thereof, caused Seianus and his confederats to be executed. Although therfore that before that time he honored Antonia greatly, yet did hee afterwards honour her farre more, in such sort as he trusted her in all things. When as therfore she entreated him to giue Eutychus audience: Tiberius answered, If, said he, Eutychus hath falsely obiected any thing against Agrippa, it sufficeth B that he endure that punishment which I haue enioyned him. But if in the torture hee maintaine that which he hath spoken to be true, it is to be feared least Agrippa intending to punish his freeman, do rather heap the punishment vpon his owne head. When Antonia had reported this answere of his to Agrippa, hee did the more instantly solicite her, requiring her that the matter might be brought to tryall. And for that Agrippa ceased not to importune her, Antonia took the occasion, which was this: Tiberius being after dinner time carryed in his litter, and hauing Caius and Agrippa before him, she walking foot by foot by the litter, besought him to call Eutychus to his tryall: whereunto he replyed: The gods (said he) know that that which I do, I do it not of mine owne wil, but for the necessity I am pressed with vpon your request: and hauing spoken thus, he commanded Macron Seianus successour to bring Eutychus before him: which was performed C with all expedition. Whereupon Tiberius asked him what he had to say against him, who had enfranchised him. My soueraign (said he) Caius that is here present, and Agrippa rode one day together in the same Coach, and I sate at their feet. After diuers discourses held between them, Agrippa began to speake after this manner vnto Caius; O said he, would God the day were come wherein the old man departing out of this world, would make you gouernour thereof: For his son Tiberius would be no hindrance vnto you, for him might you make away. Then should the world be happy, and I likewise haue my share in the felicity. Tiberius esteeming this his accusation to be true, and hauing of long time conceiued a grudge against Agrippa, for that notwithstanding he had commanded him to honor Tiberius, who was his nephew and Drusus son, Agrip- D pa had giuen small regard to his commandement, and had not honored him, but was wholly addicted vnto Caius. For which cause said he to Macron, bind me this fellow. He scarcely vnderstanding that which hee spake, and no waies suspecting that he should giue that commandement in respect of Agrippa, deferred the performance vntill such time as hee might more exactly vnderstand his mind. When as therefore Cæsar turned into the Hippodrome, and by chance met with Agrippa in the teeth: This is he (said he) Macron, whom I haue commanded to be bound, and demanding of him once more by whom he spake: It is Agrippa said he. Then had Agrippa recourse to submissiue and humble prayers, refreshing the memory of his sonne with whom he had been brought vp, and alledging the education he had vsed towards his nephew Tiberius: but he preuailed nothing, but was led away bound in those purple ornaments which he then wore.

At that time it was very hot weather, and being in distresse of wine he was extreamly thirsty, E and distressed, yea more then became one of his quality. Whereupon espying Thaumastus one of Caius seruants, who carried water in a pitcher; he required him to giue him drink: which when he had willingly bestowed on him, he dranke, and afterwards said vnto him. This seruice thou hast done me in giuing me drink, shall do thee good one day. For as soone as I shall escape out of these bonds, it shall not be long before I obtaine thy liberty at Caius hands, for that thou hast not neglected to doe mee seruice in this my imprisonment, as thou hast before time done mee whilest I was in my prosperity and dignity: Neither deceiued hee the mans expectation of his promise, but rewarded and gratified him. For afterwards, when he had obtaind the kingdom, he begged Thaumastus liberty at Caius hands, and made him superintendent of his affaires, and after his decease he gaue order that he should serue in the same place, with his sonne Agrippa and his F daughter Berenice; so that he died very old, and much honored. But this hapned afterward. But at that time Agrippa stood before the place bound with other companions, who were likewise in bonds: and thorough the grief he conceiued, he leaned against a certane tree, on which there sate an owle. One of those prisoners, who was by nation a German, beholding that bird, asked the souldier that was fettred with him, who he was that was apparelled in purple: and vnderstanding that his name was Agrippa, and that he was a Iew, and one of the nobility of that nation; he required the souldier, who to the end to guard him was chained with him, to suffer him to draw

This presage of the Germane seemed so ridiculous to Agrippa, as it afterwards deserued most mighty admiration. But Agrippina being sore grieued at the yong mans calamity, thought it not onely a difficult matter for her to entreat Tiberius for him, but altogether vnprofitable in regard she should be repulsed: yet wrought she so much with Macron, that hee was committed to the custody of such souldiers, who were of more reconciled behauiour, and had a Centurion appointed ouer them that suffered him to vse his daily bathings, and gaue his friends and seruants leaue to visit him, by whose seruice and kindnesse his necessities might be relieued. His friend Silius also was admitted to speake with him, and amongst his free-men Marsyas and Stichus, who K brought him in such meates as hee was delighted withall, and couerings vnder colour to sell them: which by the permission of the souldiers, who had no lesse direction from Macron, they spred by night for him to take his rest vpon. See here the estate wherein Agrippa liued in prison began to conceiue a sinister hope of himselfe, and commanded Euodus, whom hee most honoured amongst all his free-men, to bring him his sonnes, because hee intended to talke with them before he died. But the sooth is, that he had not any children of his own, but had adopted them.

For Drusus, who was his only childe, was already dead, and had left behinde him a sonne called ascribed very much, in remembrance of the vertues of his deceased father; and as touching himselfe, he was of a sweet conuersation, and so modest, that he was familiar and conuersant with all men. Whereby it came to passe, that not onely the people, but the Senate also held him in great estimation, as also all the subiects in euery seuerall Prouince. For they that spake with him were drawne partly by his affability, partly by the fidelity they saw in him: so that when he was dead, all of them mourned, not counterfeitly lamenting his losse, but with vnfained sorrow; for that there was not any one that supposed not his death to be euery mans particular los.

He therfore demeaned himselfe so modestly towards all men, that his sonne after his death was highly aduanced thereby. For among the rest the men of warre made their reckoning, that al- M

After that Tiberius had charged Euodus to bring him the two young men the next morrow by breake of day, he besought the gods of that place to giue him an euident signe whereby hee might know who should succeed him: For although he desired to leaue the Empire to his sons son; yet made he more account of that which God should make manifest vnto him. He there-

And hauing ſettled this thing in his fantaſie, hee ſent vnto his little ſonnes Maſter, charging him to bring him vnto him by breake of day, ſuppoſing that God had ordained that the Empire ſhould bee his: but the matter fell out quite contrary to his expectation. For being in this thought, hee commanded Euodus, that as ſoone as hee might, and as ſoone as the day ſhould ariſe, hee ſhould ſuffer him of the two young Princes to enter in vnto him, who ſhould arriue the firſt. He walking out met with Caius before the chamber doore (for Tiberius was not there, who being ignorant of that which his grandfather thought, was buſie about his breakefaſt) and ſaid vnto him that the Emperour his father called for him, and withall ſuffered him to enter. B gan to conſider vpon the power of God, who depriued him of the means to diſpoſe of the Empire, according as he had determined with himſelfe, for that it lay not in his power: and hee lamented greatly, not ſo much for that hee ſaw his deliberation could not be brought to effect, as for that his ſonne Tiberius was diſtated of the Roman Empire; and beſides that, was in danger of his life. For he made reckoning that they, who were more ſtronger then he, would not ſuffer him to conuerſe among them, and that alliance could not aſſure him his life: for ſometimes for feare, and otherwhiles for hatred, ſome one would accuſe him, that hee went about and buſily ſought to ſeize the Empire; or that he had complotted ſome ſtratageme, leaſt he ſhould loſe the Empire with his life. In a word, Tiberius was very much addicted to Aſtrologicall predictions and natiuities; ſo that the greater part of thoſe things which he executed in all his life time, was

He ſeeing Galba one day comming towards him, ſpake this of him to certaine of his familiars: Behold the man that ſhall be one day honoured with the Roman Empire. And amongſt all the Emperors, he gaue greateſt credit to diuination, for that in certain things he had found the coniectures correſpondent to truth. But at that time he was grieuouſly diſquieted, by reaſon of the misfortune that had hapned; yea he was in ſuch ſort grieued, as if his grandchild had bin already loſt, and he blamed himſelfe for that he had ſought theſe preſages: for that he might haue died without falling into that diſaſter, in being ignorant of that which was to come: wheras now he ſhould die in the knowledge of their miſhaps, whom he loued moſt intirely. Being thus troubled

D to ſee that the ſoueraignty of the Empire ſhould contrary to his intention fall into their hands, who by his will ſhould not enioy the ſame; although it were with hearts griefe and contrary to his will, yet ſpake he to Caius after this manner which enſueth: My ſonne, although that Tiberius be more neerly allied vnto me then you are; yet notwithſtanding both by mine owe aduice, as alſo by the will of the immortall Gods, I commit vnto your hands the Empire of the Romans. I require you therefore that when you ſhall enioy the ſame, you forget not the good will I haue borne towards you, who haue eſtabliſhed you in ſo high and worthy a dignity; and charge you likewiſe that you forget not your Couſin Tiberius; but knowing that by the wil of the gods I am he, who after them am the author of ſo many goods, which haue befallen you, you returne me the like good will & affection: and that you likewiſe take care of Tiberius, by reaſon of your mutuall alliance: for you ought to know that Tiberius ſerueth you for a bulwarke to maintaine your

Furthermore, the gods do neuer leaue them vnpuniſhed, who attempt or act any thing againſt the lawes of conſanguinity. Theſe were the laſt words which Tiberius ſpake to Caius, who promiſed him to performe all that which he required, notwithſtanding he meant nothing leſſe. For incontinently after he was inſtalled in the Empire, he cauſed Tiberius to be made away, bethinking him of thoſe diuinations: as alſo the ſame Caius died anon after by a conſpiracy that was practized againſt him. When that Tiberius had declared Caius his ſucceſſor in the Empire, he liued not many dayes after, and died after he had gouerned twenty two years, fiue moneths, and three daies. Thus Caius was the fourth Emperour.

For only Tiberius had done much miſchiefe to the noble families in Rome, being of himſelfe a man cholericke, implacable towards all men without any occaſion, hauing a naturall inclination ſo cruel, that the eaſieſt pain wherunto he adiudged thoſe whome he condemned, was death: notwithwanding therfore that G each man tooke pleaſure to heare the newes, yet did each one conceale it, vntil ſuch time as they might be more fully aſſured; thorow the feare of thoſe miſeries they foreſawe, if the matter ſhould fall out otherwaies. But Marſyas Agrippas free-man, hauing certaine notice of Tiberius death, ranne ſpeedily to comfort his Maſter Agrippa, with theſe good newes, and meeting with him as he came out of the Bath, he made a ſigne vnto him, and told him, in the Hebrew tongue, the Lion was dead. Agrippa conceiuing that which he meant, was raviſhed with ioy, and ſaid vnto him: I will requite thee for all thoſe benefits I haue receiued at thy hands, and eſpecially for this good newes; prouided that it prooue true. The Centurion, who had the keeping of Agrippa, conſidering what expedition Marſyas had vſed in running, and the pleaſure that Agrippa had conceiued in his report, he began to ſuſpect ſome alteration, and asked them what had hapned: H and wheras they delaied to giue him an anſwer, he importuned him the more. Whereupon Agrippa told him plainely what he had heard, in that he had growne already into inward familiarity with him. The Centurion reioiced at this newes, as well as Agrippa, hoping to ſpeed the better therby, and made Agrippa good cheer: but whileſt they were in the midſt of their banquetting, and drunk freely; there came one vnto them, who told them that Tiberius was aliue, and that within few daies he would come to Rome. The Centurion troubled with this newes, for that he had committed a capitall crime in eating in the company of a priſoner, vpon the newes of Cæſars death, and by reioycing with him, he draue Agrippa out of the place where hee ſate, and reprochfully ſaid vnto him: Thinkeſt thou (ſaid he) that I know not how falſely thou ſpreadeſt rumor of Cæſars death? yes, be aſſured thou ſhalt anſwer thy lie with the loſſe of thy head. This I ſaid, he cauſed Agrippa to be bound, whom before time he had ſuffered to go at liberty; and ſhut him vp in more cloſe priſon, then he had been before: ſo that Agrippa was all that night long in this extreame miſery. The next day the rumour was ſpread thorow the whole City, that confirmed Tiberius death, and at that time euery one boldly proteſted it. There were ſome alſo, who offered ſacrifices for this cauſe, and there came letters alſo from Caius, which were addreſſed to the Senate, by which he certified them that Tiberius was dead, & how the Empire was cõmitted to his hands. He wrote another alſo to Piſo, who had the guard of the City, containing the like report: and beſides that commanding him to transferre Agrippa from the company of thoſe ſoldiers, by whom he was kept, to the ſame place where he was lodged before; ſo that from that time forwards, he waxed confident. For although he was as yet a priſoner, yet liued hee at his K owne diſcretion. Caius arriuing in Rome, brought with him Tiberius body, which hee burned moſt magnificently, according to the cuſtome of the countrey. And although hee were very willing to deliuer Agrippa the ſame day; yet was he diſſwaded from the ſame by Antonia, not for any ill will ſhe bare the priſoner, but in regard of Caius honour, leaſt thereby hee ſhould ſhew himſelfe to be glad of Tiberius death, in ſetting him at liberty ſo ſpeedily, whom hee had committed to priſon. When as therfore ſome few daies were ouer paſt, he ſent for him to his houſe, and cauſed him to be powld, and his garments changed, and that done, hee ſet a diademe vpon his head, and made him King of Philips Tetrarchy, to which he annexed Lyſanias Tetrarchy, and changed his chaine of iron into a chaine of gold of the ſame weight, and ſent Marullus into Iudæa to gouerne there. The ſecond yeare of Caius raigne, Agrippa asked licence to repaire into L Iudæa, to the intent he might diſpoſe of his kingdome, purpoſing to returne againe at ſuch time as he had diſpatched thoſe affaires. Which when the Emperour had granted him, he came into Iudæa, and was ſeene and ſaluted for a King beyond all mens expectation, ſeruing thereby for a moſt notable example vnto men to expreſſe vnto them how great the power of deſtiny is in humane affaires, conſidering the poore eſtate wherein hee had beene before, and the happineſſe which he enioyed at that time. Some tearmed him happy, in that hee reſolutely followed his hopes, otherſome could ſcareely beleeue that he was in this ſort aduanced.

Herodias Agrippas ſiſter enuieth her brothers happineſſe, & inciteth her huſband to ſeek a kingdome.

HErodias Agrippas ſiſter was maried to Herod the Tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa. Shee enuied her brother to ſee him raiſed to ſo great authority, and to farre greater dignity then her husband enioyed. For which cauſe ſhee was diſpleaſed, that her brother, who fled out of his countrey in that he wanted meanes to pay his debts, was returned in great honor, and

A and with greater ſubſtance. This charge endured ſhe with great hearts griefe, eſpecially, at ſuch time as ſhe ſaw him apparelled like a King, and inuironed with a great multitude of people, and impoſſible was it for her to hide the bitternes of her griefe; for which cauſe ſhe incited her huſband and perſwaded him to make a voiage to Rome, & to purchaſe as much as hee poſſeſſed. For ſaid ſhe, I cannot endure to liue, if Agrippa Ariſtobulus ſon condemned to death by the ſentence of his own father (ſo poor & indigent, that to redreſſe his neceſſities wherwith he was daily preſſed by his creditors, he was conſtrain'd at laſt to flie to Rome) ſhold return with ſuch titles of a king, and that her husband who was a kings ſon, & was called to the kingdom by his father, ſhould liue obſcure, & paſſe his life like a priuate man: Husband (ſaid ſhe) if heretofore it hath bin no preiudice to thee to liue in leſſe dignity, then erſt thy father hath done; now at leaſtwiſe, deſire that
B due honor which belongeth to thy family: neither thinke it to be ſufferable to ſubſcribe to him in eſtimatiõ, who in times paſt hath bin maintain'd by thy bounty. Neither ſuffer it to be thoght (thorow thine own ſlouth) that he in his neceſſity had better meanes and induſtry to obtaine an ample fortune, then you amidſt your mighty abundance; as if it redounded not to thy ſhame to be thought inferior to him at this time, who not long ſince, except by thy merty, had no meanes to liue. Let vs therefore haſtily repaire vnto Rome, & neither ſpare gold, ſiluer, or any other expence, for that it auaileth vs not ſo much to keep the ſame, as to imploy the ſame in the purchaſe of a kingdome. But Herod diſſwaded her as much as he might, for that he contented himſelfe to liue in quiet, and ſuſpected the confuſion that was at Rome, which he endeuoured as much as in him lay, to lay open to Herodias. But the more negligent ſhe ſaw him, the more inſtantly incited
C ſhe him to ſeek out the kingdom, and neuer gaue ſhe him ouer vntill ſhe had conformed him to her deſire: Whereunto he the rather liſtned, in that ſhe might not be drawne from her reſolution. Hauing therefore furniſhed himſelfe after the moſt magnificent manner, and ſpared no coſt, he repaired to Rome, and led Herodias his wife with him. Agrippa ſmelling their intent and the preparation they made, made his prouiſion likewiſe. And hauing notice that they were put to ſea, he ſent Fortunatus one of his freemen to Rome, with preſents to the Emperour, and certaine letters againſt Herod, with cõmiſſion to certifie Caius of euery particular, according as the occaſion ſhould ſerue. He embarking himſelfe after Herod, had a happy paſſage, and was onely preuented by him, but for the ſpace that Herod preſented himſelf to Caius: for he incontinently fol-D lowed him, and deliuered his letters. For they arriued at one time at Puteol, and found Caius at Baia, a village of Campania, diſtant from Puteol ſome fiue ſtades, inriched with moſt royall and ſumptuous palaces, for that euery Emperor enforced himſelfe to exceed the honor of his predeceſſour, by reaſon of the hot bathes that naturally iſſued out of the earth, ſeruing both for the health of the body, and recreation of the ſpirits. Whileſt Caius talked with Herod in that he viſited him firſt, he receiued Agrippas letters, containing Herods accuſations; for they accuſed him of a conſpiracy made and complotted betwixt him and Seianus, ſince the beginning of Tiberius Empire: And how for the preſent he fauoured Artabanus King of the Parthians to the preiudice of the Emperor Caius: of this, the preparations Herod had ſtored vp in his Arcenals, gaue euident teſtimony, which were ſufficient to arme ſeuenty thouſand men of warre. Caius was ſore moued with theſe informations, and asked Herod if that which was informed him touching his warlike
E preparation, was true. He vnable to contradict the ſame in any thing, for feare hee ſhould bee conuicted of falſhod, auowed no leſſe. Whereupon Caius ſuppoſing the accuſation of his reuolt to be ſufficiently approued, depriued him of his Tetrarchy, and annexed it to Agrippas kingdom; beſtowing Herods ſubſtance alſo vpon him. He baniſhed him likewiſe for euer, and confined him in the citie of Lions in France: and vnderſtanding that Herodias was Agrippas ſiſter, he gaue her all that which in right appertained vnto her. And ſuppoſing that ſhee would not willingly accompany her husband in that his calamity, he told her that her brother ſhould be her warrant. But ſhe gaue him this reply: Mighty Emperor, you ſpeake magnificently, and as it well beſeemeth ſo great a maieſty, but there is a cauſe that hindreth me from partaking the benefit of that bounty, which you intend towards me, which is the affection that I beare vnto my husband,
F whom if I ſhould forſake in this his miſery, it would very il beſeem me, in that I haue bin a partner with him in his felicity. Caius diſpleaſed with this her reſolute anſwere, baniſhed her likewiſe with her husband, and gaue the confiſcation of her eſtate alſo to Agrippa. God did after this manner puniſh Herodias, in regard of that enuy which ſhe had conceiued againſt her brother, and plagued Herod in that he had ſo lightly liſtned to the fooliſh perſwaſions of a woman. But Caius gouerned the Empire, the firſt and ſecond yeare of his raigne, with moſt noble directions, behauing himſelfe graciouſly towardes all men, whereby hee obtained the good liking of the Romans

The ſedition of the Iewes and Grecians in the citie of Alexandria.

Philo & Ruffinus, chap. 15. & chap 17. Appion prince of the Alexandrians embaſſage accuſeth the Iewes becauſe they aſcribed not diuinity to Cæſar.

AND whereas there aroſe a ſedition betwixt the Iewes & Grecians, that inhabited Alexandria, three choſen Embaſſadours on either ſide were ſent vnto Caius. One of theſe Embaſſadours of Alexandria was Appion, who charged the Iewes with many outrages, and amongſt other things he alleadged that they made no reckoning of honouring Cæſar: And H that whereas all other ſubiects of the Romane Empire had erected altars and temples in honour of Caius, and in all other things had receiued him as a God, the Iews ſuppoſed it to be a diſhonor for them to honor his ſtatues, or ſweare by his name. After that Appion had vrged many things and inueyed grieuouſly againſt the Iewes, hoping that Caius would bee prouoked againſt them, as in all likelihood & appearance it ſhould haue fallen out, Philo, the chiefeſt among the Embaſſadors of the Iewes, a man of famous memory, and brother to Alexander Alabarcha, being experienced in Philoſophy, enforced himſelfe to anſwere thoſe accuſations which were vrged againſt the Iewes. But Caius cõmanded him ſilence, and willed him inſtantly to withdraw himſelfe; and was ſo ſore diſpleaſed, that it appeared very manifeſtly, that he intended ſome hainous reuenge againſt them. Wherupon Philo departed after he had bin grieuouſly taunted, and ſpake thus vnto I the Iewes that flocked about him. We muſt be of good courage, ſince Caius in words ſeemeth to be diſpleaſed with vs: for in effect he will arme God in our behalfe againſt himſelfe.

Philo Iudæus for the Iewes is ſhut out, & can get no audience, and committeth the cauſe to God.

CHAP. XI.

Alias, cap. 19. Cæſar ſendeth Petronius into Syria and commandeth him in ſpite of the Iewes to plant his ſtatue in Gods temple.

BVt Caius, being ſore diſpleaſed for that the Iewes onely deſpiſed his ordinances, ſent Petronius into Syria to ſucceed Vitellius in his room, charging him with a ſtrong army to in- K uade Iudæa; and if they willingly admitted his ſtatue, that then he ſhould place it in the temple of God; but if they denied the ſame, then that ouercomming them by warre he ſhould enforce them to condiſcend thereunto. As ſoone as Petronius came into Syria, hee endeuoured himſelfe to ſatisfie Cæſars command: and hauing aſſembled as great an army as hee could poſſibly leuy, and leading forth with him two legions of Romanſouldiers, he wintred at Ptolemais, intending vpon the firſt ſpring to inuade Iudæa. Al which he ſignified to Caius by his letters: who commending him for his induſtry, aduiſed him to vſe all expedition therein, and to make warre againſt thoſe who ſhould diſobey his commandements. Meane while diuers thouſands of the Iewes reſorted to Petronius, who ſoiourned at Ptolemais, beſeeching him not to cõſtrain them to do that thing which was contrary to their lawes, or to tranſgreſſe the ordinances of their forefa- L thers. For if (ſaid they) you haue wholly decreed to bring and erect this ſtatue in our temple, firſt depriue vs of our liues: and afterwards doe that which ſhall ſeem good in your eyes. For it » is impoſſible for vs as long as our ſoules remaine within our bodies, to permit that which is for-» bidden by our lawes, or to ſuffer ſuch impiety in regard of that honour, which we owe vnto our » lawmaker, and our predeceſſors, who haue ratified our lawes to the intent we ſhould increaſe in » vertue. Petronius enraged at this their proteſtation, anſwered thus. If I were Emperour, and of » mine owne minde enterpriſed this action, you had reaſon to vſe theſe kinds of inſinuations vnto » me. But ſince Cæſar hath ſent me this commiſſion, there is no contradiction, but that I muſt o» bey his decrees: For if you reſiſt the ſame, you ſhall endure a moſt ſeuere and rigorous puniſh» ment for your diſobedience & contumacy. Hereunto the Iewes anſwered. My Lord (ſaid they) M » ſince your pleaſure is ſuch as you will not in any ſort tranſgreſſe the command and contents of » Cæſars letters, neither will we any waies violate or infringe the preſcript of our law, vnder hope

» of the diuine aſſiſtance, and in imitation of the vertue of our anceſtors: For wee are not ſo faint » hearted, that vnder hope of a vaine & vntimely deſire of life, we ſhould breake thoſe lawes which » almighty God hath propoſed vnto vs, vnder the reward of eternall felicity: for which cauſe we

A and we are ready to encounter any misfortune, vnder hope that God will assist vs, for whose honour we feare not to aduenture on any danger. This had wee rather doe, then by obeying thee through cowardise, to incur perpetuall ignominy; and that which is more, Gods wrath in neglect of his lawes, whose authority, euen in thine owne iudgement, is more to bee regarded then Caius commission. Petronius coniecturing by these their answers, how hard a matter it was to estrange them from their opinion, and perceiuing hee could not doe for Caius what he expected in the erection of his statue, without great bloudshed, whereby much murder and inconuenience might follow, he took certaine of his neerest and deerest friends with him, and posted to Tiberias, that he might more conueniently and circumspectly look into the Iews actions. They, fearing some imminent danger through the wars they expected from the Romans, and greater
B mischiefe through the breach of their laws, assembled once more many thousands of them, and met with Petronius at Tiberias, beseeching him he would not inforce them to that necessitie, nor defile their sacred City with forbidden images. Whereunto Petronius answered: Therefore (said he) will you fight with Cæsar, without regard either of his ability or your own weaknes? We will not fight (said they) but we will rather die then depart from our lawes. Whereupon prostrating themselues, and laying open their naked throats, they said they were ready to entertaine their deaths. In these tearmes continued they for the space of 40. daies, neglecting their husbandry, whereas at that time it was the chiefest seed-time. For it was most resolutely concluded among them, rather to suffer death then to admit the statue. Whil'st the matter stood vpon these tearmes, Aristobulus, Agrippas brother, and Elcias surnamed the Great, accom-
C panied with diuers of their houshould traine, and some of the chiefest among the Iewes, came vnto Petronius, beseeching him that hee would consider the obstinacie of the people: neither giue them occasion to draw them into desperate actions, but rather that hee would write vnto Caius, with what obstinacy the people refused the dedication of his image in the temple: and how giuing ouer the care of their husbandry, they prepared themselues for the warre, without any trust or confidēce in their own strength; being rather addressed to dy then to suffer so great an indignity to be offred to their religion. Besides, how giuing ouer their tillage there was nothing to be expected but robbery, whereas they should want meanes to pay their customes; by which meanes they hoped that Cæsar would bee moued to moderate his seueritie towards that nation, and not to giue them cause of rebellion: and that if hee might not bee moued from the D prosecution of the warre, that then he might go forward with his businesse. This was the effect of Aristobulus request.

The yeare of the world. 4002. after Christs birth. 40.

The Iewes meet Petronius at Tiberias, beseeching him not to violate the sacred city with his images.

Aristobulus, king Agrippas brother, and Elcias, the high Priest, intreat Petronius in the Iewes behalfe.

But Petronius, partly in respect of their praiers who instantly vrged him, and the waightinesse of the action; partly in regard of the contentious purpose of the Iewes, supposing that it was a matter vnworthy a man to put so many thousands of men to death, to satisfy Caius vnbridled desire and insolence, and touched with the feare of God, and remorse of his owne conscience, he had rather to his owne danger informe the Emperour of the absurdity of the matter by his letters, being no waies ignorant of his wrathfull spirit and forwardnes in reuenge, except his furious passion and expectation were answered. For this thought he, that although it altered not his resolution, but happily inforc't his displeasure against him, in that he speedily executed not his
E command; yet that it was the duetie of a good man no, not to refuse an assured death, if so bee he might saue so guiltlesse and huge a multitude. When as therefore he had assembled the Iews together in Tiberias (when many thousands of them resorted thither) & disposed all those warlike forces that at that time gaue attendance on him round about him, he tould the Iewes first of all, not his owne, but the Emperours intent, who would haue them shortly taste his displeasure, and inforce them to bear the burden of his indignation, who were so bold as to contradict him. For himselfe, that it necessarily concerned him, that since by the Emperours fauour he had receiued so great honour, hee should not commit any thing contrarie to his command. I hold it (said he) a matter most iust to imploy my life & honor for you, to the end that so huge a number of men should not be drawn into danger of death: and I will respect the excellency of the laws
F of your fathers, for which you think you ought to entertaine war and danger: neither is it lawful to suffer the temple of God to be defil'd by the authority of princes. I wil therfore write to Cæsar, and certifie him of your minds: and in all that I may, I will assist you to obtaine your request. God (whose power surpasseth all industry and humane force) vouchsafe to conduct you, and make you constant in the obseruation of your laws, and grant that he, through excessiue desire of humane glorie, commit not any thing that may offend God. And if Caius be displeased, and inforce his inuitable displeasure against me, I will vndertake all danger, and endure all torments both in body and ſpirit, to the end that I may not behold ſo many vertuous men, as you G are, periſh in your good and iuſt actions. Go therefore each of you and ply your worke, and till your lands: my ſelfe will ſend vnto Rome, and both in my ſelfe & by my friends, I will imploy my ſelf for you. After he had ſpoken thus, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly, praying the chiefeſt amõgſt them to encourage the husbandmen to ply their buſineſs, and to confirme the reſt of the people in their good hope. Of himſelfe alſo he ceaſed not to animate them. And truly God ſhewed his aſſiſtance to Petronius, and aſſiſted him in all his affaires. For as ſoone as hee had finiſhed his diſ-courſe vnto the Iewes, there ſuddenly fell a great raine beyond all humane expectation. For the day was very faire, neither was there any appearance of raine in the ayre, and all that yeare long there was an extreame drought; ſo that men were paſt hope to haue any moiſture, notwithſtanding that ſometime there hapned certaine clouds in the heauens. At that time therefore the wa- H ter fell in great abundance: and beſides the expectation and opinion of men, the Iewes conceiued

zed then all the reſt, ſeeing euidently that God vndertooke the affaires of the Iewes, and gaue them teſtimony of his manifeſt aſſiſtance; ſo that they that were their profeſſed aduerſaries, had no means to contradict them, as hee himſelfe wrote to Caius at large, with inductions and exhortations, to the end hee ſhould not drawe ſo many thouſand men into a deſperate reſolution and vnhappy death. For without war it was impoſſible for him euer to make thẽ forſake their religion. Furthermore, that he would not cut off & loſe the reuenue which he receiued of that nation; and would not erect a trophy of an euerlaſting curſe and malediction againſt himſelfe. Adding moreouer, what the power of their God was: which hee had ſo cleerly declared, that no I man ought to doubt, but that his mercifull hand was ouer them. This is the content of Petronius letters.

Agrippa honoreth Caius in Rome, and in reward thereof Caius willeth him to demand ſomwhat, who deſireth nothing elſe then that Petronius commiſsion to erect the ſtatue ſhould be reuoked.

On the other ſide, King Agrippa, who at that time conuerſed at Rome, grew more and more in fauour with Caius, hauing entertained him at a banquet, wherein hee enforced himſelfe to exceed all others in ſumptuouſnes, as in all other ſorts of delights and pleaſures; yea with ſuch fe-ſtiuals entertained he him, that not only others, but alſo the Emperor himſelf could not attaine to ſuch magnificence; ſo much enforced he himſelf to exceed all others through the great deſire hee had to content and ſatisfie Cæſar in all things. Caius was abaſhed at this his courage and magnificence, ſeeing Agrippa enforce himſelfe aboue his power and meanes to abound in ſiluer, and all this to the intent to pleaſe him. For which cauſe Cæſar in requitall of his kindnes, inten- K ding to honor Agrippa to his vttermoſt power, in granting him that which he moſt deſired, being one day whet with wine, inuited him to drink a carouſe: adding theſe words; Agrippa, I haue heretofore known the honor thou haſt ſhewed towards me, and thou haſt expreſſed the earneſt » affection that thou beareſt me, in hazarding thy ſelfe in diuers dangers, into which thou haſt bin » drawne during Tiberius life time; and haſt omitted nothing, no not in that which exceedeth thy » power, to ſhew thy vertuous affection towards me. For which cauſe I thinke that it ſhould be a » great ſhame for me, if I ſhould ſuffer my ſelfe to be ouercome by thee in kindneſs, without ſome » anſwerable correſpondence: I will therfore put that in practice which I haue heretofore omit» ted. For all thoſe things that hitherto I haue beſtowed on thee, are of no reckoning. My will is » that thy readineſs and vertue ſhould at this preſent be requited, by ſuch means as might for euer L » make thee happy. Now he ſpake after this manner, hoping that Agrippa would beg ſome great » Prouince at his hands, or the reuenues of ſome Cities.

But although he had already prepared his demand, yet did hee not diſcouer his intent, but gaue Caius this ready anſwer, that wheras he had ſerued him to the diſlike of Tiberius, it was not for the gaine he expected heretofore, and for the preſent alſo he did nothing vnder hope to be rich, contenting himſelfe that he was in the Emperours good fauour. That the benefits he had receiued by him, were great, yea exceeding all that which he durſt euer haue hoped. For (ſaid
he) although they be but ſmall in compariſon of your greatneſſe, yet in reſpect of my ſelfe, who haue receiued them, and in my conceit and quality, they are very great. Caius being amazed at this his courage, inſiſted the rather to perſwade him, that he would grant him all that he would M require at his hands. Whereupon Agrippa ſaid: Drad Prince, ſince it is your good pleaſure to thinke me worthy to be honored by your preſents, I will not requeſt any thing at your hands that may tend to enrich me; for that by thoſe goods you haue already giuen me, I am greatly honoured: but I beſeech and requeſt one thing at your hands, which will purchaſe you the reputation of piety, and will procure God to bee propitious vnto you in all your actions; and which alſo will breed me much glory among thoſe, who ſhall heare that I haue not been refuſed in my demand

A demaund, which concerneth me more then the neceſſities of this life. I therefore beſeech you that it will pleaſe you to giue commandement, that that ſtatue, which you haue charged Petronius to erect in the temple of the Iewes, may neuer be aduanced there. This was Agrippas requeſt, which to his great hazard he preſented the Emperour with, knowing very well how perilous a matter it was, and as much as concerned his life to demand any ſuch thing at Caius hands, that was not anſwerable to his humour. Caius on the one ſide mooued with the ſeruice Agrippa had done him, and on the other ſide ſeeing how great an indignity it ſhould be for him, if before ſuch an aſſembly of witneſſes, he ſhould deny that which he had ſo inſtantly preſſed Agrippa to requeſt, as if he ſodainly had repented himſelfe, and admiring Agrippas vertue (who hauing means within a little time to augment his particular eſtate, either by reuenues or other commodities, had preferred the common cauſe, the lawes of his country and piety before all theſe) he B granted him his ſupplication, and wrote to Petronius, praiſing him for that he had vſed ſuch diligence in aſſembling his armie, as alſo for all that whereof he had certified him, annexing theſe words: If (ſaid he) you haue already planted the ſtatue, as I commanded you, let it remain in the place: but if it be not done, be thou no more troubleſome to the Iewes, but diſmiſſe thine army, and repaire thou in perſon to that place whither I haue ſent thee. For I vrge no more the erection of that ſtatue for the deſire that I haue to gratifie Agrippa, whom I intirely honour, and in ſuch ſort, as it is impoſſible for me to contradict any thing whatſoeuer, that either he hath need of, or ſhall require. Theſe were the contents of thoſe letters, which Caius wrote to Petronius, before he vnderſtood that the Iewes bethought them of reuolt: for they made it knowne, that ra- C ther then they would endure the ſtatue, they would hazard a war againſt the Romans: vvhich when Caius vnderſtood, he was extreamly ſorowful: and being a man addicted to all villany, and eſtranged from all honeſty, and who gaue place to no good counſell, incontinently after he had conceiued a diſpleaſure againſt any man, and who likewiſe thought it a great good hap for him to accompliſh all that whatſoeuer he pleaſed, he wrote againe to Petronius to this effect: Since the preſents which the Iews haue giuen thee, haue preuailed more with thee then my commandements haue done, ſo as to pleaſe them thou haſt deſpiſed that which I haue enioined thee, I make thy ſelfe the iudge how much thou haſt deſerued to incur my diſpleaſure, to the end that thou mayſt ſerue for an example to all thoſe, who ſhall come after thee, that an Emperors commandement ought not in any ſort to be neglected. Although this Epiſtle was both written and D ſent, yet did not Petronius receiue the ſame during Caius life time, for that they that carried the ſame, were ſtaied by croſſe winds; ſo that Petronius receiued thoſe letters that certified him of Caius death, before he receiued the other. For God wold not forget Petronius, who expoſed himſelfe to great dangers for the loue of the Iewes, and the honour of God. And Caius being taken out of the world by Gods wrath being kindled againſt him, by reaſon that he affected diuine honors, receiued his reward; and Petronius obtained fauor both at Rome, and thorow all the whole gouernment, and eſpecially among the principall Senators, againſt whom Caius was accuſtomed to vomit his cholerick diſgraces. He died a little after he had written the letter to Petronius, by which he threatned and denounced him death. Hereafter will I declare the cauſe why he was taken out of this world, and the manner how treaſon was complotted and wrought E againſt him. The letter that brought tidings of Caius death, was deliuered to Petronius firſt, and incontinently after he receiued that vvherein he enioyned him to kil himſelfe. He highly reioiced at this his good hap, and Caius death, and admired Gods prouidence, who ſpeedily and happily had rewarded him both for the honor that he bare vnto his temple, as alſo for the aſſiſtance he vſed towards the Iewes. Behold how Petronius eſcaped from death, by an vnexpected means.

That which hapned to the Iewes which were at Babylon, and of the two brethren Aſinæus and Anilæus.

F

IN thoſe daies there hapned a grieuous commotion amongſt thoſe Iewes that inhabited Meſopotamia and Babylon, and ſuch ſlaughters & calamities as neuer the like hath bin declared in our former narrations; which in that I intend to report both particularly and ſeriouſly, I wil rippe vp the whole cauſe thereof from his firſt originall. There was a City called Nearda belonging to Babylon, ſtored with inhabitants, and enriched with many fruitfull poſſeſſions, ſufficient to ſuſtaine ſo great a multitude: Moreouer, it was ſuch as might be hardly hardly inuaded by the enimy, both for that the riuer Euphrates hemmed it in on one side, as al- G

so for that it was defenced with very ſtrong wals. Vpon the ſame riuer alſo there ſtood another city, called Niſibis, in which the Iewes, in reſpect of the ſtrength of the place, kept their Drag-ma, which they were accuſtomed to offer vnto God, and the reſt of their votiue money. Theſe two Cities therefore ſerued them for two ſtore-houſes; and from thence, according as time required, they ſent the mony they had gathered to Ieruſalem, and committed the conuoy ther-of to diuers thouſands of men, for feare leſt it ſhould bee taken away by the Parthians, who at that time had the ſoueraignte in Babylon. Among theſe Iewes liued Aſinæus and Anilæus, two brethren, borne in Nearda, whoſe father being dead, their mother ſet them and bound them to the weauers trade, for that among thoſe nations it was accounted no indignitie to follow that trade: for both men and women exerciſe themſelues therein. It hapned, that their maſter, with H whom they learnd their occupation, beat them one day, for that they came ſomewhat late vnto their work. They taking this chaſtiſement of his as if a great iniurie had been done vnto them, betook themſelues to their weapons, whereof there were great ſtore in that houſe, and retired themſelues into a place where the ſloud diuideth it ſelfe into two parts, which naturally aboundded with excellent paſtures, and ſuch fruits as were reſerued for the vſe of winter. To theſe men there flocked a number of needy perſons, whom they armed & became their captaines, and no man oppoſed himſelfe againſt their inſolent proceedings. Being by this meanes growne abſo-lute and impregnable, for that they had builded themſelues a ſtrong fortreſſe, they ſent vnto the inhabitants, commanding them to pay them tribute for their cattel which they paſtured; ſo that this tribute gaue ſufficient to entertaine them, promiſing to thoſe who obeyed them, all friend- I ſhip, and that they would maintain them againſt all thoſe that ſhould iniure them, of what place ſoeuer they were: but if they did not that which they commanded them, they threatned them that they would kill all their cattell. The inhabitants of the countrey, knowing themſelues vna-ble to croſſe them, obeied them, and ſent them the number of cattell which they required; ſo that greater forces daily coupled themſelues with them, and they grew of that power, that they could make their excurſions againſt thoſe whom they intended to hurt. Euery one reſpected them, and they were feared by all men, ſo that their renown came at laſt to the eares of the king of Parthia.

Neerda, Niſibis, two cities of Babylon.

Aſinæus and Anilæus, born in Neerda, retire into a certain place, and great companies flock vnto them.

Aſinæus and his companions beſet by the gouernors and princes of Babylon.

The Gouernor of Babylon likewiſe intending to cut off this miſchiefe before it grew to grea- K ter head, aſſembled as many men as he could poſſible, both Parthians and Babylonians, & marched forth againſt them, with an intent to root them out before they ſhould haue any inkling thereof, to prepare themſelues for their defence. Hauing therefore prepared his army, he lay in ambuſh neere vnto a mariſh, and the next day following (which was the Sabbath, in which the Iewes forbeare all kinde of work, he making his account that the enemy durſt not make head a-gainſt him, but without fight he ſhould lead them away captiues) hee marched eaſily, thinking to charge them vnawares. Aſinæus, who at that time by chance ſate idly with his fellowes, hauing his Armes faſt by him: Ye men (ſaid he) me thinks I heare the neighing of horſes, not ſuch as when they are in their heat, but as when they are backt by men. Moreouer, I hear the noiſe of their bridles, & I feare leſt the enemies ſecretly ſtealing vpon vs, ſhould circumuent vs: let therfore ſome one of vs go and diſcouer what the matter is, and certifie vs truly of that which he ſhal L perceiue: I would I were found a lier in that which I haue told you. This ſaid, one of them went out to eſpy what the noiſe intended; who reurning haſtily back againe, told him that he had not falſly coniectured as touching the intent of the enemy, for that they were at hand, and would not ſuffer themſelues any longer to be out-braued by them. He alſo declared, that there was a mighty number of horſemen, who were aſſembled like a droue of beaſts, ſufficient & able vtterly to ouercom Aſinæus and al his cõpany, foraſmuch as they were not in a readineſs to defend themſelues: for that our lawe forbiddeth vs in any ſort to trauell on the ſabbath. Aſinæus determined with himſelfe not to do that which the ſpy had ſaid, but thought that it was better for them to behaue themſelues valiantly in that their neceſſity wherein they were plunged, and that if they muſt needs dy, it better became them to make breach of their law, then to hearten M their enemies by their ſubmiſſion. He therefore preſently betook himſelfe to his weapons, and encouraged all thoſe that were about him, to make it knowne in effect what their valour vvas.
Wherupon all of them at once marched forth againſt the enimy, & ſlaughtred a great many of them, for that they, deſpiſing Aſinæus and his followers, marched as if they went to lay hould on men already vanquiſhed; but in the end they were conſtrained to betake them to flight.

Aſinæus, after he had encouraged his ſouldiers, putteth his enemies to flight.

When the bruit of this skirmiſh was brought to the eares of the King of Parthia, hee was wholly

A wholly aſtoniſhed at the boldneſſe of theſe two brethren, and he had a deſire to ſee them, and to ſpeake with them. Hee therefore ſent one of the truſtieſt of his guard, to let them vnderſtand that although king Artabanus had beene iniured by them, in that they had inuaded his countrey, notwithſtanding ſaid this Embaſſadour, he making leſſe account of the diſpleaſure he hath conceiued againſt you, then of your vertue, hath ſent me vnto you to giue you my hand and troth in his name for ſafe conduct and ſecurity in your voyage, requiring you to be his friends: he conditioneth therefore with you without any deceit or fraud, promiſing you gifts and honours, and determineth to encreaſe your dignity by his power. Aſinæus refuſed to enterpriſe this voyage, but ſent his brother Anilæus with certaine preſents, ſuch as he could poſſibly finde. Hee therefore departed with the meſſenger, and preſented himſelfe before Artabanus; who ſeeing Anilæus come alone, asked him how it hapned that Aſinæus came not with him: and vnderſtanding that hee ſtayed in his mariſh thorow the feare that he had of him, hee ſwore by the gods of his anceſtors, that hee would do him no wrong, wiſhing them to giue credit to his promiſe, and he ſtretched out his hand, which is the greateſt ſigne which the kings of that countrey vſe to aſſure thoſe that parlie with them. For after they haue mutually giuen one another their hands, there is no ſiniſter practice to be feared, and they from whom a man expecteth any harme, are no more to bee feared at ſuch time as they haue giuen this teſtimony of aſſurance. That done, Artabanus ſent backe Anilæus to perſwade his brother Aſinæus to come to the court. Artabanus did this, ſuppoſing that this his amitie vvith the two brothers vvould bee a bridle for the Iewes, vvho otherwiſe might encroach vpon his gouernments. For, he feared leſt if any rebellion ſhould happen, and hee ſhould bee troubled in that warre, Aſinæus and they of Babylon ſhould growe more ſtrong, both by the voluntarie ſubmiſsion of the Iewes, as by force: and thereby ſhould doe him the more miſchiefe. Vpon this deliberation he ſent Anilæus, vvho eaſily perſvvaded his brother, giuing him to vnderſtand among other things, what good will the king bare him, and the oath that he had ſworne: ſo that both of them reſorted to Artabanus, who receiued them very graciouſly, admiring Aſinæus vertue, who had ſo great a courage to exerciſe his enterpriſes, conſidering eſpecially that he was a man of lowe ſtature, and vvho to look on ſeemed to be contemptible: and hee told his friends that vvithout compariſon, hee had a greater heart then his bodie.

Aſinæus and Anilæus are ſought vnto by Artabanus for friendſhip.

And when as in banqueting he had named Aſinæus, and ſhewed him to Abdagaſis the generall of his armie, ſignifying vnto him with vvhat valour theſe brethren were endowed in feats of armes; Abdagaſis required that it might be lawfull for him to kill Aſinæus, to the end that he might puniſh the vvrongs hee had done to the eſtate of the Parthians. Neuer (ſayd the king) will I giue my conſent to betray a man, who hath committed himſelfe to my protection: and hath giuen me his hand, and who buildeth vpon the oath I haue paſt vnto him in the name of the gods. But if thou be a valiant man in feats of armes, thou haſt no need to make me forſweare my ſelfe, to the end I might doe iuſtice on him for his outrages committed againſt the Parthians: but at ſuch time as he and his brother ſhall depart from hence, aſſayle him, and ouercome him by thy valour, prouided that I be not priuie to thy attempt. And afterwards calling Aſinæus to him in the morning: It is time (ſaid he) that thou returne homeward, for feare thou prouokeſt diuers of the captaines of my court, which contrary to my will, vvill endeuour themſelues to kill thee. I commit the countrey of Babylon to thy protection and guard, which by thy care and vigilancie ſhall remaine exempt from all robberies, and other ſuch calamities. Reaſon it is that I procure thy good, becauſe I haue engaged mine honour and faith irreuocably vnto thee, not vpon any light matter, but for things that importune thee as neerely as thy life. This ſayd, he gaue him certain preſents, and incontinently diſmiſſed him. Now as ſoone as he returned home to his owne fortreſſe, he fortified the places, both thoſe which before time he had thorowly defenced, as the other which as yet no man had attempted to ſtrengthen: and in ſhort time he grew to that greatneſſe, as no one man of ſo obſcure fortune and beginning attained before him. Neither contented with the honors of the Babylonians, he was alſo held in great account by the captaines of the Parthians, who were ſent to gouerne in the neighbouring prouinces: yea ſo much encreaſed his authoritie with his power, that all Meſopotamia was at his command. In this felicity and encreaſing glory of his, he continued for the ſpace of fifteen yeeres: which neuer began to wane vntil ſuch time as neglecting the ancient ſtudie of vertue, and contemning the lawes of his forefathers, both hee and his factious followers being deuoured in pleaſure, yeelded themſelues captiue to forrain luſts. It fortuned that a certaine gouernour of thoſe Parthians came into that countrey, accompanied with his wife, not onely enriched and endowed with other perfections, but alſo admired for her incomparable comparable comlineſs and beauty. Whom without euer ſeeing her, only by report of her beauty, Anilæus Aſinæus brother loued entirely: and when as by no one of his allurements he could obtaine her fauour, neither had any other hope to enioy the Lady, he could not bridle his vnruly luſt, but he made warre againſt her husband: and killing the Parthian in their firſt conflict, his wife became his, both in ſubiection and bed-ſeruice; which thing was the originall of many mighty calamities both to himſelf and towards his brother. For when as hauing loſt her former husband, ſhe was led away captiue, ſhe carried with her the images of the gods of her countrey, which ſhe highly eſteemed, according as it was the cuſtome of thoſe that inhabited that place, to haue their gods whom they adored in their houſes, whom at ſuch time as they trauell into a forraine countrey, they carry about with them. She therefore brought them with her, and vſed them, according to the faſhion of her countrey, at the firſt ſecretly: but after ſhe was knowne for Anilæus wife, then adored ſhe them according to the cuſtom, and with the ſame ſeruice which ſhe vſed during her firſt husbands daies, ſacrificing to her Gods.

Anilæus killeth a noble man of the Parthians, and leadeth away his wife.

Their chiefeſt friends ſeeing this, firſt of all reproued them, for that Anilæus committed ſuch things, as were no waies vſed among the Hebrewes, and altogether repugnant to their lawes, for that he had married a woman of a forraine nation, that contradicted and violated their accuſtomed religion: for which cauſe they aduiſed them to beware, leſt in ſubmitting themſelues too much to their vnbridled pleaſures, they ſhould loſe the honor & power they had receiued from God, euen vntill that preſent. But ſeeing their perſwaſions profited nothing, and that Anilæus likewiſe had villanouſly ſlaine one of his deereſt friends, who had ſomwhat too freely reproued him (who at ſuch time as he lay a dying, being touched with the zeale of the lawes of his anceſtors, and with griefe againſt his murtherer, wiſhed that Aſinæus and Anilæus and all their aſſociates might die the like death: they for that they were tranſgreſſers of the law; the other, for that they ſuccoured not themſelues in that oppreſſion, which they ſuffered for the maintenance of their lawes.) They were ſore diſpleaſed: yet notwithſtanding they contained themſelues, calling to their remembrance that their felicity proceeded from no other cauſe, but from the valour of thoſe brethren.

Anilæus being reproued for his wifes Idolatry killeth one of his friends.

But whē they vnderſtood that the Parthian gods were adored by this woman, they bethought them that it behoued them not any more to beare with Anilæus, in contempt of their laws: for which cauſe, adddreſſing themſelues to Aſinæus in great aſſemblies, they exclaimed againſt Anilæus; ſaying, that he ought, although at firſt he had no power to diſpoſe of himſelfe, yet now at laſt, to correct this error before it ſhould redound to their publike plague: for that both his mariage was diſallowed in all mens eies, as altogether contrary to their country lawes, and that the ſuperſtitious obſeruance of the gods, which the woman preſumed to vſe, was an apparant iniurie offered to the true God. But he, although he knew that his brothers fault would breed ſome great inconuenience, both to himſelfe and his followers, yet being ouercome with brotherly affection, he eaſily pardoned his brother, aſcribing his error to the violence of his vnbridled paſſion. But whereas daily more and more he was tired with exclamations, and greater reproofes, at length hee admoniſhed his brother of the matter, chiding him for that which was paſt, and willing him to amend the error hereafter, by ſending home the woman vnto her kinred. Yet did this admonition of his take no effect with him; for that the woman perceiuing that the rumour that was raiſed among the people was for her ſake, and being affraid leſt for her loue ſake Anilæus ſhould incurre ſome danger, ſhee poiſoned Aſinæus, to the end that her loue being in authority ſhe might more freely practiſe her impiety. Now when Anilæus had gotten the gouernment into his owne hands, he drew out his forces againſt certaine villages belonging to Mithridates, one of the chiefeſt among the Parthians, and Artabanus ſonne in lawe, which villages hee ſpoiled, and carried away moueables, men, ſheepe, and other riches. When Mithridates, who at that time was reſident in thoſe quarters, vnderſtood of the ſpoyle of his villages, he was ſore diſpleaſed, and the rather for that without any occaſion or proffer of iniury, Anilæus had aſſailed, him in contempt of his eſtate, who was a chiefe Peere of the Countrey: for which cauſe he incontinently aſſembled the greateſt power of horſe and footmen he could gather, to ſet vpon Anilæus and his aſſociates. Leading his forces therefore againſt one of his villages, he kept himſelfe in couert, to the end he might fight the next day; which was the Sabboth day, on which the Iewes attempt not any thing. Whereof when Anilæus was aduertiſed by a certain Syrian, who dwelt in an other village, who had exactly tolde him all Mithridates intent, and the place where he intended to banquet with his ſouldiers; after he had made his ſouldiers take their refection, he departed by night, to the end he might charge the Parthians before they might be aduertiſed of his

He therefore ruſhed in vpon them about the fourth watch of the night, and ſlew thoſe whom he found aſleep, and the reſt being aſtoniſht hereat, were forced to ſaue themſelues by flight: he alſo tooke Mithridates priſoner, and cauſed him to be caried away naked on an Aſſe, which is one of the greateſt diſgraces which the Parthians imagine may bee offered them. Hauing after this diſgraceful maner carried him into a forreſt, ſome of his familiars perſwaded him to kill him: but Anilæus told them incontinently, that they ought to deale with him far otherwiſe; for that it behoued them not to kill a man, who was one of the chiefeſt among the nobility of the Parthians, and one who was moſt honored in regard of that affinity and alliance hee had with the king: that although all that which heretofore had bin offered to Mithridates were inſupportable; yet if they ſhould be the meanes of the ſafegard of his life, he would remit the iniuries,
B and remunerate them for their mercy in ſauing his life; whereas if they ſhould deale ſeuerely with him, the king would ſeek his reuenge, and make a horrible ſlaughter of all thoſe Iewes that inhabited Babylon: whom they ought to haue compaſſion of, both for that they are of their bloud, as for that if any miſchief ſhould befall them, they knew not whither to retire themſelues; whereas they might be aſſiſted with the flower and picked number of the men of their nation. Hauing thus diſcourſed and debated the matter in the eares of his ſouldiers, his opinion was approued, and they were perſwaded; and ſo Mithridates was ſent backe againe.

Anilæus diſmiſſeth Mithridates.

But no ſooner returned he home vnto his houſe, but that his wife hit him in the teeth, that he liued but by the mercy of his enemies, notwithſtanding he were the kings ſonne in law: that he had made no reckoning to puniſh thoſe, who had ſo much iniured him: that he likewiſe conten-

Mithridates, vnable to indure theſe vſuall reproches, and on the other ſide, apprehending his wiues hauty courage, from whom he feared to be ſeparated, he aſſembled the greateſt power of men of war that he could poſſible, notwithſtanding it were againſt his will, and led them forth; ſuppoſing himſelf to be vnworthy of life, if he who was by nation a Parthian, ſhould be cowardly put to the worſt by the Iewes. When Anilæus vnderſtood that Mithridates came forth againſt him with a great force, he thought that it would redound greatly to his indignitie, if he ſhould
D lye lurking amidſt his marſhes; and hoping that he ſhould haue no worſe fortune againſt his enemies, then he had at the firſt, and building much vpon his ſouldiers, who were euer wont to get the vpper hand in their encountries, he likewiſe drew forth his armie: to them alſo certaine other adioined themſelues, who ſought nought elſe but pillage, and hoped that with their only preſence they might diſmay their enemy.

But after they had marched about ninety ſtades, and paſſed thorow a country that was ſcant of water, and were about the heat of the midday trauailed with thirſt: Mithridates army came in ſight, and charged them euen at that time, vvhen they fainted for want of drinke, and thorow the extreamity of heat; ſo as they could ſcarcely wield their weapons. At that time Anilæus ſouldiers encountring with Mithridates freſh men, were ſhamefully put to flight: whereby it came
E to paſſe, that a great number of them was murthered, and many thouſand men put to the ſword. But Anilæus himſelf, and all thoſe of his company, retired themſelues in great haſte into a foreſt, leauing Mithridates Lord and Maſter of the field, vvhereof he was very ioifull. Notwithſtanding this diſaſter, an infinite number of lavvleſſe men reſorted to Anilæus, vvho ſet little by their liues, prouided there might no limit be propoſed to their vnbridled licentiouſneſſe; ſo that he gathered a greater number of men, then thoſe vvhom he had loſt: yet vvere they farre different in valour from the former: for they vvere men vvholly ignorant of vvarlike diſcipline: notwithſtanding, hee beeing accompanied with theſe men, vvent and ſet vpon certaine boroughs of the Babylonians, which were vvholly deſtroied by his rapine and violence. For vvhich cauſe, the Babylonians and his other enemies, ſent vnto Nearda to the Ievves that vvere there, requiring F that Anilæus might be deliuered into their hands: vvherunto condeſcending not (for although they had a wil to perform their requeſt, yet it lay not in their povver to deliuer him) they required that they might liue in peace. And to intreat of the conditions of peace, the Babylonians ſent certaine men to confer with Anilæus. They hauing ſurvaied the place vvherein Anilæus kept, aſſayled both himſelfe & his followers by night, and ſlew all thoſe they encountred with, without reſiſt, and amongſt the reſt Anilæus. and curbe the hatred they conceiued against the Iewes,with whom they had oftentimes been at G at debate vpon each opportunitie, wherein they met.

The Iewes afflicted by the Babylonians repaire to Seleucia.

At that time therfore that Anilæus men were discomfited, the Babylonians set vpon the Iewes on all sides; who seeing themselues in danger by reason of the insolence of the Babylonians, against whom they were too weak to make resist, & on the other side vnable to liue amongst them, they went and dwelt at Seleucia, a citie famous in regard of Seleucus the sonne of Nicanor, who builded it. In that citie dwelt diuers Macedons, diuers Greekes, and a great number of Syrians. The Iewes fled thither, and soiourned there about some fiue yeeres, without any molestation: but in the sixt yeere, when the plague grew rife in Babylon, the Ievves that remained there, were enforced to seeke them some new habitation; and that remoove of theirs into the citie of H
Seleucia was the cause likewise of their further mischiefe,as I will make manifest. The Greekes who dwel in Seleucia,are ordinarily at debate with the Syrians,and haue alwaies the vpper hand; but after that the Iews came to inhabite in that place,in a certain sedition that arose among them, the Syrians had the vpper hand,by the meanes of the Iewes,who ioined their forces with theirs, who of themselues were valiant and good souldiers.

The Greekes who had been repulsed in this tumult, seeing they had but one only meanes left them to maintaine their former honour, but to breake that league of friendship which was betweene the Syrians and the Iewes, deuised in priuate each one with those Syrians, vvith vvhom they were acquainted, promising to liue in peace and amity vvith them, vvhereunto they condescended willingly. For the chiefest of these two nations concluded the peace, which presently I after followed,to the end that on both parts they should ioine in hatred against the Iews. So that altogether charging them at vnawares, they slew more then fiftie thousand of them: and all of them were slaine, except some few, who thorow the mercy of their friends, and warrantize of their neighbors were suffered to escape. These retired themselues to Ctesiphon a city of Greece, that was not farre from Seleucia,where the king soiourneth euery yeere, and keepeth the greatest part of his moueables;hoping in that place thorow the reuerence of the king they might remain in more safety and security. All the nation of the Iewes that were in these quarters stood in great feare: For the Babylonians and the Seleucians, with all the Assyrians of that country, accorded among themselues to make a generall war against the Iewes; whereby it came to passe that they assembled themselues at Nearda and Nisibis, trusting themselues to the strength of these fortresses, which were inhabited also by men who were expert in armes. See here vvhat the estate of those Iewes was, who remained in Babylon. K

How Caius was ſlaine by Chæreas.

The yeare of the world. 4004. after Chriſts birth. 42.

Caius did not onely expreſſe and manifeſt his furie towards thoſe Iewes that dwelt in Ieruſalem, and in other neighbouring places; but alſo through all the countries both by land & ſea, which were ſubiect to the Roman Empire, filling the whole world with an infinite number of miſchiefes; yea, ſuch and ſo hainous, as the like heereof hitherto haue neuer been heard of. But Rome in eſpeciall felt the force of his furie, which partooke no leſſe calamity and miſery, then any other citie: but eſpecially the Senatours, Patricians, and noble men were plagued. They alſo that were called Roman knights, who in wealth and dignity were next vnto the Senators, for that out of their number ſuch men were choſen, who were to ſupply the Senat, were vexed with intolerable iniuries. For with ignominies they were detracted, with baniſhments and confiſcations weakned, and by ſlaughters wholly exterminated. He likewiſe vſurped the Name of God, commanding his ſubiects to dignifie him with more then humane honors; and aſcending the Capitol, which amongſt all the temples in Rome is moſt religiouſly honoured, he was ſo bold as to ſalute Iupiter, and to call him brother. Many ſuch impieties committed he, by which he expreſſed, that his vnbridled and bouudleſſe madnes did neuer forſake him. Amongſt his other mad pranks that hee plaied, this is worthy of memorie: for on a time, thinking it to be too much trouble for him to croſſe the ſea between Puteol a city in Campania, and Miſenum another towne ſeated by the ſea ſhore, in a galley; and otherwiſe eſteeming it a thing correſpondent to his greatnes, who was Emperour, to exact that ſuperiority on the ſea, which was anſwerable to his ſoueraigntie on the land, betwixt one cape of the ſea vnto another, for the ſpace of thirty furlongs or ſtades, betwixt which the gulfe had his courſe, hee cauſed a bridge to be built, on which he commanded himſelfe to be drawne in a chariot, as if that way were anſwerable to the dignity of his deity. Hee left not one temple of Greece whatſoeuer, that he ſpoiled not of thoſe excellent pictures or imagery that was therein; Giuing a commiſſion, that all ſtatues, and whatſoeuer ornaments or gifts, and preſents that were dedicated in any temple, ſhould be brought vnto him; ſaying, that ſuch things as were admirable, ſhould be reſerued for a place of admiration, ſuch as was the city of Rome: with theſe ſpoiles of the temples decked he his palace and gardens, and generally, all his houſes and palaces that he had in Italy. He vvas ſo impudent alſo, as to giue direction, that Iupiter Olympius ſtatue, vvhich the Greeks had in great eſtimation, and Phidias the Athenian caruer had made, ſhould be tranſported to Rome. But Memmius Regulus, to vvhom he directed this commiſſion, executed it not, becauſe the Maſons informed him, that vvithout ſpoiling it they could not remoue it from the place. It is reported alſo, that he vvas hindred fro this execution by ſuch prodigies as are almoſt incredible: which he certified Caius of, giuing him to vnderſtand, what the occaſion was that had moued him to diſobey him therein: and whil'ſt he was in danger of death for this his delay, the ſudden and ſucceſsfull death of Caius warranted him from the ſame. Yea, ſo far ſtretched his vnbridled fury, that hauing a daughter newly born, he cauſd her to be caried into the Capitoll, and laid at the feet of the Image of Iupiter; ſaying, that that childe was common betwixt him and Iupiter, leauing the iudgement to all men, which of the two parents was the greateſt. And notwithſtanding all theſe his miſdemeanours, yet did men tolerate him.

He gaue liberty to ſlaues alſo to accuſe their maſters of whatſoeuer crimes they would: which was ſo much the more hateful, becauſe all things were done by Cæſars authority, & to his good liking: ſo that Pollux, who was Claudius bondman, durſt accuſe him, and Caius the Emperour was contented among the Iudges to heare his vncle brought in queſtion for his life, hoping (although it fel out otherwiſe) to pick out an occaſion to put him to death. For hauing filled all the countries of his Empire with falſe accuſations, and all ſorts of miſchiefs, & giuing ſlaues a prerogatiue aboue their maſters; their lords deuiſed many conſpiracies againſt him, ſome for ſpite, and with an intent to reuenge them of thoſe iniuries they had receiued: other ſome pretending by his death to preuent thoſe inconueniences that threatned them. In a word; his death concerned the ſecurity of the lawes, and the ſafety of all men: and had he not been ſpeedily cut off, our nation had almoſt been vtterly exterminated. For which cauſe I thought good to make an exact and ample declaration of euery occurrent, namely, for that the knowledge thereof maketh very much towards the manifeſtation of Gods power and will, which bring conſolation vnto thoſe who

who are in aduersitie, and keep them within the bounds of modesty, who suppose that their prosperity should continue alwaies firme, and although they neglect vertue, think that no euil may befall them. Three plots of conspiracy were intended against him, and purposed to his vtter ruine, each of which was attempted by men of great reckoning. For Æmilius Regulus, who was borne in Corduba in Spaine, was fully resolued to kill him, himselfe, or to make him away by the meanes of his confederates. Chæreas Cassius, Colonell ouer a thousand men, was the chiefe-taine of another band; and Annius Minucianus was in no lesse readinesse to doe his vttermost herein. The cause that mou'd them to accord thus altogether in hatred against Caius, was, that in respect of Regulus, hee was by nature a detester of all iniquitie: for he was a man endowed with great magnanimitie, and beautified with a liberal spirit; so as he dissembled not any of his counsels, but communicated them with many, who either were his friends, or valiant men fit for execution. And as touching Minucianus, he was induced to seeke his reuenge, through the desire he had to do iustice on him in Lepidus behalfe, who had bin one of his especiall friends, and one of the rarest men that were euer found among the Roman citizens (whom Caius had put to death through the feare he had conceiued of him) knowing wel that all they, against whom Caius was incensed, could not escape with lesse indignity than loss of life. As for the third man Chæreas, he could not endure the shame and reproach of cowardise that Caius had obiected against him, but feared besides, that his friendship & inward familiarity with Caius would draw him into manifest dangers: for which cause & his own security & honors sake, he thought good to make him away. Generally, all of them were resolued to rid the world of Caius, & bring an end to his pride and tyrannical power, for their hope was that their attempt should haue good successe: which if it happily fell out, their country & common-weale should reap the fruits thereof, for whose security and safety, it became them to hazard thẽselues, though it were with losse of their heads. But aboue all the rest, Chæreas was egged on with a desire he had to grow famous, and through the facility & conuenient means he had to finish the same, because his Colonels room gaue him most secure access vnto him. About that time the Circensian games were solemnized, which is a kind of pastime which the Romans very willingly behold, and to this intent they resort to the place of these exercises, and the common people is wont to demand somewhat at their Emperors hands, which they desire to obtaine; and they, after they haue examined their requests, do neuer refuse them. Now they required with instant and importunate supplications, that Caius would discharge them of their taxations, and moderate the excessiue tributes which they paid: but he would giue no care vnto them, and caused those to be apprehended who called vpon the matter most earnestly, sending his Guard, some of them one way, some of them another, to put them to the sword. After he had giuen this commandement, and they who receiued the charge had fully executed it, a great number of men were slaine. The people seeing this, ceased to exclaime any more, setting light by their goods; and seeing before their eyes, that their refusall would be the cause of their death. These cõsiderations incited Chæreas the more to execute his enterprise, to the end he might finish his furious and lawless life, whose pleasure was al mens iniurie and preiudice. And very oftentimes was he determined to set vpon him whil'st he banquetted, yet he deferred to do the same, not for that he failed or fainted in his resolution, but because he expected some fit opportunity to hit him home, and speed him to the death. He liued Captaine of Caius Guard a long time, yet took he small pleasure in conuersing with him.

But after that Caius had appointed him to gather in his tributes, and that money which was confiscate, he seemed to haue lesse occasion then before: for at that time he had doubled their paiments, in the execution whereof he followed his owne nature rather then Cæsars command, and spared those of whom he ought to haue compassion for their pouerty sake. Caius was sore displeased herewith, and obiected against him, that the cause why he delaied the bringing in of his money, was his cowardise and negligence: And among other outrages that he offered him, as oft as he gaue him the watch-word, as he vsually went to fetch it once a day vpon his watch day, he gaue him the names of women, and other that were full of ignominie, notwithstanding that he himselfe was not exempt from note of no lesse daintinesse. For in certaine ceremonies which he himselfe had established, he attir'd himselfe like a woman, and was disguised with certaine vailes, whereby hee might the better counterfait that sex, and yet notwithstanding durst he obiect this dishonor to Chæreas. As oftentimes as Chæreas receiued the watch-word, so often times grew he in choler: which was increased the more at such time, as he deliuerd the same to his companions, who openly mocked and iested at him. For when it was his turne to receiue the word from Cæsars mouth, he ordinarily fitted him with such a one as might moue laughter, which

A which made him the bolder to conſpire with his confederates, in that hee had iuſt occaſion to be diſpleaſed: among theſe was a Senator, and one that had paſt all honors and offices, otherwiſe an Epicure & louer of delights. Him did Timidius accuſe (in that he was his enimy) that he had vſed certaine iniurious ſpeeches againſt Caius: and for proofe hereof, he alledged Quintilia for his witnes, a woman amongſt all ſtageplaiers dearly beloued by many, but in eſpeciall, by Popedius by reaſon of her incomparable beauty: and for that ſhe refuſed to beare witnes in a matter falſly obiected againſt him, whom ſhe intirely loued, Timidius required, that ſhe might bee examined by torture. Caius, prouoked herewith, commanded Chæreas with all expedition and diligence to ſee Quintilia tortured: and the rather gaue he Chæreas theſe commiſſions to kill and torment thoſe whom he pleaſed, for that he had conceiued this opinion, that he would acquit him-

B ſelfe with more cruelty, to the end he might exempt himſelfe of that reproach of faint-heartednes which was wrongfully inforced againſt him.

Popedius is accuſed of a crime by Timidius vnto Cæſar.

Whil'ſt thus Quintilia was led forth to bee tortured, ſhee trod vpon the foot of one of thoſe who were of the confederacie, giuing him to vnderſtand that he ſhould be of good courage, for that there was no feare that ſhee would bewray any thing in torture, but would endure it with great conſtancy: notwithſtanding, Chæreas tormented her cruelly, which he rather performed by conſtraint then of his owne free will. And ſeeing hee could inforce nothing out of her, hee brought her back to Caius in ſo pitifull an eſtate, that all they that beheld her had compaſſion on her. Caius likewiſe himſelfe was moued, and bethinking him of thoſe paines ſhe had indured, he deſiſted from the enqueſt and accuſation which was proſecuted againſt Popedius and Quintilia, Caius commandeth Quintiliana to be tortured, who cõfeſſeth nothing.

C and gaue her a certain ſumme of mony, to comfort her againſt the indiſpoſition that might happen by reaſon of her torments, which ſhe had ſo courageouſly endured.

Popedius is abſolued.

This diſpleaſed Chæreas very much, as if he had been the cauſe of all thoſe euils that had happened to thoſe two perſons, hauing been ſo great, that to heale them it behooued Cæſar to miniſter a medicine. He conſulted therefore with Clement, who was captaine of the footmen, and Papinius, who had the command of the guard, and ſpake vnto them to this effect: We haue (ſaid hee) O Clement, imploied our ſelues to the vttermoſt for the Emperors ſafety: for by our prouidence and trauel we haue wrought ſo much, that of all thoſe, who haue conſpired againſt him, ſome of them haue bin ſlaine: the reſt in ſuch ſort tormented & martyred, that Caius himſelfe had compaſſion on them. But what reward or honour receiue we for all theſe ſeruices? Clement, hearing

Chæreas conferreth with Clement and Papinius.

D theſe words, held his peace, giuing manifeſt teſtimonie by his looks, and the change of his colour, that that he was greatly aſhamed he had ſo long time obeyed the Emperours commandements: and whil'ſt he thought with himſelfe that it was no policy for him to open his mouth againſt Caius cruelty, Chæreas emboldned himſelfe to diſcouer the calamities and dangers wherin both the city and the whole Empire were plunged, telling him that the common report was, that Caius was the cauſe of them: but (ſaid he) thoſe that will narrowly examine the truth, wil iudge that I, and Papinius that ſtandeth by me, and you, Clement, more then we, haue cauſed the Romans torment, and the worlds miſery, for that of our own will we haue bin miniſters of Caius commands; and although the means lieth in vs to make an end of thoſe violẽces that are committed againſt the citizens, and iniuries to the whole world: yet we ſerue him for his guard and

E hangmen, inſtead of men of warre. And we beare armes, not to maintaine our libertie, and the Roman Empire, but to preſerue him, who keeps their bodies & mindes in ſeruitude: and euery day are we ſoiled in their bloud who are ſlaine and tortured, vntill ſuch time as ſome one ſerue vs with the ſame ſauce, to ſatisfie Caius cruelty. For it is not for the good will he beareth vs, that he maketh vſe of vs: but that which is more, we are ſuſpected by him, and he will cauſe vs to be ſlaine, as he hath done others. For his diſpleaſure is not limited by iuſtice, but by his will: wee alſo ſhall ſerue him for a mark to aime at. For which cauſe, it behoueth vs to prouide for the ſecuritie and liberty of all men, and eſpecially to warrant our ſelues againſt thoſe dangers that threatens vs.

Clement declared by apparent ſignes, that he thought well of Chæreas reſolution, but he coun-

F ſelled him to make no words of it, for feare the rumour thereof ſhould bee ſpread among the people, and the ſecret ſhould be diſcouered before the execution: and leſt that Caius getting an inkling thereof, they ſhould all of them be drawn into danger of death; and in the meane while, it behooued them to hope that ſome good fortune would fall out to their furtherance: and that for himſelfe, his age had taken from him the neceſſary courage that belonged to ſuch enterpriſes. It may be (ſaid he) that I may furniſh you with ſome aduice more ſecure then yours is, Chæreas: for a more honeſter then it is, who is he that can propoſe? This ſaid, Clement returned to his houſe, houſe, ruminating with himſelfe vpon thoſe words which hee had both heard and ſpoken. But Chæreas wext fearfull, and conferred with the Colonell, Cornelius Sabinus, whom he knew to be a man of reputation, a louer of liberty, and greatly diſcontented with the eſtate about the miſeries of the common-weal; and ſeeing it was neceſſary to attempt that with al expedition which he had intended, hee thought good to impart the matter to him; fearing leſt Clement ſhould diſcouer all the conſpiracy, conſidering that delay & procraſtination would be but an occaſion to hinder the action. When as therfore he perceiu'd him to giue willing eare to all that which hee intended, and that already he was confirmed with no leſſe reſolution then himſelfe was; but in that he knew not with whom he might familiarly cõmunicate the ſame, he ſaid nothing: whereas otherwiſe he was ready, not only to conceale that which he had heard, but alſo declared that which he had in his hart, he was ſo much the more incouraged. For which cauſe, without further delay they went to Minucianus, who was conformable vnto them in vertue, good affection, and great courage; and who beſides that, was ſuſpected by Caius by reaſon of Lepidus death. For Minucianus and Lepidus were very great friends, and had been aſſociates in the ſame dangers. For Caius was feared by all thoſe who had any publike office, ſparing none of them in particular or in generall, but made them all grone vnder the burthen of his fury.

Annius Minucianus.

Now they knew well one another, that all of them were diſpleaſed to ſee the common-weale in that eſtate: but the apprehenſion of the danger ſuffred them not to manifeſt the hatred that each one of them bare to Caius, although their ſecret conceit engendred among them a certain amity. For before that time, as often as they mette together, they were accuſtomed to eſteeme Minucianus for the moſt honourable man of the company; as in truth, among all the citizens of Rome he was the moſt famous, valiant and beſt eſteemed among them: being therefore aſſembled at that time, he was firſt of all requeſted to ſpeake his opinion. For which cauſe hee asked Chæreas what the watch-word was hee had receiued that day (for all the city knew very well what mockery Caius vſually vſed in giuing Chæreas the watch-word) Chæreas, notwithſtanding this diſgrace, failed not to anſwer him, relying on the wiſedom of Minucianus, and ſaid vnto him;

„ But giue you mee for the watch-word Liberty; meane while I giue you thankes for that you
„ haue awakened me more ſpeedily then of my ſelfe I haue accuſtomed to be. You need not now „ any further inforce your ſelf to incite me by your words, ſith both you & I haue vndertaken the „ ſame reſolution. Before we were aſſembled in this place, our thoughts were vnited. Behold here „ my ſword, that is girt vnto my ſide; this ſhall ſuffize for vs both. And if you pleaſe, you ſhall be „ my captaine, and I will march vnder your command, & wil follow you vnder aſſurance of your „ aſſiſtance and wiſdome. They, who haue valiant hearts, neuer want armes: for it is a confident „ courage that makes the weapon walk. That which enkindleth me thus to this action, is not the „ conſideration of my particular intereſt: for I haue not the leiſure to think on thoſe dangers that „ threaten me, through the griefe that I conceiue, to ſee the libertie of my countrey changed into „ ſeruitude, and the force of the lawes wholly aboliſhed, and all ſorts of men aſſigned to death by „ the cruelty of Caius. It is I that deſerue to be truſted in this execution, and I make you my iudge, „ ſith you haue the like intention as I haue.

Chæreas, with certain others, intend to kill Caius.

Minucianus perceiuing with what affection Chæreas ſpake, embraced him with all loue; and after he had praiſed him, he exhorted him to continue his conſtancie: then departed they one frõ the other, with praiers and wiſhes; and at that time there hapned a preſage that confirmed them the more. For as Chæreas entred into the Senate, ſome one among the people caſt out a word, that redoubled his courage: Diſpatch (ſaid he) that which thou haſt to do: for God will aſſiſt thee. Chereas was ſomewhat affraid, leſt ſome one of his aſſociates had betraied him. But at laſt, he thought it was ſome one of thoſe, who, being priuy to his reſolution, gaue him a watch-word to animate him the more; or that it was God, who, gouerning and obſeruing humane affaires, puſhed him forward. After he had imparted this his deliberation to diuers; ſundry Senatours, knights, and men of war, being aduertiſed hereof, were in armes. For there was not any one that ſuppoſed not that Caius death was the greateſt good hap the common-weale could expect. For which cauſe, al of them enforc't themſelues, as much as they could, to aſſiſt that execution with courageous and vertuous reſolution: & as forward were they in affection as in power; in words as in effect; deſiring each of them to be partakers in the diſpatch of a tyrant. For Caliſthus alſo, who was Caius free-man, & raiſed him to great authority, yea, ſuch as he almoſt equald him, adioined himſelfe to them for the fear he apprehended of all men, & for thoſe great riches which he had gatherd together, for that he was a man of a corrupt conſcience, & eaſily won by bribes & preſents, doing wrong to all men, & abuſing the power he had againſt whõſoeuer he pleaſed, Caliſthus, Caius freeman, certifies Claudius that Caius commanded him to poiſon him.

contrary

A contrary to all right and reaſon. Beſides, for that he knew the vnbridled nature of Caius, who hauing once conceiued an ill opinion of any man, could neuer afterwards be diſſwaded or reconciled. Amongſt diuers other dangers that he had to apprehend, the greatnes of the danger of his riches was not the leaſt, which was the cauſe that made him ſerue Claudius, & ſecretly to follow him vnder hope, that after Caius death, he ſhould be his ſucceſſor in the Empire, and that at that time he ſhould by him be maintained in the ſame eſtate, which he enioyed: and by this meanes thought hee to obtaine his amity and good liking, by giuing him to vnderſtand how Caius had commanded him to poyſon him, and how he had inuented infinit delaies to deferre this execution. As for mine owne part, I thinke that Caliſthus forged this matter. For if Caius had pretended to kill Claudius, he had not been diſſwaded by Caliſthus allegations, who had incontinently B receiued his reward, if he had deferred to execute his Maſters command, with all expedition in a matter ſo acceptable to him. So it is, that the prouidence of God would not permit Caius to execute that rage againſt Claudius, and Caliſthus was thereby thanked for a benefite which he no waies deſerued.

Thoſe that were about Chæreas day by day, followed the action very ſlowly, notwithſtanding that he willingly delayed not, but thought all occaſions fit to finiſh his purpoſe in, for that hee might aſſaile him at ſuch time as he aſcended vp into the Capitol, or euen then when he ſolemnized thoſe ceremonies, which he had inſtituted in honor of his daughter, or at ſuch time as he ſtood in the palace to ſcatter gold, and ſiluer money among the people, by caſting him from the toppe of the palace into the market place, or at ſuch time as he celebrated thoſe myſteries, that C were introduced by him. For no man ſuſpected Chæreas, ſo diſcreetly had he behaued himſelfe in all things: and he perſwaded himſelfe that no man would haue thought, that he ſhould lay violent hands on Caius. And although he had done nothing to any effect; yet ſo it is, that the power of the gods was ſufficient to giue him force, and to kill him without drawing weapon. Chæreas was ſore diſpleaſed againſt his companions, in reſpect that hee feared that they would let ſlip their occaſions; and although they perfectly knew that he trauailed for the maintenance of the lawes, and for the good of them all: yet did they requeſt him to delay a little; for feare leſt in the execution he ſhould in ſome ſort miſcarry, and for that cauſe the citie might be brought in trouble, by the informations that would be made of that act; and that finally when Caius ſhould be D ſo much the better defenced againſt them, they ſhold not know how to ſhew their vertue, when the time required that they ſhould aſſault and ſet vpon him. They therfore thought it good that the opportunity to ſet forward this buſineſs, ſhould be the time in which the games of the palace were celebrated, which were ſolemnized in honour of Cæſar, who firſt of all diſannulled the peoples authority, and appropriated it to himſelfe. This ſolemnity is celebrated in a Tent before the palace, where the noble citizens with their wiues and children remained to behold the ſport, and Cæſar himſelfe likewiſe. At that time concluded they that it would be an eaſie matter for them, when as ſo many thouſands of people ſhould bee ſhut vp in ſo narrow a place; ſo that he, who would ſtep formoſt to giue the ſtroke, might very eaſily be ſuccoured, for that he could haue no force in armes, although his guard ſhould haue the courage and deſire to defend him. Chæreas reſolued vpon this, and it was concluded that the firſt day of thoſe ſports that E were next at hand, the deed ſhould be done: but their aduenture was greater then their concluſion. For the delay was ſuch, as the third day was almoſt paſt, and hardly could they be drawne to attempt the matter on the third day. At which time Chæreas aſſembled all the confederates, and told them that the opportunity of time that ouerſlipt them, accuſed and reproached them of ſlackneſſe in that execution, which had been ſo vertuouſly reſolued amongſt them: and that it was to be feared, leaſt if any ſhould be diſcouered, the whole matter ſhould waxe fruſtrate: by which meanes Caius might grow more cruell then hee was before. See we not (ſaid he) that by how much liberty we take from our ſelues, by ſo much we augment Caius tyranny? whereas we ought firſt of all to obtaine ſecurity for our ſelues, and afterwards purchaſe perpetuall felicity to others, the greateſt glory whereof ſhall redound vnto our ſelues. Now they hauing nothing F to reply againſt ſo honorable a reſolution, and yet notwithſtanding no waies enforcing themſelues towards the action, but remaining altogether diſmaied without one word ſpeaking, Chæreas ſpake thus:

Chæreas expecteth the occaſion to aſſaile Caius.

The finall concluſion of the confederates as touching Caius death.

Moſt noble and generous Gentlemen, what is the cauſe that we linger and delay in this ſort? ſee you not that this day is the laſt day of the games, and that Caius is ready to depart to ſea? For he hath determined to ſaile into Alexandria, and to ſee Ægypt: verily it will be a ſmall honour for vs, if we ſuffer him to eſcape our hands, to the end that both by land and ſea, he may triumph

ouer the Romans vaine boaſt and negligence. How can we chuſe but condemn our ſelues iuſtly, G and chalenge nothing but diſhonour, if ſome Egyptian ſuppoſing that men of free condition could not any longer endure his inſolence, ſhould put the matter in execution? For mine owne part, I will dreame no longer vpon your conſultations, but this very day I will hazard my ſelfe; "and betide me what can, I will ſuſtaine all fortunes with pleaſure and courage. For I am a man "of that minde, that no danger can be ſo great or grieuous to daunt mee, as that Caius ſhould bee "ſlaine, during my life time, and I ſhould be depriued of ſo deſerued an honour, which ſo worthy "an attempt may chalenge. This ſaid, hee departed with an intent to attempt and end the matter, and encouraged the reſt to do the like; ſo that all of them were deſirous to ſet hand to the enterpriſe, without any further delay. The cuſtome was, that the captains of the guard entred the palace with their ſwords by their ſides, and in ſuch equipage they asked the Emperour the watch- H word. At that time it fortuned that it was Chæreas turne to fet the word; when as a great number of people flocked to the palace, to take vp their places to behold the games with great preaſe and noyſe; wherein Caius was greatly delighted: for there was no diſtinction of place either for Senators or Knights, but each one ſate together confuſedly, men and women, ſlaues & freemen. Caius, arriuing there firſt, had offered ſacrifice in honour of Cæſar Auguſtus, in dignifyng whom likewiſe thoſe ſports were ſolemnized. It came to paſſe that whileſt thoſe beaſts were embowelled, that were appointed for ſacrifice, Aſprenas gowne; who at that time was Senator, was beſprinkled with blood: whereat Caius began to laugh; yet notwithſtanding, this was a preſage for Aſprenas. For he was ſlain that very day that Caius was. It is reported that Caius at that time, contrary to his own nature, behaued himſelfe moſt affably towards all men; ſo that all the aſſiſtants I were aſtoniſhed to behold the curteſie that he vſed. After the ſacrifice was done, hee ſate him down to behold the paſtimes, & had about him the moſt noble of his friends & familiars. Now was there euery yeare a Theater builded, according to this form & faſhion that enſueth: it had two gates, the one towards the open yard; the other opening vpon the porch, by which the actors had their egreſſe and regreſſe, without diſturbance of thoſe who ſate to behold the paſtime: There was within the ſame a certain ſeuerall roome, ſeparated from the reſt, where the plaiers & muſicians kept. When the people were ſeated, & Chæreas with the captains were neer about Cæſar, who ſate on the right ſide of the Theater: Batibius one of the Senators, a man very expert in feats of Armes, asked Cluuitus priuily in his eare, who ſate by him & had in like ſort bin Conſul, whether he heard any newes? who anſwering him, that he had heard nothing, on this this day K (ſaid Batibius) ſhal the tragedy be plaid of a tyrants death. Cluuitus made him this reply in Homers words: Whiſt; leaſt ſome Greeke ſhould liſten to our talke.

Now whileſt ſome one darted certaine apples and rare and precious birds at the people, Caius tooke great pleaſure to behold how they ſtroue one with another round about him, buffetting one another to ſee who ſhould get the ſame: but at that preſent there chanced two preſages: for the ſport that was repreſented was of a Iudge, who was apprehended and crucified, and in the dance they repreſented Cynera, who was ſlaine with Myrrha her daughter: and there was a great quantitie of blood gathered to counterfait both the murther of the Iudge that was crucified, as alſo of Cynera. It is affirmed likewiſe, that the day was the very ſame, whereon Philip the ſon of L Amyntas King of Macedon, had been ſlaine by Pauſanias one of his familiars, at ſuch time as he entred the Theater. Whileſt Caius was incertaine with himſelfe whether he ſhould remaine vntil the ſports were finiſht, for that it was the laſt day of them, or rather ſhould reſort to the bath, and after he had taken his refection returne back againe thither, as he had done before time; Minucianus ſitting next vnto him, fearing leaſt the occaſion ſhould be ouerſlipt, aroſe for that he had ſeene Chæreas depart out of doores, with an intent to goe and encourage him. But Caius catcht him by the gown, ſaying, Whither go you my friend? At which time for the reuerence ſake that he bare vnto Cæſar, he ſate him down againe: but the feare that he had grew ſo forcible, that he aroſe againe; ſo that Caius could not detaine him, ſuppoſing that he departed thence to diſpatch ſome important buſineſs. At that time did Aſprenas counſaile Cæſar to repaire to the bath, telling M him that after his refection hee might returne thither againe; all which hee did, being deſirous that the reſolution might take effect. They that were with Chæreas were already diſpoſed to take aduantage of the time, and were agreed each of them to ſtand prepared and in a readineſſe, in a place appointed, to the intent to act the tragedy: and the delay was very grieuous vnto them, for that it was already three a clock after noone. So that Chæreas ſeeing that Caius lingred ſo long, intended to go in vnto him and aſſaile him in his ſeat: but he conceiued that he could not bring that to paſſe without great loſſe and murther of Senators, and Knights that were there preſent.

A Now although he had this apprehenſion; yet addreſſed he himſelf to the execution therof, ſuppoſing that the loſſe that might happen by the death of ſome one, would be well recompenced by the ſecurity and liberty, that would redound vnto all men. When as therefore they were in a readineſs to enter the Theater, newes was brought them that Caius was riſen to come forth; by means whereof there aroſe ſom noyſe. For which cauſe the confederates turned backe into the Theater, and appeaſed the people, telling them that they diſpleaſed & annoyed the Emperour: but the effect was, to draw him aſide from all thoſe, who might yeeld him any aſſiſtance; and ſo to ſet vpon him. Before Caius marched Claudius his vncle, and M. Minucius his ſiſters husband and Valerius, who at that time was Proconſul, who might not any waies be be drawen from their place, although they had the will, by reaſon of the place and dignity which they held. Caius fol-
B lowed after them, accompanied with Paulus Arruntius. Now when he was entred into the palace, he left the ready way where his officers were, and Claudius with his aſſociates held: he turned aſide by an vnfrequented way to the bathes, vpon purpoſe to ſee certaine yong boyes, who were come out of Aſia, and were ſent him out of that country, partly to ſing in thoſe ceremonies that were inſtituted by him, and partly to dance in armes about the Theater; and in that place Chereas came and encountred him, asking him the watch-word: which Caius gaue him very reprochfully according to his cuſtome. For which cauſe without any further delay, Chereas aſſayling him both in word and act, drew his ſword and gaue him a great wound, which notwithſtanding was not mortal: ſome ſay that Chereas purpoſely wounded him after that ſort, becauſe he would not kill him at once, but to his further torment increaſe the number of his wounds: but I can not
C beleeue the ſame, for that in ſuch executions a man hath no leaſure to determine how to ſtrike. And if Chereas had ſuch an intention, I account him the verieſt foole that might be, for that hee rather tooke his pleaſure to content his deſpite, then readily to deliuer both himſelfe & others, who by his delay in being of his confederacy might be drawen into hazard. For if Caius had not beene ſuddenly ſlaine, hee could not haue wanted meanes of reſcous, and it ſhould ſeeme that Chereas had not pretended to doe ſo much miſchiefe to Caius, as to himſelfe and his fellow confederates. And being in this incertainty, whether his enterpriſe ſhould haue fallen out happily or no, he had without reaſon both vndone himſelfe and loſt the occaſion: whereas hauing happily hit home, he might without a word ſpeaking, warrantize himſelfe againſt thoſe, who would
D offend him. But let each man think what beſt pleaſeth him. Caius feeling the griefe of the wound (for he was ſtrooken betwixt the ſhoulder and the neck, and his ſword could not pearce further, by reaſon that it hit vpon the firſt bone of the breaſt) he cryed not in any ſort, neither called for any of his friends, whether it were that he diſtruſted them all, or that he had ſom other thought, and in lamenting himſelfe he paſt onward. But he was met by Cornelius Sabinus, who was already prepared to encounter him, who thruſt him downe vpon his knees: whereupon all of them enuironed him round about, and with mutuall exhortations encouraged one another to do their vttermoſt in murthering him. At length in all mens opinion they agreed on this, that it was Aquila that gaue him the deadly wound, that ſeuered his ſoule from his body. But this act ought to be attributed to Chereas. For although diuers ſet to their hands in the action, yet was he the firſt,
E who had bethought him of the action, hauing long time before any of them premeditated the ſame, after what ſort it ſhould be attempted: and he alſo was the firſt that durſt boldly impart it vnto others, and who after they had allowed of his reſolution aſſembled them: and when as euery one was to ſpeake his opinion, he concluded the ſame very diſcreetly, and had alwaies done farre more then the reſt; ſo that by his earneſt and honourable perſwaſions, he encouraged thoſe that were faint-hearted, ſince at ſuch time as the opportunity preſented it ſelfe to ſet hand to the execution, hee was the firſt that attempted it, and who valiantly ſtrooke and made an eaſie way to the reſt, who found Caius calme enough, in that he was a man almoſt thorowly ſlaine. For which cauſe, it is neceſſary, that all that which others haue done ſhould be aſcribed to Chereas aduice, vertue and diligence.

Thus died Caius, being ſlaughtered with many mortall wouuds: now when Chereas and his
F companions had diſpatched him, they perceiued well that it would bee impoſſible for them to ſaue themſelues, if ſo bee they ſhould returne by the way that they came; ſo much were they raviſhed with that which they had done. For they drew themſelues into no ſmall danger, by murthering an Emperour, who was cheriſhed and beloued thorow the folly of the common people, and whoſe death the men of warre would not leaue vnpuniſhed. Now in that the waies were narrow where the murther was done, and they themſelues alſo were hindered by reaſon of the great number of people, and officers and ſouldiers that gaue their attendance that day in garding the Emperor, they tooke another way & retired themselues into Germanicus lodging, who G was Caius father, whom they had lately slaughtered. This house adioyned vpon the palace. For although the palace was but one, yet consisted it of diuers lodgings which were builded by seuerall Emperours; whose names, whether they had begun or finished the workes, were imposed on the same buildings. When as therefore they were escaped from the preasse, they were in safety as long as the inconuenience that had befallen the Emperour was as yet hidden. The first report of his death came to the Germans who were of his guard, being a company chosen out of that nation named the Celtique band, for the preseruation of the Emperours person. These men are very prone vnto wrath, and amongst all other Barbarians, it is a rare thing in them to examine the causes of their execution: otherwise they are men strong in body, and who in the warres alwaies giue the first onset, yeelding great aduantage to those on whose side they fight. H They hauing notice of Caius murther, were vehemently aggrieued therat, for that it is their manner to censure all things, not according to right, but as they are answerable to their own profits: Caius in especiall was dearely beloued by them, in that he had obtained their fauour by bestowing much money vpon them. Their captaine was one called Sabinus, who was not aduanced to that estate, either for his vertue or the nobility of his ancestors (for he was but a feneer) but for his mighty strength and huge body. They therfore ran about with their naked swords searching for Caius murtherers from house to house: and meeting with Asprenas at first, whose gowne (as we haue said) was bebloodied with the blood of the slaughtered sacrifice, which was a presage that boaded him but little good fortune, they heawed him in peeces. The second was Norbanus (who for his nobility and ancestors might deriue his titles from the noblest Citizens, a- I mongst whom were diuers generals of armies) who seeing they made no reckoning of his dignity, and being of himselfe endowed with great force and strength, hee tooke a sword from one of them which first assailed him, with whom he grapled, and made them know that he intended they should buy his blood very deerely: and in deede so had hee done, but that being inuironed by diuers, who assailed him at once, he was beaten down and slaughtered with many deadly wounds. The third was Anteius, one of the number of the Senators, who with some others met not with these men by chance, as the two other had done; but to shew the hatred that hee bare vnto Caius, and the pleasure that he tooke to see him lie dead, was come out of his house, being egged on with enuy to feed his eyes with that spectacle. For Caius had banished Anteius father, whose name likewise was Anteius, and not content therewith hee had sent his souldiers to K kill him. He therefore with great pleasure beheld the slaughtered carcasse of this tyrant: but hearing the vprore that was raised in euery part of the house, he thought good to hide himselfe; yet might he not auoid the narrow search of the Germans, who were so displeased, that they slew all those whom they met with, whether they were guilty or guiltles of the fact. Thus were these three made away.

What sort of people they were that lamented Caius death.

But after the rumour of Caius death was heard in the Theater, euery one was amazed, and could scarcely beliue it. For although diuers of them were very glad, that he was taken out of the world, perswading themselues that it would highly profit them; yet did their feare hinder their beliefe. On the other side, there were some, who desiring not that any such mishap should befall Cæsar, and conceiuing in their thoughts, that it was impossible to be done, for that there L was no man so hardy, as to enterprise the same; they supposed the report to bee vtterly vntrue. Of this minde were certaine women and children, slaues and souldiers. These, by reason they receiued wages at his hand, and tyrannized with him, being his ministers in all those outrages that he offered to many good citizens, in partaking the bootie and other aduantages that Caius drew vnto him. As for the women and children, they were of that opinion, by reason that such kinde of people take delight in plaies, iests, donations of flesh, and other such pastimes, which Caius in word pretended to do to gratifie the common people, but in effect it was to haue means to satisfie his rage and cruelty. He was also gratious among the seruants & slaues, for that by him they had the liberty to accuse and contemne their Masters, and were therein countenanced by Caius. For when they falsely accused their Masters, they were easily beleeued: and when they M discouered their Masters treasures, in recompence of their discouery they were not only made free by him, but also sent home with rich and ample rewards. For the reward that was assigned them, was the eighth part of those goods that were confiscated. As for certaine of the nobility, although the matter seemed true to some of them, for that before time they were priuy to that which the rest intended, and notwithstanding they desired that the enterprise should be effected: yet kept they all things close, and gaue no signe of ioy, nor made any shew that they heard

A that which was reported. For ſom of them feared leſt if they ſhould be fruſtrated of their hope, they ſhould bring themſelues in danger of puniſhment, for that they had diſcouered their intent ſooner then they ſhould haue done. They likewiſe who knew the enterpriſe and were confederates with the actors; yet did they more cloſely conceal it the one from the other, fearing leſt if they ſhould diſcouer the matter to any one of thoſe, who drew any commodity from Caius tyranny, they might bewray them: whereby if Caius ſhould be yet aliue, they might incurre the danger of puniſhment. For the voice was, that he had been wounded in certaine places; yet that he was not ſlaine; but as yet aliue, and among his Phiſitians hands, who dreſſed his wounds. No man therefore durſt liberally diſcouer the ſecrets of his heart to his neighbour: for they that ſpred thoſe reports were either friends (and for that cauſe were ſuſpected as fauourers of his ty-
B ranny) or enemies, and by that meanes in that they were but ſiniſterly affected towards Caius, there was no certainty to be gathered of that which they ſaid. There aroſe alſo another report, which abaſhed and beat downe the hearts and hopes of the nobility, namely that Caius ſetting light by the danger wherein he was, and as little alſo by the wounds he had receiued, was come into the market place all bloody as he was, and after that manner declaimed before the people. See here how they that ſpred theſe rumors, preferred their coniectures, which were void of all reaſon; which diſtracted thoſe vncertainly that heard the ſame, according as they were affectioned. This notwithſtanding no man remooued from his place, for feare leaſt they ſhould be ſuddenly accuſed, knowing well that they ſhould be cenſured, not according to their thoughts and affections, but according to the diſpoſition of their iudges and accuſers.

Diuers rumors of Cæſars death.

C But after that the troupe of Germans had inuironed the Theater with their naked ſwords, all the aſſiſtants expected nothing but death; and as ſoone as any man entred, they were ſeized with ſuch an amazement, as if they had already felt the ſtrokes; ſo that they knew not what to do, hauing no heart to depart from thence: and otherwiſe perſwading themſelues, that if they ſtayed there any longer, it would breed them further danger. Finally, when the ſouldiers were entred into the Theater by force, all the whole aſſembly cried out, and beſought them, proteſting that whatſoeuer was done it was beſides their knowledge, whether it were either attempted by conſpiracy, or any other means. They therfore moſt humbly intreated them, that they would ſpare them, and not inflict the penalty of the guilty on thoſe that were innocent: for their owne parts,
D they beſought them to ſearch out thoſe, who had cõmitted the act, if any ſuch thing were committed. And thus ſpake they with teares, beating their breaſts, and calling the gods to witneſſe, alledging all that which the preſent danger ſuggeſted them with, and as much as ſuch as pleaded for their liues could profer. By theſe perſwaſions of theirs the ſouldiers fury was abated; ſo that they began to repent themſelues of that which they had executed in the Theater: for this alſo was a cruelty, as they themſelues (notwithſtanding their barbarous inciuility) ſuppoſed it to be; which was, that the heads of Aſprenus and other that were ſlaine, were carried and ſet vpon an Altar. Whereat all the aſſiſtants were moſt grieuouſly diſcontented, remembring themſelues of the dignity of the men, and hauing compaſſion of that which had befallen them; conſidering alſo that they themſelues were not farre off from dangers, being vncertaine whether they ſhould ſaue themſelues: whereby it came to paſſe, that ſome of thoſe, who had for good cauſe hated
E Caius, durſt not freely reioyce at his death, becauſe they were vpon the point to loſe their owne liues, hauing as yet no appearance of any ſafety.

The German ſouldiers reſort to the Theater.

At length Aruntius, a man who was gratious among the people, and was one of the common cryers, who had a ſtrong voice, and by crying ſuch goods as were to be ſolde, had gathered ſo great ſubſtance, as that he was accounted one of the richeſt men in Rome, and in great eſtimation amongſt all men in that behalfe, entred the Theater in a mourning habit, and after a lamentable manner: and although hee inwardly hated Caius; yet for the feare he conceiued leaſt hee ſhould loſe his goods, and in conſideration of the preſent danger, he diſſembled his ioy, wearing all thoſe garments of mourning, and vſing no leſſe lamentation then if hee had bemoaned the death of his deareſt friend. After this manner came he into the Theater, publiſhing Caius death,
F to the intent that the people might not be ignorant of that which had hapned: after this, he began to repreſſe the rage of the Germans, and commanded their captaines and tribunes to put vp their ſwords, certifying them of the Emperours death, which act of his did manifeſtly ſaue the liues of all thoſe, who were aſſembled in the Theater; and all them likewiſe, whom they could haue met with. For if they had had but the leaſt ſurmiſe, that Caius had as yet beene aliue, there was not any ſort of cruelty which they had not committed. For they bare him ſo great loue and affection, that to warrantize him frõ that miſhap, they would haue redeemed him with the loſſe of their own liues. But as soon as they vnderstood that he was dead, they repressed their furious rage, which egged them forward to reuenge: knowing that it auailed them nothing to discouer their affections towards him, in that he could yeeld them no requital. Besides, the feare they had least that in pursuit of their tyrannous murthers, the Senate should be incensed against them, if so be the gouernment of the estate should bee returned into their hands, made them containe themselues. Thus was the fury of these Germans appeased for the death of Caius. G

Chæreas, Minucianus, and Clement consult about Cæsars death.

Meane while Chæreas (who feared very much least Minucianus should fall into the Germans hands, and in their fury be slaughtered by them) sought for him among the souldiers, enquiring of euery one whether they knew if hee were slaine or no. Whereupon Minucianus and Clement were brought vnto him, who in his presence commended Chæreas exploit, and gaue him thanks in the name of the whole Senate, who witnessed that it was to the generall benefit and good of the cõmon-weale, and that the greatest persons were beholding to him, for that he had neither wanted good aduice in his deliberation, nor courage to execute his resolution; alledging that the nature of tyrannie was such, that being puffed vp with a short pleasure of vniust & intolerable rule, it finally (as being hated by all good men) determined and ended in misery, as it manifestly appeared in that which had befallen Caius; who before any thing was either deuised, practized or executed against him, was already hatefull to all men, and had in such sort violated all lawes, that his greatest friends were resolued to take armes against him, who in appearance had depriued him of life, when both in truth and in effect it was he himself, who was the author of his owne ruine. H

Arcion a certain Physician dismisseth some.

Hereupon all they arose who were in the Theater, and raised great noise and trouble in seeking to saue themselues. The occasion was, that a certaine Physician called Arcion, being called out to goe and dresse certaine men that were wounded, making a shew as if he went to goe and prepare such things, as were necessary for those that were wounded, made those issue out with him who sate neerest vnto him: but the truth was that hee did it to the end to draw them out of the present danger. Meane while the Senate assembled themselues in the palace, and the people flocked together to make enquiry after those, who had murthered Caius: the people with an intire and simple intent, the Senate onely to vse some formall proceeding. For Valerius Asiaticus, who had otherwhiles been Consul, came forth among the people, who were in an vprore; and supposing it a strange matter that no man knew who had slaine the Emperour, whilest euery one enquired who it was that had done the deed: O said he, would it had bin I that had done it. But the Consuls published an edict, containing the accusations that were presented against Caius, commanding the people and souldiers, who were as yet in the Theater, to retire themselues to their lodgings. And the people were put in great hope, that they should be eased of those taxations, wherewith before time they had been burthened: and the men of warre were promised honours and dignities, if they would containe themselues in their accustomed order, and stirre vp no further trouble. For it was to be feared least if they had been further fleshed in slaughters, the Citie should haue fallen into some great danger through rapines & the spoiles both of houses and temples. But by this time all the whole order of the Senate were assembled, especially those who were confederates in Caius murther; who seemed to gather courage, and to speake boldly as if the gouernment of the estate had been fallen into their hands. CHAP. II.

Claudius tooke vpon him the gouernment of the Empire.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 2. The souldiers elect Claudius Emperour.

WHileſt the estate of the Empire was thus distracted, Claudius was suddenly fetcht out of his house: For the souldiers assembling themselues together, and conferring among themselues what was requisit to be done, perceiued that it was impossible, that so many and so waighty affairs of the common-weale should be wel disposed by a popular gouernment; and that this change also would yeeld them little profit, if some of those who were in authority should happen to obtain the soueraigne gouernment. Furthermore, that it would be euery way preiudiciall vnto them, if they had not a part of the gouernance, & a hand in the administration of the common-weale. Whileſt therefore the soueraigne authority remained as yet vndisposed, they thought meet to elect Claudius, who was Caius vncle, for their Emperour; who was a man of that reputation, that none of those, who had been assembled in the Senate, was more capable then he was, both in regard of the vertue of his ancestors, as also in respect of the doctrin wher- M

A with he was endowed. Who likewiſe being by them exalted to the dignity of the Empire, wold honor them, and with all anſwerable bounty acknowledge their good deſerts. This concluſion of theirs was both admitted, and preſently executed: ſo that Claudius was receiued and elected Emperour by the men of warre. But Cnaius Sentius Saturninus hauing intelligence that Claudius was in this ſort elected (who in appearance ſeemed vertuouſly to contradict, but in effect deſired nothing more) preſented himſelfe before the Senate: and being neither amated nor amazed in any ſort, he freely ſpake his minde, and as it became his birth and nobility, he ſpake vnto the aſſembly after the manner that enſueth. The yeare of the world 4005. after Chriſts birth 43.

You Lords of Rome, although it be an incredible matter, that the liberty which hath ſo long time been vnexpected, ſhould returne and viſit vs; yet ſo it is, that wee ſee the excellency there- B of, although it be vncertaine how long time the Gods will beſtow it on vs: which is ſuch, that it may reioyce vs for the preſent, what iſſue ſoeuer it may haue hereafter. For to them that know what vertue is, it is no ſmall felicity to liue one houre in freedome of mind, and in a free country gouerned by ſuch lawes, which in times paſt haue made our cõmon-weale to flouriſh. For mine owne part, I cannot remember our ancient liberty, for that I was borne after the ſubuerſion thereof: But I infinitly deſire to haue the happy fruition of that which we enioy at this preſent. And I think them alſo very happy, who are borne and brought vp in vertuous ſtudies. I likewiſe ſuppoſe that a ſecond honour next to the immortall Gods is to be aſcribed to them, by whoſe vertue at laſt though very late euen in this our age, wee haue obtained the felicity to enioy the ſame: which happineſs would God with our inheritances we might bequeath to our poſterity. C For in in regard of our ſelues, this day ſufficeth vs both, as well all thoſe that are yong as they alſo who are old. For the aged ſhall forſake this life with more pleaſure, in that they haue had the knowledge of that bleſſing which is annexed to their liberty: and the yonger ſhall be furniſhed with a royall example in admiring & knowing their vertues, by whom we enioy this benefit of freedom. For in regard of the preſent time, there is not any thing that we ought more earneſtly to affect, then to liue vertuouſly. For only vertue is the thing that confirmeth men in their liber- tie. I cannot ſpeake of the time paſt, but only by hearſay: but for that I haue ſeen with mine eies, and perceiued by my obſeruation, I know how great miſchiefes tyrannies do ordinarily breed in a politike eſtate: for they vtterly extinguiſh all vertue, and depriue freemen of all that perfect D magnanimity that may be in them, and teach both to flatter & to feare, for that the cõmon-weal is abandonted not to the wiſdome of the lawes, but to the fury of intemperate gouernours. For ſince Iulius Cæſar bent his thoughts to ouerthrow the popular gouernment in Rome, and violated that happy courſe of law, whereby our ſtate was policied, the common-weale hath been ouer- throwne. For in ſubiecting the law to his good liking, and himſelf to his particular deſires, there is not any kind of miſery & miſchiefe, that hath not ouerthrown our citie; ſo that his ſucceſſors haue imploied themſelues to the vttermoſt, and with a certain emulation, to aboliſh the lawes of our countrey, ſtriuing which of them might deſpoile our cõmon-weale of her nobleſt citizens: for that they haue made their account, that their ſecurity conſiſted in communicating their ſe- crets with ſuch as were baſe and abiect, abaſing not only the hauty courages of thoſe men, who were famous for their nobility and vertue, but alſo by ſlaughtering a great number of them by E all ſorts of puniſhment: and whileſt each of them laboured to be abſolute in their command, they enforced themſelues to oppreſſe the common-weale.

But amongſt all the reſt, Caius, who this day hath loſt the benefit of life, hath wrought greater miſchiefes himſelfe alone, then any other, by inforcing his brutiſh and beaſtly wrath not onely againſt the common citizens, but alſo againſt his own parents and friends; demeaning himſelfe alike towards all men, and manifeſting his vniuſtice in that he purſued them with moſt iniury, who were moſt innocent: and by this meanes grew hatefull not onely to men, but alſo to the immortall Gods. For it is not enough for tyrants to ſatisfie their concupiſcence, to vſe all ſorts of outrages, to rauiſh both mens wealth and their wiues; but alſo their gaine and glory is, when they may vtterly ruinate both their fortunes and families, who are their enemies. For all liber- F tie is oppoſed againſt tyranny, and it is impoſſible (notwithſtanding all the miſeries that may be imagined or offered) that freemen ſhould accord with tyrants, how little time ſoeuer it be that they haue exerciſed their tyrannie. They alſo know too well with how many miſchiefes they haue entangled their ſubiects (although they haue not the ſpirits to reuenge themſelues of thoſe wrongs that are done vnto them) and being well aſſured into what incombrances they haue drawne them, perſwade themſelues, that they haue but one only meanes left them to warrantize themſelues from ſuſpicions; and to procure their owne ſecurity, which is, to put them to death,

if they may possibly doe it. Sith therefore at this present you are deliuered from so many mis- G chiefes, and are no more subiect, except to one another (which is a pledge of concord for the present, and of security in time to come, and glory vnto him that hath redressed the estate) you shall deale very well and wisely in my opinion to prouide for the common-weale, foreseeing very diligently all that which concerneth the good and profit thereof. It is free for any man to speake his opinion of that which displeaseth him, for that there is no superiour to countermand their sayings, or that is exempt from reproofe if hee offend against the common-weale, or that may threaten with the authority of an Emperor for that shall be said. For what else in these later times hath increased and furthered our ouer-topping tyranny, then their slouthfull feare, who durst in no sort oppose themselues against his lust? For being entangled by a certain kind of pleasure of a quiet life, and accustomed to liue after the manner of slaues, and being afraid also to dy H vertuously, and desirous to liue with shame, we are fallen into these scarce sufferable calamities, and into such mischiefes as haue concerned vs too neerly. First of all therfore, you ought to honour those, who haue slaine the tyrant, by dignifying them with as great honors as may be imagined, and especially Chæreas. For he only hath bin the man, who by the power of the gods, and thorow his great wisdome & valour, hath giuen you your liberty. Neither ought you to forget him, but to heap honors on his head, yea especiall fauours, as to the man who first of all consulted, and first of all hazarded himselfe against a tyrant for your liberty. It is an honest & wel-beseeming action in men of free hearts, to restore and repay condigne kindnes for the benefites that they haue receiued: such is this man in your behalfe, not like to Brutus & Cassius, who murthered Cæsar; for they were the originals of seditions & ciuill wars in this citie: and this man by I the death of a tyrant, hath not only at once deliuered you of him, but also hath cut off all those mischiefs that arose by him.

An exhortation to maintain liberty.

Chæreas to be honored for his noble attempt.

Thus spake Sentius, and his aduice was entertained with great applause, not onely by the Senators, but the knights also that were there present. Whereupon a certaine Senator called Trebellius Maximus arose, and stepping to him, pulled off the ring which Sentius had on his finger, wherein was inchased a stone with Caius picture in it, which Sentius had forgot to pull off: so intent was he about that which he both said and did: and by this meanes the engraued image was broken. Now for that it was late, Chæreas demanded the watch-word at the Consuls hands, who gaue him the word Liberty. Thus all of them were astonished at this change, and could scarcely belieue that which had hapned. For since that time that the popular gouernment had been abo- K lished, the Consuls had neuer giuen the watchword vntill that present time. For before the city was oppressed by tyranny, the Consuls commanded the men of warre. After that Chæreas had receiued the word, he gaue it to his souldiers, who subscribed to the Senats authority: of these there were about foure companies, which preferred the lawfull gouernment before a tyranny, who also retired themselues to their chieftaines. As for their parts, the people returned to their seuerall houses, full of ioy, hope and courage, for that they had regained the gouernment of the state, which belonged vnto them, and not to any particular gouernour. In a word, Chæreas was their only hope: He foreseeing that there would some mischiefe follow, if Caius wife & daughter should remaine aliue; and that if all his friends and family should not be vtterly extinguished, L
all those who shold be spared, would serue to no other end, but to the ruine of the cómon-weale and the lawes: and on the other side, desiring to see a finall end of that which he had begun, and to satisfie that hatred he had conceiued against Caius, he sent Iulius Lupus one of the captains of the guard, to kil both his wife & daughter, which he did. And the cause why he gaue this charge chiefly to Lupus, was, for that Lupus was Clements kinsman, who was a confederate in the execution of Caius; to the end that partaking after this manner the death of the tyrant, hee might be knowne to haue dealt as forwardly for the common-weale, as if from the beginning he had bin a counseller and agent in the conspiracy. Notwithstanding, there were some of his companions of that opinion, that it should be but cruelty to deale with a woman in that sort, for that Caius had offended thorow the corruption of his owne nature, and not by the counsell of his wife; and M that all those euils which he committed in the common-weale, by desolating the flower therof was his owne offence, not hers.

Chæreas requireth a watch-word at the Consuls hands.

Chæreas sendeth Iulius Lupus to kill Caius wife & daughter.

Thre were others that accused her to be the cause of all that which Caius had committed, alledging that she had giuen him an amorous drink, by which he was tied & entangled in such sort vnto her, and so led and transported by her loue, that she gouerned all that which concerned the estate of Rome, and the world subiect to Rome; but her defenders preuailed nothing. For finally it was resolued, that she should lose her life.

To

A To finish this tragedy, Lupus was dispatcht, who lost no time in the accomplishment of their intent who had sent him, for feare he had to be blamed, and accounted but coldly affectionate towards the good of the common-weale. As soon as therfore he came into the palace, he found Cæsonia, Caius widow, lying fast by the body of her slaughtered husband, destitute of all that which the law gratifieth those that are dead with, altogether bloody & greatly afflicted, hauing her daughter fast couched by her. Being in this estate, she was heard to vtter no other words, but that she blamed Caius, for that he had not giuen credit to that counsell which she had giuen him so often: which words of hers, were by certaine of them interpreted two waies. For some of them thought that she meant, that she had counselled her husband to giue ouer his cruelty, and murthers which he exercised against his citizens; and that in his gouernment he shold vse a tem-
B pered measure with vertue, for feare least his subiects misliking of his manners, should seeke his destruction. Others took it as if she had encouraged Caius to set vpon the cõspirators & kill them, without any delay; yea, before they had committed any offence, and by that means prouide for his security. They therefore said, that Cæsonia blamed Caius for that hee had behaued himselfe too carelesly, in that wherein she had counselled him. Such were the words Cæsonia spake, and such was the exposition, as diuers men interpreted the same.

Cæsonia accuseth Caius for that he would not giue credit to her counsels.

She seeing Lupus comming, shewed him Caius body, and besought him with teares and complaints to come no neerer. But perceiuing that he cõtinued in his resolution, & made no account of her words, but did that for which he came; after that she knew the cause of his arriuall, she offred her naked throat vnto him, with a great courage, vsing such supplications as they ordinarily C do who despair of their liues. For she willed him to defer no longer, to finish that tragedy which his companions had begun, & died in this sort courageously by the hand of Lupus: and after her was her daughter slain, which was very yong. This did Lupus certifie Chæreas of with all expedition. This was Caius end, after he had liued foure years, wanting foure months. Before such time as he obtained the Empire, he was an intemperate & wicked man, and addicted to his pleasure, a fauourer of tale-bearers, exceeding fearefull, and for that cause, when he got the vpper hand of any man, he was ready to kill him. He esteemed this the only fruit of his power, when he abused the same against innocents; and gathered or heaped vp great spoiles and booties by wicked and vniust murthers, rapines and oppressions; lifting himselfe aboue all humane authority, and af-
D fecting to be esteemed as a God, suffering himselfe to be transported by the peoples praises. Furthermore, all that which the law condemned and punished, as a thing most detestable, that made he vse of to punish vertue with. He neuer remembred any friendship that had beene done him, how great soeuer it either was or had bin, at such time as he was in his choler, and was apt to inflict punishments in his rage on iust and vpright men. All that which was answerable to vertue, was odious in his eyes: In all things that him listed hee had so violent appetites, that it was impossible to contradict him; so that hee was not ashamed to vse the vnlawfull company of his owne sister: whereby it came to passe, that the citizens of Rome began to hate him extreamly; for that the like matter had not been seene nor heard of: of a long time men could not beleeue the same, yet notwithstanding they sufficiently expressed the hatred they bare against the fact he had committed. It cannot be said of him, that he builded any work beseeming his royall magni-
E ficence worthy the mentioning, or profitable either to the present or future world, except some ports that he made neer to Rhegium and Sicilia, for harbour of such ships as came & went into Egypt for corne, which doubtlesse is a goodly and mighty work, and very profitable for such as trauell by sea. True it is that it was not brought to perfection, but only halfe finished, because the workmen trauelled leasurely. But the chiefe cause thereof was, that he spent his study in vnprofitable matters, and loued rather to consume his substance to feed his owne priuate lusts wherin he tooke great delight, then to erect and build any goodly or famous worke, which might haue redounded to the profit of the common-weale. Otherwise he was a man well spoken, and very expert in the Greek & vulgar Roman tongues, apprehending presently that which others said: and although they had spent long time in discouering their mindes; yet answered he them vpon F the instant, and in affaires of consequence hee had such a mouing perswasion and power, as no man could exceed him; both in regard of his quick spirit & easie apprehension, as of the exercise and paine he had takea. For being Tiberius brothers sonne, whose successour also hee was, hee was enforced to be studious, seeing that Tiberius, who was of the same years, was in like manner excellently learned. Caius therfore inforced himselfe to imitate the Emperor Tiberius whose neere kinsman he was, and surpassed all those that were in Rome at that time; yet notwithstanding all these great aduantages, which his good instruction had bred in him, could not hinder the the misfortune that befel him, by the abuse of his authority. So rare a thing it is to see them, who G haue liberty to do what they list without punishment, to gouerne themselues with modesty. In the beginning he took delight in the friendship of very honest men, to get credit & reputation, thinking to outstrip the most excellent: but after he was giuen ouer to licentiousnes, the affection that he bare them was changed, and in steed thereof he grew in hatred of them from day to day: whereby they were inforced to conspire against him, and seeke his ruine.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 3.

Now, as I haue heretofore declared, Claudius vnderstanding of that which had befallen Caius his Nephew, and seeing all his house wholly troubled, for this occasion was in such distrust, that he knew not what to do to saue himselfe: but went and hid himselfe in a certain corner, where he was surprised, hauing no other cause to apprehend his danger, except his nobility. For during the time that he liued a priuate man, hee behaued himselfe modestly, kindly, and fauourably vnto all H men, being well seen in the Sciences, and principally in the Greeke tongue, shunning as much as in him lay all tumult & train that might breed trouble. When as therfore the people at that time were wholly amazed at the trouble, and the palace was replenished with souldier-like fury and feare, & nothing raigned more in generall then confusion & disorder; the souldiers of the guard, who were the most experienced & hardy amongst the men of warre, consulted amongst themselues what course they were to take. Neither were they much discontented with Caius death, in that they supposed that vpon iust occasion, he was done to death: for which cause they rather bethought themselues on that which concerned their estates, and how they might assure themselues in those dangers, seeing the Germans were wholly bent against those, who had slaughterd Caius; rather incited thereunto of their owne cruell natures, then of any good affection they had I towards the welfare of the common-weale. All which things troubled Claudius, and put him in feare of his life, the rather for that hee saw Asprenas head, and the rest of the nobility that were massacred, carried about to be seen: for this cause he kept himselfe in a certain place, which was only accessible by certaine steps or staires, and hid himselfe therein, because it was obscure. In that place one of the souldiers of the palace, called Gratus, being vnable to discerne who he was in regard of the obscurity of the place, and supposing him to be some one that desired to be concealed, he drew neere vnto him, to the intent he might the better know him: And when as Claudius besought him that he would depart and leaue him, he passed the more onwards, and laying hold of him and drawing him into the light, knew him, crying out to those that followed him:
This is Germanicus, let vs take hold of him, and create him Emperour. Claudius perceiuing that he K was ready to be attached, & fearing least they should put him to death in the like maner as they had done Caius, besought them that they would pardon him, protesting vnto them his innocencie, and how he had in no sort been either accessary or agent in that which had bin done. Wherupon Gratus beginning to smile, took him by the hand, saying, that he had no cause in that sort to suspect his life: For (said he) it behoueth thee to pull vp thy spirits, and to bethink thee how to gouerne an Empire, of which the gods (who haue the care of the whole world) haue despoiled Caius, to reward thy vertue with. Arise therefore and take possession of the throne of thine ancestors. This said, he lifted him on his shoulders, for that Claudius could not walk on foot tho-row the feare and ioy that he had conceiued of that which had been told him.

Vpon these speeches diuers of the souldiers of the guard assembled about Gratus: and perceiu- L ing that it was Claudius, whom they supposed to be dragged to his death, they had compassion of him as on an innocent, for that they knew him to be a man of milde nature, who all the time of his life intermedled with nothing, and who in like sort had been often in great danger during Caius life. There were others of them that said, that the iudgement of his matter pertained to the Consuls: whereupon, although a great number of souldiers flocked about him, and the simple people that were vnarmed, fled from them; yet could not Claudius goe onward in his way; so weake and feeble felt he himselfe in his whole body. It fortuned likewise, that they who caried his litter, perceiuing his flight, fled away for feare, and left him; so little hope had they that their Master should escape with his life, whom they saw to be thus drawn by the soldiers. Now when Gratus & his associats were arriued in the court of the palace, which (as it is reported) is the place M which was first of all inhabited in Rome, they began to thinke vpon that which was to be done:
thither also there flocked a great number of other soldiers vnto them, who tooke pleasure to behold Claudius, enforcing themselues to place him in the imperiall dignity, in regard of that good affection which they bare to Germanicus his brother, whose memory was much honored among all those, who had at any time conuersed with him. Moreouer, they ripped vp how many auaritious acts the Senate had cõmitted, & how great errors the chiefest Senators had defaulted in, be-

Claudius against his will drawen vnto the Empire.

The cause that induced the army to make Claudius Emperor.

fore

A fore the publike gouernement was changed. Moreouer, they conſidered vpon the danger and difficulty of their actions then in hand, for that the gouernment being adminiſtred by one only man, would be dangerous for them if he ſhould obtaine the ſame by any other meanes; whereas if Claudius ſhould enioy the ſame by their permiſſion and good will, he would haue them in remembrance who had fauoured him, and would recompence them according to their merits. This was the effect of their diſcourſe, which they held among themſelues, or when they met with one another. Finally, all of them at length concluded vpon this aduice, and enuironed Claudius, and lifting him vp vpon their ſhoulders, they carried him into the army, to the intent that no man might hinder them to finiſh that which they intended. There fell a debate alſo betwixt the Senators and citizens: For the Senat deſirous to recouer their former dignity, and enforcing themB ſelues to auoid the ſeruitude that had befallen them by the out-rage of tyrants, intended the maintenance of their offered good fortune. Contrariwiſe, the people enuied them that dignity. And knowing that their Emperors ſhould be as it were certaine bridles, to reſtraine the auarice of the Senate, and the refuge of the people, they were very glad to ſee that Claudius was aduanced: making their account that if he were created Emperour, they ſhould auoid a ciuill warre, like vnto that which hapned in Pompeius time.

Claudius cattried on mens ſhoulders into the army.

Difference betwixt the citizens and Senators.

The Senat knowing that Claudius was carried into the army by the ſoldiers, choſe out ſome of their order, and now ſent them as meſſengers in their behalfe, to ſignifie vnto him that he ought to vſe no violence in obtaining the Empire, but rather to remit the charge of the common-weal to the Senat. That he both was and ſhould be one of the Senators, and haue the conduct of the C common-weale, and diſpoſe it according to law, perſwading him to call vnto his remembrance thoſe grieuous miſchiefes, which the former tyrants had wrought in the common-weale, and what dangers he himſelfe had alſo ſuffered with them, during the raigne of Caius their late Emperor. That it ſhould ill become him, who had deteſted the fury of others tyranny at ſuch time as they vſed outrages, now willingly to be drawne to oppoſe himſelfe againſt his country. That if he would obey them, and continue to expreſſe the vertue and conſtancy of his life, which in times paſt he led with commendation, he ſhould obtain thoſe honors which free Citizens could affoord him; and in ſuffering himſelfe to be gouerned by lawes, to the end he might haue part in the commandement, and to be commanded in his turne, he ſhould obtaine the praiſe of vertue. D That if he ſhould not be diſſwaded by the ſlaughter of Caius, which was freſh in memory, for their own parts they would hinder his proceedings as much as in them lay. They alſo alledged, that they were furniſhed with men of war, with ſtore of armor, and a great number of domeſticall ſeruants, all which they would imploy againſt him: But ouer and aboue theſe things, they had farre greater helps, namely their hope, and good fortune, and the gods, who are wont to fight for thoſe who maintaine vertue and goodnes. They ſolemnly proteſted alſo for their own parts, that they were of that mind, that there was nothing more honeſt & iuſt, then to fight for their liberty and country. The Embaſſadors that brought this meſſage, were Veranius and Broccus, who both of them were Tribunes of the people. They proſtrating themſelues on their knees before him, humbly beſought him that he would not draw the common-weale into ciuill warre. And ſeeing that Claudius was incloſed with a great company of men of warre, in reſpect of whom the E Conſuls were of no force, they beſought him that it would pleaſe him to demand the gouernment at the Senates hands, and receiue it from them if he were reſolued to be Emperor; for that it would be an act more holy, and coupled with iuſtice & good hap, if he ſhould obtain the ſame with their good will, and not in deſpight of thoſe, who would vouchſafe it him willingly.

The Senate perſwade Claudius to reſigne the dignity offered him.

CHAP. III.

The ſedition that aroſe between the Senate and the people.

ALthough Claudius knew with what preſumption the Senat had ſent this Embaſſage, yet did he modeſtly entertaine the ſame for the preſent. But ſuppoſing that it ſtood very F little with his ſecurity to commit himſelfe to their truſt, and being encouraged by the exhortation of the ſouldiers, who promiſed him their vtmoſt endeuour, and by the incitation of king Agrippa, he determin'd in no ſort to let the ſoueraignty eſcape out of his hands, in that it was ſo willingly & freely beſtowed on him when he thought leaſt on it. After that Agrippa had performed al thoſe duties vnto Caius which were requiſit for ſuch a one as had bin by him aduanced to honor, & hauing taken his bodie & laid it in a litter, he brought him out before the ſouldiers of his guard, and certified them that Caius was yet aliue, and for that he found himſelfe selfe sick of those wounds which he had receiued, he sent to seek for Physitions. But afterward, G vnderstanding that Claudius was taken by the men of war, he thrust so much that he got himselfe passage, and came vnto him, whom he found altogether dismaid, & ready to surrender all things into the Senats hands, and incouraged him and incited him to take vpon him the gouernment of the Empire which the men of war had offered him. Which done, he departed, and was suddenly sent for by the Senate, whither he resorted altogether perfumed with odors, as if at that time he were returned from some banquet, and had known nothing of that which had hapned: He therfore asked the Senators what was become of Claudius, who certified him of the truth; & besides that required him to giue them his opinion and counsell as touching the present affaires: his answere was, that he was ready to aduenture his life in the behalfe of the Senate; yet by the way he told them that they ought to haue an especiall regard of the common-weale, rather then all the H pleasure they could pretend; and that they who would be Lords of an Empire, had need of armes & men to maintaine themselues, least being weake and vnfurnished, they should be deceiued in their expectations. The Senat replied that they had great store of furniture, and that they would contribute money; that they had good store of men of war, to whom they would annex their slaues and giue them liberty. But Agrippa replied, would God, graue fathers, that you were able to performe the matters you intend; yet will I not feare to discouer that vnto you, which concerneth you neerely. You know well that the army which is with Claudius, consisteth of such men, who haue beene long time trained vp in feates of armes; and that those that are to fight on your side, are but men gathered together, and such as you couple them with are the very scum of your slaues, who are both intractable and vntrained. Wee shall therefore enter fight against I expert souldiers, and commit our fortunes to such men as scarcely knowe how to draw their swords: I rather think it meet that we send vnto Claudius such men, as may perswade him to giue ouer the Empire. And to performe this message, behold my selfe in a readinesse to be commanded by you.

Claudius confirmed in his resolutions by Agrippa.

Agrippa telleth the Senat his opinion.

To this effect spake Agrippa; And hereunto the Senators accorded, and sent him to Claudius, appointing him certaine others to accompany him. As soone as he came to Claudius, he secretly discouered vnto him in what perplexity the Senate was, & gaue him instructions to answer and demeane himselfe like an Emperor, and to shew his dignity & power. Whereupon Claudius gaue the Embassadors this answer; That he wondred not that the Senat were so vnwilling to be commanded by a soueraigne, in regard of that cruelty which the forepassed Emperorus had vsed to K their destruction. But for the present, they should taste of his mercy, and feel his moderate rule: and they should liue vnder the gouernment of such a one, who although in name he had the imperiall authority; yet that in effect he would gouerne all things by their disposition. For which cause he wished them in no sort to distrust him, whom as they themselues could witnes, they haue seen and known to haue dealt vertuously & iustly in many affaires, although the state of times had been farre different. Those that were sent from the Senate hearing these words, returned backe againe. But Claudius instantly assembled his men of warre, and exacted an oath of fidelity from them, bestowing on euery one of them who were of his guard in way of largesse, fiue thousand drachmes, amounting to some 25. pound a man of our sterling money. Hee presented their cap- I. taines also with presents answerable to their qualities, promising to performe no lesse bounty to all the rest of the men of war, in what place soeuer they were. Hereupon the Consuls assembled the Senate in the temple of Iupiter the victorious, before day, and some of them hid themselues through the feare they had of that which should be spoken: othersome departed out of the city, and resorted to their country farmes, foreseeing with themselues the issue of all these things: and perceiuing that their hope of liberty was lost, they thought it far better for them to be exempt from danger, and to passe their life in repose, though it were with subiection, then to be altogether vncertaine of their security & safety, by maintaining the dignity of the Senators: yet about some hundreth of them drew them selues together and no more. Now whilest they were consulting vpon that which they were to do, they suddenly heard a shout of souldiers that were assembled round about them, requiring the Senate to chuse them an Emperor, and not to suffer their state to be lost through a multitude of gouernours: and to this effect spake they, lest the gouernment should be giuen to diuers and not to one. This course of theirs gaue little content to the Senators, both in regard of the losse of that liberty which they expected, as thorow the good liking they had of Claudius; notwithstanding there were some that pretended some hope to be aduanced both in respect of the nobility of their race, as in regard of their alliance that they had by marriage with the Cæsars. Another Minutianus alſo one of Caius tutors withdrewe Valerius Aſiaticus from thinking on thoſe things: and there had hapned as great a ſlaughter as had euer beene heard of, had any of theſe had the liberty to deſire the Empire, or oppoſe themſelues againſt Claudius. For amongſt other, the fencers, who were of no ſmall number, they of the watch, and the ſailers ioyned themſelues together with the men of warre. They therefore that pretended to demand the Empire, gaue ouer their ſuites, partly in the cities behalfe, partly for their owne priuate ſecuritie ſake.

About the day ſpring Chæreas and his companions went forth to debate the matter with the ſoldiers: but they ſeeing by the beckoning with their hands they would draw them to ſilence,
B and were vpon the inſtant to fall into diſcourſe, made a great noyſe to cut them off from proceeding any further, for that all of them were earneſtly affected to haue an Emperour & Soueraign Lord, and required with all expedition that they might haue one proclaimed and knowne. At that time the Senate were ſo diſtracted, both for the maner how they ſhold command, as for the meanes they ought to vſe to cauſe them ſelues to be obeied, conſidering the ſouldiers ſet light by them; and thoſe that were confederates in the death of Caius ſuffered not the Senate to obey the ſouldiers. At length Chæreas being vnable to conceale his paſſion wherwith he was ſurpriſed, & hearing that they asked for a monarch, promiſed that he wold giue them one, if they wold bring him a token from Eutychus, who was the wagoner to the greene band, whom Caius had loued extreamly, in ſomuch as he imployed his ſouldiers in ſeruile labours, as to build him ſtables for his
C horſes, & reproched them with diuers like matters, telling them that he wold bring them Claudius head, ſhewing them that it was a matter ill beſeeming them, if after a mad man they ſhould cõmend the Empire to a foole. Yet none of theſe words could diuert them from their purpoſe: but all of them drew their ſwords, & with diſplaied enſignes marched towards Claudius to vnite themſelues with thoſe, who had already bound themſelues by an oath to ſerue him faithfully. So that the Senate was abãdoned, & deſtitute of al defence, ſo as ther was no difference betwixt priuate men & Conſuls. All of them were aſtoniſhed & confuſed, not knowing what to do, becauſe they had thus prouoked Claudius diſpleaſure againſt them. And now fell they to reuiling one ano
D ther, in teſtimonie of the repentance they conceiued for theſe their proceedings. Wherupon Sabinus one of thoſe who had murthered Caius, aroſe & proteſted that he would ſooner cut his own throat, then conſent to the eſtabliſhment of Claudius, or behold with his eies the miſery & thraldome of his country: he likewiſe encouraged Chæreas, telling him that he had deſerued very little by cutting off Caius, if he thought to liue without the liberty of his country. To which he anſwered, that he made no account of his life, yet that he intended to ſound Claudius mind, & with this reſolution they concluded. Meane while certaine of the Senators ſought on euerie ſide to break thorow the midſt & thickeſt of the ſouldiers to go and do reuerence and homage to Claudius: amongſt whom was Q. Pompeius one of the Conſuls, whom the men of war accuſed to be one of E the principal actors to incite the Senate to recouer their liberty, and they drew their ſwords againſt him. And if Claudius had not reſtrained them, they had ſurely diſpatched him: but he made him ſit downe by him, and by that meanes deliuered him from the daunger. The other Senators, who accompanied him, were not entertained thus honourably, but ſome of them were wounded euen then when they preſſed forth to ſalute Claudius. Aponius retired himſelfe ſore wounded, and the reſt were in great daunger to loſe their liues. But king Agrippa drawing neere vnto Claudius, deſired him to vſe as much lenitie as was poſſible in him towardes the Senators, for that if any miſchiefe ſhould betide them, hee ſhould haue no other perſons to commaund. To the which counſel of his, Claudius gaue place, and aſſembled the Senat in the Palace, cauſing himſelfe to be caried thorow the citie in the company of his ſoldiers, who marched before him, doing much miſchiefe to the common people. But amongſt thoſe that ſlewe Caius, Chæreas and Sabinus were come out into the ſtreets, notwithſtãding they were forbidden by Pollio, whõ not long before Claudius had made captaine of his guard. And as ſoone as Claudius came into the F palace, whither he aſſembled his friends, he pronounced ſentence againſt Chæreas. For although his action was accounted both generous and noble, yet was hee condemned for this, becauſe he was perfidious: whereupon hee was adiudged to die, to giue example to others, to the ende that Princes and Emperours may hereafter liue in ſafetie. He was therefore led to his death with Lupus, and diuers other Romanes. It is ſaid of Chæreas that he endured this accident with a great courage, which he expreſſed not onely in that he chaunged not his countenance, but alſo by the reproches which he gaue Lupus who wept. For when as Lupus was putting off of his cloaths, and complained of the cold that he felt,he taunted him thus,alluding to his name which was Lupus; That neuer any cold did harme to a woolfe. Furthermore,when he came to the place of execution,where a great number of people were gathered together to behould the spectacle, he asked the souldier that was appointed to behead him,if he were a cunning headsman,and whether hee had a new sword,wishing him to vse that wherewith he murthered Caius. His death was happy, for hee receiued but one stroke; whereas Lupus was faint-harted,and receiued diuers, because he stretched not out his neck freely. Some fewe daies after,at such time as the Romans solemnized their expiations, and that euery one honoured the memory of his dead friend, they gaue Chæreas a part of that honour, and cast his portion into the fire, saying, that was to deface and purge their ingratitude,wherof they were guiltie towards him. Thus ended Chæreas his life. But for Sabinus, although Claudius had not onely absolued him, but also suffered him to exercise his office, as before time he had done: yet thought he that he should do amisse & against iustice, if hee falsified his faith to his associates and confederates; for which cause hee shortned his owne daies, thrusting his sword thorow his body to the very hilts.

Hedio & Rufsinus,chap.5. al.4.

IN continently after this,Claudius cashierd all those of the souldiers whom hee suspected; and published an edict, by which he confirmed the kingdome to Agrippa, that Caius had giuen him,accompanying his bounty with many praises; annexing moreouer vnto his gouernment all that which Herod his grandfather had possessed, to wit, Iudæa, and Samaria,which in that they were as one lawfull inheritance, appertained vnto him. He gaue him also out of his own dominions,Abela & al the countreyabout the mount Libanus, that in times past appertained to Lysanias. And he caused the alliance that was past betwixt them twaine to be engrauen and registred in an open place of the city of Rome. He tooke from Antiochus the kingdom that he had, & gaue him in exchange a portion of Cilicia & Comagena. He set Alexander Lysimachus Alebarcha at liberty, who had beene his olde friend,and sometimes gouernour in Arabia,and otherwhiles his mother Antonius steward, who had been committed prisoner thorow Caius displeasure, and married Bernice Agrippas daughter, with his sonne Marcus: which after the death of Marcus,who died before he was espoused, was afterwards maried with her father Agrippas allowance to Herod his brother, for whom Agrippa begd of Claudius the kingdome of Chalcis. At that very time the Iewes,that were in the Citie of Alexandria, mutined against the Greekes. For after Caius death the nation of the Iewes,which had beene oppressed during his raigne,and iniuriously dealt withall by the Alexandrines,recouered their former courage, and instantly fell to armes. For which cause Claudius gaue commission to the gouernor of Egypt, to pacifie and appease that vprore. He sent also his letters patents into Alexandria and Syria, at the request of the two kings Agrippa and Herod, to this effect. Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, Father of the people, signifieth this that followeth. Vnderstanding that the Iewes inhabitants in Alexandria,and for this cause called Alexandrines,haue at all times enioyed the selfesame priuilegdes of the City,which the ancient and first Alexandrines haue had: Which fauours they haue obtained by the largess of those princes,that were our predecessors,as it hath been plainly made knowne vnto vs,as well by letters which haue been written vnto vs,as by confirmed decrees: And that since Alexandria hath beene annexed to our Empire by Caesar Augustus, their priuiledges haue continued in force during the seuerall successions of many of our gouernours, which rights of theirs haue neuer beene called in question, no not in that time when Aquila was gouernour in Alexandria: Since in like sort Caesar Augustus hath not letted them, but when the chiefetaine of their nation was dead, they might establish other substitutes and gouernours in his place, willing that all of them should yeelde him obedience in obseruation of their lawes and customes, without constraint or impulsion to doe any thing contrarie to their religion: yet notwithstanding the Alexandrines haue mutined against the Iewes,beeing in the Citie of Alexandria in the time of the Emperour Caius,by reason of the folly and frenzie of Caius,who disgraced & oppressed the nation of the Iewes, because they would not violate their religion, nor acknowledge the said Caius for a god. Our will & pleasure is,that no one of the priuiledges of the nation of the Iewes be abolished,by reason of Caius frenzie; but my minde is to maintaine those which heretofore haue beene giuen them, to the ende they may continue and liue according to their auncient lawes and customes: Commanding you and euerie one of you very

But that which was generally made in fauour of those, who were dispersed thorow the whole world, was to this effect: Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, High priest, Father of the people, elected Consul the second time, signifieth that which ensueth. Our well beloued friends, the kings Agrippa and Herod, haue required vs that we will permit all those Iewes, that liue vnder the Roman Empire, to vse the same lawes and priuiledges which they haue vsed heretofore, as we haue granted to the Iewes, that dwell in Alexandria. Which suite of theirs wee haue willingle granted, not onely in fauour of those that require the same, but also for that I thinke them B worthy such a grace: for whome I haue bin intreated in regard of the fidelitie & friendship they haue alwaies expressed towards the Romans. My pleasure therfore is, that no Citie either Grecian or otherwise, shal deny any priuiledge, from whence they shal be excluded, for that since the Emperour Augustus time they haue neuer beene exempted from them. It standeth with reason therefore, that henceforth the Iewes, who liue vnder our Empire of what place soeuer they bee, may obserue their auncient customes, without any contradiction: Giuing them to vnderstand, that hereafter they vse our clemencie so much the more moderatly, without neglecting the religion of other nations, in retaining their owne. CHAP. V.

BY these edicts of Claudius Cæsar, which he sent both to Alexandria and other parts of the world, it plainely appeareth how well affected he was towards the nation of the Iewes. And presently after this, after he had dignified Agrippa with all kinds of honour, he sent him backe into his kingdome to gouerne the same, commaunding all his presidents and lieutenants in his prouinces, thorow which hee was to passe, to giue him a friendly & honorable conuoy. But he hauing wisely and happily dispatched his affaires, returned in all haste. As soone as D he came to Ierusalem, he offered his sacrifices of thankesgiuing which he had vowed, without omitting any thing that was cõmanded by the law. He caused also diuers Nazarites to be pould, and offered in gift that chaine of gold that Caius had giuen him: which was of the same waight the yron chaine was of wherewith his royall hands were manacled, in memorie of the aduersity he had past, and the testimony of the exchange thereof into better fortune: commaunding that it should be hanged vp in the temple, and ouer the chamber of the treasurie, to testifie vnto those that should behould the same, that the highest estates are subiect to alterations, and that God can raise men again from obscuritie to happie fortune. For this chain that hanged in the temple, being consecrated to God, manifestly expressed vnto all men, that king Aggrippa was vpon a verie E small occasion despoiled of his former dignitie, and made prisoner: and then a little while after, that he, being deliuered from his bonds, was raised and exalted to a famous kingdom; to signifie thereby, that humaine affaires are of that nature, that that which is the greatest may be easily ouerthrowne, and that which is declining may recouer againe his auncient honour and dignity. When as therfore Agrippa had duely and deuoutly acknowledged Gods mercies, he deposed the hie priest Theophilus the son of Ananus, and bestowed that honour on Simon surnamed Cantharа the son of Boethus. This Simon had two brothers, & Boethus was their father, whose daughter had bin married to king Herod, as heretofore it hath bin spoken. Simon held the priesthood with his brethren and his father, in such sort, as before time the three sons of Simon hie priest, son of Onias had done, during the Empire of the Macedonians, as wee haue declared in our former bookes. F After the king had giuen order for the priesthod, he thought good to recompence the good affection that they of Ierusalem had borne vnto him: for which cause he acquited them of those tributes that euerie family paid, knowing well that it became him to shew kindnesse vnto them, who had been faithfull and well affected towards him. He created Silas, who had been his companion in many dangers, generall of all his army. Not long after, certaine young men that were Dorites vnder the colour of constancie in case of religion, who also had dayly expressed in their actions an vnbridled rashnesse, brought the image of Cæsar into the temple of the Iewes, and erected erected it in that place; which insolence of theirs highly offended Agrippa, who construed it as G an act that tended to the abolition of the religion of their countrey: for which cause, with al expedition he repaired to Petronius, who was gouernour of Syria, & complained against these Dorites, who was no lesse displeased with the action then hee himselfe. For he supposed that such breach of religion was the meanes to further impietie, and for that cause hee wrote to those which had attempted this innouation somewhat sharply, to this effect following.

Petronius letters vvritten to the Dorites, in the behalfe of the Iewes.

Alias, cap. 5. P. Petronius writeth to the Dorites to send them vnto him who haue broke Cæsars edict.

Pvblius Petronius, lieutenant to Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, to the Ma- H gistrates of the countrey of Doria, health: Whereas Cæsar hath published an edict, by which he permitteth the Iewes to liue according to their lawes and customes, some one amongst you haue been so presumptuous to contradict the same in effect (although in wordes you protest that you obey him) and doe all that which you can to hinder the Iewes from enioying their Synagogue, in so much as in the same you haue planted Cæsars image, not onely thereby opposing your selues against the Iewes, but also against the Emperour himselfe, whose image might haue beene better placed in his owne temple, then in a forraine temple: and you haue placed it in their Synagogue; whereas by right euery one ought to bee master of his place, according to Cæsars iudgement: For it should be verie ridiculous in me to alleadge mine owne iudgement after that of Cæsars, who hath granted the Iewes the libertie to liue according to their I lawes and customes, and hath commanded that they should conuerse in equall freedome among the Greekes. For these causes I commaund you, that they, who haue bin so bold as to contemne Augustus decree (against whome their owne magistrates haue beene displeased, excusing themselues that this accident hapned not by their motion, but by the furie of the commonpeople) be brought before me by the captaine Proculus Vitellius, to yeeld a reason of that which they haue done; exhorting the magistrates that if they wil not be accounted parties in this contempt, they labour to discouer those that are guiltie, vnto Proculus, & giue order that no sedition or violence be offered thereupon. Which notwithstanding it seemeth that they affect, although we and the most honoured king Agrippa, whom I take for my good and special friend, labour nothing more K then that the nation of the Iewes should not assemble and take armes vnder colour of their defence. And to the end that whatsoeuer Augustus hath ordained as touching this matter, may bee the better knowne vnto all men, I haue annexed his edict which he published in Alexandria: and although they are sufficiently knowne vnto all men, yet hath the most honoured king Agrippa read them vnto me at such time, as I sate in my tribunall seat; concluding according to right, that the Iewes ought not to be excluded nor hindred from enioying those benefits, which are granted vnto them by Cæsar: I therefore charge all men, that hence forward they take heed least they seeke any occasion of mutinie or sedition, and that euerie one liue according to his religion. See here how Petronius proceeded in this matter, both to amend that which was past, as also to pre- L uent that which was to come, that none should be so bold to attempt the like. After this, Agrippa tooke the priesthood from Simon Canthara, and gaue it againe to Ionathan the sonne of Anani, whom he esteemed to bee more worthy then the other. But Ionathan declared that hee was not desirous of this dignitie, for in effect hee refused it, saying: O king, I most willingly acknowledge the honour which it pleaseth you to bestowe vpon me, and know wel that it is a dignitie which of your owne freewill you bestow vpon me; notwithstanding that God iudgeth me vnworthy. It sufficeth me that I haue once beene inuested with the sacred habite: for at that time I wore it with more holinesse, then I can now receiue it at this present; yet notwithstanding if it please you to know one that is more worthie of this honour then my selfe, I will informe you of one. M
My liege, I haue a brother, who towards God and you is pure and innocent, whom I dare commend vnto you for a most fit man for that dignitie. The king tooke great pleasure in these his words, & leauing Ionathan he bestowed the priesthod on Matthias his brother, according as Ionathan aduised him: and not long after this, Marsus succeeded in Petronius roome, and tooke vpon him the gouernment of Syria.

Silas was made generall ouer the kings army: and for that he had alwaies been faithful vnto him, and had neuer forsaken him in any daunger that was offered, without partaking the vtmost extremitie, but had alwaies aduentured on the greatest perils in respect of his intire & constant resolution; he made his account, that being so firme a friend to the king, he should also be partaker and companion with him in the honour. For which cause in all things whatsoeuer, he submitted not himselfe to the king, but chalenged to himselfe a liberty to speake
B what him listed. For this cause hee grew hatefull in the kings sight, for that in particular he boasted of himselfe beyond measure, and oftentimes refreshed the memorie of those aduersities the king had past, the rather to expresse how affectionate he had been toward him, and his continuall talke was nothing else but of those trauailes he had endured. Now for that hee obserued no measure in this his discourse, the king took it as an iniury intended to his honour, & was offended with the vnbridled licence of the mans prattle. For nothing soundeth more harsh in a mans eare, then the memorie of his forepassed miserie, & it is but the fault of a foole to rip vp the courtesies he hath emploied on another man. Finally, Silas grieuously prouoked the kings displeasure against himself, that rather subscribing to his wrath then his wit, he not onely dispossessed Silas of his generals roome, but also sent him bound into his countrey in that place to be held prisoner.
C This notwithstanding, time asswaged his displeasure, & the king drawing himself into better cõsideration, and remembring himselfe how many trauels Silas had endured in his behalf, he reuoked the sentence that he had pronounced. At such time therfore as he was ready to celebrate the festiuall day of his birth, and all his subiects were addressed to take their pleasure, hee speedily sent for Silas, to the end he might be partaker therof, and banquet with them. But Silas, who was of a free nature, supposing that he had iust cause to bee displeased, concealed it not from those who were sent vnto him, but spake vnto them after this manner. To what honour doth the king inuite me at this present, to the intent incontinently to depriue me thereof? for he hath not onely depriued me of those honours which he bestowed vpon me, in acknowledgement of the good affection I haue alwaies shewed vnto him; but he hath altogether spoyled me, and contumeliously intreated me: but if he thinke that he can restraine me from speaking freely, hee deceiueth
D himselfe. For my conscience knoweth how many hazards I haue deliuered him from; and as long as I breath, I will ring it in all mens eares, how many trauels I haue endured for his conseruation and honour, in recompence wherof I am at this day in bonds, and shut vp in an obscure prison, which I will neuer forget. Yea and when my soule shall depart out of this body, she shall beare with her the remembrance of those benefits I haue imployed on him. These words spake he with a loud voice; willing them to relate the same vnto king Agrippa; who seeing that hee was grounded in an incurable folly, left him in prison.

Silas by too much reuiuing the kings miseries, and misfortunes, and ripping vp his owne deserts groweth into the kings hatred, & is sent prisoner into his countrey.

Agrippa sendeth for Silas out of prison, who dissembling not his displeasure is left still in prison.

After this the king began to fortifie the walles of Ierusalem, on the side of the new towne, vpon the common charge; increasing them both in length and bredth: & might he haue thorowly finished them, it had been a fortresse inuincible, by all humane force. But Marsus the gouernour of Syria certified Cæsar what the worke was; and Claudius suspecting some commotion, wrote expresly to Agrippa, commaunding him thence forward to desist from further building of the walles, according to that forme wherin he beganne: whereunto he would not disobey. This king Agrippa was of a nature so ready to exercise liberalitie, and tooke so great pleasure to vse his magnificence towards all sorts of nations, that the great expences he was at, obtained him great reputation. So that his whole pleasure and delight was, to shew courtesie vnto all men, & to purchase good esteem, being euery way different in nature & disposition from king Herod his predecessor. For Herod was naturally malicious, extream in punishing men, & irreconciliable to those with whom he was displeased, manifestly expressing that hee loued the Grecians better then the F Iewes. For he beautified those cities that belonged to strangers, and gaue them money, and erected them bathes, and sumptuous Theaters, and Temples, and in some of them galleries: but as touching the cities of the Iewes, he bestowed not this bountie on any of them, no not the least reparation or gift that was worthy the speaking of. Contrariwise, king Agrippa was verie courteous and lowly, & equally imparted his bountie vnto all men. He was courteous vnto strangers, and testified no lesse by the bountie he bestowed on them. To his countrimen he behaued himselfe affably, and in especiall hee was mercifull to all those that were in miserie. For which cause his ordinary court & the place he tooke moſt pleaſure in, was Ieruſalem. He was a diligent obſer- G uer of the lawes of his countrey, and liued religiouſly, & with as great piety as was poſſible: neither paſſed there one day wherin he offered not ſacrifice. It happened at one time that a certaine cunning lawyer, who was called Simon, and dwelt in Ieruſalem, had aſſembled the people by reaſon of the kings abſence, who for the preſent was in Cæſarea: In which aſſembly hee alleadged many things againſt him, that he was a prophane man, and that vpon iuſt cauſe hee was for-bidden to enter the temple, in that it was not lawfull nor decent for thoſe that were vncleane, to enter thereinto. Theſe words of Simons thus wrongfully vrged againſt him, were ſignified to the king by certaine letters ſent him, by the gouernour of the citie: when as therefore he ſate him downe in the Theater, he commanded that verie Simon to ſit next him, and in peaceable & kinde manner he ſpake thus vnto him. Tell me, I pray thee, what thing thou ſeeſt fault worthy, or done contrarie to the law, in that which is done heere? Simon hauing not any thing to reply, beſought H him to pardon him. The king grew friends with him farre ſooner then it could be imagined, re-ſoluing with himſelfe that mercie doth farre better become a king, then wrath; and that moderation is more requiſite, then haughtie courage; ſo as after he had beſtowed certaine preſents on Simon, hee dimiſſed him. Now although hee had many reparations in diuers places; yet honoured he thoſe of Beryth aboue all the reſt, and builded them a Theater ſurpaſſing all other in ſumptuouſnes and beautie: and beſides that, he made them a ſumptuous Amphitheater, and baths and porches: in which hee neither ſpared coſt, neither ſcantled the beautie and greatnes of the works in any ſort. The dedication alſo of theſe things was celebrated with great pompe and magnificence: he alſo made great ſhewes and plaies in the Theater, in which there were all ſorts of muſicke and recreation. He made alſo diuers turnaments in the Amphitheater, expreſſing I in all things the greatnes of his magnificence; and being deſirous to delight the people with a combate, he gathered all the malefactors that he might get, and made two ſeuerall companies of ſeuen hundreth a peece, & brought them together to fight, to the ende that in skirmiſhing they might receiue their puniſhment; and beſides, that by this warlike exerciſe he might preſent the people with a paſtime concluded with the puniſhment of wicked men: for each of theſe combatants ſlue one another.

After that he had finiſhed theſe aboue named buildings in Beryth, he reſorted to Tiberias a ci-tie of Galilee, and was admired of all the other kings, ſo that Antiochus king of Comagena came to viſite him: the like did Samſigeran king of the Emeſenians: Cotys king of Armenia the leſſe; and K Polemon Lord of Pontus: and beſides all theſe, Herod prince of Chalcis and his brother, all whom he receiued and entertained moſt magnificently and amiably, to ſhew his greatneſſe; to the end that all men might perceiue, that hee was deſeruedly honoured with the preſence of ſo many kings. And during the time that theſe princes were with him, Marſus the gouernour of Syria viſited him likewiſe, whom to the end he might expreſſe the reuerence he bare to the Romans he met with, ſeuen furlongs off frō the citie. This interview of ſo many kings was the originall of that diſcontent that grew betwixt him & Marſus; for whileſt he ſate in his litter, he ſent for theſe other Kings. But Marſus ſuſpected this concord and ſo great amitie, ſuppoſing that this agreement of ſo many kings would bee no waies profitable or beneficiall to the Romans. For L this occaſion he conceiued ſcarce kindly of Marſus. He tooke the prieſthood from Matthias, and came to Cæſarea, which in times paſt was called the tower of Straton, and there made he ſports in honour of Cæſar, ordaining a certaine feaſt for his conſeruation, to the celebration whereof there were aſſembled a great number of thoſe, who vvere of eſtate & dignitie thorow the whole countrey. On the ſecond day of this ſolemnitie, he ſhewed himſelfe being apparelled in a Robe ſycophants (which did not a little diſhonour him) exclaimed one on the one ſide, the other on the other, ſaluting him for a God, and in ſpeaking to him cried out thus: Bee mercifull vnto vs:

hitherto haue we feared thee as a man, but henceforward we will confeſſe & acknowledge thee to be of a nature more excellent then mortall frailtie can attaine vnto. Agrippa reproued them not for vſing theſe words: neither reiected he their palpable and deteſtable flattery. But not long

And so- denly he was seized with a terrible griping in his belly, which began with very great vehemen- cie: for which cause tuming his eies towards his friends, he spake vnto them after this manner: Behould him (said he) whome you esteeme for a God, condemned to die, and destiny shall ap- parently conuince you of those flattering and false speaches, which you haue lately vsed in my behalfe. For I, who by you haue beene adored as one immortall, am vnder the hands of death. B Whileſt hee spake thus, his griefes augmented in such sort as hee was brought almost to his last: for which cause with all expedition he was conuaied into his royall palace, and the rumor was spred in euery place, that very shortly he would be dead. For which cause the people with their wiues and children put on sackcloth, according to the custome of the countrey, to the end they might sollicit Gods mercy in the kings behalfe, and all the Citie was filled with teares and lamentations. The king that lay in an vpper chamber, and looking downe into the court, sawe them lying thus on the earth, could not refraine himselfe from teares. And after hee had for the space of fiue daies without ceasing beene tormented with griping in his belly, hee gaue vp the ghost in the fiftie fourth yeere of his age, and the seuenth yeere of his raigne. His reuenue amounted to twelue hundreth myriades, besides which, he made many loanes. For in that he was very liberal in giuing, he spent farre more then his reuenue, and spared not any thing to shew himselfe mag- nificent. Before the people knew of his death, Herod his brother prince of Chalcis, and Chelcias the kings lieutenant and friend, agreed betweene themselues to send Ariſto one of their trustiest seruants to kill Silas, who was their enemie, as if they had beene commaunded by the king.

After Agrippas death, they of Cæsarea & Sebaste forgot themselues of those benefits they had receiued from him, and vsed him no lesse despitefully, then as if he had been their vtter enemy. For they reprochfully abused him after his death, & reuiled him in such sort as it is vnseemelie to report the same. Furthermore, all the men of warre, who were at that time many in number, went vnto the kings lodging, and with one accord seized the statues of the kings daughters, & carried them to the brothell house; where after they had placed them, they vttered all the in-

Besides this, resting themselues in the publike places, they banquetted in the open street, wearing chaplets of flowers on their heads, & perfuming themselues with odours to sacrifice to Charon, drinking to one another for ioy that the king was dead. Thus expressed they their ingra- titude not onely towards their king Agrippa, who had bestowed so many liberalities on them; but also towards Herod his grandfather, who had builded their Cities, and to his extream charge erected their ports and temples. At that time Agrippa, the deceased Agrippas son was at Rome & was brought vp vnder the Emperour Claudius. When Cæsar vnderstood how those of Cæsarea & Sebaste had iniuriously dealt with Agrippa, he was sore displeased, & mooued with their ingrati-

He gaue especiall commission also, that Fadus should sharply punish those of Cæsarea & Sebaste, for the outrages they had offered to his deceased friend, and the excesse that was committed against his daughters, who were yet liuing; commaunding him to transporte the companies of the Cæsareans and Sebastens, & the fiue Roman legions into the countrey of Pontus to serue in that place, and to take those Romane souldiers that bare armes in Syria, to serue in their place: yet notwithstanding this cõmandement of his they were not displaced. For they sent Embassadours to Claudius to appease him, and by this meanes they obtained the fauour to remaine in Iudæa. After this they gaue an entrance to those most grieuous mischiefs and calamities that befell the Iewes: for they spred the seed of that warre, which was awakened vnder Florus gouernment. And for that cause after that Vespasian had obtained the victorie, as it shall be hereafter declared, he caused them to depart out of that prouince, and made them seeke their habitation elsewhere.

The dissension betweene the Philadelphians and the Iewes: and of the Ephode vvhich vvas the sacerdotall stole.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 1. Cassius Longinus prefect of Syria.

AFter King Agrippas decease (as we haue heeretofore declared in our former booke) the Emperour Claudius sent Cassius Longinus to succed Marsus in the gouernment of Syria, whom he displaced of that honour in memory of Agrippa, who during his life time had oftentimes required by his letters, that he should not suffer Marsus to gouerne the estate of Syria. As soone as Cuspius Fadus came into Iewrie to take charge of that countrey, which hee was to gouerne vnder Cæsar, he found the Iewes that dwelt on the other side of Iordan in an vprore, who had taken armes against the Philadelphians, about the limits of a certaine village called Mia, which was stored with valiant men at armes. Now had those who inhabite beyond Iordan, armed themselues in this manner, without the consent of their gouernors; and had slain a great number of the Philadelphians. Which when Fadus vnderstood, he was sore displeased, for that they had not reserued the cause to his hearing, and opened their griefes they had conceiued against the Philadelphians, but were so bolde of their owne authoritie, and without feare to betake themselues to their weapons. Hauing therfore apprehended some three

And hee had alſo other ſons by his other wiues: yet notwithſtanding Izates was moſt manifeſtly his beſt beloued, and ſo cheriſhed by him, as if he had been his only begotten ſonne. For which cauſe, his other brothers enuied him: which increaſed their hatred, for that all the reſt of them were aggrieued, becauſe Monobazus made moſt account of Izates. The father manifeſtly perceiued al this, yet did he pardon them, knowing that they did it not for malice, but for the deſire that euerie one of them had to be beſt eſteemed by his father. Notwithſtanding, being affraid leaſt ſom miſhap ſhold betide Izates, by reaſon of the hatred his brethren bare vnto him, hee gaue him many great gifts, and ſent him to Abemerigus, who faigned at that time in a fort called Spaſinus, committing his ſons life into his hand. Abemerigus alſo intertained him with kind affection, and loued him in ſuch ſort, that in proceſſe of time he gaue him Samacha his daughter to wife; and for her dowrie hee gaue gaue him a countrey of great reuenew.

Izates and his mother Helena learne the true ſeruice of God according to the manner of the Iewes.

During ſuch time as Izates ſoiourned in the fortreſſe of Spaſinus, a certain merchant, who was a Iew, called Ananias, hauing acceſſe to the kings wiues, taught them the manner how to ſerue God, according to the religion of the Iewes: and Ananias by their meanes growing acquainted with Izates, taught him the like, and accompanied him into Adiabena: being drawen thereunto by his earneſt entreaties, at ſuch time as Izates reſorted thither vpon his fathers ſending for. It chanced alſo in like ſort that Helena was in like manner inſtructed by another Iew, and retained the rites and religion of the Iewes.

After

A After that Izates came into his kingdome, and knewe that his brethren and kinsfolke were impriſoned, he was much grieued. Conceiuing therefore with himſelfe that it would be a great impiety in him to ſuffer them to be ſlaine, or kept bound in priſon; and that on the other ſide, it were a dangerous matter for him, if being at liberty they ſhould remember the euill they had indured: for this cauſe hee ſent ſome of them to Rome for hoſtages with their children vnto the Emperour Claudius, and the reſt vnto Artabanus king of Parthia. Afterwards when he was thorowly aſſured that his mother was wholly addicted to the religion of the Iewes, hee endeuoured himſelfe the more to ſhew himſelfe zealous therein: and ſuppoſing that he could not be a perfect Iew, except he were circumciſed, hee prepared himſelfe to be circumciſed. Which when his mother vnderſtood, ſhe laboured to her vttermoſt to hinder his reſolution, certifying him that in
B ſo doing hee ſhould bring himſelfe in great danger; for that in being king, he would draw himſelfe into the diſlike of his ſubiects, if they ſhould haue notice that he was addicted to a new religion, and to ſtrange ceremonies, and that they would not endure, that in being a Iew hee ſhould be their king: ſo ſhe for a while by her diſſwaſion reſtrained him from his deſire. But the king required counſell of Ananias, who, according with Helena in the courſe of her diſlike, threatned Izates, that if he would not obey his mother, he would forſake him, and depart from him, for that he feared, leſt if the matter ſhould be publikely knowne, he ſhould ſuffer ſome puniſhment, as being the only author and inſtructer of the king in vndecent matters; that otherwiſe he might ſerue God, although he were not circumciſed; ſince he had reſolued to liue according to the inſtitutions and lawes of the Iewes, and that God would pardon him: for in this, true religion conſi-
C ſteth, more then in the circumciſion of the body, though he were not actually circumciſed, ſince the neceſſitie and feare of his ſubiects ouerruled him. By which words the king for that time vvas wonne to affect the ſame no further. But ſome little vvhiles after (for he was not vvholly altered in that affection vvhich he had) another Iew called Eleazar, comming from Galilee, and accounted a man of great experience in the doctrine of our religion, perſwaded him to be circumciſed. For, comming one day vnto him to ſalute him, he found him reading of the bookes of Moſes, and ſayd vnto him; O King, contrary to your knowledge you offend the law, and God likewiſe; for it ſufficeth you not, that you vnderſtand the ſame, but the chiefeſt matter you are tyed vnto, is to doe that which the lawe commandeth: how long therefore will you remaine vncircumciſed? And if as yet you haue not peruſed the lawe as touching this point, read it now to D the intent you may know what impiety it is to omit it.

After the king had heard this, hee would no longer deferre his circumciſion: for which cauſe withdrawing himſelfe into another chamber, he called a ſurgeon vnto him, who acted that which he required, and afterwards calling his mother and maſter Ananias vnto him, he certified them vvhat had paſt: whereupon they grew ſtrangely amazed, fearing leſt the king ſhould growe in danger of the loſſe of his kingdome, if this action of his ſhould come to light; for that his ſubiects would not endure that ſuch a man that followed a contrary religion ſhould be their king: they feared alſo leſt they themſelues ſhould be in danger, for as much as the cauſe of all this matter would be imputed to them. But God by his prouidence preuented leſt any of thoſe things which they feared ſhould come to effect: for hee deliuered Izates himſelfe and his children likewiſe out of many dangers, yeelding them his aſſiſtance in their doubtfull and deſperate eſtates,
E declaring in effect that thoſe that onely put their truſt in him, and depend vpon his prouidence, are neuer depriued of the fruit of their piety. But of theſe things will we ſpeake hereafter.

When Helena the kings mother perceiued that the eſtare of the kingdome vvas in peace, and that by all mens opinion, both home-bred and ſtrangers, her ſonne vvas reputed happie by the good vvill of God, ſhe was ſeized with a deſire to go and viſit the Citie of Ieruſalem, and adore God in that temple, which was ſo much renowmed thorow the whol world, and offer ſacrifice of thankſgiuing therein; for which cauſe ſhe beſought her ſon that he would ſuffer her to performe her vowes: who willingly condeſcended to her deſire, and furniſhed her royally with all things that were neceſſary for ſuch a voiage, giuing her a great maſſe of mony with her, and bringing her
F onward on her way many daies iourney; ſo that at length ſhe arriued in Ieruſalem, to the great aduantage of the inhabitants of that city. For at that time the city was oppreſſed with a grieuous famine, ſo as many died for want of food; for which cauſe Queen Helena ſent her ſeruants ſome into Alexandria to buy a great quantity of corne, the reſt into Cypris to buy dried figs, who returned with all expedition they might: whereupon Helena diſtributed the victuals among the poore, leauing a ſingular memory of her beneficence a mong the whole nation. Her ſonne Izates alſo vnderſtanding of this famine, ſent a great ſumme of money to the gouernour of Ieruſalem. But hereafter

The yeere of the world, 4009. after Chriſts Natiuitie, 37.

Now Artabanus king of Parthia, perceiuing that the princes of his kingdom had conſpired againſt him, reſolued with himſelfe to go vnto Izates, for the ſecuritie of his life and perſon, hoping by his meanes, if it were poſſible, to recouer his kingdome. He therefore retired thither, & brought with him about one thouſand men of his kinsfolke and houſhold ſeruants. And by the way he met with Izates, whom he knew verie well by his royall traine, notwithſtanding he were vnknowne vnto him by countenance. Drawing therefore neere vnto him, he firſt of all humbled himſelfe on his knees, according to the cuſtome of the countrey, and afterwards ſpake vnto him after this manner.

Artabanus retireth himſelfe to Izates, and requireth his aſsiſtance.

Drad king, forſake me not, who am thy ſeruant, neither reiect thou my prayers. For being » deiected by the meanes of my misfortunes, and of a king become a priuate man, I haue neede of » thy ſuccour. Conſider therefore the inconſtancie of fortune, and thinke with thy ſelfe, that by H » prouiding for mee, thou ſhalt prouide for thy ſelfe. For if thou makeſt no reckoning of the » wrong that is done vnto me, diuers men will grow audacious to enterpriſe vpon other kings.

Theſe words pronounced hee with weeping teares, and with lookes lowely fixed vpon the ground. When Izates had heard Artabanus name, and ſaw his humble and ſubmiſſiue eſtate, he leapt incontinently from his horſe and ſaid vnto him: King, be of good courage, and let not thy preſent and perplexed condition diſmay thee, as if thy miſfortunes were irrecouerable. For this ſorrow of thine ſhall ſodainely bee changed, and thou ſhalt finde a better friend and allie, then thou hopedſt for at this time. For either will I repoſſeſſe thee of thy kingdom of Parthia, or I will loſe mine owne gouernment. This ſaid, he cauſed Artabanus to get vp on horſebacke, and walked by him on foote, yeelding him this honour, as to a greater king then himſelfe. Which I when Artabanus ſaw, hee was diſcontented, and ſware by his fortune and honour to come, that he would ſet foote on ground, if he would not get vp on horſebacke and ride before him: whereunto he obeyed, and mounting vpon his horſe againe, he conducted him to his palace; yeelding him all the honour that was poſſible, both in his ſittings and banquets, as in his aſſembles, not reſpecting his preſent eſtate or condition; but his former dignitie: conſidering with himſelfe, that ſuch caſuall misfortunes and changes are incident to all men. Furthermore, he wrote vnto the Parthians, perſwading them to receiue their king Artabanus, aſſuring them on his faith and oath, that hee would obtaine a free pardon for all that which was paſt, and to that intent he offered himſelfe to be an arbitrator betweene them. The Parthians gaue him this anſwer, that they K wold not refuſe to entertain him, but that they could not: for that one who was called Cinnamus was aduanced in his place and dignitie, and that they feared leaſt a ſedition ſhould happen amongſt them. Cinnamus, who was a noble and honourable minded man, knowing that their intent was ſuch, wrote himſelfe vnto Artabanus, who had nouriſhed and brought him vp, exhorting him to returne vpon his faith, and to receiue againe his owne kingdom. Artabanus vpon this motion gaue credit to his words, and returned backe againe. Whereupon Cinnamus came foorth and met him, and proſtrating himſelfe before his feete, called him king; and afterwardes taking the diadem from off his own head, he ſet it vpon Artabanus head, who by this means was reſtored to his former eſtate by Izates mediation, after he had beene driuen out of his kingdome L by his chiefeſt nobilitie. And hee did not forget the fauours which hee had receiued at Izates hands, but did him all the honour that poſſibly hee could imagine: For hee permitted him to weare the ſtraight Tiara, and to ſleepe vpon a gilded bed, which is a priuiledge that belongeth onely to the kings of Parthia. He gaue him alſo a goodly and great countrey which he had taken from the king of Armenia. Preſently after Izates was in this ſort honoured, Artabanus died, leauing his kingdome to his ſonne Vardanes; who repaired to Izates, praying him to ioyne with him in that war which he intended to wage againſt the Romans: but he preuailed not with him. For Izates knowing the Ro- M mans force and good hap, imagined that hee vndertooke a matter beyond his power. Furthermore, he had ſent fiue of his young ſonnes to Ieruſalem to learne our tongue and diſcipline, and his mother likewiſe to adore in the temple, for which cauſe hee the rather held backe & diſſwaded Vardanes from enterprizing againſt the Romans, whoſe power and puiſſant conqueſts he ordinarily reckoned vp vnto him, to the end he might diſmay him, & by theſe his allegations cauſe him to giue ouer his purpoſed intent of war againſt them. But the Parthian was diſpleaſed with this his perſwaſion, and for that cauſe denounced a preſent warre againſt Izates. But this his enterprize had but a fruitleſſe iſſue: for God cut off all his hopes. For the Parthians vnderſtanding what

The yeare of the world, 4009. after Chriſts birth, 47.

After Vardanes was ſlain, the kingdome is committed to Gotarza. Vologeſus king of Parthia.

When Monobazus King Izates brother and the reſt of his kinsfolke ſaw how happily all things ſucceeded to Izates, and how in reſpect of his piety towards God, hee was honoured and reuerenced by all men, they alſo reſolued themſelues to forſake their religion, and to ſerue God after the manner of the Iewes. But this intent of theirs was diſcouered. Whereupon the chiefeſt among them grew diſpleaſed; yet did they not manifeſt their deſpite, but kept it hidden in their
B hearts, ſeeking ſome fit occaſion to reuenge themſelues as ſoone as they might. They wrote alſo to Abias King of Arabia, and promiſed him great ſummes of money, if he would take armes againſt their King, promiſing him that vpon the firſt charge, they would forſake him, for that they deſired to be reuenged on him, who was growne in hatred of their religion. Hauing therefore confirmed their promiſe with an oath, they incited him to make haſte. The King of Arabia performed that which they required, and marched forth againſt Izates with a great power. And when as the firſt charge was ready to be giuen, and before they came to handy-ſtrokes, all Izates ſouldiers forſooke him; and turning their backs to their enemies, fled in great diſorder, as if they had been ſurprized with a Panicke feare; yet was Izates no waies diſmaied, but hauing diſcouered that it was the treaſon and conſpiracy of his greateſt peeres, he retyred himſelfe alſo into his
C campe, where he enquired of the cauſe that they pretended. After he knew that they had complotted with the Arabian, he cauſed the conſpirators to be put to death: and the next day after went out to fight, and ſlew a great number of his enemies, & conſtrained the reſt to betake them to flight. He purſued their King alſo into a fort called Arſam, which hee battered and aſſaulted with ſuch ſpirit and diligence, that hee tooke the ſame with a great quantity of booty that was therein, and returned to Adiabena with great triumph: but hee tooke not Abias aliue; for hee himſelfe had preuented his captiuity with his death. The Lords of Adiabena ſeeing themſelues fruſtrated of their former hopes, in that by Gods hand they were deliuered into the hands of their King, could not containe their diſpleaſure, but practiced further miſchiefe: for they wrote
D their letters to Vologeſus King of Parthia, deſiring him to kill Izates, and to beſtow another King vpon them who was a Parthian, for that they hated their king, who had aboliſhed their religion, and had embraced a ſtrange law. The Parthian vnderſtanding hereof prepared himſelfe for the warre: and hauing no iuſt colour or pretext to enforce the ſame, he ſent a meſſenger vnto him to redemand thoſe honours which his father had giuen him; which if he refuſed, hee denounced warre againſt him. Izates was not a little troubled in his minde, when hee vnderſtood this meſſage: For he thought that if he ſhould reſtore the gifts, he ſhould offer himſelfe great preiudice, for that it would be imagined that he did it for feare: knowing on the other ſide, that if the Parthian ſhould recouer that which he redemanded, yet would he not be in quiet; he therfore commended his cauſe to God, truſting that he would take care of him. And building vpon this, that the greateſt good he might haue, was to haue God to help, hee ſhut his wiues and children in a
E ſtrong Caſtle, and his corne in his ſtrongeſt towers: and afterwards burned all the hay and forrage; and hauing after this manner prouided for all things, he expected the approach of his enemie. The Parthian came onward ſooner then he was expected, with a great power of horſemen and footmen. For he marched forward in all haſte, and encamped neere vnto the ſloud that ſeparateth Adiabena from Media. Izates likewiſe encamped not farre from thence, hauing with him about ſix thouſand horſemen. To whom the Parthian ſent a meſſenger to giue him to vnderſtand how great his power was, which extended from the riuer of Euphrates as farre as Bactria, recounting vnto him what Kings he had vnder his ſubiection, threatning him to puniſh him very ſeuerely, in that he behaued himſelfe ſo vngratefully towards his benefactors, yea in ſuch ſort as the god whom he adored, might not deliuer him out of the Kings hands. Hereunto Izates
F anſwered, that he knew well that the Parthian farre exceeded him in power, but that hee was farre better aſſured that Gods power extended beyond all mens contradiction. And hauing returned him this anſwere he betook himſelf to his praiers, & proſtrating himſelfe vpon the earth, and caſting aſhes on his head, and faſting himſelfe, his wiues and all his children, he called vpon God, and praied, after this manner: O Lord Almighty, if I haue not vainely ſubmitted my ſelfe to thy protection, but haue entirely choſen thee for mine onely and true God, be thou my help and aſſiſtance, and not only deliuer mee from mine enemies, but alſo abate and controule their name, and vtter blaſphemous ſpeeches againſt thy power. Thus prayed he with ſighes & teares, and God heard him: For incontinently, and the very ſame night, Vologeſus receiued letters by which he was certified that a great number of Dahans and Sacans taking opportunity by his abſence, were entred into the kingdome of Parthia, and ſpoiled the whole countrey; for which cauſe he returned back into his countrey without any further trouble. And thus Izates by Gods prouidence was warranted from the Parthians threats.

Izates deliuereth vp the kingdome to his brother Monobazus, and dieth.

Not long after this, at ſuch time as he had liued fifty fiue yeares, and raigned foure and twen-tie, and left behinde him foure and twenty ſonnes, he dyed, and appointed his brother Monoba- zus to ſucceed him in the kingdome, requiring hereby his faith and loyalty, in that during the time of his abſence, and after the death of his father, hee had faithfully ruled and gouerned the H kingdome to his vſe. His mother Helena hearing newes of his death, lamented very grieuouſly as reaſon would, in that ſhe being his mother was depriued of a ſonne that ſo zealouſly honored and feared God. Yet notwithſtanding ſhe was comforted, when ſhe vnderſtood that her eldeſt ſonne was to ſucceed him in the kingdom; and haſted herſelfe with all diligence to go and meet him. As ſoone as ſhe arriued in Adiabena, ſhe liued not long time after her ſonne Izates. Where-during his raigne.

place, who ſurpaſſed likewiſe his ſon Alexander in piety and ſeruice of God, who forſooke the religion of his forefathers. In that time there happened a great famine in Iewry, during which Queene Helena ſent huge ſummes of money into Ægypt, and bought L

How a great number of the Iewes were ſlaine about the Temple.

The yeare of the world,4011. after Chriſts birth,49.

AT the time of the feaſt of Paſcha (during which time we are accuſtomed to feed on vnleauened bread) a great number of people aſſembled themſelues from all parts to the Citie of Ieruſalem. Wherevpon Cumanus fearing leaſt by this occaſion there ſhould ariſe ſome commotion, hee gaue order that a company of his ſouldiers ſhould be armed, and ſhould keep their guard in the porches of the temple, to the end that if any trouble ſhould happen, they might repreſſe it. Thoſe gouernours, who had been his predeceſſors, had done the like in ſuch manner of aſſemblies. It came to paſſe on the fourth day of the feaſt, that a certaine ſouldier diſcouering thoſe priuities which were vndecent to be ſeene, ſhewed them before the people: wherewith they that beheld the ſame,were ſore diſpleaſed, and prouoked, ſaying, that the diſhonor was not done vnto them,but to God,to whom it rightly appertained. And ſome of them of beſt reſolution caſt out certaine ſpeeches againſt Cumanus, ſaying; that the ſouldier was ſet on by him. Which when Cumanus vnderſtood, hee was in like maner grieuouſly offended in regard of thoſe iniuries: yet exhorted he thoſe, whom hee ſaw too forward in raiſing factions, to keep the peace, for feare leaſt a ſedition ſhould grow during the time of the feaſt; and ſeeing they would in no ſort obey him, but contrariwiſe they ceaſed not to iniure and reuile him, hee commanded that all the forces he had ſhould be in armes,and retire themſelues into the fortreſs of Antonia that was neer vnto the temple, as we haue heretofore declared. The people, ſeeing the armed ſoldiers,were affraid, & began to fly: but becauſe the places thorow which they iſſued,were but narrow,they imagined that they were purſued by their enemies;ſo that they thruſt on one another in their flight,and diuers of them were thronged to death. In this mutiny there died twenty thouſand men: and after this in ſteed of a feaſt there was nothing but mourning; and without bethinking themſelues of their praiers & ſacrifices,all of them began to weep and lament. So great miſchief ſprang from the inſolence of one ſouldier. This firſt lamentation was ſcarcely finiſhed,before a ſecond ſucceeded the ſame. For ſome of thoſe who had a part in this mutiny, being about ſome hundreth ſtades from the citie,robbed one Steuen that was Cæſars ſeruant in the high way, and tooke from him all that which he had. Which when Cumanus vnderſtood, he preſently ſent ſome of his ſouldiers to ſpoyle thoſe villages, which were neereſt to the place where the fact was committed,and to bring the chiefeſt inhabitants thereof in bonds vnto him. In this pillage a certaine ſouldier found a book of the law of Moſes in one of theſe villages, which he took & brought,and before them all tore it in peeces,with hainous blaſphemies & vile ſpeeches againſt the law & whole nation. The Iewes vnderſtanding hereof,ſuddenly aſſembled themſelues in great numbers,and ran to Cæſarea where Cumanus kept for that preſent,requiring him that he would reuenge not their cauſe, but Gods,whoſe law was on that ſort diſhonoured; ſignifying vnto him,that it was impoſſible for them to liue,ſo long as their law was thus contemned. Cumanus fearing leaſt a ſecond mutiny and vprore ſhould be raiſed among the people, by counſell of his friends cut off the ſouldiers head, who had committed that outrage againſt the law; and by this meanes appeaſed the ſedition that was ready to take head.

CHAP. V.

The ſedition of the Iewes againſt the Samaritanes.

THere hapned alſo an enmity betwixt the Samaritanes and the Iewes, vpon this occaſion. They of Galilee, who reſorted to the Citie of Ieruſalem at the times of our ſolemne feaſts, were accuſtomed to paſſe thorow the countrey of the Samaritanes. And at that time it hapned, that their way lay thorow a borough called Nais, ſituate in a great champaine field: where a quarrell ariſing betwixt diuers inhabitants of the place,and certaine paſſengers, a great number of the Galileans were murthered. Which when the magiſtrates of Galilee vnderſtood, they reſorted to Cumanus, requiring him to execute iuſtice on thoſe that had murthered their countrimen: but he being corrupted with money by the Samaritanes, made no account of their complaint. The Galileans being prouoked by this contempt of his,perſwaded the cõmon people of the Iewes to betake them to their weapons, and maintaine their liberty; telling them that ſeruitude is of it ſelfe tedious; but that when it is accompanied with outrages, it is intolerable. But their gouernours laboured to pacifie them, promising them to deale so effectually with Cumanus, that he should take punishment of the murtherers: but they gaue them no audience, but fell to armes, requiring Eleazar the sonne of Dinæus to be their chieftaine. This Eleazar was a theefe, who for many years made his abode in the mountains: They therfore spoyled and burnt certaine villages of the Samaritanes. After that the report of all that which had passed, came to Cumanus eares, hee tooke a company of the souldiers of Sebaste, with foure bands of footmen, and armed the Samaritanes likewise to goe and make warre against the Iewes; whom they took, and slew many of them, and led more of them away prisoners. When the chiefest gouernours in Ierusalem saw into what an infinitie of mischiefes they were fallen, they cloathed themselues in sackcloth, and cast ashes on their heads, exhorting those that were mutinous to forethinke themselues of the ruine of their countrey, the danger the temple was in to be burned, the seruitude both of themselues, their wiues and children, to prophane and strange nations; and desired them to change their aduice, and to lay aside their weapons, and cease to offer violence, to the end that they might hereafter liue in quiet, and that euery one of them would retire themselues peaceably to his owne habitation. By which words in the end they being perswaded, returned home, and betook them to their business. The theeues also retired themselues again into their strong holds, and from that time all Iudæa was replenished with thefts. The gouernors of Samaria resorted to Numidius Quadratus gouernor of Syria, who dwelt at that time in Tyre, to accuse the Iewes for that they had fired their villages, and spoiled them; telling him that their losse did not so much trouble them, as for that they saw the Romans were contemned by the Iewes: who notwithstanding ought to appeare before them as their competent Iudges; yet nathelesse that they assembled themselues in such sort, as if the Romans were not their superiours. For which cause they addressed themselues to him, to the end they might haue redresse of those wrongs which they had receiued by them. This is that wherewith the Samaritanes charged the Iewes: who answered to the contrary, alledging that the Samaritanes themselues had beene the authors of that mutiny and vprore; and that Cumanus being wholly corrupted by their money, had smothered the matter, and done no iustice on the murtherers. When Quadratus heard this, he reserued the iudgement till another time, telling them that hee would giue sentence in the matter at such time as he came into Iudæa, & had examined the truth of both sides; so that they returned without doing any thing.

The Galileans in reuenge of their iniuries burn certaine villages of the Samaritanes and spoile the same.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 8. al. 12.

The Samaritanes accuse the Iewes before Numidius Quadratus

The Iewes lay the burthen of the warres on the Samaritanes and Cumanus.

Anon after, Quadratus came into Samaria, where hee heard that the Samaritanes had been the authors of the trouble: and on the other side, knowing that some Iewes likewise incited som insurrection, he caused them to be crucified, whom Cumanus had left in prison. From thence he transported himselfe to Lydda, which is a borough of no lesse bignesse then a city: in which place he sitting on his tribunall seat, heard the Samaritans the second time, & discouered by the report of a certaine Samaritane, that one Dortus one of the principallest among the Iewes, and foure other his confederates induced the people to rebell against the Romans. These did Quadratus cause to be executed. As for Ananias, who was the high Priest, and the captaine Annanus, he sent them bound to Rome, to render an account to the Emperour Claudius of that which they had done. Moreouer, he commanded the chiefe gouernours both of the Samaritanes & Iewes, that they should speedily repaire to Rome; whither Cumanus and captain Celer should conduct them, to the end they might be iudged by Cæsar himselfe, vpon the information taken on both sides. And fearing least the common people of the Iewes should break out into some rebellion, he repaired to the citie of Ierusalem, to giue order that the Iews should attempt to raise no new stirres: but when he came thither, he found all in peace, and busied in the celebration of the feast and offering sacrifices to God, according to their accustomed ceremonies. Being therfore assured that no man would innouate or rebell in that place, he left them to their solemnities, and repaired to Antioch.

Dortus with foure other are crucified.

Ananias, Ananus, Cumanus, Celer, & som other are sent to Rome.

But the Iewes that were sent to Rome with Cumanus, and the principall Samaritanes had a day assigned them by the Emperor to decide the differents that were between them: Cumanus and the Samaritanes laboured all that they might by the mediation of Cæsars friends and freemen, to haue the vpper hand of the Iewes, and indeed the day had been theirs if yong Agrippa had not been in Rome. For he seeing that the matter was handled to the disaduantage of the Iewes, besought Agrippina the Emperops wife, that she would labour her husband in such sort, that he would be pleased to take full knowledge of that which was done, and that afterwards he should execute due iustice on those whom he found guilty of that sedition. Claudius fauourably gaue care to this request: and hearing the whole matter, he found that the Samaritanes were the first

Furthermore, he sent Claudius Fœlix, Pallas brother, to gouerne Iudæa. The yeare of the world, 4015. after Christs birth, 53.

In the twelfth yeare of his raigne, he gaue Agrippa Philips Tetrarchy, with Batanea; and besides that, anexed thereunto Trachonitis and Abila, which in times past appertained to Lysanias Tetrarchy, taking from him the prouince of Chalcis, which hee had gouerned for the space of foure yeares. After that Agrippa had obtained this gift at Cæsars hands, he married his sister Drusilla to Azizus king of the Emesenians, who consented to be circumcised, because Epiphanes king Antiochus sonne would not giue eare vnto the marriage, for that he refused to entertaine the reli- Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 9. al. 14. He gaue Mariamme also to Archelaus Chelcias sonne, who by her fathers consent was before time promised him, on whom he begat a daughter called Bernice. A little after this, the marriage of Azizus and Drusilla was broken off, on this occasion following. At such time as Fœlix gouerned Iewry, he saw Drusilla and was surprised with her loue, for that she surpassed all other women in beauty. He therefore sent a certaine Magician called Simon, who was borne in Cypris, and one of his greatest friends among the Iewes, who perswaded her to forsake her first husband, & to marry with Fœlix, giuing her to vnderstand, that she should be happy, if she refused not this match. She vnadui sed, and resolued to rid her selfe from the enuious affection, which her sister Bernice bare towards her (who hated her in regard of her beauty, and for this occasion ceased not to iniure her) Mariamme. His death hereafter will I declare, and how in the Emperour Tiberius time he died, and was burned in the fire of the mountain Vesuuius with his wife. Bernice remained a widow, very long time after Herods death, who was both her vncle and her husband, and the report was that she had the company of her brother. Finally, she wrought so much, that Polemon King of Cilicia caused himselfe to be circumcised, to the end hee might espouse her, purposing by that meanes to make it knowne how falsely she had been accused. Whereunto Polemon gaue eare, because she was rich. But this mariage continued not any long time. For Bernice thorow her impudency, as it is reported, abandoned Polemon, who giuing ouer that mariage forsooke also the religion of the Iewes. At the same time Mariamme hauing refused Archelaus her Polemon king of Cilicia marrieth Bernice. The yeare of the world, 4018. after the birth of Christ, 56.

The Emperour Claudius died after he had raigned thirteen yeares, eight moneths and twenty daies. Some say, that hee was poisoned by Agrippina his wife, the daughter of Germanicus Claudius brother, which was first married to Domitius Oenobarbus, one of the greatest men of Rome: after whose death and long widowhood, shee was finally married to Claudius, into whose house shee brought her sonne called Domitius, by his owne fathers name. Claudius had before time put Messalina his wife to death, for the iealousie that hee had of her: although he had had chil- Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 10. al. 15.

Hee had Octauia also by his first wife Pætina, which was elder then her brethren, and was married to Nero, whom Claudius so named, and adopted for his sonne. Agrippina, fearing least Britannicus, growing to mans estate, should succeed his father in the Empire, and desirous to make her own sonne Emperour, as it is reported: she left nothing vnattempted that might bring her husband to his death; & presently sent Burrus, who was generall of the army, with certaine other captaines, and those of greatest power among his freemen, to bring Nero into the field, and to proclaime him Emperour. Hee being thus established in the Empire, caused Britannicus to be secretly poysoned; and not long after this he openly caused his mother to be put to death, yeelding her this recompence, not only for that she had born him in her womb, but also because by her policies he had obtain'd the Empire. But I will no further prosecute this matter, for that there are diuers who haue composed Neros History, of whom some haue no regard of the truth, but haue spoken at their pleasure, for that hee had beene their benefactor: other some transported with hatred and despite against him, haue not beene ashamed to publish such impudent lies against his renowne, as they deserue to be condemned. For mine own part I am intended to write nothing but the truth: neither ſtand I much on that which concerneth not the matter which I intreat of, purpoſing in all truth and diligence to declare that which hath befallen our nation of the Iewes, without omitting of either their misfortunes or follies, that haue proceeded with them. CHAP. VI.

Alias cap. 16. Fœlix puniſheth the theeues, and Magicians & other ſeducers of the people.

BVt the affaires of Iudæa grew daily worſe and worſe. For the countrey was repleniſhed againe with theeues, and enchanters, who deceiued the common people. Fœlix apprehended many of them daily, and cauſed them to be executed and put to death. He took Eleazar alſo the ſonne of Dinæus, who was captaine of thoſe outlawes and theeues that ranged in the countrey, and ſurpriſed him by a ſubtilty. For Fœlix had giuen him his word, that he ſhould I in no ſort be endangered: Whereupon he came and ſubmitted himſelfe, and was preſently fettered and ſent to Rome. And for that hee had conceiued a diſpleaſure againſt Ionathan the high Prieſt, who had diuers times admoniſhed him to vſe more circumſpection in the gouernment of Iudæa, for feare he ſhould be blamed by the people, for that hee had required Cæſar that Fœlix might be admitted to the gouernment, he thought it not amiſſe to cut off Ionathan, who continually ſollicited and vexed him. For this cauſe, he perſwaded and bribed a certaine man called Dora, who was borne in Ieruſalem, and was one of thoſe in whom Ionathan repoſed his moſt truſt, to bring in certaine theeues to murther Ionathan, who willingly liſtned to his demands; and deſirous to gratifie the gouernour, by this means that enſueth brought that to effect which he had intended. There were certaine theeues that came vp to Ieruſalem, vnder colour to adore God, K who carrying their ſwords cloſely hidden vnder their garments, accoſted Ionathan & ſlew him. Now for that this murther was let ſlip, and not puniſhed; from that day forward the theeues reſorted boldly to the ſolemne feaſts, hauing their weapons hidden vnder their garments, and thronging in among the people, ſlew ſome of thoſe who were their aduerſaries; and otherſome to pleaſure thoſe, who had hired them with ready mony to rid them of thoſe they miſliked. And theſe outrages committted they not onely in other parts of the Citie, but in the temple likewiſe, where they ſlaughtered ſom who little ſuſpected that any impiety ſhould be committed in that place. For mine owne part, I thinke that God hath deſtroyed our Citie in deteſtation of that impietie: and for that he accounted the temple for an impure manſion place, he hath ſent vs the L
Romans, who haue ſet fire on the ſame to purge the Citie, and make vs ſlaues with our wiues and children, intending thereby to teach vs wiſedome by our owne miſeries. Thus was the Citie filled with theſe thefts and murthers. And as touching the enchanters and deceiuers, they perſwaded the common people to follow them into the deſart, promiſing them to ſhew them ſignes and miracles done by the power of God: whereunto diuers gaue eare, and at laſt ſuffered the penaltie of their folly. For Fœlix recalling them backe againe, puniſhed them.

At that ſame time there came a certaine man from Ægypt to Ieruſalem, who tearmed himſelfe a Prophet, who incited the common people to follow him to the Mount called Oliuet, ſituate not far off from Ieruſalem, and onely diſtant ſome fiue furlongs from thence, telling them from thence that he would make them ſee the walls of the Citie fall vnto the ground, by which M way he promiſed them to giue them entry. Which being reported to Fœlix, he cauſed his ſouldiers to arme themſelues, and departing out of Ieruſalem with great ſtore of horſe and foote, he ſet vpon them, and ſlew foure hundreth of them, and tooke two hundreth aliue: as for the Egyptian he eſcaped out of the skirmiſh, and no man knew what became of him. The theeues alſo incited the people anew to make warre againſt the Romans, telling them that they ought not to yeeld them obedience; and they burned and ſpoiled diuers of thoſe boroughs which oppoſed themſelues againſt them. It chanced alſo that the Iewes, which inhabited Cæſarea, mutined againſt

A againſt the Syrians that were in the ſame Citie, in that they ſtroue to haue an equall authority in the gouernment of the ſtate as wel as they. The Iewes pretended the title of ſuperiority, becauſe that Herod, who was a Iew, had builded the city of Cæſarea: on the other ſide, the Syrians auowed the Iewes ſayings to be true; but they replied alſo that Cæſarea was in times paſt called the tower of Straton, and that at that time there was not one Iew that inhabited the ſame. Which when the gouernors of that country heard, they laid hands on the authors of this ſedition, as wel of the one as of the other party, and gaue them the baſtinado, pacifying by this means the trouble for a little ſpace. For the Iewes once more being puffed vp with their riches, & contemning the Syrians, iniuriouſly reuiled and prouoked them: on the other ſide, the Syrians being weaker in ſubſtance, but as great in hart (by reaſon the greateſt number of thoſe that bare armes with B the Romanes were Cæſareans & Sebaſtens) at ſome times brake out into opprobrious ſpeeches againſt the Iewes, and at length the quarrell grew to that heat, that they caſt ſtones one at another: ſo that on both ſides diuers of them were both ſlaine & hurt; yet had the Iewes the vpper hand. Fælix perceiuing that this debate might breed a warre, came on between them, requiring the Iewes to deſiſt from further violence, and commanding his ſouldiers to beat downe thoſe who ſhould refuſe to obey him: by which meanes a great number were ſlaine, and diuers taken priſoners. Moreouer, hee gaue his ſouldiers liberty to ſpoile, and rob diuers very rich houſes. The other Iews, who beſides their authority, were renowmed for their moderation, fearing leſt the like miſery ſhould befall them, beſought Fælix to ſound a retreat, and to call in his ſouldiers, and to ſpare that which as yet remained, being ſore grieued at that which had hapned: to which C Fælix condeſcended. At that ſame time King Agrippa gaue the prieſthood to Iſmael, the ſonne of Phabeus. There aroſe alſo a diſſenſion betwixt the high Prieſts, and the other Prieſts & gouernours of Ieruſalem, and each faction walked forth accompanied with a troupe of proud & mutinous perſons, who decided their debates with bitter wordes, and flinging of ſtones; ſo that no man might pacifie them. For all things were ſo out of order, as if there had been no Magiſtrates in the citie: and the impudency and audacioufnes of the high Prieſts permitted ſo much, that they ſent their ſeruants to the granges, to ſeize the tenths that were due vnto the Prieſts; wherby it came to paſſe, that ſome poore Prieſts died of neceſſity, and want: ſo much did the violence of the ſeditious at that time preuaile aboue all right.

AFter that Portius Feſtus had been ſent by Nero to ſucceed Fælix in the gouernment of Iudæa, the chiefeſt of thoſe Iewes that inhabited Cæſarea, repaired to Rome to accuſe Fælix: and without all doubt he had been puniſhed for the iniuries he had committed againſt the Iewes, if Nero had not pardoned him vpon his brother Pallas ſubmiſſion and intreaty, who importuned him, and was at that time in great reputation with him. Furthermore, two of the chiefeſt amongſt the Syrians wrought Berillus, who had ſomtimes bin Neros Maſter, and at that time was Secretary of eſtate in the Greek tongue, by mighty bribes, to E beg at Neros hand the reuocation of the right and title, which the Iewes enioyed in the gouernment and adminiſtration of the common-weale. For which cauſe Berillus ſollicited the Emperour, and obtained a letter at his hands, which was the cauſe of thoſe miſchiefes that afterwards happened in our nation. For the Iewes of Cæſarea, vnderſtanding what commiſſion the Syrians had gotten, were ſo much the more kindled and encouraged to make warre.

As ſoone therefore as Feſtus was arriued in Iudæa, he found the country grieuouſly afflicted with robberies, and the lower country was ſpoiled by ſword and fire. The theeues likewiſe at that time encreaſed wondrouſly, and they vſed ſhort ſwords after the manner of a Perſian Cymetre, and crooked like the Roman faulchion; with which they ſlew diuers men. For thruſting themſelues into the preſs of people that came in great multitudes on the feſtiual daies to celebrate F Gods ſeruice, they killed thoſe very eaſily whom they liſted; and oftentimes repairing to their enemies villages, they ſpoiled and burnt the ſame. But Feſtus ſent diuers forces both of horſe and foot againſt certain Iewes, that were ſeduced by an enchanter, who had promiſed them ſecurity and repoſe from all their troubles and moleſtations, if ſo be they would follow him into the deſart; who ſlew both the deceiuer and the deceiued that followed him. At that time King Agrippa erected a ſtately building, within the palace at Ieruſalem, neere vnto the porch. This palace in times paſt appertained to the Aſmoneans, and was ſituate in a high place with a goodly proſpect, from

from whence they that listed, might with pleasure behold the whole citie of Ierusalem, wherin the King took great delight, and beheld from thence that which was done in the temple. The chiefest men of Ierusalem seeing this building, were sore displeased. For neither doth our custom or law permit that any one should look on that which is done in the temple, and especially forbiddeth that no man should behold the sacrifices and oblations. They therefore builded a high wall vpon the gallery, which was within the temple on the West side, which did not onely dam vs the sight of the royall chamber, but also that of the gallery without the temple on the West side, where the Romans kept guard neere vnto the temple on the festiuall daies. Heerewith was King Agrippa sore displeased, and the gouernour Festus far more then he, who commanded them to pull downe the wall. But they besought him that hee would giue them licence to send their Embassadours to Nero, to this intent, alledging that it was impossible for them to liue, if any part of their temple should be beaten downe. Which being granted them, they sent tenne of their chiefest nobility, and with them Ismael the high Priest, and Chelcias the Treasurer of the temple, vnto Nero: who no sooner heard there sute, but he pardoned them, not onely for that they had done, but he commanded that the building should remane as it was. All which hee did in fauour of his wife Poppea, who was intreated by the Iewes, for that she was a deuout Princesse, to sue for them. Shee therefore commanded the ten Embassadors to returne, and kept Chelcias and Ismael for pledges with her. The King vnderstanding how all things had past, gaue the high priesthood to Ioseph, surnamed Cabi, which was the sonne of Simon, who in times past had beene high Priest.

Iames the brother of our Lord stoned.

Ananus accused before Albinus.

Iesus the son of Damneus possesseth Ananus place.

CÆsar being aduertised of Festus death, sent Albinus to gouern Iudæa. But King Agrippa commanded Ioseph to lead a priuat life, and aduanced in his steed a certaine man called Ananus, the sonne of Ananus, who is reported to haue been most happy. For hee had fiue sons, all which supplyed the place of the high Priest, after himselfe had long time before them enioyed the roome: the like whereof hath neuer hapned to any of our high priests. The younger Ananus, who, as we said, was aduanced to this place, was a rash and head-strong man, that followed the sect of the Sadduces, who (as wee haue already declared) were amongst all other the Iewes the most seuere in executing Iustice: wheras therfore Ananus was of this disposition, he thought that he had a fit occasion offered him to doe what him listed after Festus death, and during the time that Albinus was as yet vpon his way. He therfore ascended and sate downe in the tribunall, assisted by the Iudges, and caused Iames the brother of Iesus, who was called Christ, to appeare before him, with certaine others, and accused them for transgressing the law, and blasphemy against God, and caused him to be stoned to death. They that were men of vpright conscience within the city, and diligent obseruers of the law, were very much displeased with this act, and sent secretly vnto the King, beseeching him to prohibit Ananus, that hereafter he should commit no such like offence: for that his first action was not allowable. Some of them also went to meet Albinus, being on his way from Alexandria, to enforme him that it was not lawfull for Ananus to assemble the councell without his licence. Albinus perswaded by these words, wrote a cholerick letter to Ananus, wherin he threatned to punish him. And for the same cause King Agrippa dispossessed him of the priesthood, after he had held the same for the space of three moneths, and in his steed he established Iesus the son of Damneus. After that Albinus was arriued in Ierusalem, he employed all his care and study to pacifie the countrey, by executing diuers of the theeues.

But the high Priest Ananias daily increased in honor and credit, and purchased the good will of the citizens by his liberality and great gifts. But he had certaine mischieuous seruants about him, who conuersed with those that were most intemperate and audacious, who repairing from graunge to graunge, tooke vp many tenths that belonged to the Priests, and beat those that refused to tender them. The Priests vsed no lesse force then did their seruants, hauing no man that might restraine them: whereby it came to passe that the Priests, who were before time maintained by the tenths, died at that time for want of victuals. And the thieues renewing their entrance into the citie by night, during the feast that was celebrated at that time, took the Secretary of captain Eleazar aliue, who was Ananias son, who was the hie Priest. And hauing bound him, led him

A him out of the City, ſending Ananias word, that they would deliuer his Secretary, if he would labour ſo much with Albinus, as to deliuer them their ten companions then priſoners, who were taken by him. To the performance whereof, Ananias perſwaded Albinus by manifeſt reaſon: and by obtaining his demand, encreaſed and begat a number of miſeries. For the theeues vſed all the wily meanes they could deuiſe in apprehending ſome one of Ananias houſe; and when they had taken any one of them aliue, they would not deliuer him, except before they might haue one of their owne deliuered. So that increaſing both in courage and number, they wexed more and more inſolent to afflict the countrey.

The theeues apprehend Ananias kinred and ſeruants.

At that ſame time king Agrippa enlarged the citie of Cæſarea, ſurnamed Philippi, and in honor of Nero called it Neronias. He builded alſo to his great charge a Theater in fauor of the Beryti-

B ans, wherein euery yeere he ſpent diuers thouſands of ſiluer in ſports. Hee diſtributed oyle and corne to euery one of the people, and garniſhed all the city with moſt antick and goodly counterfaited portraitures vpon the porches. Briefly, hee welny tranſported into the citie all the ornaments of the reſt of his kingdome; for which cauſe his ſubiects began to hate him, ſeeing hee depriued them of their rare ornaments to adorne one ſtrange citie. Ieſus the ſon of Gamaliel ſucceeded in the prieſthood, which the King had giuen him, and taken away from Ieſus the ſon of Damneus: who reſigned him his place againſt his will. Whereupon there aroſe a diſcord between them. For hauing aſſembled their reſoluteſt followers, they grew from bitter words to ſatall blowes and ſtones. But amongſt all the reſt, Ananias was the richeſt in wealth, and by his bounty reconciled the more vnto him. Coſtobarus alſo and Saul gathered each of them a band of

C raſcall and deſperat men. Theſe two were of the blood roiall, and by reaſon of their affinity and alliance with Agrippa, they were well beloued. For which cauſe they were outrageous and violent, in ſpoiling & rauiſhing the fortunes of the weaker ſort. From this time forward the eſtate of our citie grew deſperate, encreaſing daily more and more in wickednes.

The Berytians receiue much kindnes at Agrippas hands.

Ananias, Coſtobarus and Saul, prepared to ſpoile the weaker.

When Albinus vnderſtood that Geſſius Florus came to ſucceed him, deſirous that they of Ieruſalem ſhould acknowledge ſome good turne at his hands, he called before him all thoſe priſoners that were notoriouſly guilty of murther, and cauſed them to bee executed. As for thoſe that were impriſoned vpon any ſmall or ſlight cauſe, vpon payment of their fines, he deliuered them: and in ſo doing, the priſon was cleanſed of malefactors, and from that time the country

D remayned full of theeues and robbers.

Hegeſippus & Ruffinus, chap. 17. al. 22.

Albinus executeth the hainous malefactors.

Agrippa giueth the of the tribe of Leui, leaue to weare linnen garments.

The Leuites, who were ordained to ſing Hymnes vnto God, ſolicited the King to aſſemble the councell, and therby to permit them to weare the linnen Robe, which the Prieſts were accumed to vſe, telling him that ſuch an ordinance would dignifie his eſtate very much, in that hee would be alwaies famous in memory of this new eſtabliſhment. This ſute of theirs was eaſily reſpected & admitted: For the King after he had conſulted with thoſe, who were his aſſiſtants, ſuffered the Leuites that ſung the Hymnes, to lay aſide their ordinary Robe, and to apparell themſelues in linnen, as beſt liked them. He permitted alſo that another part of the Leuites, who intended the ſeruice of the temple, ſhould learne to ſing the Hymnes and Pſalmes according as they had required. All which he did contrary to the ordinances of the countrey, which being broken, there was nought elſe to be expected but puniſhment.

Agrippa permitteth the miniſters of the temple to ſing the ſacred Hymnes.

E At that time was the building of the Temple finiſhed: And the people perceiuing that more then eighteen thouſand workmen ſhould be idle, and depriued of wages, whereupon they were accuſtomed to liue in trauailing in the building of the Temple: on the other ſide, being loth to reſerue their money thorow the feare they had of the Romans; to prouide for thoſe workemen (in the entertainment of whom they reſolued to imploy their treaſure: for if any one of them trauailed but one houre in the day, hee was ſuddenly paied his wages) they requeſted the King that it would pleaſe him to repaire the Eaſtern gate on the outward part of the Temple, ſituate in a deſcent, the wals whereof were in height foure hundreth cubits, made of ſquare ſtones of white marble, from the top to the bottome, and euery ſtone twenty foot long, and ſixe foote thicke.

The people of the Iewes beſeech the king that it may be lawfull for thē to repaire the porch.

F This work was firſt builded by King Salomon, who was the firſt that builded our Temple. But the King, to whom Claudius Cæſar had giuen the commiſſion of building the Temple, thinking with himſelfe that it was very eaſie to breake it downe, but very hard to build it vp, and that to reedifie the porch, it would coſt much time and expence, hee denied their requeſt, permitting them neuertheleſſe to paue their citie with broad ſtone. He tooke the prieſthood from Ieſus the ſonne of Gamaliel, and gaue it to Matthias the ſon of Theophilus. In whoſe time the warre betwixt the Romans and Iewes grew to the firſt head.

The succession & number of the high priests among the Iewes.

Aaron and his progeny.

There were 83. hie priests in all.

But I thinke it not amisse, but very answerable to the course of this present historie, to speake G of the priests, and to shew how they had their beginning, and to whom this honour may be lawfully communicated, and how many they were in number vntil the end of the war. The first of them was Aaron Moses brother, after whose death his children succeeded him, & from that time forward the honour hath continued with their successours. For it is a law obserued by our auncestors, that no man should be admitted to the priesthood, except he be of Aarons posteritie: for albeit he were a king, if so bee that he were of another line, it was impossible for him to obtaine the priesthood. All the priests after Aaron, who (as we haue said) was the first, vntil Phanasus, who the seditious created priest in the time of the war, haue bin in number 83: wherof 13 haue executed the office from the time that Moses erected Gods tabernacle in the desart, vntill such time as arriuing in Iudæa, king Salomon builded a temple to God. For in the beginning, the high priest- H hood continued with the possessors for terme of life: but afterwards, although the priestes were yet aliue, yet were there other successors planted in their rooms. These 13 were of Aarons posteritie, and obtained this degree in succession the one after the other. Their first gouernment was Aristocratia, which is the gouernment of the nobilitie: afterwards a Monarchy; and finallie, a royall gouernment. The number of yeeres wherin these 13 flourished, were sixe hundreth & 12 yeeres, from the day that our fathers departed out of Egypt, vnder the conduct of Moses, vntill the edification of the temple that was builded in Ierusalem by king Salomon.

After these 13 high priests, there were 18 others; who after Solomons time succeeded one after another, vntill the time that Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon, hauing encamped before the citie, tooke the same, and burned the temple, and transported our nation into Babylon, & led away I the high priest Iosedech prisoner. The time of the priesthood, and continuance of these 18, was foure hundreth sixtie sixe yeeres, sixe moneths, and ten daies: so long as the Iewes haue had the royall gouernment. After the surprisall of Ierusalem by the Babylonians, vntill such time as Cyrus king of Persia dismissed the Iewes, and gaue them leaue to returne from Babylon into their owne countrey, with permission to reedifie their temple, there are 70 yeers: and at that time the captiues beeing returned, Iesus the sonne of Iosedech tooke vpon him the high priesthood, who with those of his posterity to the number of fifteene, haue gouerned in a Democratie or popular estate, vntill the time of Antiochus surnamed Eupator, for the space of foure hundreth & fourteen yeares. This Antiochus was the first, who with his generall Lysias displaced Onias, surnamed Menelaus, of his priesthood; commanding him to be slain at Beryth, and after he had driuen his son K out of the succession, he established Iacim high Priest, who notwithstanding was of Aarons race; but not of his family. For this cause Onias, the sonne of Onias, and nephew to the deceased Onias, retyred himselfe into Egypt: where growing familiar with Ptolomey Philometor and Cleopatra his wife, hee perswaded them to build a Temple in the confines of Heliopolis, not vnlike to that of Ierusalem, and to create a high Priest in the same: of which temple in Egypt, we haue made very oftentimes mention. After that Iacim had held the priesthood for the space of three years, he died without successor. For the citie remained seuen yeares without a high Priest. Againe, the Asmoneans recouered the gouernement of their nation, and after they had warred against the Macedons, they established Ionathan high Priest, who exercised the office seuen yeares: but afterwards he was slaine by an ambush, and treason conspired against him by Tryphon, as wee haue L declared elsewhere. After him, Simon his brother vndertooke the priesthood, who was not long after slaine treacherously by his sonne in law at a banquet. After him succeeded his sonne Hircanus, who enioying this dignity for the space of thirty one yeares, died when hee was very olde, leauing behinde him Iudas, surnamed Aristobulus; who dying by sickenesse, left his brother Alexander his heire, both of the kingdome and high priesthood. After that Aristobulus had obtained the royall gouernment, he enioyed both dignities one whole yeare. For this Iudas surnamed Aristobulus, was the first that set the diadem on his head, causing himself to be called a King. The which, Alexander did continue: for he also ioyned the kingdom with the high priesthood, and raigned twenty-seuen years: and feeling himselfe draw neere to his death, hee left it in Alexandras his wiues hands to dispose of the priesthood as she pleased. She therefore bestowed it M on Hircanus: and as touching the kingdome, she kept it in her owne hands nine yeares, and afterwards died. Her sonne Hircanus was high Priest for so long time: for after Alexandras death, his brother Aristobulus made warre against him: and hauing ouercome him, hee tooke the kingdome from him, and not onely seized the crowne, but the priesthood. After hee had raigned three yeares, and as many moneths, Pompey repaired to Ierusalem, and took it perforce, and laying hold of Aristobulus, sent him bound vnto Rome with his children. After which he restored

A the prieſthood once more to Hircanus, cõmitting the gouernment of the nation vnto his hands, forbidding him in the meane ſpace to weare the diademe. Beſides the firſt nine yeares, Hircanus gouerned twenty and foure, but Barzapharnes and Pacorus Princes of the Parthians, paſſed Euphrates, and made warre againſt Hircanus, and tooke him aliue priſoner, and made Antigonus, Ariſtobulus ſonne King. But after he had gouerned three yeares and three moneths, Soſius and Herod tooke him aliue perforce, and Antonius ſent him to Antioch where he was put to death. After that Herod was created King by the Romans, there was neuer any high Prieſt created of the poſterity of the Aſmoneans (for he gaue the high prieſthood to certaine men of obſcure & baſe condition, who were of the order of the Prieſts) Ariſtobulus onely excepted. This Ariſtobulus was Hircanus nephew, who was priſoner among the Parthians; and hauing giuen him the prieſt-
B hood he married himſelfe with Mariamne his ſiſter, to the intent to continue himſelf in the good liking of the people in remembrance of Hircanus: but afterwards fearing, leſt all of them ſhould turne to Ariſtobulus ſide, he cauſed him to be ſlaine, by finding out a meanes to cauſe him to be ſtifled, at ſuch time as he bathed himſelfe in a fiſhpond neere to Iericho, as we haue declared before this. After him he beſtowed the prieſthood no more on any of the line of the Aſmoneans. Archelaus, his ſonne followed his fathers ſteps in reſpect of the prieſthood, and from that time forward the Romans haue enioyed the ſoueraignty ouer Iewry. All they then that haue exerciſed the prieſthood from Herods time vntill the day that Titus tooke the Citie and the Temple, haue been in all twenty and eight. All the continuance of their gouernement was one hundreth and ſeuen yeares. Certaine of theſe gouerned during Herods life, and in the daies of Archelaus,
C his ſonne: but after theſe two were dead, the gouernment was Ariſtocratical, or of the nobility, wherein the Prieſts had the gouernement ouer the whole nation. Thus much haue we thought meet to ſpeake at this time as touching the high Prieſts.

How Florus, Albinus ſucceſſor, offered many iniuries to the Iewes, which conſtrained them to take armes.

D GEſſius Florus being ſent by Nero to ſucced Albinus, filled all Iudæa with many miſchiefes and miſeries. He was a Clazomenian borne, and was married to a certain woman called Cleopatra, no leſſe miſchieuous then himſelfe: who being beloued by Poppea Neros wife, obtained this dignity for him. He behaued himſelfe ſo outrageouſly and violently in all his gouernement, that thorow the great iniuſtice he committed, the Iewes praiſed Albinus as if he had been their benefactor. For he concealed his miſchiefe, taking care leaſt it ſhould wholly be conceited or diſcouered: but Geſſius Florus behaued himſelfe in ſuch ſort, as if he had beene ſent to make open ſhew and ſale of his villanies, publiſhing his iniuſtice in the eares of our nation, without omitting either rapine or iniuſtice in execution and inflicting puniſhment on the innocent. For he was pitileſſe and couetous, and made no difference between noble and ignoble, and was not aſhamed to be partaker with theeues: of whom there were diuers that made it their profeſſion, to ſteal without any fear, in that they were aſſured of their ſafety, becauſe he was partaker
E with them. And in a word, there was no moderation in him, in ſuch ſort that the poor Iewes being vnable to endure the inſolent rapines and ſpoiling of their goods that they receiued by theſe theeues, were conſtrained to abandon their owne houſes, and to flie their country, and remaine in ſome more commodious place of ſecurity, yea though it were among ſtrangers. What need I ſpeake any more? Hee that conſtrained vs to raiſe our ſwords againſt the Romans, was Florus, who made this account, that it was better for them to die all at once in great troups, then to periſh by little and little. In briefe, the warre began the ſecond yeare of the gouernment of Florus in that Prouince, which was the twelfth yeare of Neros Empire. But they that deſire to know exactly all that which we haue beene conſtrained both to do and ſuffer, may peruſe my bookes as touching the Warres of the Iewes. For which cauſe in this place I will end this ancient Hiſtorie, F after which I haue begun to deſcribe the Hiſtory of the Warre.

haue been high Priests for the space of two thousand years. I haue also collected the succession of Kings, their actions and gouernments, with the power of their monarchies, according as it is amply described in holy Scriptures, as also I haue promised in the beginning of my History. Furthermore, I dare boldly say, that whatsoeuer I haue set downe, is so assured, that there is no man either Iew or of what nation soeuer, yea although he should haue imployed the vttermost of his power, could more exactly communicate the same vnto the Greeks, then I haue done. For in their confessions & opinions who are of our nation, I haue such knowledge in that which concerneth our doctrine, as I surpasse them all: And as touching the Grecian disciplines, I haue studied & learned the tongue, although I cannot boast of the familiar & fit pronunciation of the same, for that I haue liued in the countrey. For amongst vs wee make but slender reckoning of those, who are exercised in diuers tongues, for that this study is accounted prophane by vs, and common not onely to free persons, but also vnto slaues: and they onely are esteemed to haue profited in wisedome, who fully know the contents of the law, and who can expound the holy Scriptures. For this cause, although diuers haue trauailed in this exercise of writing Histories, yet are there scarcely two or three of them that haue written succesfully, and haue receiued the fruits of their labours. And it may be that it shall not be misthought of, if I freely speake somewhat of my progeny and life, considering that there are men at this day liuing, who can approue or reproue me in that I set down. And in this place I will make an end of mine ancient History. which I haue reduced into twenty Bookes, containing sixty thousand verses. And if God grant me life I will shortly entreat of our wars, and the euents of the same that haue hapned hitherto, which is the thirteenth yeare of Domitianus Cæsars Empire, and the fifty sixt yeare of mine age. NOW therefore that I am not basely but nobly descended, being both on the father and mothers side, deriued from the line of the priests: and for as much as some are accustomed to draw the ground of their nobility, the one from this man, the other from that; so among our nation the marke of true nobilitie is, to deriue a mans pedigree from the priesthood. Touching my selfe I am not onely lineally issued from the Priests, but I drav my originall from them, who amongst the foure & twenty ranks or families of priests iustly challenge the superiority. Moreouer, by my mothers side I am of the bloud royal. For the heires of the Asmoneans, frō whom she is descended, haue for a long time exercised the priesthood and princely power among our nation. I will likewise make it knowne, how my predecessors haue succeeded the one after the other. My great grandfathers father was Simon, surnamed Psellus, that is, the stutterer, who liued at such time as Hircanus the high Priest the first of that name, and the sonne of Simon the high priest, was in office. This Simon Psellus had nine sonnes: the one of these was Matthias, surnamed Aphlias. This Matthias tooke to wife the daughter of the high priest Ionathan, by whome he had one sonne, who was Matthias surnamed Curtus, who was borne in the first yeere of Hircanus priesthood. Matthias begat Ioseph the ninth yeere of Alexandras gouernment, and of Ioseph came Matthias the tenth yeer of the raigne of Archelaus; and Matthias begat me the first yeere of the Empire of Caius Cæsar. I likewise haue three sonnes, mine eldest is Hircanus, who was borne in the fourth: my next, Iustus, who was borne in the seuenth: and Agrippa my last was borne in the ninth yeer of Vespasians Empire. This genealogy of mine do I in this manner propose, according as I haue found it written in the publike registers, to put them to silence who shall pretend to reproue or detract the same.

My father Matthias was not onely famous for his expresse nobilitie, but hath also bin praised by reason of his iustice and authoritie in Ierusalem, which is the mother city of all the rest in our countrey. My bringing vp during my tender yeeres was with Matthias, who was my brother by the same father and mother; with whom I happily profited in all kinde of science, hauing a good memorie and a quick apprehending spirit: so that, being as yet a child of fourteene yeeres of age, I was praised by all men in regard of the good affection I bare to learning, and the priests & noblest citizens alwaies assembled about me, to receiue certaine exact instructions from mee in any thing that concerned our ordinances. About the age of sixteene yeeres my desire was to haue a search and insight into the sects of our nation, which (as I haue said) are three: the first of the Pharises, which is the chiefest. The second of the Sadducees. And the third of the Esseans. For I truely thought with my selfe, that I might easily choose the better of the three, at such time as I had beene exercised and acquainted with them all: for which cause with great abstinence and no lesse labour, I passed thorow them all: and not content with this experience; after I had heard that a certaine man called Banus liued in the desart, clothing himselfe with that which the trees brought forth, & feeding on no other kind of meat, but that which they willingly yeelded him, washing himselfe oftentimes by day and night in cold water to keep himselfe chaste: I began to imitate his course of life: and after I had liued with him for the space of three yeeres, and satisfied my desires, at last I returned into the citie.

Ioseph from his infancy very studious, and addicted to learning.

At the age of nineteene yeeres, I began to intermeddle with publike affaires, following the sect of the Pharisees, which very neerely resembleth that sect among the Græcians, who are called Stoicks. After I was sixe and twentie yeeres old, it was my fortune to repaire to Rome vpon this occasion that ensueth: During such time as Fœlix gouerned Iudæa, there were certain priests my familiars, men of much honour & more vertue, who vpon some slight occasion were bound and ſent to Rome by his commandement, to aunſwer to that which was obiected againſt them in Caſars preſence. Whereupon I being deſirous to labour for their liberty, hauing eſpeciall intelligence, that notwithſtanding the torments wherewith they were martyred, they buried not in forgetfulnes that pietie which they ought to God, but liued on figges and nuttes : for this cauſe I departed for Rome, and was encountred with many great and grieuous hazards by ſea. For the ſhip, wherein I ſailed, was wrackt in the midſt of the Adriatike ſea, and there were about ſixe hundreth of vs that ſwamme all night long, and vpon the day ſpring by Gods prouidence a Cyrenian ſhip came in ſight, and both I and certaine others to the number of foureſcore, outſwimming the reſt, were taken vp into it and ſaued. After I had in this ſort eſcaped, I came to Dicæarchia, which the Italians call at this day Puteol, and grew acquainted with Aliturus a Iew borne, who was a plaier, and in good reputation with Nero ; by whoſe meanes inſinuating my ſelfe into Poppeas knowledge, who was Caſars wife, I determined to beſeech her to procure thoſe Prieſts liberties, with all expedition: which done, I by her meanes recouered their preſent liberty : and being gratified likewiſe by her with many great gifts, I returned into my countrey. There found I the commonweale too much addicted to factions and troubles, and diuers too prone and readie to rebell and forget their alleageance to the Romans. I inforced my ſelfe to repreſſe the ſeditious, and exhorted them to change their opinions, repreſenting before their eies the qualitie of thoſe, againſt whom they enterpriſed their war, with whom they neither might compare in experience of war, neither in good fortune: for this cauſe I aduiſed them, not to hazard and ouerthrow their countrey by their raſhnes and rage, and with it their poſterities and themſelues.

To this effect ſpake I vnto them, and inſtantly intreated them to forſake their vntamed reſolution, for that I foreſaw that the end of this warre would redound to our vtter ruine : but I preuailed nothing with them. For the fury of deſperate and diſſolute men preuailed aboue reaſon: for which cauſe fearing leaſt by continuall inforcing of one thing, I ſhould grow into hatred and ſuſpicion among them, as if I fauoured their enemies; fearing likewiſe leſt if they ſhould lay hold on me, they ſhould be put to death, ſeeing that the fort of Antonia was already ſeized vpon by the ſeditious, I retired my ſelfe into the inward part of the temple. In proceſſe of time, after Manahem and the chiefeſt among the theeues were put to death, I came out again from the temple, and conuerſed with the prieſts, and chiefeſt Phariſees, who were ſurpriſed with great feare. And grieuouſly were we diſmaied, when we ſaw the people in armes : and being vncertain what to do, and wanting the meanes to pacifie theſe mutinies, and apparantly perceiuing their manifeſt danger, both I and the Phariſees tould them our opinion was anſwerable to theirs, & counſailed them to containe themſelues in peace, and not to prouoke the enemy. For our hope was that Ieſsius would with all expedition draw out great forces, and chaſtice thoſe peace-breakers. But as ſoone as he arriued, and had fought with them, he was ouercome, and a great number of his men were ſlaine : whereupon grew the vtter ruine of our whole nation. For ſuch as deſired the warre, were puffed vp with that victory, and conceiued an aſſured hope that in the end they ſhould ouercome the Romans. Beſides that, this enſuing occaſion preſented it ſelfe. The inhabitants of the cities that bordered vpon Syria, laid hands on thoſe Iews that dwelt amongſt them, & ſlue both them, their wiues, & children, without any iuſt cauſe or crime committed by them. For they had not conſpired any waies or intended to reuolt from the Romans, or to vſe any hoſtilitie or any ſecret conſpiracie againſt any of thoſe, with whome they were conuerſant. But among all the reſt, the citizens of Scythopolis exceeded all other in impietie and wickednes. For being beſieged without by certaine of the Iewes, they inforced thoſe Iewes that inhabited amongſt them to take armes, & to charge thoſe of their owne nation (which is both prohibited & vnlawfull by our lawes) who fighting againſt them diſcomfited them : but after this ouerthrow, they in ſuch ſort falſified and forgot their faith, that they had giuen to their aſſociates and fellow citizens that they ſlew euery mothers ſonne of them, to the number of many thouſands. The like misfortune alſo fell vpon thoſe Iewes that inhabited Damaſco. But of this wee haue more amply ſpoken in thoſe our bookes, which we haue written of the warres of the Iewes : & at this preſent I make mention hereof, intending to ſignifie, and certainly perſwade the readers, that the warre which was waged with the Romanes, proceeded not of a reſolute intent and purpoſe, but for the moſt part of an inforced neceſſitie.

After that Geſsius was ouercome (as we haue heretofore declared) the chiefeſt men of Ieruſalem perceiuing that the theeues made a partie among the ſeditious, and were ſtrongly and plentifully armed and prouided, they began to fear leaſt if they ſhould be found diſarmed, they ſhould

A ſhould ſuddenly be ouerthrowne by their enemies; as in effect it fell out afterwards: and hearing that all Galilee was not as yet wholly reuolted from the Romans; but that a part thereof as yet entertained the peace, they ſent me with two other Prieſts Ioazar and Iudas, who were both vertuous and honorable men, to perſwade the mutinous to lay by their armes, & to let them know that it was more behooueful for the good of the nation, that ſuch men as were in authority & reputation, ſhould haue the keeping thereof. The reſolution that was taken by them was, that they had them alwaies ready vpon all occaſions, but that they expected vntill they were certifi- what the Romans intended to doe.

With this commiſſion and ſuch like inſtructions, I repaired into Galilee: where I found the Sephorites were in no ſmall hazard in reſpect of their countrey, for that they of Galilee had re- The danger of the Sephorites.

B ſolued to forrage the ſame in regard of their league of friendſhip continued with the Romanes, and contracted and ratified by Senius Gallus Gouernor of Syria. But I deliuered them all of that feare, and appeaſed the cõmon people by permittting them, to ſend at all times when they pleaſed, their hoſtages to Geſſius, who lay at Dora a Citie of Phœnicia. I found likewiſe that the inhabitants of Tiberias were already in armes, vpon this occaſion following. There were in that Sedition in the Citie of Tiberias. Three factiõs in the citie of Tiberias.

Citie three different factions, the one of the nobility, whoſe chieftaine was Iulius Capella, and all thoſe that accompanied him, that is to ſay, Herod the ſon of Miarus, Herod the ſon of Gamalus, and Compſus the ſonne of Compſus (for Criſpus his brother, who in times paſt had been gouernour for Agrippa ſurnamed the Great, was amongſt his poſſeſſions on the other ſide of Iordan) all theſe I ſay gaue counſell at that time to ſubſcribe to the Romanes authority, and to obey their King.

C But Piſtus would no waies accord to this aduice, in regard of his ſon Iuſtus: for naturally he was vaine-glorious. The ſecond faction was of the common ſort, who concluded vpon warre. Iuſtas, Piſtus ſon, who was the ring-leader of the third faction, carried himſelfe very doubtfully as touching the warre; yet notwithſtanding hee ſought & thirſted after innouation, hoping that by a change he ſhould encreaſe his power. Preſenting himſelf therfore in the midſt of the multitude, he inforced himſelfe to perſwade the common ſort, that their Citie had alwaies belonged to Galilee, and that during the daies of Herod the Tetrarch, who founded the ſame, it was the chiefeſt Citie, whoſe pleaſure it was that the Citie of Sephoris ſhould yeeld obedience to that of Tiberias. Furthermore, he auowed that they had not loſt that preheminence in the time of King Agrippa the father, but had continued the ſame till Fœlix obtained the gouernement of Iudæa. The oration of Iuſtus, Piſtus ſonne, to the multitude. " " " " " " " "

D But for the preſent wherein they had been giuen by Nero to the yonger Agrippa, they had fallen and loſt their ſuperiority. For the Citie of Sephoris obtained the ſoueraignty of Galilee, after that ſhe acknowledged the Roman gouernment, who had aboliſhed the table royall and publike regiſters. By theſe words and others of like nature, inforced againſt King Agrippa, he incited the people to rebellion, ſignifying vnto them that the opportunity inuited them to take arms, to the end that being aſſociated with the Galileans, they might make themſelues Lords, for that all of them would willingly ioyne themſelues with them, thorow the hatred they bare to the Sephorites, on whom they would reuenge thẽſelues with great force, becauſe they continued in their allegeance, which they promiſed to the Romans. Iuſtus incites the people to rebellion. " " "

And by theſe words hee won the peoples hearts vnto him: for hee was a man that was very Iuſtus the ofſpring of war.

E eloquent, and by his ſubtilty and politike diſcourſe, eaſily ouerthrew all that which his aduerſaries produced againſt him. For hee was not ignorant of thoſe ſciences that are knowne vnto the Greekes: but truſting to his wiſedome and good diſcourſe, hee began to diſcouer how all things had paſt at that time, to the intent that by ſuch colourable inſinuations he might ſmother the truth. But in the proceſſe of our diſcourſe, we will declare that hee was a man of a diſſolute life, and that by his and his brothers meanes, he wanted little of vtterly ouerthrowing his countrey. When as therefore this Iuſtus had perſwaded the Citizens of Tiberias to take armes, and had conſtrained diuers men likewiſe, who were of the contrary opinion, to do the like, he iſſued out with them, and burned the villages of the Gadareneans and Hippenians, that are ſituate in the confines of Tiberias and Scythopolis. In this eſtate was Tiberias: and as touching Giſchala,

F their eſtate and affaires were brought to this iſſue. Iohn the ſonne of Leui ſeeing ſome of the Citizens waxen proud by means of their reuolt from the Romans, laboured to reſtraine them, and required them to continue in their allegeance: but notwithſtanding all his perſwaſion and diligence, he could not containe them. For the nations round about them, as the Gadareneans, Gabaraganeans and Tyrians aſſembled a great army, and with the ſame aſſailed Giſchala, and tooke it by force: and after they had conſumed it by fire and vtterly deſtroied the ſame, they returned euery one to their dwelling places. Iohn being ſore diſpleaſed with this act, armed all Giſchala burned & ſpoiled.

thoſe that were with him, and ſet vpon theſe abouenamed nations: and hauing obtained the victory, he reedified Giſchala in farre better ſort then it was before, incloſing it with a wall, to the intent it might be the better fortified againſt future inuaſions. G

Gamala faithfull to Rome.

But thoſe of Gamala perſeuered in their faith towards the Romans; for the occaſion that enſueth. Philip, the ſonne of Iacim, who gouerned vnder King Agrippa, eſcaping beyond all opinion, and flying to the royall palace in Ieruſalem at ſuch time as it was beſieged, fell into another great danger; to wit, to be ſlaine by Manahem, and thoſe theeues that were with him: but certain Babylonians his kinſmen being at that time in Ieruſalem, hindered the theeues from executing their purpoſe at that time. When as therefore Philip had ſoiourned there for the ſpace of foure daies, on the fift he fled away, diſguizing himſelfe in a falſe haire, for feare hee ſhould be diſcouered: And as ſoone as he was arriued in one of thoſe villages which was of his owne poſ- H ſeſſion, ſituate neere vnto the mount Gamala, he ſent for certaine of his ſubiects to make their repaire vnto him. But God would not permit it; but for Philips greater good, hee croſſed the ſcope of his intent, which otherwiſe had bin the ruine of many: for being ſurpriſed by a ſudden feuer, hee committed certaine letters of his, written to Agrippa and Bernice who were yet but young, to one of his free-men, commanding him to deliuer them to Varus, who was put in truſt by the King and Queene, to adminiſter the affaires of their kingdome, for that they were gone to Beryth to meet with Geſſius. As ſoone therefore as he had receiued Philips letters, and vnderſtood that he was eſcap't, he tooke it very hardly, for that he thought it would bee ſaid that the King and Queene had no vſe of him ſince Philip was arriued. Hee therefore brought him that had the cariage of theſe letters, into the peoples preſence, obiecting againſt him that he had for- I ged that writing, alledging that he falſely lied in that hee reported that Philip was in Ieruſalem, making warre with the Iewes againſt the Romans: and for that cauſe he commanded him to be executed. Philip being ignoranr of the cauſe why his free-man did not return, ſent another with letters, to the intent he might diſcouer what was become of his firſt meſſenger, & for what cauſe hee ſtaied ſo long. But Varus accuſing his ſecond meſſenger alſo very falſely, commanded him to be executed, as he had done the firſt. For the Syrians that inhabite Cæſarea, had made him proud, inſomuch that he aſpired to high and great matters, by telling him that Agrippa ſhould be put to death by the Romans, in regard of thoſe faults which the Iewes had commited; and that Varus, who was royally deſcended, ſhould poſſeſſe his gouernement. For without queſtion Varus was held to be of the blood-royall, for that he deriued his pedigree from the Tetrarch Sohemus that gouerned the countrey that abutted on Libanus. For theſe cauſes, Varus grew proud, K and retained Philips letters by him, hoping by theſe means that the King ſhould haue no knowledge thereof; and hee ſet watch in euery paſſage, for feare leaſt any man ſhould flie and certifie the King, of that which had hapned; and to giue the Syrians the better content, who dwelt in Cæſarea, hee put diuers of thoſe Iewes that dwelt among them to death. Hee intended alſo to vndertake a warre againſt the Iewes of Bathanæa, who were called Babylonian Iewes, by confederating himſelfe with the Trachonites of Bathanæa. For which cauſe, ſending for twelue of thoſe Iewes who were of moſt eſtimation among the inhabitants of Cæſarea, he enioyned them to repaire to Ecbatane, to ſignifie vnto thoſe of their nation that dwelt there, that Varus vnderſtanding that they pretended to take armes againſt their King, and ſcarcely beleeuing it, had L ſent them vnto them, to perſwade them to lay by their armes. And that this ſhould be a certaine ſigne, by which they might perfectly expreſſe that hee had no reaſon to giue credit to their reports who had inforced & obiected ſo much againſt them. Furthermore, hee commanded them that ſeuenty of the chiefeſt of them ſhould be choſen out, to anſwer to thoſe accuſations wherewith they ſhould be charged. Theſe twelue arriuing in Ecbatane, and entertained by thoſe of their nation, found that they neither imagined nor intended any commotion: for which cauſe, they perſwaded them to ſend their ſeuenty men: which they did, little ſuſpecting that which would happen.

But one of the ſeuenty, who had eſcaped, reſorted thither with all expedition preuenting Varus, and certified the reſt of that which had hapned. Wherupon, they incontinently fell to arms, & with their wiues & children retired theſelues to the fort of Gamala, abandoning their villages which were ſtored with all kind of goods, and many thouſand cattell. When Philip had tydings hereof, he repaired himſelf alſo to the fort of Gamala: where he no ſooner arriued, but the people cried

A out with a loud voyce, exhorting him to take the ſoueraignty, and to make warre againſt Varus and the Syrians of Cæſarea. For they had intelligence that the King was dead. But Philip moderated their fury, recounting vnto them what benefits the King had beſtowed on them, & of what power the Romans were, againſt whom it was but a folly for them to take armes; and in the end he perſwaded them to peace. The King vnderſtanding that Varus, was determined to kill and murther all the Iewes that were in Cæſarea, with their wiues and children all in one day (who were as many in number) he ſent vnto him Equus Modius to ſupply his place; as it hath been by vs declared in another place. Meane while Philip kept the fort of Gamala, and the countrey thereabouts, perſeuering in their fidelity and loyalty to the Romans. Who gaue me this anſwere, that I ſhould remaine where I was, and retaine thoſe Embaſſadors that I had with me, if they thought good to take charge of Galilee. But they being very wealthy, by means of thoſe tenths & tithes that were giuen them; and very willing, becauſe they were due, to gather them vp in right of their prieſthood, reſolued with themſelues to returne to their owne houſes. But for that I entreated them to remaine with me, vntill ſuch time, as we had ſettled the affaires, they willingly conſented vnto me. I therfore departed wi h them to the citie of Sephora, and came into a borough called Bethmaus diſtant from Tiberias ſome foure furlongs, and from thence I ſent a meſſenger to the councell of Tiberias, exhorting the chiefeſt among the people to come and ſpeak with me: who comming forth

C to viſit me, accompanied with Iuſtus alſo, I tolde them that I was ſent Embaſſadour vnto them, with thoſe other, by the communalty of Ieruſalem, to perſwade them to deface that building that was erected by Herod the Tetrarch, wherein diuers figures of liuing creatures were painted; for that our law forbad them to allow or doe ſuch things, and I exhorted them to ſuffer vs to do that execution as ſoone as they might.

Capella and thoſe of his party, did for a long time refuſe to conſent thereunto: but in the end we inforced them ſo much, that they condeſcended. Now whileſt wee debated vpon this concluſion, Ieſus the ſonne of Saphias (of whom we haue ſpoken heretofore, declaring how he was the chieftaine and conductor of the faction of ſailers and poore men) took with him certain Galileans, and ſet fire on all the palace, vnder hope to get great riches thereby (for that there were

For after we had conferred with Capella, and the chiefeſt Tiberians, we retired our ſelues from Bethmaus into the higher Galilee. In the meane time Ieſus men ſlew all the Greeks that remained there, and who before the warre had been their enemies. Which when I was certified of, I was grieuouſly diſpleaſed, and came down to Tiberias, and diſpoſed of the Kings moueables, for feare leaſt they ſhould be carried away by the robbers: and hauing recouered a candleſticke of Corinthian work, princely tables, and no ſmall quantity of maſſiue ſiluer, I reſolued with my ſelf to reſerue it to the Kings vſe. Calling therefore ten of the chiefeſt Senators, and Capella, Antillus ſonne vnto me, I deliuered the veſſels into their hands, charging them to deliuer the ſame to no man, except it were to my ſelfe.

Ioſeph procureth the ſafety of the Kings goods.

E From thence, with mine aſſociates I went to Iohn at Giſchala, to knowe what his minde and reſolution was, and I preſently ſmelt out by him, that hee affected innouation and tyranny. For he beſought me to grant him liberty, to tranſport Cæſars wheat that was ſtored vp in the villages of higher Galilee, telling me that he would beſtow the ſame in reedifying & repairing the wals of his countrey. But I ſmelling out both his drift and counſels, denyed him that liberty. For I thought that that wheat would either ſerue the Romans, or my ſelfe, for that already I had the care of that countrey committed to my hands by the Citie of Ieruſalem. When as therefore he could winne nothing at my hands, hee appealed to my companions, who were improuident of thoſe troubles that were to come, and greedy of rewards, and obtain'd at their hands thorow his lauiſh liberality a liberty to diſpoſe of all the corne that was in the Prouince, in that I my ſelfe

F was vnable to contradict them both. After this, Iohn vſed another ſubtilty: for he ſaid that thoſe Iewes, who inhabited Cæſarea Philippi, being by the command of their King, to whom they were ſubiect, kept priſoners within their wals; being in want of pure oyle, deſired to buy the ſame at his hands, for feare leaſt contrary to their cuſtome, they ſhould be compelled to vſe that of the Greeks. But this ſpake he not in reſpect of religion or deuotion, but for his filthy lucres ſake. For knowing that among the Cæſareans, two ſextaries were ſold for a drachme, and that at Giſchalis eighty ſextaries were ſold for foure drachmes, hee ſent all that oyle that was in that place vnto them, doing it (as he thought) by my permiſſion. But I did not willingly condeſcend G thereunto, but for feare leaſt if I ſhould withſtand the ſame, the people ſhould ſtone me to death.

As ſoone therefore as I had giuen him leaue, Iohn gathered a great ſumme of money by this cunning ſhift.

Ioſeph ſends back his companions to Ieruſalem. Ioſeph preſident of Galilee.

theeues before me, when as I perceiued that I might not recouer their weapons from them, I perſwaded the multitude to hire them by rewards, telling them that it was more profitable for them to entertain them in their ſeruice, then to ſuffer their country to be ſpoiled by their excur-ſions. And thus hauing taken their oathes, did I diſmiſſe them vnder condition, that they ſhould not come into our region, except they were called, or to receiue their due pay vnder condition, H conſpiracy of theirs preuented by my ſpeedy acceſſe. For a certaine meſſenger came vnto mee from Silas, whom I had in former time preferred to the gouernment of Tiberias, who certified me of the citizens intent, and exhorted me in all haſte to make my repair thither, for that other-

failed

A ſailed them that they ſhould not reuolt, leaſt in ſo doing they might ſhortly repent them of their mutability and breach of faith: for that no man hereafter would giue them credit, being already either ſuſpected or guilty of this their perfidiouſneſſe.

Scarcely had I ſpoken this, but that I heard one of my attendants, who perſwaded mee to deſcend, telling me that this was no time now to reconcile the Tiberians, or to perſwade them: but rather to ſeeke for mine own ſecurity, and how I might eſcape mine enemies. For after that Iohn had learned that I was deſtitute of followers, he ſent a thouſand of his choſen ſouldiers, cõmanding them to kill me; who were at hand, and ready to commit the murther, had I not ſpeedily leapt down with my ſeruant Iacob, and being relieued by Herod the Tiberian, had been brought to the lake, where finding a barke by chance, and putting forth to ſea, I eſcaped contrary to mine B enemies expectation, and came to Taricheas. Iohn ſeeketh to betray and murther Ioſeph.

As ſoone as the inhabitants of that citie vnderſtood how perfidiouſly and traiterouſly the Tiberians had dealt with me, they were ſore diſpleaſed, and betaking themſelues to their weapons, perſwaded me to lead them forth againſt them, telling mee that they would reuenge the iniury that was offered vnto their gouernor, and they blazed this treaſon of theirs thorow all Galilee. For which cauſe a number of armed Galileans came to me, requeſting me that I would inuade Tiberias, and entering it that I would ſpoile the ſame, and in the ruines thereof, that I would ſell the inhabitants with their whole families vnder the ſpeare. The like did my friends, who eſcaped with me out of the citie, perſwade mee. But I in no ſort would admit their ſute, ſuppoſing it to be a matter vnworthy my diſcretion, to reuiue a cauſe of ciuill warre, imagining with my ſelfe, C that ſuch a contention ought to proceed no further then words: yea, I proteſted vnto them, that ſuch reuenge would be preiudicial to thẽſelues alſo, if the Romans ſtanding at gaze, they ſhould ſpend themſelues in ciuill diſcords. By this meanes at length the Galileans wrath was appeaſed. The Galileans require that they may inuade Tiberias.

But when Iohn perceiued that he failed of his purpoſe, he began to feare: for which cauſe taking with him thoſe armed men which he kept about him, and forſaking Tiberias, he repaired to Giſchala, and from thence he wrote his letters vnto me, excuſing the fact, as if hee had beene no waies guilty therof, and beſought me that I would in no ſort ſuſpect him, & confirmed his words with execrable oathes, whereby hee might win the more credit to his writing. But the Galileans, who were gathered in great multitudes from all parts of the region, knowing that hee was a wicked and perfidious man, beſought mee that I would lead them forth againſt him, promiſing D me to ouerthrow both him, Giſchala, and all his Country. Therefore, after I had giuen them thanks for their loue towards me, I promiſed them that mine offices of loue ſhould be anſwerable to their kindneſſe. Yet beſought I them to reſtraine themſelues, and to grant me pardon, for that I thought it better to appeaſe, then procure, troubles. Iohn excuſeth himſelfe to Ioſeph.

This requeſt of mine the Galileans granted: Whereupon we preſently came to Sephoris. But the townſmen, who were reſolued to continue faithfull towards the Roman people, fearing my approach, endeuoured themſelues to diſtract me with ſome other affaires, whereby they might liue in more ſecurity. Whereupon, ſending their meſſenger to Ieſus, the captaine of the thieues, that kept vpon the confines of Ptolemais, they promiſed him a great ſumme of money, if with his armie of eight hundreth men, who liued vnder his command, he would wage warre with vs. E He, allured by their promiſes, bethought himſelfe to aſſaile vs ſuddenly & vnawares: for which cauſe he beſought me by a meſſenger, that I would grant him leaue and liberty to come & ſalute me: which when he had obtained, for that I was wholly ignorant of his treaſon, taking with him a troup of his theeues, he haſted ſpeedily towards me: yet failed he of his purpoſed treaſon; for when he was not far off from me, a certaine fugitiue of his troupe diſcouered his intent towards me. Which when I heard, I went out into the market place, fayning that I knew nothing of his ſecret fraud, attended with a multitude of armed Galileans, and among theſe with certain Tiberians. Ieſus captaine of theeues.

Afterwards, ſending abroad certaine ſpies, who ſhould ſcoure the high-waies, I cõmanded the keepers of the gates, that they ſhould only ſuffer Ieſus to enter with the formoſt of his company, F and exclude the reſt: and if they ſhould attempt to break in by force, they ſhould beat them off. Who fulfilling that which was commanded them, Ieſus entred with a few: and being willed by me preſently to lay downe his weapons, except he deſired to be ſlaine; he, ſeeing himſelfe inuironed with armed ſouldiers, obeyed. Whereupon they that followed him, and were excluded, perceiuing that their captain was apprehẽded, ſuddenly betook them to flight; and leading Ieſus apart, I told him I was not ignorant of thoſe treaſons which hee intended againſt mee; neither by whoſe prouocatiõs he attempted the ſame. Yet told I him that I wold pardon him, if ſo be by Ieſus ſeekes to betray Ioſeph. Ioſeph politiquely ſurpriſeth Ieſus.

which I requested, I dismissed the man, and gaue him leaue to depart with his weapons: yet threatned I to punish the Sephorites, except hereafter they desisted from their treasons. About the same time there came two noblemen vnto me, who were subiect to the King of Trachonites, bringing with them both horsemen, armour, and money: whom when the Iewes would haue them to be troublesome to the Trachonites, alledging that euery man ought according to his owne minde, and not by other mens impulsion, serue God: and that it was not to be suffered that they, who for their security sake were fled vnto vs, should repent themselues of their trust they put in vs. And thus hauing perswaded the multitude, I freely and aboundantly furnished these men with all things necessary. H

In the meane space, Agrippa sent out his forces vnder the conduct of Equus Modius, to take the Castle Magdala by force, which for that they durst not assault, they beset the waies, & the rather Ebutius against Ioseph. troubled Gamala. But Ebutius Decadarchus, who had the gouernment of the great champaine, hearing that I was come to a certain village called Simonias, situate on the confines of Galilee, and distant from the same some sixty furlongs, took with him by night one hundreth horse that attended him, and about two hundreth footmen, with certaine inhabitants of the citie of Gaba their associates, whom he conducted by night, and assailed and beset the borough where I was.
Against whom after I had drawn forth a valiant band of men, Ebutius laboured all that he might to toule vs into the champain, for that he trusted very much in his horsemen: but he easily perceiued that we might not be won. For knowing the aduantage which the horsemen had, if wee I should encounter them in the plaine, considering that we were but footmen, I resolued to fight in the place where we were: and Ebutius charged vs for a while very valiantly. At length, perceiuagaine with lost labour to Gaba, hauing onely lost three men in the battell. But I presently pur-su'd him with two thousand armed men: and when I came to Besara, which is situate on the confines of Ptolemais, distant some twenty furlongs from Gaba, where Ebutius encamped at that time; and besetting al the passages with courts of guard, wherby we might be more secure from the excursions of our enemies, vntill wee had carried out the wheat, whereof there was a great quantitie stored vp in that place, which was gathered out of the townships thereabout, belonging to Queene Berenice, and loading diuers Camels and Asses, which to that end I had brought K

the battell: and whereas he detracted the same, being terrified by our boldnes, I took my course and foraged there. Now this Neopolitanus was a captaine of horsemen, and had vndertaken to defend Scythopolis against their enemies: Hauing therefore driuen him from doing any wrong in the country belonging to the Tiberians, I prouided for the security of Galilee.

Iohn maligneth Iosephs good successe. But Iohn the son of Leui, who (as we said) liued at Gischala, after hee heard that all things fell out fortunately with mee, and that I was loued of my subiects, and feared by mine enimies, was sore aggrieued thereat: and supposing his owne fortune was embased by my felicity, and being touched with no small enuy, and in greater hope that he should hinder my good succes, if so be L that he could bring me in hatred with my subiects; he sollicited those of Tiberias and Sephoris to forsake me, and supposed also that the Gabarenians would reuolt vnto him; which Cities are the chiefest in Galilee. For he tould them, that vnder his conduct the common-weal should bee more discreetly gouerned: but among the rest, the Sephorites gaue least eare vnto him, for that neglecting vs both, they onely held for the Romans.

As for the Tiberians, they would not consent to rebell: yet notwithstanding they promised of one Simon, a principall Citizen, who was Iohns fellow and friend. Yet did they not openly seeme to allow him, for that they vehemently feared the Galileans, whose good will towards me they were long time assured of, but priuily they sought another meanes to entrap mee. And M

The Dabarittenians spoile Ptolomeis wife. truely I fell into great danger vpon this occasion. For when as certaine Dabarittenians (beeing audacious young men) had intelligence that Ptolomeis wife, the kings steward, vnder the conduct of certaine horsemen should in great pompe trauell along the great Plaine, out of the kings countrey into the Romane gouernment, they suddenly set vpon them, and putting the woman to flight, they spoiled all that which she caried with her. Which done, they draue to Taricheas, a place where I then kept, certaine Moyles loaden with apparell, and houshold stuffe of diuers sorts;

A sorts; among which there were diuers siluer vessels, and fiue hundreth peeces of gold. Intending therfore to reserue these things for Ptolemey, as being one of the same tribe, in that our law permitteth not to defraud, no not our enemies, if they be of the same tribe; I told those that brought the goods thither, that they must be kept to be sold, to the end that the price of the goods might be bestowed vpon the building of the wals of Ierusalem. This motion of mine, the young men interpreted very hardly, in that they were cut off from the part of the prey which they hoped for. For which cause, dispersing themselues in the streets of Tiberias, they spred a rumor that I would betray that countrey to the Romans, alledging that I only fained that the prey was destinated towards the repairing of the wals of Ierusalem: whereas the truth was, that I kept the same to the intent I might restore it to the owner. In which matter they were no whit deceiued in
B their opinion. For after the departure of the young men, I called vnto mee two chiefe citizens, Dassion and Iannæus the sonnes of Leui, intire friends to the King, and commanded them that taking the houshold stuffe with them, they should conuay it vnto the King, threatning them with death, if they reuealed this secret to any man.

Ioseph labours to restore Ptolomy to his goods.

But when as the rumour was spred through Galilee, that I would betray the region into the hands of the Romans, and all of them being grieuously bent and intent against me to punish me; they of Taricheas also giuing credit to the yong mens fained speeches, perswaded my guard, and the rest of the souldiers, that forsaking me whil'st I was asleep, they should come into the horse-race, and consult with other in that place how to degrade me, and giue the honor vnto another. They, being perswaded, came to the appointed place, where they found many others there ar-
C riued: and all of them cried out with one consent, that it was meet to take punishment on a traitor, who hath sought the destruction of the common-weale. But he that most of all incited them to these troubles, was Iesus the son of Saphias, who at that time had the magistracy of Tiberias in his hands, a man giuen ouer to all wickednesse, and borne to breed troubles, and stirre vp seditions.

Sedition against Ioseph. Iesus, the son of Saphias, conspireth against Ioseph.

This man, bearing Moses tables in his hands, and comming out into the midst of the assembly, spake thus with a loud voice: If (said hee) you bee touched with no care of your selues; yet at « the leastwise contemne not these sacred lawes, which this your chiefetaine Ioseph, a man worthy « to bee hated by all men, hath of long time dared to betray, and for that cause is worthy of ex- « treame punishment. «

D After he had thus spoken, and was applauded by the acclamations of the people, he leading the armed men with him, hastily repaired to the house where I kept, with a certaine intent and purpose to put me to death. Meane while, I suspecting nothing of all this tumult, and tired with labour and wearinesse, took my rest; when as suddenly Simon, one of my guard, who at that time onely remained with me, seeing the incursion of the people, came and awaked me: and certifying me of mine instant perill: he gaue me counsell likewise, that rather, like a noble and vndaunted chiefetaine, I should shorten mine owne life, then shamefully die by mine enemies direction. Whil'st he gaue me this counsell, I committing my safetie to Gods hands, and changing my garments, went forth into the assembly after a mournfull manner; and wearing my sword hanging about my neck, stealing by that way, by which I knew that none of mine aduersaries might E meet me: and comming into the horse-race, I offred my selfe to euery mans eye, and lying prostrate on my face, and watring the earth with my tears, I moued all men that beheld me to compassion. And when I perceiued that the affections of the people were changed, I laboured all that I might to diuide them in opinions, before the armed souldiers returnd from my house: and confessing my self that I was not wholly cleer of that which was obiected against me, I besought them to vnderstand to what vse I reserued that prey that was brought to my hand; after which, if they list they might kill me. And whil'st the multitude commanded mee to speak, the armed men returned back, and beholding me, rushed in vpon me with an intent to murther me: but being restrained by the peoples exclamations, they moderated their fury; supposing, that after my confession of treason, and reseruation of the kings money, they might haue a better occasion to F finish my Tragedy.

Simon, one of Iosephs guard awaketh him.

Ioseph moues the people to compassion.

For which cause, after silence I beganne thus: Men and brethren (said I) if in your opinion I deserue death, I refuse not to dy; yet before my death will I certifie you of the whole truth: truly, when as I perceiued, that this City was most commodious and fit to entertaine strangers, and that I perceiued that many men, forsaking their owne countries, were delighted with your conuersations, and willing to partake with you in al sorts of fortune: I was resolu'd to build vp your wals with this mony; for which being thus destinated to do you good, your indignation is pro-

But after I had promiſed the Tiberians that I would reedifie their wals, and fortifie other conuenient cities, they giuing credit to my words, repaired euery one of them to their owne houſes. And I beyond all expectation eſcaping from ſo great a perill, with certaine of my friends, and ſome twenty ſouldiers, returned to my houſe.

Which done, laying hold of one of the moſt troubleſome fellowes, that with the reſt came in vnto me, I cauſed him to be beaten with many grieuous ſtrokes, and his hand to be cut off, & hung about his neck; and thus handled, we thruſt him out of dores, to returne vnto thoſe who had ſent him. But they being wondrouſly affraid heerewith, and ſuſpecting the like puniſhment if they ſhould ſtay there any longer, for that they ſuſpected that I had diuers armed ſouldiers in my houſe, they ſuddenly all of them fled away: and ſo by this ſtratageme eſcaped I the other dangers. They likewiſe accuſed them, that they were of the Roman faction, and priſoners, and preſently the people began to mutine, beeing deceiued by their words, who laboured to flatter them. Which whẽ I heard of, I once more inform'd the people, that they ought not to perſecute thoſe who reſorted vnto them for reſcous: & I ieſted at their folly who accuſed them of impoiſoning, and that the Romans would not vainly nouriſh ſo many thouſands of ſoldiers, if they pretended to make away their enemies with poiſon. Beeing by theſe words ſomewhat pacified, they had ſcarcely withdrawn themſelues awhile, but that by certaine out-caſts & wicked men, they were K incited againſt the nobility, ſo that with armed weapons they came to the houſes of the Taricheans, intending to murther them. Which when I heard, I was ſore affraid, that if this wickednes ſhould be committed, no man hereafter ſhould dare to truſt his life in my hands. For which

For, I my ſelfe took it very heauily, that I was once more inforced to land thoſe men in the enemies country, who had committed themſelues to my truſt: yet thinking, that if it ſhould ſo fall out, that they ſhould fall L into the Romans hands, they ſhould bee ſafer, then if by ſuffering them to remaine in my country, I ſhould ſee them oppreſt: I aduentured them thus. Yet were they ſaued, and the king gaue them pardon. And this was the end of this tumult.

But they of Tiberias wrote vnto the king, requiring him to ſend a garriſon into their country,

Which done, as ſoone as I came vnto them, they requir'd me that I would build them thoſe wals which I had promiſed them: for they had already heard that Taricheas was enuironed with wals. Whereunto I condeſcended, and gathering

But ſome three daies after, departing from Tiberias towards Taricheas, which was thirtie ſtades diſtant from thence, by chance a troupe of Roman horſemen were diſcouered, not far from the Citie, which made the inhabi- M tants beliue, that they were the kings army: Whereupon they preſently beganne to vtter many things in honour of the king, and more in my reproach. And preſently a certaine friend poſted

Which when I vnderſtood, I was wondrouſly troubled: For I had ſent backe my men of war from Taricheas to their houſes, for that the next day was the Sabbath: for I would by no meanes, that the Citizens of Taricheas ſhould be charged or troubled with entertaining ſouldiers. And at all times

A times, when I remained in that citie, I tooke no care of the guard of mine owne perſon, hauing had often proofe of the loyal ie of the inhabitants towards me, Beeing therefore at that time attended onely with ſeauen ſouldiers, & a few of my friends, I knew not what to do. For I thought it not fit to call backe my forces, for that the day was welny paſt; and although they ſhould haue been vvith me the next morning, yet they might not haue taken armes, becauſe our lawes forbad the ſame, how great ſoeuer the occaſion be that is offered. And although I ſhould haue drawne forth the Taricheans and the ſtrangers that were retired thither, and if vnder hope of prey I had led them forth, yet ſaw I that they were too feeble to reſiſt their forces. On the other ſide, I alreadie perceiued that if I ſtaied ouer-long, the army which was ſent by the king, beeing already entered the citie, wold haue excluded me: I therefore determined to vſe this ſtratagem. I preſently

B therefore garded the gates of the Taricheans with my moſt truſtie friends, ſuffering no man to paſſe out of them; and aſſembling the chiefeſt of euery familie, I commaunded euery one of them to lanch their boates into the lake, and to follow me with the maſters of their ſhips. After which both I and my friends, and ſeauen other ſouldiers, betooke vs to a barke, and ſailed toward Tiberias. But when the Tiberians perceiued that they had no forces come from the king, & that the whole lake was couered with barkes; amazed and fearing the ruine of their citie, for that they ſuppoſed the ſhips to be loaden with ſouldiers, they changed their former opinion. For which cauſe laying by their weapons, they themſelues with their wiues and children came forth to meet mee, entertaining me with happy acclamations: for that they thought I had heard no inkling of their intents, beſeeching me that for the ſafetie of their citie, I would enter the ſame.

C But I drawing neere the citie, commaunded the maſters of the barks to caſt anchor farre off the ſhore, leaſt the townſmen might perceiue that the ſhippes were emptie: and I my ſelfe drawing neere with mine owne barke vnto them, accuſed them, for that contrarie to their oaths, they had beene ſo fooliſhly induced to reuolt. Afterwards, I promiſed them aſſured pardon, if ſo bee they would deliuer mee tenne of their chiefeſt nobilitie: which when they had incontinently performed, I ſhipt them in a a barke, and ſent them priſoners to Taricheas: and by this policie one after another, I at laſt gotte all the Senate of Tiberias, and manie of the chiefeſt Citizens, and caried them thither alſo.

Ioſeph ſaileth to Tiberias.

At length, the reſt of the multitude, as ſoone as they perceiued in how great danger they were, they beſought mee that I would puniſh the chiefe authour of this conſpiracie, who was called Clytus, a bold and raſh young man. But I, that held it a wicked act to kill one of the ſame

D Tribe, and yet was inforced to puniſh him, commaunded Leuias one of my guard to goe vnto him and cut off his hand: who not daring for that he was alone to enter into ſo huge a multitude; for feare leaſt his cowardiſe ſhould be diſcouered by the Tiberians, I called Clytus vnto mee, and ſaid vnto him: Sith vngratefull and perfidious man, as thou art, thou deſerueſt to loſe both thy handes, I charge thee to become thine owne executioner, for feare leaſt thorow thy delay thou procure thy further puniſhment. And whereas with many prayers hee beſought mee to grant him one of his hands, I hardly condeſcended: at length of his owne accord, for feare leaſt hee ſhould loſe both, hee tooke a knife and cutte off his left hand: and thus was this tumult appeaſed.

Clytus the authour of the ſedition in Tiberias.

E As ſoone as I returned to Taricheas, and the Tiberians vnderſtood what ſtratagem I had vſed with them, they were all amazed, ſeeing how I had puniſhed their ingratitude and diſobedience without any bloudſhed or murther. After I had ſent for ſuch of the people of Tiberias as were in priſon, amongſt whom was Iuſtus and his father Piſtus, I inuited them to ſuppe with mee: and during the repaſt, I told them that I was not ignorant, that the Romane armie excelled all men of the world in power & force: notwithſtanding that, I kept my ſelf ſilent in the reſpect of thoſe theeues that were round about, and I counſailed them that they alſo wold doe the like in expectation of ſome better daies; and yet that in the meane time they would not thinke amiſſe of my gouernment, becauſe the time affoorded them not a more affable and commodious gouernour. I admoniſhed Iuſtus alſo that before I came frō Ieruſalem, the Galileans had cut off his brothers

F hands, accuſing him to haue forged falſe letters before the warre; and that after Philips departure the Gamalites, beeing at oddes with the Babylonians, ſlew Chares, Philips own kinſman, and had moderately puniſhed his brother in law Ieſus, who had maried his ſiſter. After this diſcourſe during ſupper time, I diſmiſt Iuſtus and his friends early in the morning, with their freedomes. But before this came to paſſe, it hapned that Philip the ſonne of Iacimus departed from the fort of Gamala vpon this occaſion that enſueth. As ſoone as he vnderſtood that Varus was reuolted from king Agrippa, and that Modius Equus who was his friend, was ſent to ſucceed him, hee certified certified him of his estate by his letters: which when he had receiued, he highly reioyced at Phi- G

King vnderstanding the false rumour that ranne as touching Philip, that he was the chiefetain of Agrippas kind and humane to- the Iewes armie, who vndertooke the war against the Romanes, sent certaine horsemen to Phi-

kindly and shewed him to the Romane captaines, telling them that that was Philip, of whom it was commonly reported, that he was in rebellion against the Romans. He therfore charged him, Hedio, Gadara that taking with him certaine horsmen, he shold poste in all diligence to the fort of * Gamala; & drawing his houshold seruants from thence, hee should lead and reestablish the Babylonians in Batanæa, and trauaile to his vttermost power that the subiect should bee continued in obedience and peace. After Philip had receiued this commandement from the King, he hasted to per- H forme the same.

Ioseph stired vp a sedition in Gamala. But Ioseph a certaine drougier or treacle seller, gathering together a sort of bold young men, & inciting the nobilitie of Gamala, perswaded the people to fall from the king, and that betaking them to their armes, they should recouer their former libertie: and thus drew they other into their opinion, killing those that durst contradict them. Amongst these died Chares and Iesus his kinsman, and the sister of Iustus the Tiberian, as we haue heretofore declared. After this they requested me by letters, that I would send them aide, and certaine labourers to begirt their towne withall. To both which requests of theirs, I easily condescended. About this time the coun-

Seleucia and Sogon, which were two strong places vnaccessible, and fortified by nature, with walles. I did the like also by Iamnia Amerytha, and Charabe, a borough of higher Galilee, al- I though they were situated amongst the rocks. I fortified in like sort Taricheas also and Tibe-rias, & Sephoris, Citties of Galilee; and the borough of the caue of the Arbalians, Bersobe, Selamen, Iotapa, Capharath, Comosogana, Nepapha, and the mountaine Itabyrium. In those places hoorded I vp great store of corne, and laid vp store of armour, and munition for defence.

Meane while, Iohn the sonne of Leui, increased his hatred daily more and more towards mee, being greatly aggrieued to see my fortunes happy, and the successe answerable: and wheras hee was wholly resolued to rid me of my life, after he had encompassed his countrey Gischala with walles, he sendeth Simon his brother with one hundreth souldiers to Ierusalem, to Simon the son Iohn laboureth to supply Ioseph in his gouernment. of Gamaliel, requiring him to labour the matter in such sort with the City, that my authority K might be disannulled, and that Iohn by the common consent of all, might bee ordained gouer-nour ouer the affaires of Galilee. This Simon was borne in Ierusalem, noble in birth, and in sect a Pharisee (which sect of all other seemed most exactly instructed in the lawes of our country) a man of excellent wisedome, who by his counsaile was able to repaire the decaying ruines of his countrey, who of long time had made vse of Iohns friendship, because hee was at that time mine enemy.

This man, solicited by the intercession of his friends, perswaded the high Priest Ananus and Simons counsell against Ioseph. Iesus the sonne of Gamala and others of his line and faction, to cut off my increasing honours, and not to permit me to attaine the fulnesse and content thereof. For it should be very profitable for L them also, if I were remoued from the gouernment of Galilee. Further, hee told Ananus and the rest, that they were not to delay the matter, least vpon the discouery of their counsaile, I should inuade the Citie with mine army. Thus spake Simon: yet Ananus the high Priest replyed, that it might not easily be done, for that diuers Priests and gouernours of the people bare witnesse for me, that I behaued my selfe honestly in that gouernment, and that it was ill done to intend an accusation against a man, who might not be touched with any misdemeanour. When Simon had heard what Ananus had said, he besought him and the rest also to speak nothing therof; neither to make his motion knowne, certifying them that he had prouidently prouided, that I should be speedily driuen out of Galilee: And calling vnto him his brother Iohn, he charged him to send M presents to Ananus. For (said hee) in so doing they would so much worke with him, that they would make him change his opinion. In the end, Simon obtained that which he long time sought after. For Ananus and his adherents were corrupted with money, and accorded to cast me from the gouernement of Galilee, without the consent or allowance of any other of the citizens. For

A of them all. Theſe did they command, that calling together a councell of the Galileans, they ſhould demand why they loued me ſo well; commanding them that if they anſwered that I was a Galilean, they ſhould likewiſe ſay that Ieruſalem was their countrey. But if they allowed in me the knowledge of the law, they were likewiſe willed to ſay, that they knew their countrey cuſtomes; or if in regard of the name of prieſthood, they ſhould ſay they loued me, they ſhould likewiſe auerre that two of them were Prieſts. Being thus inſtructed, and receiuing forty thouſand ſiluer drachmes of the publike treaſure, for their fellow and conſort Ionathas, they ſet forwards.

Embaſſadors with ſouldiers ſent to Ioſeph.

And for that at the very ſame time a certaine man called Ieſus of Galilee, was come to Ieruſalem with a band of ſix hundreth ſouldiers, they ſent for him and hired him, & gaue him three
B moneths pay, commanding him to follow Ionathas and his companions; and to doe that which they ſhould command them: and to theſe annexed they three hundreth Citizens, whom they hyred with reward. With this preparation the Legates ſet forward, being accompanied with Simon Iohns brother, who had one hundreth ſouldiers with him, who had cõmiſſion from thoſe that ſent them, that if I willingly gaue ouer armes, they ſhould ſend me aliue to Ieruſalem: and if I reſiſted, by their authority they might lawfully kill mee. They had letters alſo directed to Iohn, which incited him to make warre againſt mee. Moreouer, they charged the Sephorites, Gabarites, and Tiberians to maintaine Iohn againſt mee. After that I had intelligence hereof, by my fathers letters, who had intelligence thereof by Ieſus the ſonne of Gamala, one of thoſe who were preſent at the deliberation, and who intirely and familiarly loued mee; I was much
C grieued, ſeeing with how much ingratitude my countrimen requited mee, who of malice had decreed vpon my death: and for that my father inuited me by moſt affectionate letters to draw my ſelfe homeward, telling me how much he deſired to ſee me, who was his ſonne, before hee left this life; I imparted theſe things to my friends, and certified them that within three daies I would forſake their countrey, and retire my ſelfe into mine owne. Whereupon they were altogether ſurpriſed with great ſadneſſe, and beſought mee with weeping teares, that I would not forſake them, for that they ſhould be vtterly ouerthrown, if ſo be they were left deſtitute of my conduct. But wheras by no means they might perſwade me, and the care of mine owne ſecurity preuailed very much with me; the Galileans fearing leaſt I ſhould leaue them, & by that means the theeues ſhould be encouraged to ſet vpon them, they ſent meſſengers thorow all Galilee, to D ſignifie vnto them the reſolution of my departure. Whereupon diuers of them being made priuy to theſe newes, reſorted vnto me from all parts, bringing with them their wiues & children; not ſo much, as I ſuppoſe, for the ſorrow they conceiued at my departure, as the feare that they had of their owne eſtates: For they perſwaded themſelues, that if I remained among them, there could no miſchiefe befall them. They aſſembled therefore in a great Plaine, called Aſochim, where I remained.

Ioſephs father ſignifieth all theſe newes vnto him.

Ioſeph reſolueth to return home.

That night in my ſleepe I had a wonderfull dreame. For lying in my bed, and being wholly diſconſolate and troubled with the newes I had receiued, me thought that a certaine man from aboue ſpake vnto me after this manner: Pacifie thou the paſſions of thy ſpirit, and be thou free » from all feare. For that which diſcomforteth thee, ſhall be that which ſhall make thee great, and »
E happy beyond thine expectation. For not onely theſe things ſhall turne to a fortunate ende or » iſſue, but alſo many other. Be not thou therfore diſmaied, but remember thy ſelfe that thou art » reſerued to make warre againſt the Romans. After I had this dreame, I awaked; and ſo prepared » as I was, went I downe into the Plaine: and as ſoone as I came thither, all the people of Galilee, with their wiues and children, humbling themſelues vpon the earth, and weeping, beſought me that I would not leaue them for a prey to their enemies: neither that I would abandon their countrey to ſerue for a prey and mockery to their aduerſaries. But ſeeing that I made ſmall reckoning of their praiers, they conſtrained me by oath to remaine amongſt them, and vttered diuers iniurious outrages againſt the people of Ieruſalem, that enuied them the peace and happineſſe which they enioyed.

Ioſephs admirable dreame.

A number of Galileans beſought Ioſeph that he would not forſake them.

F After I had heard theſe words, and ſeene the deſolation of the people, my heart was broken with compaſſion, and I reſolued my ſelfe that in reſpect of ſo great a multitude, my life could not be better hazarded then for their contentment: I therefore gaue my conſent to remain with them. I gaue order that fiue thouſand of their beſt ſouldiers, with their prouiſion, ſhould attend me: as for the reſt, I ſent them backe euery one to his owne houſe. When theſe fiue thouſand preſented themſelues, I annexed them to the other three thouſand that I had with me, and drew out with them foureſcore horſemen, and marched on towards Chabalon a borough vpon the marches of Ptolemais, where I vndertooke to prepare them for the battell, expecting some assault from Placidus, who was come with two companies of footmen and one of horsemen, sent by Cestius Gallus to burne the countrey townes of Galilee, and other little boroughs that bordered on Ptolemais. And for that he was entrenched before the Citie of Ptolemais, I encamped mine army likewise not farre from the borough Chabalon, som sixty stades off: and diuers times drew I out my forces to bid him battell, but neuer would he offer any thing but skirmishes. For Placidus, perceiuing my forwardnesse to fight, was abashed thereat, and retired himselfe: yet departed he not from Ptolemais. G

Placidus against Ioseph.

About that time came Ionathan with the other Embassadors, who (as we haue heretofore declared) were sent by Simon, and the high Priest Ananus, who laboured to entrap me by policy, for that they durst not assaile me in open field. They therefore wrote a letter vnto me to this effect: Ionathan and the Embassadours with him, who are sent by those of Ierusalem, to Ioseph Greeting. We are certified by the chiefest men of Ierusalem, that Iohn of Gischala hath oftentimes sought to betray you: for which cause we are sent to represse his malice, and to exhort him hereafter to submit him self vnto you: and being desirous to conferre with you, as touching that which concerneth the publike profit, we pray you to resort vnto vs as soon as you can, with som few attendants, because the borough is not able to entertain many. To this effect wrote they vnto me, hoping that one of these two effects would fall out: either that I coming disarmed, should be easily surprised by them; or that bringing with me a great company, I should be condemned for an enemy to my countrey. The messenger that brought mee this letter was a valiant young man, mounted on horseback, who had in times past borne armes for the King. The time wherin he came vnto me, was two houres within night, & euen then was I banquetting with my friends, and the chiefest gouernours of Galilee. After that one of my housholde seruants had certified me, that a certaine Iew on horseback came to speak with me, I cõmanded he should be brought in; who embracing me but coldly, and deliuering me the letter, said vnto me: They that are come from Ierusalem, send you this letter; giue them a speedy answere: For I am commanded to make a speedy returne. They that sate at the table with me, were amazed at the souldiers boldnesse. But for my selfe, I willed him to sit downe, and to make merry with me: but he refusing the same, I kept the letter in my hand in such manner, as I had receiued the same, and began to talke with my friends of other affaires: and not long after rising from supper, and dismissing the rest to their rest, I only retained with me some of my most inward friends, and commanding my page to fill me wine, I opened the letters before any man perceiued the same: and conceiuing incontinently what they meant, I sealed them anew, and as if I had knowne nothing of the contents, hauing the letter in my hands, I gaue order that the souldier should receiue 20. drachmes for to beare the charges of his voyage. He hauing receiued the same, and giuing me thankes; I perceiued well that he was addicted to gaine, and might easily be wrought with money. Wherupon I said vnto him, If thou wilt drinke with mee, thou shalt haue a drachme for euery glasse thou drinkest. To this the souldier listned willingly, and hauing drunke good store of wine, to get him the greater store of money, he grew drunken; so that he was vnable any longer to conceale his secrets: but of his owne accord hee declared the treason that was prepared, and how the sentence of death was giuen by them against mee. Which when I vnderstood, I answered them to this effect. Ioseph to Ionathan, and those that accompany him, Health. I am very glad to heare that you are arriued in Galilee in good health, especially for that I may now redeliuer into your hands the gouernment of the affaires thereof, to the end (according as I haue long time desired) I might returne into my country. I will not onely therefore visit you at Xallon: but in any further place also, notwithstanding you had neuer sent for mee. Notwithstanding pardon me, though I come not at this present: for I am now at Chabalon to confront Placidus, who pretendeth to inuade Galilee. Resort you therefore vnto mee, who shall reade my letters. Farewell. H I K L

Ionathans letters to Ioseph.

A horseman brought the letters.

Iosephs policy.

Iosephs answere to Ionathan.

After I had written this answere, and deliuered it to the souldier to carry it vnto them, I sent by the same way thirty of my most approoued friends of Galilee, commanding them to salute them that were come, without any further speech. I assigned also to each of these one of my most resolute and best souldiers to take heed least any of those I sent should conferre with Ionathans men. They therefore set forward on their way: and Ionathan and the other seeing their first purpose failed them, they sent me another letter after this tenour which ensueth: Ionathan and his company to Ioseph, Health: We command you that within three daies, you make your appearance before vs, without any of your souldiers, in the borough of Gadara, to the ende you M

A may answere to that which Iohn hath obiected against you. As soon as they had written this, and saluted those whon I had sent, they went to Iapha, which is the greatest town of Galilee, defenced with strong wals and peopled with many inhabitants. Against these the people of that Citie, their wiues & children came forth, exclaiming against them with huge cries, charging them to returne back, and not to depriue them of the good gouernour they had. Ionathan and his companions were prouoked with these cries; yet durst they not make any open shew of their displeasure, but without returning them any answer they resorted to other Cities, where they met with no lesse effectuall exclaimes from the multitude, protesting with a loud voyce, that no man should be able to disswade them frō continuing Ioseph in authority in their gouernment. Wherupon Ionathan with his followers marched forth without any further speech, and came to Se-
B phoris, the greatest citie of Galilee. But the inhabitants thereof being addicted to the Romans, came forth to them: but for my part they neither praised nor blamed me. Departing from Sephoris, they came to Asochim, where the citizens sung the same song, that the Iapheans did. Whereupon they being vnable to containe their displeasures, commanded their souldiers to beat them with their truncheons, who exclaimed against them, and claimed me for their gouernour. And when they drew neere to Gabara, Iohn came out to meet them, accompanied with three thousand souldiers: and I hauing intelligence by their letters, that they were resolued to make warre against me, departed from Chabalon, accompanied with three thousand souldiers; and hauing committed the campe to the charge of my trustiest friend, I went to Iotapata, be-
C cause I would be within foure stades of them, & sent them this letter: If your will be that I must needs come vnto you, there are in Galilee two hundreth and foure cities and boroughs, I will meet you in any one of them, which you please, except Gabara or Gischala: for that the one is the place of Iohns natiuity, and the other is his associates and friends.

The Embassadors of Ierusalē coldly enteratined in Galilee.

Ioseph writeth again to them.

As soon as Ionathan had receiued this answere, he replied not any more, but sought the means to entrap me. Iohn was of the opinion to write vnto all the cities and boroughs of Galilee, suppoposing that without question there were one or two in them that were mine enemies, whom they might incense against me, as against their common enemie. Hee gaue order also, that this his resolution should be sent to Ierusalem, to the end that those of the citie vnderstanding that I was adiudged an enemy by the Galileans, might in like sort confirme that their decree by their opinion. For he said, that by this meanes it would come to passe, that the Galileans, who were D well affected towards me, should forsake me for feare they had of them. This aduice of Iohns maruailously pleased them all, and was presently brought vnto me about the third houre of the night, by one Sacchæus, who flying from them, came and brought me the newes, and particularly related to me their intent. For which cause perceiuing that the time required no longer delay, and supposing that Iacob was one of my most assured and trustiest seruants, I commanded him to take two hundreth men with him, and to belay the waies betweene Gabara and Galilee, and to send me those whom he should surprise, that came that way; and especially those that carried letters. I sent Ieremy also, who was one of my friends, to the marches of Galilee, with sixe hundreth men at armes, to keep the passages that way towards Ierusalem, commanding him to lay hands on all those that carried letters, and to commit the men to prison, and to send me their

The consultation of the Embassadors against Ioseph

Ioseph beseeteth the waies of Galilee.

After I had in this sort instructed those whom I sent, I willed and commanded the Galileans the next day following, to take their armes, and to furnish themselues with victualles for three daies, and to attend me at the borough of Gabaroth. Those souldiers that I had, I distributed in foure companies, and kept those with mee in whom I reposed most confidence for the guard of my person: and hauing appointed captaines ouer them, and commanded them to be carefull, I charged them to suffer no vnknowne souldier to enter in among them. The next day I came to Gabaroth, the fift houre of the day, where I found all the fields about the Citie full of men of warre, of those of Galilee, who resorted thither to assist mee, according as I had commanded them. Thither also came there a multitude of other men from other boroughs. As soone as I F came to their presence, and was ready to speake vnto them, all of them began to cry out, calling mee their benefactour, and maintainer of their countrey. After I had solemnely giuen them thanks for this fauour they had shewed me, I charged them neither to offer war, or attempt any spoile in the champaine countrey, but to encamp amidst the fields, contenting themselues with that prouision they had brought with them. For I told them all in generall, that I would extinguish those troubles without effusion of blood. It hapned the same day that Ionathans messenger and letters fell into their hands, who had the guard of the passages by my appointment, and ac-

Iohn alſo into Ieſus houſe, which was a great tower, nothing different from a cittadell, in which they hid a number of men of warre, and locked vp all the other gates ſaue one; expecting that I ſhould come that way, to ſalute them. In a word, they had commanded their ſoldiers that when I ſhould enter, they ſhould ſuffer no man elſe to enter with me, but exclude all the reſt. For they made no other account, but that by this means they might eaſily lay hold on me. But they were deceiued of their hopes: for hauing notice before hand of their intents, as ſoone as I came thi-

they came forth in all haſte into the Plaine, labouring to diſſwade my ſouldiers from their loue and alleageance, and detracting my gouernement. But all things fell out contrary to that they thought: for as ſoon as they were diſcouerd, the Galileans gaue a great ſhout, teſtifying the good will they bare vnto me, who was their gouernour, and they blamed the Embaſſadours for that without any cauſe of iniury, they were come to diſturbe the publike peace, willing them to be gone, for that they intended to admit no other gouernor. When theſe things were ſignified vnto heare what theſe Embaſſadors could alledge againſt me. Vpon my arriuall the whole troupe ſhouted for ioy, and applauded me with a loud voice, giuing me thanks for my happy and peace- I

Ionathan and his adherents hearing this were affraide, leaſt if the Galileans ſhould ſet vpon them, they ſhould grow in danger of their liues, and beganne to bethinke themſelues how they might eſcape. But perceiuing that they might not retire, for that I required them inſtantly to to ſurceaſe their ſhouting, and planted the ſouldiers of greateſt truſt in euery paſſage, to preuent leaſt Iohn ſhould charge them vnawares. After this, I exhorted the people to betake them to their weapons, to the end that if the enemy ſhould ſuddenly aſſaile them, they might not bee driuen to diſorder. This done, I firſt of all began to rippe vp to Ionathans followers and ſent by the communaltie and inhabitants of Ieruſalem, to make an end of thoſe debates that were betweene mee and Iohn; and how they had incited mee to come vnto them. Afterwards in the ſequell of my diſcourſe I produced their letters in open view, to the end they might not deny any thing, ſeeing themſelues conuicted by their owne hand-writing, and ſpake thus vnto them.

In the mouth of two or three witneſſes, conſiſteth truth. If being accuſed by Iohn, I ſhould produce two or three witneſſes that were men of reputato continue the ſame hereafter. And all of them affirmed by a pubike oath, that I had carefully preuented leaſt any woman ſhould be violated, or any man by my meanes ſhould be drawne into any iniury, or inconuenience. This done I publikely read the two letters in the preſence of all

me to beſet the waies, and were by them ſent to me, which were full of iniuries and falſhoods, alledging that I rather behaued my ſelfe like a tyrant then a gouernour towards them: and be-

were voluntarily offered me by thoſe that carried the ſame. For I was vnwilling that mine aduerſaries ſhould know that I had beſet the waies, fearing leaſt they ſhuld forbear to write hereafter.

The people hauing heard this, were diſpleaſed & animated againſt Ionathan and his followers,

and

A and flocked on to murther them; and they had ſurely done it, had I not pacified the diſpleaſure of the Galileans. As for the Embaſſadors that accompanied Ionathan, I tolde all of them that I pardoned whatſoeuer was paſt, if ſo be they would repent themſelues of that which was done; and if vpon their returne into their countrey, they would truely report vnto thoſe who had ſent them, how all things had paſt vnder my gouernment. This ſaid; I diſmiſſed them, notwithſtanding that I knew they would perform nothing of that which they had promiſed. But the whole multitude proſecuted their diſpleaſure againſt them, requiring me to giue them leaue to puniſh thoſe with all rigour, who had committed this ſlanderous act. But I laboured all that I might to perſwade them, to lay no hands vpon them, knowing full well that whatſoeuer mutiny it bee, it cannot but breed preiudice to the common-weale. Whereupon ſeeing that it was impoſſible to reſtraine their fury, I incontinently betooke me to my horſe, and commanded the people to follow me to Sogan a borough of the Arabians, diſtant from thence ſome twenty ſtades. By this ſtratagem I brought to paſſe, that the beginning of the ciuill warre might not be imputed to me.

After I came neer to Sogan, I aſſembled the people, and told them that they ſhould not violently ſubmit themſelues to their froward diſpleaſures, nor entertain their vnquenchable deſire of reuenge: and I cõmanded them to pick out an hundreth of the chiefeſt & oldeſt men amongſt them, who ſhould make their repaire to the citie of Ieruſalem; and there complain vnto the people againſt thoſe that had kindled ſedition in their country. Ioſeph ſends one hundreth Embaſſadors to Ieruſalem.

C be fauourable & liſten to your diſcourſe, you ſhall perſwade them to write vnto me, that according to their command I remain in Galilee; and that Ionathan & his partners depart from hence. After I had giuen them this charge, and that they were furniſhed with all things neceſſary for their iourney, in all expedition on the third day after the generall aſſemblie, I diſpatched them and ſent fiue hundreth armed men with them. I wrote alſo to my friends in Samaria, ſo to further them that they might finiſh their iourny in all ſecurity. For Samaria was already in ſubiectiõ to the Romans: and it behoued my men of neceſſity, who would make a ſhort iourney, to paſſe that way. For from Galilee by this means a man may in three daies arriue at Ieruſalem. Furthermore, I guarded the Embaſſadors my ſelfe as farre as the frontiers of Galilee, laying forces and guards vpon the waies, to the end that no man might eaſily diſcouer or know of their departure.

But Ionathan and his companions hauing failed of their purpoſe intended againſt me, diſmiſſed Iohn to Giſchala: as for themſelues they went to Tiberias, hoping to bring the ſame vnder their obeyſance; for that Ieſus, who was Preſident at that time, had written vnto them, and promiſed them to perſwade the people to entertain them, & take their part if they came: and vnder this hope they alſo retired themſelues thither. Sylas, who (as I declared) was left by me as mine Agent in Tiberias, certified me of all this by his letters, requiring me to vſe all diligence: and I condeſcending thereunto, was brought in danger of my life vpon this occaſion that enſueth. Ionathan and his followers being come to Tiberias, perſwaded diuers who were mine enemies, to reuolt from mee; but after they were certified that I was there in perſon, they were affraid, and

Furthermore, they required me to take vp my lodging in another place, for that on the morrow was the Sabbath day, & it were an incõuenient that the city of Tiberias ſhould be drawne into trouble on that day. The next day therfore they all aſſembled in the Proſeucha or Oratory, which was an ample houſe wherin they praied, and was able to contain a great multitude. When Ionathan was entred into this place, he durſt not manifeſtly ſpeake vnto them of a reuolt, but only told them that their citie had need of a better Gouernor. But the Preſident Ieſus without diſſembling, ſpake plainly after this manner vnto them.

But the greater part tooke no pleaſure therin: and there had preſently followed a mutiny, had not the aſſembly bin diſmiſſed, by reaſon it was midday, which is the ordinary houre amongſt them to to take their repaſt in. Thus did Ionathans conſorts remit the determination of the matter vntill the next day, retiring themſelues without any good done. Which being preſently reported vnto me, I reſolued with my ſelfe the next morning to repaire to the citie of Tiberias: and on the morrow I arriued there in due time, for I found the people already aſſembled in the place of prayer, and they that were drawne to the conuocation, knew not the cauſe why they were aſſembled. Ionathans partners ſeeing me there in perſon contrary to their expectation, H were very ſore troubled, and bethought themſelues of this ſubtilty. They told the multitude that a certain friend of theirs had informed them, that he had diſcouered certain Roman horſemen vpon the frontiers of that territory, ſome thirty ſtades from the citie, in a place called Homonœa: and that the newes being brought to them, thoſe of Iohns faction had preſently ſignified the ſame vnto them, to the intent they ſhould not endure their countrey to be ſackt by the enemy. They vſed this ſpeech, ſuppoſing that vnder pretext of reſcuing the country, they might driue me abroad, and ſtrengthen the city for themſelues.

Now although I knew very well what their intent was, yet gaue I eare vnto them, leaſt I ſhould driue the Tiberians into an opinion, that I was negligent and careleſſe of their ſecurity: I therfore rode out, & came to the place of which they had ſpoken: where finding ſcarce a foot- I

there I found the whole councell aſſembled with a multitnde of people, and Iohns partakers vrging againſt me a very vehement accuſation, that I made no account to relieue them in their warres, but that I ſtudied nothing but mine own pleaſure. And whileſt they ſpake theſe words, they produced foure letters, as being written vnto them by thoſe who were vpon the marches of Galilee, requiring them to come & ſuccor them, for that the Roman horſemen and footmen would within three daies forrage and ſpoyle their country: for which cauſe they made haſte, and would not neglect their ſuit who beſought them. The Tiberians hearing theſe allegations, and ſuppoſing them to be true, cryed out ſaying, that it behoued them not in that maner to dallie time, but to go and ſuccor their countrimen inuironed with great dangers. Whereunto I an- K ſwered, that I was ready to obey them, and promiſed to march forth againſt the enemy with all expedition. Now knew I well the pretence of Iohns partakers; and was of the opinion, that ſince

For it is an honour for good men not only to giue counſel, but alſo when need requireth to be the firſt and formoſt in action: For I told them that it lay not in my power to lead any more then one company. This my aduice was pleaſing vnto all the people, who preſently conſtrained theſe men to march out vnto the warre: whereby it came to paſſe that they were greatly confuſed to ſee that they might not finiſh that which they had imagined, becauſe I croſſed all their enterpriſes.

He ſpake this, not for any piety that was in him, but to the end to ſurpriſe both me and my followers vnarmed. To this aduice of his was I enforced to cõdeſcend, to the end it might appear that I contemned not that which appertained to the ſeruice of God. As ſoone therefore as we were retyred euery one of

He receiuing this letter, willingly obeyed. The next day I commanded two of my ſtrongeſt and faithfulleſt ſoul- M diers to hide their ſhort ſwords vnder their gownes, and to attend mee, to the end that if in any ſort we were aſſailed by the enemy, we might defend our ſelues. I put on my curets alſo, and girt my ſword by my ſide in ſuch ſort, as no man might perceiue the ſame, and came with them to the place of prayer.

But Ieſus as ſoone as I was entred with my friends, hauing the guard of the gate, would not permit the reſt of my followers to enter with me: & at ſuch time as we were ready to begin our prayers,

A prayers, according to the cuſtome of our countrey, Ieſus ariſing demanded of me what was become of the houſhold ſtuffe that was taken out of the kings palace when it was burned, & where the bullion of ſiluer was, and with whom I had left the ſame: of all which he therefore made mention, that he might delay the time till Iohns approach. I anſwered, that Capella had all, and thoſe ten of the chiefeſt nobility of Tiberias; and willed him to aske of them whether it were true that I ſpake: who confeſſed that they had it. What (ſaid hee) are become of thoſe twenty pieces of gold, that you receiued by the ſale of a certain waight of maſſiue ſiluer, where are they? I anſwered him, that I had deliuered the ſame to the Embaſſadorus, to defray their charges in their voyage towards Ieruſalem. B herewith (for I very eaſily perceiued the wicked diſpoſition of theſe men) & ſeeing that a ſedition was likely to ariſe, I thought it beſt to whet & animate the people the more againſt them: I ſaid, that if I had done amiſſe in rewarding the Embaſſadours on the common ſtock, they ſhould need to take no further diſpleaſure for that: for ſaid I, I will repay thoſe twenty peeces of gold out of mine own purſe. Hereupon the people were incenſed the more againſt them, in that they manifeſtly diſcouered what hatred they wrongfully bare vnto me. Wherupon Ieſus fearing leaſt ſome change might ariſe, commanded the people to depart, and required the councell to ſtay, for that it was vnpoſſible to examine matters diſcreetly, where ſo much trouble and turmoile was. The people cried out, that they would not leaue me alone among them. Whervpon there came one vnto Ieſus, who ſecretly informed him that Iohn with his armed men was at hand, who Whereupon I incontinently ſent for the chiefeſt men of Galilee, and told them how contrarie to all law and right I had almoſt been murthered by Ionathan and the Tiberians. For which cauſe the Galileans were grieuouſly diſpleaſed againſt them, and willed mee without delay to make war againſt them; or if I liſt not my ſelfe, to ſuffer them with all expedition to cut off both Iohn and Ionathan, with all their followers. Yet did I reſtraine them the beſt I could, and pacified their diſpleaſure, and prayed them to expect vntill ſuch time as wee knew what newes our Embaſſadors would bring that were gone to Ieruſalem. For I told them wee ought to execute no kinde of thing without their approbation and conſent: and by theſe meanes I perſwaded them.

E But Iohn ſeeing at that time that his policy had but very ſlender ſucceſſe, returned backe againe to Giſchala.

Some few daies after, our Embaſſadors, who were returned from Ieruſalem, certified vs, that the people of Ieruſalem were ſore diſpleaſed with Ananias the high Prieſt, and Simon the ſonne of Gamaliel, for that without their common conſent they had ſent Embaſſadors into Galilee, and ſought to diſplace mee of the gouernment there, and their diſpleaſure was ſo kindled that they were ready to ſet their houſes on fire. They brought me alſo letters, by which the gouernour of Ieruſalem vpon the inſtant requeſt that the people had made vnto them, cõfirmed me in the gouernement of Galilee, commanding Ionathan and his aſſociates to returne backe againe with all expedition. After I had receiued theſe letters, I repaired to the borough of Arbela, where I aſand conſulted with them what they were beſt to doe. The Tiberians opinion was that they G ſhould continue and maintain their eſtates, and that they ſhould not forſake the Citie which had already ſubſcribed to their authority, eſpecially for that I would inuade them: for that I had ſo threatned them they were not aſhamed to faine and imagine. This aduice not only pleaſed Iohn, but hee furthermore gaue this counſell, that ſome two Embaſſadours ſhould be ſent from them to the people of Ieruſalem, to accuſe mee for that I had vniuſtly gouerned the common-weale of Galilee, telling them that they might very eaſily incenſe the people againſt mee, both in regard of their authoritie, as alſo for that the common people are by nature variable and in-conſtant. This counſaile that Iohn gaue was allowed by them all: whereupon it was thought fit that Ionathan and Ananias ſhould in perſon repaire to Ieruſalem, and that the other two ſhould remaine at Tiberias, and for their conuoy they gaue them a hundreth armed ſoul- H diers.

The Tiberians had before this prouided for the ſecurity of their wals, and gaue commandement to all the citizens to take armes, and afterwards ſent for ſome ſupplies to Iohn to ſtrengthen their garriſon, if they ſhould any waies be prouoked by me. For Iohn kept at Giſchala. Meane while Ionathan trauayling onwards of his iourney came to Dabaritta, a Citie ſituated vpon the vttermoſt borders of Galilee in a great Plaine: and there met hee about midnight with ſome of my troupes that kept the watch, who commanded them to lay by their armes, and kept them ſafely bound, as I had commanded them. Hereof Leui, who had the charge of this quarter, certified me by his letters: wherefore diſſembling the matter for ſome two daies, I ſent letters to the Tiberians, by which I counſelled them that laying their armes aſide, they ſhould diſmiſſe I euery one to his owne dwelling place. But they returned me an iniurious anſwer: for they ſup-poſed that Ionathan and his traine were already arriued in Ieruſalem. But I ſetting light by their iniuries, reſolued to circumuent them by this cunning ſtratagem: For I thought it a dangerous matter to kindle warre againſt the citizens. Being therefore very willing to draw them out of their wals, I choſe out ten thouſand of my beſt ſouldiers, whom I diſtributed into three bands, and lodged one company of them ſecretly at Dora, to lie there in ambuſh: I encamped alſo another thouſand in a certaine borough ſituate in a mountainous place, ſome foure ſtades diſtant from Tiberias; cõmanding them that as ſoon as I gaue them a watchword or ſigne, they ſhould break forth: as for my ſelfe, I withdrew my ſelfe and kept in the open field, and ſate me downe on the graſſe. Which when the Tiberians perceiued, they made continuall excurſions towards K me, vſing many bitter and iniurious taunts againſt me: and ſo great folly poſſeſſed them, that they ſpred a magnificent couch in the open Plaine; and marching round about the ſame, they ſeornefully ſeemed to lament me, as if I had lien therein, whileſt in the meane time I took plea-ſure to laugh and looke vpon their follies.

The Tiberians intend war againſt Ioſeph.

The Tiberians ſcoffe very bitterly againſt Ioſeph.

But being very deſirous to ſurpriſe Simon by ſome policie, and Ioazar alſo with him, I ſent vnto them, requiring them that they would march forth a little without their wals, attended by their friends and guard for their ſecurity ſake; for that I was determined to conferre with them vpon a peace, and to confirme the one halfe of the gouernment vnto them. Hereupon Simon de-ceiued by his folly, and ouercome and blinded with greedy deſire, came forth with all expedition: but Ioazar ſuſpecting ſome ſtratageme, would not aduenture without the wals. As ſonne as L I ſaw Simon attended by his friends and guard, I went out to meet him, and embraced him kindly, giuing him thanks for that he was come downe; anon after walking along with him, as if I intended to communicate ſomewhat with him in ſecret, I withdrew him from his friends, and laying hands on him, I deliuered him to my friends to lead him into the borough, and gaue a ſigne vnto my ſouldiers that they ſhould come down, and with them I aſſaulted the Citie of Tiberias. There was a ſharpe skirmiſh on both ſides, and the Tiberians had welnie gotten the vic-torie: For my ſouldiers began to flie; but perceiuing how the matter went, I animated thoſe of my company, and with them gaue a valiant onſet on the Tiberians, who almoſt had the better, and chaſed them into their citie, and ſent another company by the lake, to ſet on fire thoſe houſes which they ſhould firſt fall vpon. Hereupon the Tiberians thought that their citie was taken M by force, and caſt downe their weapons for feare, praying me to haue compaſſion of their wiues and children, and to pardon their citie. For this cauſe being moued with compaſſion, I reſtrai-ned the fury of my ſouldiers; and for that it was late I retyred my ſelfe with my ſouldiers, both to the intent I might ſpare the citie, and relieue my wearied and wounded ſouldiers. Hereupon
I ſent for Siman to come and banquet with me, and comforted him in his misfortune, promiſing him to ſend him to Ieruſalem, and to aſſure him in his iourney homeward, and to furniſh him for

The next day I aſſembled ten thouſand ſouldiers, and preſently made mine entry into Tiberias; and hauing aſſembled the chiefeſt Citizens in the horſe race, I commanded them to diſcouer vnto me who they were that were the authors of that rebellion: who hauing ſatisfied me, I laid hands on them and bound them, and ſent them incontinently to Iotapata. As for Ionathan and his conſorts, I ſet them at liberty, and gaue them money for their charges, and ſent them back to Ieruſalem with Simon & Ioazar, & fiue hundreth ſouldiers for their guard. Hereupon the Tiberians reaſſembled themſelues before mee, beſeeching me to pardon their miſdeeds, promiſing me to recompence by their future fidelity their forepaſſed and foul faults: beſeeching me alſo to reſtore thoſe goods vnto the citizens, which in way of pillage were taken from them. Whereupon I gaue a preſent command, that all the prey
B ſhould be brought and laid before me: and whereas the ſouldiers delaied to performe the ſame, I ſpying one of thoſe ſouldiers that ſtood by me, better apparelled then he was wont to be, asked him where he had gotten that garment: who confeſſing that he had taken it in the ſpoile of the citie, I chaſtiſed him hith ſtrokes, and threatned a worſe puniſhment to all thoſe that would not reſtore that which they had taken away: whereby recouering a great part of the prey together, I gaue euery citizen that which he knew to be his owne.

In this place I cannot chuſe but in ſome ſort I muſt reprehend Iuſtus, who wrote vpon this argument; and others who promiſing a Hiſtory are not affraid in contempt of truth, either for fauour or hatred, to commit lies to their poſterity. For they differ nothing from counterfeiters of euidences, and raſers of records; but that theſe men are more corrupted by impunity. For hee
C to the end he might ſeem to imploy his time well, vndertaking to ſet downe the euents of this warre, hath belied me in many things, and hath not been aſhamed to belie his owne countrey. For which cauſe I am neceſſarily inforced in this place to diſcouer that which hitherto I haue concealed, and to reprooue that which he hath falſely teſtified of mee: neither is it to be wondered at that I haue ſo long time deferred the performance therof. For whoſoeuer writeth a Hiſtory ought of neceſſity to ſpeake the truth; yet is it not lawfull for him to inueigh againſt the wickeder ſort too vehemently; not for that they are worthy of this fauour, but for his owne modeſties ſake.

A reproofe of Iuſtus the Hiſtoriographer, that falſly accuſed Ioſeph.

Tell me therefore Iuſtus (for thou deſireſt to be held for the man of greateſt note amongſt all » other Hiſtorians, and art not aſhamed to vaunt and boaſt thy ſelfe of that title) tell mee I pray »
D thee in familiarity (for I muſt ſo talk with thee as if thou wert preſent before me) how I and the » Galileans haue been the authors of that rebellion, which thy countrey began both againſt the » Romans & their King. For before I was choſen gouernor of Galilee by the people of Ieruſalem, » both thou and all the Tiberians were not only vp in armes, but had already made warre againſt » the ten Cities of Syria. Thy ſelfe hadſt burnt their villages, and one of thy ſeruants died in that » encountrie: yet not I alone proteſt this, but it is extant alſo in writing in the records of the Em- » perour Veſpaſian, how the inhabitants of theſe ten cities cried out to Veſpaſian in the citie of Pto- »
lemais, requiring that thou mighteſt be puniſhed, as the authour of their miſchiefes: and aſſu- » redly thou hadſt beene puniſhed by the Emperour, had not Agrippa, who had receiued commiſ- »
ſion to execute thee, vpon the inſtant requeſt of his ſiſter Bernice ſpared thee life, and kept thee »
E bound in priſon for a long time. Furthermore, thy politicke behauiours do ſufficiently expreſſe » what the reſt of thy life hath beene, and how thou haſt cauſed thy country to rebell againſt the » Romans: whereof I wil produce hereafter moſt euident arguments, and for thy cauſe will I vrge »
ſomewhat againſt thoſe other Tiberians; and I will make it plaine to thoſe that ſhall reade theſe » Hiſtories, that thou haſt been no friend to Rome, nor faithfull to thy King. And I enforce theſe » my authorities from the greateſt cities of Galilee, Sephoris and Tiberias, in which thou Iuſtus » wert borne. For Sephor is ſituate in the heart of Galilee, hauing round about it a number of vil- » lages, and being a citie ſufficiently able in it ſelfe to attempt & execute any noble action at their » pleaſure; yet notwithſtanding the citizens therof reſolued to obſerue their faith to the Romans, » and thruſt me out of doores, forbidding euery man among them to beare armes for the Iewes. » F And to the end they might be more aſſured in my behalfe, the inhabitants deceiued me in that » they entreated mee to encompaſſe their citie with a wall: and that done, they willingly entertai- » ned a garriſon which was ſent them from Ceſtius Gallus, who was generall of the Roman Legi- » ons in Syria in contempt of mee, although at that time I had a great power, and terrified the » countrey round abouts. But when our great citie of Ieruſalem was beſieged, and that temple » which was common to all our nation, was in danger to fall into the enemies hands, the Sepho- » rites ſent no ſuccours, to the end it might not be ſaid that they tooke armes againſt the Romans: »

But

But thy countrey Iuſtus being ſituate vpon the lake of Genazareth diſtant from Hippus thirty G ſtades, from Gadara ſixty, from Scythopolis ſixſcore, in a country obedient to the King, hauing not any citie of the Iewes round about it, might haue very eaſily kept their faith to the Romans, if they had liſted. For both the citie & people were furniſhed with munition in all aboundance:
But as thou ſaiſt, I was the cauſe at that time. And who afterwards? For thou knoweſt that before the ſiege of Ieruſalem, I was in the Romans hands, & that Iotapata was taken by force, & diuers other caſtles, and that many other Galileans were ſpent in diuers battels. At that time ſhouldeſt thou haue deliuered thy ſelf of that fear thou hadſt of me, laying thine armes aſide, & preſenting thy ſelf to the king & the Romans, when thou vndertookeſt arms not of thine owne accord, but inforced. But the truth is, you expected Veſpaſians coming, euen vntill ſuch time as he begirt your citie wals with a ſiege, & then laid you your armes aſide for feare of danger: yea euen then had H your citie bin ouerthrown, except the king in excuſe of your folly, had obtained your pardon at Veſpaſians hands. It was not therfore my fault, but your offence, that behaued your ſelues like enemies. Do you not remember how often times I haue obtained the victory againſt you, and how few times you could complaine of bloudſhed? But you falling at diſſenſion one with another haue been the inſtruments of your own ruine; and not for the loue you bare either to the King, or the Romans, but of your owne malice ſlew 185. citizens, at ſuch time as I was beſieged by the Romans in Iotapata: Nay more, is not this true, that during the ſiege of Ieruſalem, wherof I haue made mention, there were more then two thouſand Tiberians ſlaine, or otherwiſe taken priſo-ners? But perhaps thou wilt alledge, that at that time thou wert no enemy, for that thou wert fled to the King; but I tell thee that thou fleddeſt thither for the feare thou hadſt of me. I am a I wicked man, as thou ſaiſt: but what art thou? whom King Agrippa, vpon many preſents deliue-red from puniſhment, at ſuch time as thou wert condemned by Veſpaſian to loſe thy head. For what cauſe hauing made thee priſoner twice, and hauing ſo many times paſt the ſentence of baniſhment againſt thee, and hauing once commanded thee to be thine owne murtherer, hath hee giuen thee life vpon the importunate ſollicitation of his ſiſter Bernice? And after ſo many crimes commited by thee, hauing entertained thee for his Secretary, when he found thy corruption in that office, he baniſhed thee from his preſence.

Iuſtus condē-ned to death.

But I will not too exactly touch thee with theſe matters, yet notwithſtanding I wonder at thine impudence, that haſt openly proteſted, that thou haſt written more exactly and perfectly of this matter, then any man: whereas thou art vtterly ignorant of thoſe things that were done K in Galilee. For at that time wert thou at Berytum with the King, and wert no waies priuy to the ſiege of Iotapata; ſeeing thou didſt not follow vs. Neither couldſt thou be able to learne how
I behaued my ſelfe therein, for that there was no one left aliue to giue thee certain intelligence.
Thou wilt perhaps ſay, that thou haſt carefully deſcribed that, which hapned during the ſiege of Ieruſalem. And how may this bee poſſible? For thou wert neither agent nor looker on in that warre; neither haſt thou read the commentaries of Veſpaſian. But I coniecture hereby that thou haſt not read them at all, foraſmuch as thou haſt written cleane contrary to that which is contained therein. And if thou art ſo confident, that thy Hiſtory is truer then other mens, why didſt thou not publiſh it during Veſpaſians and Titus liues, who were the generals of that warre; neither before King Agrippa and thoſe of his race, who were all of them very expert in the Greeke L tongue? For thou haſt kept it written by thee aboue twenty years, and mightſt haue produced witnes of thine exact diligence before them, who were priuy to all things. But now when they are dead, and thou thinkeſt that no man liueth that may reproue thee, thou haſt vndertaken this boldnes to publiſh thy work. But I haue vſed no ſuch policy or feare in my books, but haue preſented them to the Emperors themſelues, who haue been eye witneſſes and actors therof. For I knew in mine owne ſoule that I had ſet downe all things truely: Whereupon I obtained my expected approbation. Moreouer, I communicated the ſame Hiſtory with diuers others, whereof ſome of them were preſent in the warre, as was King Agrippa, and ſome of his kinred. And Titus the Emperour himſelfe was ſo deſirous that men ſhould ſearch for the truth of that Hiſtorie out of theſe bookes, that he placed them in a library, and cauſed them to be publiſhed, being M ſubſcribed with his owne hand. As for King Agrippa, he ſent me ſeuenty two Epiſtles, teſtifying the truth of my books, whereof two of them are vnderwritten, to the end that the truth may ap-peare thereby; King Agrippa to his deare friend Ioſeph, Health. I haue with great contentment ouer-read thy book, wherein thou ſeemeſt in my opinion to haue handled this matter more exactly, then any other. For which cauſe I pray thee ſend me the reſt. Farewell my deare friend.

Thus was he a witnes of the truth of my accomplished History: not flattering me, for it became him not; neither deriding me, as you perhaps may obiect; for farre was it from so noble a mind to be subiect to so seruile a folly: but only to this end, that the truth of my writings might be cõmended to the reader by the worth of his testimony. And thus much haue I thought good to set downe in way of answere to Iustus.

Iosephus prosecuteth his History, and leaueth to debate with Iustus.

Now as soone as I had pacified these troubles in Tiberias, and had established a councell of such as were well affected towards me, I bethought my selfe of that which concerned me to do in respect of Iohn. All they of Galilee were of the opinion, that I should arme them all, and that
B in battell array I should match against Iohn, and doe iustice vpon him, as hee that had been the author of all this mischief. But for mine owne part, I misliked their counsels, for that my desire was to extinguish these troubles without bloodshed; and for that cause, I incited them with all diligence that was possible, to learne the names of all those who serued vnder him: which being done, and I made priuy what they were, I published a Proclamation, by which I promised both safety and pardon to all those, that would forsake Iohn, assigning them the terme of twenty daies, to determine of that which seemed best for their owne security: and I threatned to set fire on their houses, and confiscate their goods, except they gaue ouer their armes. They hearing these things, were greatly troubled, and forsooke Iohn: and after they had laid downe their weapons they came vnto me to the number of foure thousand: so that onely fifteene hundreth men re-
C mained with Iohn or there abouts; either of citizens, or strangers of Tyre. When Iohn perceiued that hee was circumuented by this policy, hee euer after remained quiet in his countrey in great feare.

Foure thousand of Iohns followers forsake him, and follow Ioseph.

At that time the Sephorites grew so bolde, that they tooke armes vnder the confidence and strength of their wals, and for that they saw me distracted with other businesse. They therefore sent to Cestius Gallus gouernour of Syria, praying him to repaire vnto them, with all expedition, to take possession of their Citie, or to send them a garrison of men at the least. Gallus promised to come vnto them, but he set downe no certaine time of his approach: whereof when I was aduertised, I tooke the men of warre that I had, and marched against the Sephorites, and tooke their Citie by force. The Galileans very glad of this opportunity, and supposing the time was
D come wherein they might satisfie the insatiable hatred that they bare against that citie, marched on with that intent, as if they would haue wholly ruinated the Citie, with all the inhabitants. They therefore trauailed the streets, and set fire on the houses, which they found wholly desolate: For the inhabitants were fled away for feare, and were retired into a fortresse. They therefore ransackt all things, & left nothing vnspoiled: neither was there any kind of misery which they inflicted not on their countrimen. Which when I saw, I was sore grieued; and commanded them to giue ouer, signifying vnto them that it was impiety in them, to shew themselues so sauage towards their countrimen. And seeing that neither by any prayer or command that I made, I could draw them to obedience, for that their hatred surpassed my counsels, I commanded those that were about me, and whom I most trusted, to spread a rumour that the Romanes
E charged vs on the other side of the Citie, with great force. All which I did, to the end that by this rumour I might pacifie the fury of the Galileans, and saue the City of Sephoris: and this policie took good effect. For when they heard this newes they were affraid, and forsook their pillage, to trust to their heels, in especiall for that I who was their generall did the like. For I made a shew, that I belieued the rumor to be as true, as they belieued it: and by this stratagem the citie Sephoris was saued beyond all hope.

And hardly escaped Tiberias from being spoiled by the Galileans, thorow this occasion which ensueth. The chiefest of their councell wrote vnto the King, that he should come vnto them, and take possession of their City. The King promised to satisfie them very shortly, and answered them by his letters, and deliuered them to one of his chamber, called Crispus a Iew borne, to car-
F ry them to the Tiberians. The Galileans knowing this messenger, tooke him and brought him vnto me: which when the common people vnderstood, of meere spleen they fell to armes, and the next day diuers of them assembled themselues from all parts, and came to the City of Asoch where I made my abode, and made huge exclamations, calling the Tiberians traytors, and the Kings friends, and demanding of mee licence and liberty that they might repaire to Tiberias, and raze it to the ground, being as much displeased against the Tiberians, as they were against the Sephorites.

Tiberias in danger of ruine.

Which

Ioseph consulteth with himselfe.

Which when I heard, I stood in great doubt how I might deliuer the Tiberians from that displeasure, which the Galilæans had conceiued against them: for I could not deny but that the Tiberians had written and sent for the King: for the answere which he made them, did euidently expresse the truth. And hauing a long while debated the matter with my selfe, I sayd vnto them, I know as well as you, that the Tiberians haue offended: neither will I hinder you from spoiling their citie; yet must you proceed to the execution thereof with some iudgement. For the Tiberians alone doe not betray our liberty, but others also, who are more accounted of in the countrey of Galilee. Stay therefore vntill such time as I am throughly enformed, who they be that are authors of this treason; and then you shall haue them all vnder your hands, with all those amongst them, whom you may particularly thinke worthy punishment. By these perswasions I wonne the people, who departed from me wholly contented and pacified. As for the messenger that was sent by the King, I caused him to be imprisoned, hauing respect to an vrgent necessity of mine owne, which constrained mee to depart out of the Kingdome within a little while. And calling Crispus secretly vnto me, I charged him to make those souldiers drunke, who had the charge of him, to the end that he might in all security fly backe to the King. Thus Tiberias being ready to be destroyed, the second time by my gouernment and prouidence, auoided at that time a great and fatall danger.

The Galileans wrath pacified, conceiued against the Tiberians.

Iustus desireth to command Galilee.

At the same time Iustus, the sonne of Pistus, fled vnto the King without my knowledge: the cause of which flight of his, I will orderly expresse. As soon as the Romans had begunne their warre against the Iewes, the Tiberians concluded to obey the King, and in no sort to rebell against the Romans. But Iustus egged them on to take armes, thirsting after alteration, and hoping both to obtaine the gouernment of Galilee, as of his owne countrey: but his hope failed him of a successfull end. For the Galileans being enuiously bent against the Tiberians, for those iniuries they had suffered at their hands before the warre, could not allow Iustus to be their gouernour. My selfe also, whom the people of Ierusalem put in trust with the gouernment of Galilee, was oftentimes so much mooued, that I failed little of killing Iustus; so intolerable was his wickednesse. Hee therefore fearing least my displeasure should shorten his daies, went vnto the King, supposing that he might liue more freely and securely with him. The Sephorites beyond their expectation hauing escaped this first danger, wrote vnto Cestius Gallus the second time; requiring him to come vnto them, to the end that hee might be the sooner seized of their citie; or that he should send them forces to withstand the incursions of their enemies: and finally they wrought so much, that Gallus sent them store of horsemen, and after them footmen, who came by night, and were receiued into their Citie. But seeing that the countrey round about them was but in poore estate, by reason of the Roman horsmen, I tooke my souldiers, and came to Garizim, where I encamped some twenty stades off from Sephoris, and by night I approached the same, and set ladders to the wall, with which I entred a great number of my soldiers, and became master of the better part of the Citie; from whence notwithstanding we were afterwards constrained to retire, for that we knew not the place, killing before our departure twelue Roman footmen and two horsemen, with some Sephorites, to the only losse of one of ours. Afterwards a fight hapning between vs and their horsemen in open field, we fought for a long time with disaduantage: For the Romans hauing inuironed mee on all sides, my rereward through the feare they conceiued, began to retire. In this skirmish I lost one of my guard, called Iustus, who in times past had serued in the very same place vnder the King. At that very time the Kings forces both of horse and foot came thither, vnder the gouernment of Sylas captaine of the guard, who encamping some siue stades off from Iulias, beset the high waies that bended towards Cana with men of warre, and the fort of Gamala, to hinder the inhabitants from receiuing any commodities from the countrey of Galilee.

Ioseph assailed the wals of Sephoris.

Silas captaine of the Kings guard.

As soone as I receiued newes hereof, I sent out two thousand souldiers, with Ieremy their coronell: who shrouding themselues within a stade of Iulias, neere vnto the floud Iordan, offered nothing else but light skirmishes, vntill such time as I had gathered three thousand souldiers more, and was come vnto them. The next day hauing planted an ambush in a certaine trench neer vnto the enclosure of their campe, I touled out the Kings souldiers to skirmish, hauing first forewarned my souldiers to faine a flight, vntill such time as they had drawn their enemies as far as the ambush; which they cunningly executed. But Sylas supposing that our men fledde for cowardize, set forward to follow them as fast as he might possible: but they that lay in ambush charged him on the backe, and discomfited his army: and I presently turning and making head against them, constrained the Kings forces to trust to their heeles. At that time the estate of the countrey

Ioseph putteth the kings soldiers to flight.

A countrey was at a good point, had not ſome curſed ſpirit thwarted mine honeſt purpoſes. For the horſe whereon I roade, falling into a certaine bog, caſt mee on the ground: vvhereby mine hand being thruſt out of ioynt about the wriſt, I was carried into a borough of Cepharnom. My ſouldiers hearing hereof, and fearing leaſt ſome more ſiniſter misfortune had befallen mee, then indeed had done, reſtrained themſelues from purſuing the enemy any further, and turned their backes thorow the griefe they had conceiued by reaſon of mine accident. Hauing therefore ſent for Phyſitions, and cauſed my ſelfe to be dreſſed, I ſtaied there for that day; and being ſeized with a feuer, I was carried by night to Taricheas, according to the aduice of my Phyſitions.

Sylas and his ſouldiers hauing newes of mine accident, recouered their courages: and vnderſtanding that we kept but ſlender watch in our campe, they laid an ambuſh by night on this ſide Iosephs misfortune animateth the enemy.

B Iordan, with their horſemen, & as ſoone as the day appeared, he drew out our ſouldiers to fight: who willingly condeſcended thereunto; & being come into the Plaine, they perceiued the men that lay in ambuſh, by whom they were put to flight, and ſix of our men were ſlaine. But they purſued their victory no further: For hauing newes that certaine ſouldiers had paſt the water of Taricheas to Iulias, they were affraid and returned backe.

Not long after, Veſpaſian arriued at Tyre, accompanied with king Agrippa. Againſt whom the Tyrians began to vtter many reproaches, telling Veſpaſian that the king was both an enemy to the Tyrians & the Romans, alleaging that Philip his Generall had betraied the kings palace and the Roman army in Ieruſalem, and that by the kings commiſſion. Which when Veſpaſian vnderſtood, hee reproued this impudent bouldneſſe of the Tyriaans, for blaming a king of that Veſpaſian and Agrippa arriue at Tyre.

C power, and a friend to the Romans: and aduiſed the king to ſend Philip to Rome, to yeelde account of his actions. But notwithſtanding that Philip was ſent thither, yet preſented he not himſelf before Nero; for finding him extreamely buſied with troubles and ciuill warres, he returned vnto the king without doing any thing. When Veſpaſian was arriued at Ptolemais, the gouernors of the ten cities of Syria cried out againſt Iuſtus the Tiberian, accuſing him for burning of their boroughs. Verſpaſian therefore deliuered him bound vnto the king, to the end that the ſubiects of his kingdome might haue him puniſhed. But the king before that time, vnwitting to Veſpaſian, had kept him priſoner, as it hath been heretofore declared. The Sophonites alſo reſorted to Veſpaſian, to ſalute him, and receiue a garriſon from him, with their commander Placidus, vvho made many roades into the countrey, and purſued them vntill ſuch time as Veſpaſian arriued in Galilee: of which arriuall I haue amply ſpoken in my bookes of the Warres of the Iewes, how The gouernors of Decapolis accuſe Iuſtus. Of Veſpaſians arriuall, and the ſiege of Iotapata read Ioſeph lib. 4. cap 5. of the warres of the Iewes.

D he came, how he fought againſt me, the firſt time neere to the Citie of Taricheas: how I departed from thence to repaire to Iotapata, my taking, my deliuerance, and all my actions and fortunes during the warres of the Iewes, and the ſiege of the Citie of Ieruſalem. But now meeſeemeth that it is neceſſarie, that I deſcribe other things exploited by mee during my life time in other places then in the warres of the Iews. After the ſiege of Iotapata was ended, I was priſoner with the Romans and kept very carefully: yet notwithſtanding, Veſpaſian did me much honour. For by his commandement I married a virgin, that was one of thoſe that had been taken captiue in Cæſarea. But ſhe remained not long time with me: for after I was ſet at libertie, and that I followed Veſpaſian, ſhee retired her ſelfe to Alexandria. After which, I married another woman

E in Alexandria, from whence I was ſent to Titus to the ſiege of Ieruſalem, where I vvas oftentimes in danger of death. For the Iewes laboured what they might to take and puniſh me: and the Romans ſuppoſing that as many and oftentimes as they were repulſed, it was by my treaſon, cried out continually to the Emperour to execute mee for a traitor. But Titus well experienced in the changes of warre, pacified the violence which his ſouldiers intended againſt me by his ſilence. And after the Citie of Ieruſalem was taken, Titus often ſolicited mee to take that which I liked among the ruines of Ieruſalem, promiſing to giue it me. But I making but ſmall account of any thing after the ruine of my countrey, beſought him that hee would giue me certaine free men, and the ſacred Bible, which I receiued for a great conſolation in my miſeries. All vvhich he gratiouſly granted me. Not long after hauing begd my brother and fifty other of my friends, The danger that Ioſeph paſt betwixt the Romans and Iewes.

F they were giuen me, and I was refuſed in nothing. Entring into the temple by Titus permiſſion, I found a great number of priſoners ſhut vp therein, and all thoſe women and children of my friends and familiars, whom I knew, I deliuered them, to the number of one hundreth and ninetie, without paying any ranſome: and I reſtored them to their former free condition. Being ſent with Cerealis and one thouſand horſe into the Citie of Thecoa by the Emperour Titus, to eſpie if the place were fit for a campe; in returning from thence I ſaw diuers priſoners, who were on the gibbet, amongſt which were three of my familiars; whereat I was grieued in my ſoule, Ioſeph diſchargeth a number of captiues. Ioſeph deliuereth three from the gibbet.

and I came and ſignified the ſame vnto Titus with teares : who incontinently commanded that G they ſhould be taken downe, and as carefully dreſt and cured as might bee : two of vvhich died notwithſtanding the vtmoſt diligence of the Phyſitions, and the third ſuruiued.

Ioſeph repaireth with Titus to Rome, and is honourably entertained by Veſpaſian.

After that Titus had appeaſed the troubles of Iudæa, coniecturing with himſelfe that the poſſeſſions which I had in Ieruſalem, would yeeld me but little profit, by reaſon of the Roman garriſon that ſhould be placed there; he planted me in a poſſeſſion in a champaine countrey: and intending to embarke himſelfe to depart for Rome, he tooke me with him in his owne ſhip, & did me great honour. As ſoone as we came to Rome, Veſpaſian had great care of mee; for hee lodged me in his owne howſe, vvhere he kept before he was Emperour, & honoured me with the title of a citizen of Rome, and gaue me an annuall penſion in money; and as long as he liued, continued his good affection towards me, forgetting no kinde of bountie which he might vſe towards me.

Ioſeph enuied & ſlandered.

Whereupon I was ſo much enuied, that I grew in danger thereby to loſe my life : For a certain H Iew called Ionathan, hauing ſtirred vp a ſedition in Cyren, and gathered about him ſome two thouſand inhabitants of the country, was the cauſe of their ouerthrow : & as touching himſelfe, being bound by the gouernour of that countrey, and afterwards ſent vnto the Emperour, he ſaid it was I that had ſent him armes & money. But Veſpaſian knew his falſhood, and condemned him to death, and commanded him to be executed. After this, mine enemies obiected diuers crimes againſt me, in regard that I was in good reputation: but God ſo wrought that I eſcaped them all. Moreouer, I receiued in gift frō Veſpaſian an ample poſſeſſion in Iudæa, & at that very time I forſooke my wife, becauſe her manners pleaſed me not, although ſhe were the mother of my three children, of whom two are deceaſed, and the third, who was called Hircanus, is yet aliue. After this I married a wife that was borne in Candie, and was by nation a Iew, and by birth noble, and I one of the greateſt reputation amongſt the inhabitants, endowed vvith as laudable manners as any other vertuous woman whatſoeuer; as her after-life moſt plainely expreſſed. By her I had two ſonnes, Iuſtus who was the eldeſt, and Simonides, who alſo vvas ſurnamed Agrippa. Thus far as touching my domeſticall affaires. That bountie which I receiued from the hands of the Cæſars, hath alwaies continued mine. For after Veſpaſians death, Titus who ſucceeded him in the Empire, continued the ſame fauour which his father had ſhewed mee. For although I were oftentimes accuſed, yet vvere not mine aduerſaries beleeued. Domitian, vvho ſucceeded him, augmented mine honours. For he puniſhed thoſe Iewes that accuſed me, and gaue order that the Eunuch & ſlaue vvhom I kept to teach my ſon, and by vvhom I vvas accuſed, ſhould be puniſh- K

ed. He granted me exemption alſo from all the tributes of Iudæa, which is one of the moſt greateſt honours that a man may receiue. And as touching Domitia the Emperours wife, ſhee alwaies continued her good affection towards mee. Behould heere the ſhort recitall of my whode life : whereby let each man coniecture of my manners as him liſteth. But O thrice excellent Epaphroditus, after I haue giuen and offered thee all this ancient hiſtorie of our nation, I will for this preſent pauſe in this place.

THE LAMENTABLE AND TRAGICALL HISTORY OF THE VVARS AND VTTER RVINE OF THE IEWES:

COMPRISED IN SEVEN BOOKES
BY FLAVIVS IOSEPHVS, THE SONNE of MATTHIAS:

AND NEWLY TRANSLATED OVT OF THE Latin, and French, into Engliſh, by Tho. Lodge, D. M. P.

Printed at London by H. L. dwelling on Bread-ſtreet hill, at the ſigne of the Starre. 1620,

TO THE RIGHT VVORSHIPFVL HIS esteemed friend, M. Anthony Palmer Esquire.

SIR, my affection, that had rather bee an Actor then an Orator (do well, then speak well,) hath pickt you out to bee the patron of this tragicall historie of the wars of the Iewes. The reasons that draue me hereunto, are neither the expectance of worldly benefites, nor the fruitlesse vp-shot of ostentation: but your virtue (which is not beloued respectiuely, but onely for it selfe) hath created this good conceit in me, which (if you so please) your accpetance may continue. Now since, as the Philosopher supposeth, it is an action worthy a good man, to do good vnto his friend; so it is no lesse commendable to accept an office of kindnes from a friend. For by giuing, wee bewray our well wishing; and by receiuing, we proportion and continue friendship: vpon this ground I pray you build the good entertainment of my Present, and nourish this good custome in mee (which was vsual both amongst Grecians & Latins) I meane my translation: which if it please you, I haue my wish. As for my maligners, I expect no worse from them then Iason the Thessalian, who being assailed and wounded by an enimie (who had an intent to kill him) had an inpostumation opened, that saued his life: their stabbe and stroke of disgrace shall cure and heale the hidden and neglected infirmities of my mind; and notwithstanding, I shall both Genio & ingenio liue to loue you, and lament their want of charitie. Thus heartily commending mee, I hastily take my leaue, beeing tied prentise of late to other mens importunities.

Your louing Friend,

THO. LODGE.

THE FIRST OF THOSE SEVEN BOOKES, WHICH WERE WRITTEN BY FLAVIVS IOSEPHVS THE SONNE OF MATTHIAS, AS TOVCHING THE WARRE AND DESTRVCTION OF THE IEWES.

The Præface.

In which the author taxeth diuers Hiſtoriographers, of vntruth: and declareth his intent, and ſpecifieth the principall points of this Hiſtorie.

FOR as much as the vvarre vvhich vvas enterpriſed betwixt the Iewes and Romans, hath (amongſt all other) beene the greateſt that eyther hath beene attempted in our age, or heard of in any other; either betweene citie & citie; or nation againſt nation: there haue beene ſome, vvho (rather building their diſcourſe on the vaine and improbable report of others, then their owne iudgements) haue (according to the manner of orators) made a hiſtorie of their hearſay, and haue filled their diſcourſes not onely with vanitie, but alſo with contradiction. Others there were (who for that they vvere eie witneſſes or actors of the ſame) haue according to their owne fancies preferred many lies; either to flatter the Romans, or exerciſe their hatred againſt the Iewes: forging ſomewhiles accuſations, otherwhiles breaking out into praiſes, vvithout any obſeruation of hiſtoricall veritie. For this cauſe, I Ioſeph the ſonne of Mattnias, by birth an Hebrewe, and a citizen and prieſt of Ieruſalem: who in the beginning of theſe wars bare armes againſt the Romanes, and afterwards (being thereunto forced by neceſsitie) vvas preſent at all thoſe things, which vvere attempted and proſecuted in thoſe vvarrs; haue thought good to diſcourſe in the Greeke tongue (in fauour of all thoſe vvho acknowledge the ſoueraignitie of the Roman Empire) all that which heretofore in my owne language I haue imparted to thoſe Barbarians that inhabit the Eaſt. For at ſuch time (as I haue already ſpoken) as theſe moſt bitter and buſie vvarres tooke their beginning, the Romanes were at ciuill vvarres among themſelues: and as touching the Iewes (vvho vvere in yeeres valiant, and in vvits turbulent) they being both ſtrong in power, and rich in money, did ſo inſolently abuſe the time, that being animated by the greatnes of thoſe ſeditions and troubles; they ſomewhiles ſwamme in hope, ſometimes ſweltered in feare of poſſeſsing or loſing certaine ſoueraignties in the Eaſt. For the Iewes hope vvas, that all thoſe of their nation (euen they vvho inhabited the parts beyond Euphrates) vvould haue both followed them in their rebellion, and ſeconded their follies vvith their forces. Moreouer, at that time the Frenchmen (vvho bordered vpon the Romans) ſuffered them not to liue in peace: and the Germans alſo began to take armes. Finally, after the death of Nero, ſeditions raigned euery vvhere: ſo that by reaſon of the opportunitie of theſe times many men vvent about to make themſelues kings, and the ſouldiers whetted on with the couetous deſire of gaine, deſired nothing more then trouble and alteration. For vvhich cauſe, I thinke it a matter both worthy reproofe, and ill beſeeming my reputation, if in ſo vvaightie affaires, I ſhould ſuffer the truth to be ſmothered in incertainties, and ſhould permit the Parthians, Babylonians and the furtheſt diſtant Arabians, and thoſe of our nation inhabiting beyond Euphrates, together vvith the Adiabenites, to obtaine the true knowledge of thoſe euents by mine induſtrie; vvhileſt the Grecians, and diuers of thoſe, vvho haue not borne armes vvith the Romans, being diſtracted vvith factions, and deceiued by adulation, ſhould bee ignorant hereof. Yet ſome of theſe there be, vvho (notwithſtanding their falſe informations) ſtick not to write hiſtories, not onely voide of all truth, but also no waies answerable to the subiect which they vndertake. For whilest they labour to G dignifie and extoll the Romans, they altogether suppresse the fame and fortunes of the Iewes: yet cannot I con-iecture by what meanes they may be held great, who triumph in the conquest of men so obscure and abiect.

The glory of the Romans is diminished if you derogate from their labours at the siege of Ierusalem.
Nay whilest they thus extoll the Romans valour in conquering the Iewes, they nothing at all respect the continuance of the warres, nor the multitude of the Roman souldiers, nor the honour of their captaines; whose titles are much embased if they (hauing laboured so much to conquer Ierusalem) should haue any thing derogated from the honour and prosperitie of their attempts. For mine owne part I am not resolued to contradict those who shall enhance the glory and noble actions of the Romans, neither to extoll and dignifie the deserts of mine owne nation, but my resolution is in all truth and sincerity to set down each occurrent, without respect or par-tialitie towards either part. In performance whereof I will fashion my discourse according to the matter I entreate of, and as my griefe and sorrow shall inuite me to lament the miseries of my countrey: For the ciuill H dissension that dismembred the same, was the cause that brought it to confusion: and those tyrants that raigned Titus his piety towards the Iewes.
amongst vs, were such, who forcibly drew the Romans with sword and fire to seeke the desolation of our holy temple. The truth whereof Titus Cæsar himselfe can iustifie, who destroied the same; who during all those warres still pitied the people, for that they (as he well perceiued) were kept in awe by the seditious: And who oftentimes of his owne accord deferred the surprisall of the Citie, purposely protracting the siege, to the intent that in the meane time the authours of the sedition and bloudy warres might haue leasure to repent and submit themselues. Now if any man thinke that I write this, as one that exclaimeth against the tyrants and their thecue-ries; or that in bewailing the miseries of my lost countrey, I accuse their villanies, and thereby transgresse the limites of a historie, let it bee imputed to my griefe, and so pardoned. For amongst all the Cities that were euer gouerned by the Romans, our citie onely attained to the top of felicitie, which now alas is brought into extreame miserie, captiuitie, and desolation. Nay, if all the misfortunes and calamities which the world from the begin- I ning hath seene, be compared with the infelicitie and fall of the Iewes, they are slight and of no moment.

And to increase our sorrow, no forrainers but our owne familiar friends, and countrimen haue been the actors of our tragedy. This considered, if any man of too seuere and stoicall iudgement shall reprehend this my lamentation, let such a one attribute the deeds I recount, to the history which I write; and reserue the lamentations and sorrowes thereof to me, who am the historiographer: although in my mind I may iustly challenge the smooth tongued Grecians, for that (notwithstanding these our so miserable, and so memorable wars happened in their daies, in respect whereof all other former troubles were obscure and of no reckoning) they haue restrained their tongues and pens; and vndertaken an ouercurious silence, to the end they might carpe at those with greater liberty, who vndertake the publishing thereof: whome though in learning and eloquence they K both exceede and outstrip, yet are they inferiour vnto them in the matter and subiect they intreate of. For they forsooth discipher and set down the valiant acts of the Assyrians and Medes, as who should say the ancient writers had but coldly and scarce conceitfully handled the same: and yet God knoweth they come so far behind those auncient authours in their writings, as they neither second them in sense, nor equall them in vnderstanding. For such as in times past published any worthy history, endeuored to write that which they themselues had seene: and for that each of them were eie witnesses of those affaires they committed to writing, they more effectually performed all that which they promised; the rather for that they accounted it to bee an act of dishonestie, to report and publish lies in steed of a history. And truly in my opinion that man is both worthy commendation and praise, who striueth by his studious indeuours, to register not onely the occurrences of times past, but also those memorable euents that haue happend in his daies: and hee onely and truly is to bee accounted I.

industrious, not that altereth and pruneth at his pleasure another mans workes, but hee that of himselfe com-pileth a history, whereof no man hath before time written. For mine owne part (the rather for that I am a stranger) I haue beene inforced to my no small labour and expence, to refresh the memory and truth of these euents in the eares of the Greekes and Romans. For as touching their owne learned men, their mouthes are alwaies open to gaines and controuersies, and to this purpose their tongues still runne on pattens: mary if they come to a history wherein they should both tell truth, and with great labour enquire of those things that are past, here are they mum, the trauell is too tedious, the bit is in their teeth, so that they leaue the matter to their performance, who are incapable and vnapt both in stile and study, to register the noble actions of royall princes.

Since therefore the Grecians make no account of the truth of history, it behooueth vs both to esteeme and honour it. Now to discouer vnto you the originall of the Iewes, what their estate hath beene in times past, and af- M ter what manner they departed out of Aegypt, to shew what countries they conquered, and what colonies they planted, were in my iudgement both impertinent and to little purpose; considering that diuers of mine owne nation haue before my time made and written an exact history of the noble attempts of our ancestors: yea many Greeks also haue translated these mens writings into their owne tongue; & haue as truly, as rhetorically exemplified the same. I will therefore begin my history in that time where these writers and our own prophets ceased, and set down at large all those wars that hapned in my time: and as for those things that exceed my knowledge

A knowledge and remembrance, I will onely touch them briefely, and in a word or two. First how Antiochus surnamed Epiphanes, tooke the citie of Ieruſalem, and poſſeſſed the ſame for the ſpace of three yeeres, and ſix months: and finally how he was driuen out of that countrey by the Aſmoneans. After this I will ſet downe the diſſenſions that happened amongſt Antiochus (ſucceſſors for the kingdome) and how by this meanes they drew Pompey and the Romans into the managing and medling with their affaires. How Herod likewiſe the ſon of Antipater, being aſſiſted by Soſius, vtterly ouerthrew and canceld their felicity and authority: and how in Auguſtus Cæſars time and after the death of Herod, and during the gouernment of Quintilius Varo, a ſedition was raiſed among the people: and how in the twelfth yeere of Neros raigne the warre began to take head and continuance. That likewiſe which hapned in Ceſtius time, and what warlike executions the Iewes performed in their firſt attempts and reuolts, how they ſtrengthened the cities and forts about them, and how

B Nero (hearing of the great ouerthrow which his army receiued vnder Ceſtius their Generall, and fearing leaſt he ſhould loſe all) made Titus Veſpaſian the Generall of his army: who being attended by his eldeſt ſon, came into Iudæa accompanied with as great a company of Romans as hee could poſsibly gather; what number of their allies inuaded and ſpoiled Galilee, what cities they ſurpriſed in that place, either by forcible aſſault, or by any other compoſition. Beſides all theſe things, I will expreſſe what order and diſcipline the Romans obſerue in their wars, and wherein they are accuſtomed to exerciſe their ſouldiers. I will note down alſo the places and nature of the country of Galilee, and the deſcription of Iudæa, together with the mountaines, lakes and fountains therof, with all the properties of the ſame; not forgetting thoſe miſeries which the captiue cities ſuffered: neither how they were ſurpriſed. All which (together with all thoſe euils and miſeries which during thoſe troubles befell me) will I diſcouer, and diſcourſe with all truth and diligence, the rather in that I publiſh

C them in their eares, who are no waies ignorant of them. After this I will ſet down how (vpon the declining and downfall of the Iewes) Nero died; and how, at ſuch time as Veſpaſian had vndertaken the expedition to Ieruſalem, he was withheld from the action, to receiue and enioy the imperiall dignitie: how at that inſtant when he returned himſelf into Egypt to eſtabliſh that eſtate, the Iewes began to mutiny among themſelues; how many tyrants aroſe among them, who hatched much ciuill diſcord and debate in their gouernment. Againe, how Titus departing out of Egypt, came the ſecond time into Iudæa, and ranged ouer the country, and how and where hee leued and encamped his armies. How and how oftentimes the citie hath beene vexed by ſedition, eſpecially at ſuch time as hee himſelfe was preſent. What aſſaults hee gaue, and how many mounts hee raiſed in begirting the city with a treble wall: the ſtrength and prouiſion of the city, the ſituation and platforme of the temple, and the altars therin: the rites and ceremonies which were vſed vpon feſtiuall daies, the 7. purifications and offices of the prieſts: the garments alſo of the high prieſt, and the holy ſanctuary of

D the temple. All which I will recount without any diſſimulation, or ſwaruing from the truth of hiſtory. After this I will relate what cruelty the tyrants vſed againſt their owne countrimen, and what humanity the Romans ſhewed towards ſtrangers, and how oftentimes Titus (who deſired the ſafety both of the citie and temple) prouoked and inuited the ſeditious to mutuall amity. Furthermore, I will report how the people of the Iewes (after theſe many & grieuous wounds which they both ſuffered and ſunke vnder, ſometimes by war, otherwhiles by ſedition, and many times by hunger) were at length ouerthrowne to their vtter confuſion. Neither will I omit the ſlaughter of ſuch as reuolted, neither the puniſhment inflicted on thoſe that were captiue: but I will ſet down how the temple was burned againſt Cæſars will, and what an infinit maſſe of ſacred treaſure was deuoured by the fire. But to ſhut vp the hiſtorie, I will annex the ſurpriſall of the citie, and what ſignes and

E wonders hapned before the ſame: the captiuity alſo of the tyrants themſelues, and the number of thoſe that were led away into captiuitie: and what miſerie euery one of them endured: how the Romans continuing their warres, vtterly raſed the fortreſſes of their captiues: finally, how Titus in trauailing thorow the whole countrey, eſtabliſhed a forme of gouernment therin; and afterward returning into Italy, triumphed with much honour. All theſe things haue I comprehended in ſeuen bookes: indeuouring as much as in me lieth, to fly and auoide all occaſion of reproofe and reprehenſion from thoſe men, who knew theſe affairs and were actors in the wars. All which I haue done for their ſakes, who rather affect truth, then follow their pleaſure: and according to that order and forme I haue propoſed, I will begin and proſecute my ſtile and hiſtorie.

CHAP. I.

How Ieruſalem vvas deſtroied by Antiochus.

The yeare of the world, 3802. before Chriſts Natiuitie, 162. Ant. li 12. c. 6. Antiochus being ſtirred vp by Tobias ſons, inuadeth Iudæa, and ſurpriſeth Ieruſalem. Ant. lib. 15. cap. 4.

AT ſuch time as Antiochus ſurnamed Epiphanes, made warre againſt Sextus Pompeius for the whole gouernment of Syria, there aroſe a ſedition among the Iewes: wherein euery one indeauoured himſelfe to haue the ſoueraigntie ouer others; and thoſe of chiefeſt authoritie and nobilitie amongſt the reſt, diſdained to ſubmit themſelues to ſuch as M were their equals. At that time a certaine man called Onias (who was one of the high prieſts) hauing gotten the vpper hand, did driue the ſonnes of Tobias out of the Citie; who flying to Antiochus for refuge, beſought him in all humilitie that he would lead his forces into Iudæa; offering themſelues to be his guides in that expedition and voiage. Antiochus (who long before that time deſired ſuch an occaſion) eaſily cõdeſcended to their requeſts; & leuying a great army entred

A entred their countrey, and tooke the citie by force, and ſlew the moſt part of them, who fauoured Ptolomy: and giuing his ſouldiers libertie to ſack the citie, he himſelfe ſpoiled the temple alſo; and for the ſpace of three yeeres and ſixe moneths, forbad all ſacrifices & ceremonies, which before time were accuſtomed and vſed in that place. Whereupon Onias the high Prieſt fled vnto Ptolomey, and hauing obtained a grant of a peece of ground from him, within the liberties and precinct of Heliopolis, he built a towne and temple in that place, reſembling the citie and ſanctuarie in Ieruſalem. The yeere of the world, 3802. after Chriſts Nativitie, 62. The high prieſt Onias flieth to Ptolomey. Ant. lib. 12 cap. 7.

But neither was Antiochus ſatisfied with the vnexpected ſurpriſe of the citie, nor with the pillage & ſlaughter of the citizens, but was ſo far tranſported by his paſſions, & incēſed with the rememberance of thoſe euils which he ſuſtained during the ſiege of the city, that he compelled the B Iewes to forſake the cuſtomes of their countrey; commaunding them from that time forward to vſe no more circumciſion of their children, but that they ſhold immolate ſwine vpon the Altar: which whē all of them iointly refuſed to obey, the moſt conſtant among them were for that cauſe put to death. Bacchides beeing made chiefe of the garriſons by the appointment of Antiochus, what with his innated cruelty, and the impious commaundement that was left him, omitted no occaſion to further his wicked impietie, inſomuch as he particularly tormented ſuch as were of noble birth, and qualitie: that each day for the moſt part, hee repreſented vnto them the freſh face and memorie of the deſolation of their citie: till all of them at the laſt beeing prouoked and whetted on through the grieuouſnes of that which both themſelues and others indured, addreſſed themſelues with confidence to proſecute their reuenge. At length Matthias the ſon of Aſmoneus, one of the prieſts, who was borne in a village called Modin, accompanied with his fiue ſons C and his own houſhold armed with ſwords, ſlue Bacchides: and fearing the power and multitude of the enemies garriſons, ſpeedily retired himſelfe into the mountaines. Thither reſorted diuers of the people vnto him: for which cauſe he wexing more confident and courageous, came down from the mountaines, and ouercomming the captaines of Antiochus, draue them out of the borders of Iudæa. At ſuch time therefore as through his happy ſucceſſe he became potent, and was by common conſent of the people (for that he had deliuered them from the ſubiection of ſtrangers) made their Ruler: he died, leauing his eldeſt ſonne, who was called Iudas to ſucceed him in the gouernment. Who fearing leaſt Antiochus would ſtill continue warres againſt him, gathered together an armie of his countrimen, and was the firſt among the Iewes that made a league with the Romanes; and draue back Antiochus Epiphanes at ſuch time as hee enforced himſelfe D once more to inuade the borders of Iudæa, repulſing him with a great ouerthrow. And whereas the remembrance of this victory was yet freſh in mens mindes and memory, he aſſaulted the garriſon of the city: For as yet they were not deſtroied (in which conflict he forced them to forſake the higheſt part thereof, which is called holy) and to betake themſelues into the lower part: and hauing obtained the temple, he made euery place cleane, and compaſſed it with a wall, and made new veſſels for the ſeruice of the temple, and planted them therein, becauſe thoſe that had bin before time conſecrated there, were prophaned. He builded likewiſe another Altar, and began to renue the accuſtomed ſacrifice, and obſerue the rites of religion.

Matthias, confederaced with others, maketh warre againſt Antiochus.

Scarcely was the citie brought to the former eſtate, but Antiochus died; who left a ſonne and E heir behind him, who was not onely inheritour of his kingdome, but alſo of his hatred againſt the Iewes: who hauing gathered together fiftie thouſand footmen, & almoſt fiue thouſand horſmen, and foureſcore Elephants, entred by the mountaines of Iudæa; and tooke a towne named Bethſara, neere which Iudas met him in a place called Bethzacharie, where the paſſage was ſomthing ſtreight: and before the armies ioyned battell, Eleazar, Iudas brother, ſeeing one Elephant higher then the reſt, bearing a great tower on his backe, & adorned with golden furniture, thinking Antiochus had been there, ranne from his company, and breaking the ranks of the enemies, came vnto the Elephant: but he could not reach him (whom he deemed to be the king) hee was ſo highly mounted; for which cauſe wounding the Elephant in the belly, the Elephant fell vpon him, and preſſed him to death: which act of his had no other ſucceſſe but this, that by at- F tempting ſo great a matter, he gaue a manifeſt teſtimonie that hee preferred his renowne, before his life.

Antiochus dieth and leaueth the kingdom to his ſon Antiochus, who gathereth a huge power and inuadeth Iurie. Ant. lib. 12. cap. 14. 15. Eleazar dieth being ſlain by an Elephant.

Now he that gouerned the Elephant was but a priuate perſon, and although by hap Antiochus had been there, Eleazar had atchieued nothing elſe in this valiant attempt; but yet hee aduentured his life vnder hope to performe ſome valiant exploit. And this act of his was a preſage vnto his brother of the euent of the whole war that enſued. obtained the victorie; ſo Iudas therfore after the loſſe of many of his company, fled vnto the Gophonits, with thoſe of his ſide who eſcaped: And Antiochus went to Ieruſalem, from whence after ſome ſtay he departed for want of neceſſaries, leauing a ſufficiēt garriſon; as for the reſt of his armie, he led them for the winter time into Syria. Yet notwithſtanding the kings departure Iudas reſted not: but encouraged by many of his nation, who daily came vnto him, and gathering alſo together thoſe who eſcaped out of the former battell, at a village named Adaſa, hee fought with Antiochus captaines, where after much & many approbations of his valour in aſſaulting & ſlaughtering a great number of his enemies, he himſelfe at length was ſlaine, and within a few daies after, his brother Iohn alſo was betraied, and ſlaine by their treacheries who fauoured Antiochus.

CHAP. II.

Of the ſucceſsion of Princes, from Ionathas vntill Ariſtobulus.

AFter him ſucceeded his brother Ionathas, who carefully ſtudied for the peace and ſecuritie of his people, and fortified himſelfe by the friendſhip of the Romans, & was reconciled to Antiochus his ſonne; yet did none of all theſe things profit him, or acquit him from danger. For the tyrant Tryphon (who was tutor to Antiochus) laying wait for him, and ſeeking to ſpoile him of his friends, tooke Ionathas at ſuch time as he came with a ſmall companie to Antiochus who was at Ptolemais, and binding him, led an army againſt Iudæa: from whence beeing repulſed by Simon, Ionathas brother, and ouercome by him, in diſpleaſure and reuenge thereof, he ſlew Ionathas.

But Simon valiantly beſtirring himſelfe in the gouernment & guide of the affaires of the commom-wealth, tooke Zara, Ioppe, and Iamnia (which were bordering townes:) and ouercoming the garriſon at Accaron, he deſtroied the citie, and aſſiſted Antiochus againſt Tryphon who beſieged Dora, before that expedition which he made againſt the Medes. Yet would not the greedy mind of the king be ſatisfied, notwithſtanding that Simon had thus faithfully ſerued and aſſiſted him in the death of Tryphon; but that within ſhort time after, he ſent vnto Cendebeus (who was the generall of the army) commanding him to ſacke and ſpoile Iudæa, and to take Simon, and make him a ſlaue. But Simon though aged in yeeres, fought both youthfully and valiantly, & ſent his ſons with the moſt reſolute men he had, before, againſt Antiochus, and himſelfe with the reſidue of his army, aſſaulted another quarter of their enemies camp; and hauing laid many ambuſhes euen in the mountaines, hee in euery place was victorious: and after this his moſt famous victorie, he was proclaimed high prieſt, & deliuered the Iewes from the gouernment of the Macedonians, vnder which they had bin 270 yeers. Finally, by the treacherie of Ptolomæus his ſon in law, he was murthered at a banquet; who impriſoning his wife & two ſons, ſent certaine men to kill the third ſon, whoſe name was Iohn, otherwiſe called Hircanus. But the young man vnderſtanding the ſucceſſe of his fathers voiage, haſted vnto the citie accompanied with a great multitude; for hee greatly hoped that the people would remember his fathers proweſſe, eſpecially becauſe Ptolomæus iniquitie was hated of all men; Ptolemæus alſo haſted to enter the citie at another gate: but he was ſpeedily repulſed by the people who had already receiued Hircanus. For which cauſe he preſently retired himſelfe into a Caſtle named Dagon, ſituate beyond Iericho.

After that Hircanus had obtained the office of the high prieſt, which was left him by his father, and had offered ſacrifices vnto God, he led forth his forces with al ſpeed againſt Ptolomæus, hoping to help and deliuer his mother and brethren that were detained priſoners with him: and aſſaulting the Caſtle, notwithſtanding that in all other things he had the better hand, yet was hee ouercome by iuſt griefe and compaſſion. For at ſuch time and ſo often as Polomæus perceiued himſelfe to be in danger, hee brought Hircanus mother and brethren vpon the walles, and beat them where he might behold them in their torments, threatning to caſt them down frō the wall except Hircanus would preſently depart. For which cauſe Hircanus was more moued with compaſſion & feare, then with anger & wrath. But his mother being no waies diſmaied with ſtripes which ſhe indured, nor with death wherewith ſhe was threatned, lifted vp her hands to her ſon, beſeeching him that in regard of her miſeries he would not be moued to ſpare ſo impious a perſon, for ſhe eſteemed her death threatned by Ptolomæus, dearer then immortalitie it ſelfe; if ſo be hee might receiue iuſt puniſhment for the villany which hee had impiouſly committed againſt their houſe. But when Iohn had perceiued the reſolute mind of his mother and heard her intreatie, he was moued to aſſault the Caſtle, & ſtraight way ſeeing her beaten and torne, he relented with

But ſo ſoone as Antiochus had bent his power and forces againſt the Medes, he took hand-faſt of that opportunity he had offred him, to reuenge himſelf, & preſently aſſaulted the townes of Syria, aſſuring himſelfe he ſhould find them (as indeed they were) void of ſouldiers to defend them. Whereupon hee tooke Medaba and Samea, with the places thereunto adioyning; Sichem and Garizim, which border vpon the Chuthæans, who inhabite the places adioyning to the Temple, that is made after the imitation of that which is at Ieruſalem. Moreouer, hee tooke many cites of Idumæa, and amongſt the reſt Doreon, and Mariſa: and comming into Samaria (where now Sebaſte is ſituate, which was builded by Herod) he beſiged it on euery ſide, and left his two ſons Ariſtobulus and Antigonus, to continue the ſiege, who diligently beſieged the place.

Whil'ſt thus fortune fauoured them more and more, they ceaſed not to purſue their good ſucceſſe, but led their army to Scythopolis: and taking it, they diuided and ſpoiled all the country.

THis felicitie and good hap of Iohn and his ſonnes, was accompanied with the enuie of many of his countriemen: and this diſcontent of theirs, was the cauſe of a mutinie. For diuers of the Iewes riſing vp in armes againſt them, were ſo much ouer-ruled by their ambitious paſſion, that they could not containe themſelues from the proſecution of an open and bloudy warre: wherein notwithſtanding they were put to the worſt. From that day forward Iohn paſſed the remainder of his life in all felicitie and happineſſe; and after he had gouerned the common-weale for the ſpace of thirtie three yeeres, he departed this life, leauing behind him fiue valiant ſons. He was a man truly happy, & ſo fauoured by Fortune, that he had no occaſion to complaine of her niggardice in bountie. Finally, he alone might iuſtly boaſt himſelf of three excellent endowments: firſt of all, that he was the Prince of his countrey: ſecondly, that he was high prieſt: thirdly, a Prophet, to whom God ſo ſpake, that he was ignorant of no future accidents: he foreſaw & fore-told that his two eldeſt ſonnes ſhould not continue long in the gouernment (whoſe liues are worth rehearſall, although they much declined from their fathers felicitie) for the eldeſt ſonne Ariſtobulus, after his fathers death tranſlated the principalitie into a kingdome; and was the firſt that put a crowne on his head; foure hundreth, eightie and one yeeres and three moneths, after the deliuerance of the people from the captiuity of Babylon. But the reuenge of this his impietie was this, that hee ſlaughtered his owne brother Antigonus whom hee intirely beloued, and made both a competitor & partner with him in the kingdome. For by reaſon of thoſe ſcandalous ſlanders, which his enuious and malignant courtiers contriued & inuen-

Ariſtobulus (ouermaſtered by brotherly affection) gaue them no credit; the rather for that he was certainly aſſured, that all things for the moſt part which were obiected against him, were rather enforced vpon enuie, then alledged on good ground.

But when as Antigonus returned from the warre, attended with many teſtimonies of his valour and proweſſe, vpon that feſtiuall time, wherein according to the cuſtome of our countrey, wee celebrate the feaſt of Tabernacles; it happened at that time, that Ariſtobulus fell ſick and was diſeaſed. Antigonus therefore about the end of thoſe feſtiuall daies being attended by his armed men, aſcended vp into the Temple to offer ſacrifice, & the rather reſorted he thither in greater pompe and maieſtie, becauſe hee intended to honour his brother. Heereupon, certaine curſed and wicked detractors repaired to the king, buzzing in his eares, that this great guard of ſouldiers which accompanied Antigonus, and that his haughtie reſolution and kingly preſence, was H rather for a ſoueraigne, then a ſubiect: inferring hereby, that he entred the citie in this Equipage, with an intent to murther him, not contenting himſelfe to haue the onely honour of the kingdome, except hee might reduce the power and poſſeſſion thereof into his owne hands. Ariſtobulus though vnwillingly, yet at laſt beeing wonne to believe them, deſirous (in ſeeming not to ſuſpect) to ſhew himſelfe prouident, commaunded his guard to hide themſelues in a certaine obſcure place vnder the ground: as for himſelfe, he tooke vp his lodging in a certaine Caſtle, which in times paſt was called Bari, and afterwards Antonia: giuing his archers this commiſſion, that if Antigonus came vnarmed they ſhould let him paſſe; if otherwiſe, that they ſhould kill him. He ſent certaine meſſengers alſo to Antigonus, requiring him to repaire vnto him diſarmed. But the enuious Queene preuented his good intent of his, by a ſubtill ſtratageme complotted and acted I by thoſe, that with her conſpired against him. For ſhee perſwaded thoſe that were put in truſt to diſcharge this meſſage, to diſcouer nothing of that, which the king had comaunded them: but to ſignifie vnto Antigonus, that his brother hauing intelligence, that he had made himſelfe many accompliſhed & compleat armours, with other faire and worthy furniture for the warre in Galilee (which by reaſon of Antigonus ſodaine departure frō that place & his owne inſtant infirmitie he might not behold) would count it no little fauour & felicitie to behold & ſee him in his warlike ornaments. Which when Antigonus vnderſtood (who by reaſon of his brothers diſpoſition ſuſpected no miſchiefe) he armed himſelfe, and reſorted vnto him, intending to delight and content him with his muſters. But no ſooner arriued hee in the ſtreight which is called the tower of K
Straton, but the guard of Ariſtobulus ſette vpon him, and ſlaughtered him, yielding by this meanes a demonſtratiue & certaine teſtimonie, that detraction diſtracteth & deſtroieth all good nature & friendſhip, and that amongſt all our moſt accounted affections, there is no one ſo defenced and fortified, as may abate the edge of enuie.

At this time alſo who would not wonder at a certaine man called Iudas? who being by birth an Eſſean, was bleſſed with this felicitie in his prophecies, that his predictions were neither touched with miſtaking, nor tainted with lying. This man perceiuing how Antigonus paſſed thorow the temple, cried out to his familiars who attended him in no ſmall number (for ordinarily diuers of his diſciples did attend vpon him:) Ah, how happy were it for mee at this preſent, if I were dead, ſith that truth dieth before me; and ſome one of my predictions are found faultie and L deficient? For behould Antigonus yet liueth, who ſhould this day haue dwelt with death. The place which was deſtinated for his departure is the towre of Straton, which is diſtant from this place ſome ſix hundreth ſtounds, & yet notwithſtanding there are but foure hours of the day to be paſt: now therfore is the time wherein my diuination ſhall be falſified. Hauing ſpoken to this effect, the old man ſate him downe beeing altogether diſconſolate and penſiue, vntill ſuch time as within a while after it was told him that Antigonus was ſlaine in a place vnder ground, which was called the tower of Straton, beeing of the ſame name with Cæſarea which is ſituate vpon the ſea coaſt; which was the occaſion that Iudas ſtaggered in his diuination.

The ſorow which incontinently ſeized Ariſtobulus, for committing this hainous murther, augmented and increaſed his ſickneſſe in ſuch ſort, that his ſoule was continually troubled with the M thought of his ſin, & his body thorow extream heat of paſſion dried vp: & the griefe that he felt was ſo vehement, that his entrailes became exulcerate, ſo that hee voided bloud in great abundance. And it ſo fell out by the diuine prouidence, that one of his ſeruants, who was deputed to that office, bearing out that bloud which came from him, miſſed his way, & came to that place where Antigonus had bin ſlaine, wherin as yet there appeared ſome ſignes & ſtaines of the bloud-ſhed of Antigonus, on which he powred out the bloud of the murtherer Ariſtobulus. Whereupon his eyes were ſuddainly filled with teares, ſo that in vehement agonie of minde, he at laſt cried out & ſaid: It is impoſſible, but that the great eye of the diuine Maieſtie ſhould ſee my wicked acts, & the ſuddaine vengeance of my brothers bloudſhed ſhould purſue and ouertake me. But Alexander after he had recouered this loſſe, inuaded the frontier townes vpon the ſea coaſt, and wan Raphia, & Gaza, and Anthedon, which afterwards by king Herod was called Agrippias. But after he had conquered & ouercome theſe places, the common ſort of the Iewes raiſed a mutiny againſt him during a certaine ſolemne and holy feaſt: for al mutinies and ſeditions are commonly raiſed at banquets: and it is thought that he could not haue preuailed againſt thoſe treacheries, had he not bin aſſiſted by the Piſidians & Cilicians, whom he hired to helpe him; for the Syrians, he refuſed to

After this, he preſently aſſaulted Oboda, king of the Arabians: who hauing laid ambuſhments in the countrey of Galaad, in a place fit for ſuch a purpoſe, diſcomfited him & his whole armie, beeing driuen thence into a deepe valley, where they were peſtered with a multitude of Camels.

For which cauſe giuing ouer his warres, he began to ſeek the peoples fauour by ſweet and mild ſpeeches: but they ſo much hated his inconſtant and variable manners, that when he demaunded of them what he might doe to win their fauours, they anſwered, if he would die, for that ſcarcely they would pardon him if ſo be hee were dead, who had committed ſo many hainous crimes. And therupon the Iewes ſent vnto Demetrius, ſurnamed Acerus for helpe, who in hope of great rewards came and ioyned his forces with the Iewes about Sichem: where Alexander met them both, with a thouſand horſemen & ſixe thouſand footmen, that were encounter Demetrius had the vpper hand (although Alexanders hirelings euidentlie shewed strength and courage.) But the end of this victorie was such as neither partie expected: for they who sent for Demetrius, after his victory did forsake him; and fortune changing her colours, sixe thousand Iewes fledde vnto Alexander into the mountaines, whither for safetie hee had betaken himselfe. This reuolting much displeased and discouraged Demetrius, for hee now thought that Alexander vniting his forces was able to bid him battell, and he feared that all the Iewes would at that present follow Alexander: for which cause hee returned home. Yet the rest of the Iewes hauing thus lost the helpe of Demetrius, would not for al this desist from their rebellion; nay they so long warred with Alexander, till at last (the most of them beeing slaine) he draue the rest into the city of Bemeselin, and when he had surprised and sackt the citie, he led them captiues into Ierusalem. But immoderate anger turned his crueltie into impietie: for hauing crucified eight hundreth captiues in the midst of the citie, he killed their wiues, & the children he massacred before their mothers faces; and this pittifull spectacle hee beheld with pleasure, drinking and making merry with his concubines. Wherat the people were so terrified, that the night after, eight thousand of the contrary part fled out of the country of Iudæa, who staied in banishment during the life of Alexander. Thus, after he had by those actions sought for the tranquillitie of his kingdome, which he obtained not but with long time and great difficultie, he ceased to make warre against his country.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the warre of Alexander with Antiochus, and Aretas, and of Alexandra, and Hircanus.

Alexander feareth Antiochus, Demetrius brother.

After this, Antiochus (who likewise was called Dionysius, the brother to Demetrius, who was the last of all the race of Seleucus) raised vp new broiles against Alexander, who fearing him because he had prepared warre against the Arabians, drew a deepe trench along that ground which lieth betweene Antipatris, and the Sea-coast of Ioppe: and before the trench he builded a very high wall, and raised towers of wood to hinder his enemies passage. But all this could not keepe out Antiochus, but that burning the towers, and filling vp the trenches, he entred & passed ouer them with his forces. And not tarrying at that time to reuenge himself of him who had thus forbidden him passage, he presently marched forward against the Arabians. But the king of Arabia retiring himself into certaine places of his country which were fittest for defence, & returning suddainly to battell with his horsemen (who were in number 10000) rushed hastily vpon Antiochus souldiers, and found them vnprouided: so that a hot skirmish began betwixt them, in which the souldiers of Antiochus, whil'st hee liued, shewed themselues valiant (though they were on euery side massacred by the Arabians) but so soone as he was slaine (who was alwaies ready to assist those that were in danger) all of them fled: and the greatest part of them were slaine in the battell and in flight: as for those that escaped, they fled into the towne of Cana, where they all (except verie few) died for hunger. After this, the people of Damascus beeing incited by the hatred they bare to Ptolomey the son of Mineus, sent for Aretas, and established him king ouer Cœlosyria: who warring against Iudæa, & ouercomming Alexander in battel, retired himselfe vpon composition. Alexander hauing taken Pella resorted once more to the towne of Gerasa, in that he was desirous of Theodorus riches: & took the place, notwithstanding that it was fortified with 3 wals: & that vpon euery wall there was planted a garrison. He tooke Gaulan & Seleucia & that towne which is called the valley of Antiochus. Moreouer, hauing taken Gamala, which was a most strong castle, and imprisoned the gouernour thereof, who was called Demetrius, because he was a wicked person, he returned into Iudæa, after hee had spent three yeeres in warre: where for his prosperous successe he was ioyfully receiued of his nation. But no sooner ceased he from war but he fel sick, and falling into a quartane ague, he thought that hee should driue away his sickenesse, if hee emploied himselfe in some businesse: for which cause being not rid of his disease, he applied him selfe to warre, and labouring aboue his strength, amids those tumults yeelded vp the ghost in the seauen and thirtith yeere of his raigne: leauing the kingdom to Alexandra his wife, fully accounting that the Iewes would in all things obey her, because that shee alwaies by misliking and seeking to hinder his crueltie and iniquitie, had won the harts of the people. Neither was he deceiued; for she being admired for her pietie amongst them, obtained the principalitie: the rather for that she was well acquainted with the customes of her countrey, & euen from her childhood detested

A deteſted them, who violated the holy law. She had by Alexander two ſonnes, the eldeſt was called Hircanus: whom by reaſon of his yeeres ſhe proclaimed high prieſt, & becauſe of his dull nature ſhee thought that though he were in princely authoritie, yet he would moleſt no man: and therefore alſo made him king. As for the youngeſt ſon Ariſtobulus, becauſe he was of a hot ſpirit, ſhe was willing that he ſhould liue a priuate life. The yeare of the world, 3862. before Chriſts birth, 102.

Hircanus firſt made high prieſt, and afterward king.

Now there was a certaine ſect among the Iewes, which were called Phariſees, who ioyned themſelues with the Queene: theſe people were thought to bee of the godlieſt ſort, and to bee more skilfull then other in interpreting the ſcriptures: and for that cauſe Alexandra fauoured them the more, becauſe ſhe was ſuperſtitiouſly giuen to religion. Theſe hauing by little & little inſinuated themſelues into the fauour of a ſimple woman, now did domineere at their pleaſure,
B diſplacing diſpoſing, impriſoning, and reſtoring to liberty whom they pleaſed, for no other purpoſe, but that they might inioy the profits and commodities of the kingdome; and Alexandra bare al charges. This Queene was alwaies deſirous of high attempts, & daily ſtudied to encreaſe her wealth: ſhe leuied two armies, and hired a great many ſtrangers; whereby ſhe did not onely ſtrengthen her owne countrey, but alſo made her ſelfe to be feared of other nations. She ruled others, but herſelfe was ruled by the Phariſees, who at laſt killed Diogenes, who was a gallant man, and highly in fauour with king Alexander; affirming that through his counſell the king commanded thoſe eight hundred before mentioned to be crucified: and further, they perſwaded the Queene Alexandra, that ſhee ſhould put to death all others, through whoſe counſell Alexander her husband had beene incited againſt thoſe eight hundred. The Queen beeing blinded with ſu-
C perſtition, thought it vnlawfull to deny any thing which they requeſted: ſo that they put to death whom they pleaſed, til ſuch time as the chiefeſt of thoſe, who were in this danger, in humble vviſe came to Ariſtobulus, vvho perſwaded his mother to ſpare thē for their dignitie, & baniſh others, whom ſhe thought had deſerued puniſhment: vvho hauing obtained their liberty, diſperſed themſelues through the whole countrey. Now Alexandra ſent an armie to Damaſcus, and becauſe Ptolomeus daily vexed the citie, ſhe tooke it vvithout doing any thing worthy of memory: ſhee did ſollicite Tigranes king of Armenia with gifts and promiſes (who with an armie had beſieged Ptolemais wherein Cleopatra was) but he for feare of troubles in his owne countrey, in that Lucullus had entred into Armenia, withdrew himſelfe from thence.

The Phariſees getting in fauour with the Queene are made her chiefe gouernours, and enioy all honours.

Alexandra willingly obeith the Phariſees.

The Phariſes by their enuie & accuſations are the death of many good men.

Ariſtobulus expoſtulateth with his mother.

In the meane time Alexandra being ſicke, her yongeſt ſonne Ariſtobulus vvith his ſeruants (which were many in number, all truſty, & in the heat of their yong yeares) got all the caſtles: &
D hiring ſoldiers with the mony he found in thoſe caſtles, he proclaimed himſelf king. But Alexandra (pitying the complaints of Hircanus) impriſoned the wife and children of Ariſtobulus in a caſtle neere vnto the North part of the temple, which in olde time was called Baris (as wee ſaid before) afterwards Antonius being Emperour, it was called Antonia, as in like maner Sebaſte and Agrippias other cities, were named of Auguſtus and Agrippa. But Alexandra died before ſhe could reuenge Hircanus of the wrongs which Ariſtobulus had done him. This Queene raigned nine yeeres, and left Hircanus in poſſeſſion of all, whom during her life time ſhe had aduanced to the Kingdome. But Ariſtobulus being both ſtronger in power, and more eſteemed in authoritie, encountred with his brother about Iericho, where many of Hircanus ſouldiers forſaking their E king fled vnto Ariſtobulus: for which cauſe, both he and the remnant of thoſe that followed him, were forced to fly into the caſtle called Antonia, where he found hoſtages to redeem him. For (as we haue already ſaid) Ariſtobulus wife and children were impriſoned in that place: and leaſt any worſe miſhap ſhould betide him, he concluded a peace, vpon condition that Ariſtobulus ſhould be king, and that he as brother to the king, would content himſelfe with other dignities. Vpon theſe conditions they were made friends in the temple, where in the preſence of all the people, they in moſt friendly ſort embraced each other: which when they had done, they changed houſes, and Ariſtobulus went into the kings palace, and Hircanus vnto Ariſtobulus his houſe.

ſwaded Hircanus to fly vnto Aretas king of Arabia, & craue his help to ſet him in his kingdome. G Furthermore, he perſwaded Aretas likewiſe to receiue Hircanus, and to help him to recouer his kingdome, ſpeaking much againſt the manners of Ariſtobulus, and praiſing Hircanus; adding that he being king of ſo famous a nation ought to aſſiſt thoſe who were vniuſtly oppreſſed; and that Hircanus had manifeſt iniury offered him, being forced to forſake his kingdome, which by the right of ſucceſſion was due vnto him. After he had thus made his way, he in the night time took Hircanus and fled with him foorth of the citie: and making all haſte poſſible, they arriued at a town called Petra, with ſafety (which is a towne where the kings of Arabia were accuſtomed to keepe their court) there he deliuered Hircanus into the kings hands, and through many gifts and intreaties obtained the fauour that he might be conducted into his kingdome. And to the effecting of the ſame, Aretas gaue him an army of fifty thouſand horſe and foote: which power ſince Ariſtobulus was not able to reſiſt; hee was ouercome vpon the firſt onſet, and was forced to flie H vnto Ieruſalem: and he had been ſurely taken, if Scaurus a captaine of the Romans by taking opportunity at thoſe troubles, had not raiſed the ſiege. For Pompey the Great (vvho warred againſt Tigranes) ſent him out of Armenia into Syria: vvho comming to Damaſcus, found it newly taken by Metellus and Lollius; who diſmiſſing them from thence, and finding how matters ſtood in Iudæa, haſted thither in hope of a booty. So ſoon as he entred into the confines of the country both of the brethren ſent embaſſadours vnto him, deſiring him to take their partes: but Ariſtobulus hauing ſent him three hundreth talents he neglected to doe Iuſtice; for hauing receiued that ſumme, Scaurus ſent meſſengers vnto the Arabians and Hircanus, threatning the diſpleaſure of the Romans and Pompey, except they would preſently raiſe their ſiege: for which cauſe Aretas being much abaſhed, returned out of Iudæa vnto Philadelphia, and Scaurus repaired vnto Da- I maſcus. Yet ſufficed it not Ariſtobulus, that he had eſcaped from being taken, but that gathering all his forces togither, he purſued his enemies: and ioyning battell with them about Papyron, he ſlew ſixe thouſand of them, in which number was Cephalon Antipaters brother. But Hircanus and Antipater being deſtitute of the Arabians helpe, were driuen to hope for ſuccour euen at their aduerſaries hand. For which cauſe, as ſoone as Pompey after hee had entred Syria came to Damaſcus, they in humble manner came to him, and giuing him many gifts proteſted vnto him that which before they had done to Aretas; earneſtly requeſting him, that he would conſider the violence offered by Ariſtobulus, and reſtore Hircanus to the kingdom: to whom both by yeers and manners it was due. Meane while Ariſtobulus ſlept not, but hauing corrupted Scaurus, came in as royall pompe as hee could; but not abiding to debaſe himſelfe, and thinking it diſparagement in more abiect manner then beſeemed a king to ſeeke his owne commoditie, returned from Dioſpolis. Wherat Pompey being angrie, at the requeſt of Hircanus and his followers, hee went againſt Ariſtobulus, accompanied both with the Roman army and the Syrians, who aſſiſted them. When they had paſſed Pella and Scythopolis, and came to Corea (where the confines of Iudæa begin) as they paſſed thorow the midſt of the countrey, they vnderſtood that Ariſtobulus was fled to Alexandrium (which was a Caſtle richly built and ſituate vpon a very high hill.) Pompey arriuing in that place ſent meſſengers vnto him, commanding him to deſcend; but he becauſe he was called in queſtion about the kingdome, determined rather to hazard himſelf, then obey. But when he ſaw L that the people began to feare; and that his friends willed him to think of the power of the Romans, whoſe ſtrength hee was no waies able to reſiſt; hee allowed their counſaile and came vnto Pompey: where hauing alleadged many reaſons to ſhew that he had iuſt title vnto the crowne, he returned againe into the Caſtle. And afterward being vrged by his brother to come & plead his title, hee came and returned thither againe, without any contradiction from Pompey. Thus wandred he betwixt hope and feare, and doubting how the matter would go with him, he came to Pompey as it were to entreat him to pardon all, and returned againe vnto the mountaine, leaſt hee ſhould ſeeme to derogate any thing from the maieſty of a king; yet becauſe Pompey willed him to depart from his Caſtles and to warne his gouernours therof to do the like (whom he had commanded to diſobey, except they receiued letters written by his owne hand) in this he fulfil- M led Pompeis minde: yet being angrie and diſcontented, he departed into Ieruſalem, and now fully determined to fight with Pompey. But Pompey not thinking it beſt to let him haue time to prepare himſelfe, followed him with all ſpeed, and ſo much the willinger, becauſe that neere vnto Iericho he had news of Mithridates his death, euen in the fruitfulleſt place of Iudæa, where there are great ſtore of palmes and balme. Moreouer, there was a huge ditch before the wall, and hard by he beheld the Temple ſo ſtrengthened, that although the Citie were taken; yet it might be a ſeeond refuge for the enemy. Whileſt thus he long deliberated what to doe, there aroſe a ſedition
B within the citie, wherin Ariſtobulus confederates thought it meet to fight, and deliuer the king out of priſon: but thoſe that fauoured Hircanus would that the gates ſhould bee opened to Pompey. At laſt Ariſtobulus friends hauing the worſt, fled into the temple; and to the end that they might fight it out to the laſt, they cut downe the bridge, by which men goe out of the citie, into the temple. When the reſt had receiued the Romans into the citie, and deliuered vnto them the kings palace, Pompey ſent a captaine called Piſo with ſouldiers to ſeize the ſame; who leauing a garriſon in the towne (ſeeing he could perſwade none of them that were in the temple to peace) prepared all places about it to batter it. All which time Hircanus and his friends ſhewed themſelues readie to helpe them with counſell, and to doe whatſoeuer they were commanded. Pompey
C at the north ſide filled the ditch and valley with all kinde of matter: which his ſouldiers carried, although that by reaſon of the huge depth, and for that the Iewes made reſiſtance, it was a thing hard to be done: and it had beene left vndone, had not Pompey (obſeruing the ſeuenth day, wherin the Iewes religion forced them to abſtaine from all labour) cauſed it to bee filled vpon thoſe daies; forbidding the ſouldiers to fight at that time, to the intent hee might fill the ditch more conueniently (for it is lawful for the Iewes onely to fight for their bodies vpon the Sabbath.) At laſt when the ditch was filled, and the towres were built vpon the rampire, he beat the wals with thoſe engines which hee brought from Tyre; but they were beaten backe by thoſe who reſiſted from the top of the wals, who darted diuers ſtones at them. Againſt the violent power whereof, the towers that were builded in that quarter, being of a great & goodly building, reſiſted as valiantly and as long as they poſſibly could. But the Romans found but hard meaſure in this place, D and Pompey admired the conſtancie of the Iewes; who beeing amongſt the thickeſt of their enemies darts, yet omitted not any ceremonie: but (as though they had firme peace) they euerie day obſerued their ceremonies, offered ſacrifices and offerings, and moſt diligently obſerued all honour and diuine ſeruice: yea in the very taking of the place, although euerie day they were killed at the altar, yet did they not ceaſe frō the lawfull rites of their religion. At laſt in the third moneth of the ſiege, whereas ſcarcely one tower was beaten downe, they brake in o the temple, and the firſt that attempted to climbe ouer the wall was Fauſtus Cornelius Sylas ſonne, and after him two Centurions Furius and Fabius with their regiments; who compaſſing the temple about (while ſome ſought to hide them ſelues, and other ſome reſiſted) they ſlew them all. There were many prieſts alſo among the reſt; who, although they ſaw the enemies with naked ſwords ruſh-
E ing vpon them, yet beeing nothing at all diſmaied thereat, continued ſtill their ſacrifices; and were ſlaine euen whileſt they offered & incenſed in the temple: preferring the duty they ought to religion euen before their owne ſafetie. Many alſo were ſlaine by their owne countrimen that fauoured the aduerſe part: and many caſt themſelues downe headlong vpon the rockes; otherſome in their furie hauing deſperatly fired all things vpon the wals, burned themſelues for company. So that there twelue thouſand Iewes were ſlaine, but very few Romans: yet many were hurt, and amongſt all that maſſacre there was nothing ſo lamentable, as that the holy ſanctuarie (which neuer any man ſaw before that time) was reuealed to ſtrangers. Finally, Pompeius accompanied with his followers, come into the temple, where it was lawfull for none but the high
F prieſt to come, and ſaw the candleſtickes, lamps, table, cenſers, and all the goulden veſſels, and whatſoeuer was within the temple. Moreouer, hee beheld the great quantitie of odoriferous drugges which were kept in ſtore in that place, & two thouſand talents of holy money: yet did he not take away theſe things, nor any thing elſe belōging to the temple. But the day after it was taken, he commanded the Sacriſtans to purge and make cleane the temple, and to offer ſolemne ſacrifice. He likewiſe proclaimed Hircanus high prieſt (who had in all things ſhewed himſelfe very forward, and eſpecially at the time of the ſiege:) as alſo for that hee hindred a multitude of ſwaines (who addreſſed for warre) from ioyning themſelues with Ariſtobulus: and there-

Amongst others that were captiues there was Aristobulus father in lawe, who was also his vncle: as for those that had bin the chiefe cause of these wars, Pompey caused them to be beheaded. He rewarded Faustus likewise, and those who fought valiantly with him, with very rich gifts, & imposed a tribute vpon Ierusalem, & tooke from that nation the Cities which they had gotten in Cœlosyria: & appointed them to be gouerned by him who then was president for the Romans; making them keepe within the bounds of their owne countrey. And in fauour of Demetrius of Gadara (a libertine of his) he reedified Gadara, which the Iewes had destroied: he deliuered the Mediterranean Cities from their gouernment (for they had not as yet destroied them, because they were sodainly preuented) namely, Hippon, and Scythopolis, and Pella, and Samaria, and Marisa, and Azotum, and Iamnia, and Arethusa. And of this place and Iudæa, and of all places from the borders of Egypt vnto Euphrates, hee made Scaurus gouernour, leauing him two legions of souldiers. Which done, hee tooke his iourney to Rome by Cilicia, leading Aristobulus and his family captiues, who had two daughters and two sonnes, the elder whereof called Alexander escaped in the way; as for the younger whose name was Antigonus, he with his sisters was carried to Rome.

Of the warre of Alexander, with Hircanus, and Aristobulus.

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 9.

AT that time Scaurus tooke his iourney into Arabia: but by the difficultie of the place he was so hindred, that hee could not come to Petra, yet wasted he all the countrey adioining to Pella; although whilest hee staied to doe this, he endured much euill: For there arose a great famine in his army, notwithstanding that Hircanus by Antipaters meanes sent them victuals. Scaurus also sent the same Hircanus as his familiar friend vnto Aretas, to perswade him that by disbursing some money, hee should worke his peace. Vpon whose motion Aretas condescended and gaue him three hundred talents, and so Scaurus with his army departed out of Arabia. K

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 10.

In the meane time Alexander the sonne of Aristobulus (who in the way to Rome escaped from Pompey) gathered togither a great army, and desperately set vpon Hircanus; wasting all Iudæa, which hee hoped quickly to winne; yea the wall which was destroied by Pompey at Ierusalem had been builded vp againe as he hoped, had not Gabinius (who was sent into Syria to succeed Scaurus) who had oftentimes before shewed his valour, at that time also with an army come against Alexander. Who fearing the worst, assembled all the forces that hee could to make resistance, so that hee had ten thousand footmen, and a thousand and fiue hundreth horsemen: hee L fortified also the commodious places of the country, to wit Alexandrium, Hircanium, and Machærunt, which were neere vnto the mountaines of Arabia. Gabinius sent Marcus Antonius before him with part of the army, and followed after with the rest; and certaine chosen men out of Antipaters company, and other companies of the Iewes, whereof Malichus and Pitholaus were made chiefe, ioyned themselues with Marcus Antonius; and presently after them followed Gabinius with all his company, who all went to meet Alexander.

Antipater with his forces goeth out to meet Alexander.

But Alexander perceiuing himselfe vnable to encounter with all their vnited forces, fled: but drawing neere vnto Ierusalem, he was constrained to hazard the fight; where losing to the number of six thousand (whereof some three thousand were taken aliue, and other three thousand M slaine) he escaped with the rest. But Gabinius as soon as hee came to the castle called Alexandriū, vnderstanding that many had forsaken their places, he by promising them pardō sought to vnite them vnto him before the warre began: but when he perceiued that they hammered on no abiect resolution, he slew the most of them; as for the rest he shut them vp in the Castle. In this battel captaine Marcus Antonius did many things worthy of renowme, & although hee had alwaies and at all times shewed himselfe valiant, yet there especially his valour appeared. Gabinius leauing some to winne the Castle went vnto the Cities, and strengthened those that were not yet assaulted, and reedified those that were destroied, and by his commaundement Scythopolis and Samaria, and Anthedon, and Apollonia, and Iamnia, and Raphia, and Marisa, and Dora, and Gadara,

What cities the Iewes receiued to inhabite.

A Gadara, and Azotus, and many more began to bee inhabited; so that their inhabitants ioyfully peopled and dwelt therein. Which when he had done he returned to Alexandrium, and began a more vrgent siege: whereat Alexander being terrified and made desperate, he sent Embassadors to him, beseeching him to pardon his offences, promising to render vnto him the castles of Macherunt and Hircanium, which were in his power, and besides them Alexandrium: All which Gabinius by counsell of Alexanders mother destroied, least they might be occasion of new wars. This woman accosted and flattered Gabinius, for that shee feared least her husband & the rest of the captiues at Rome should bee any waies damnified. After this Gabinius carried Hircanus to Ierusalem: and committing the temple vnto his charge, he made others of the nobility rulers of the common wealth, & diuided the whole nation of the Iewes into fiue parts & gouernments,
B whereof one was established at Ierusalem, another at Doris, the third at Amathunt, the fourth at Iericho, the fift at Sephoris a citie of Galilee: & the Iewes being deliuered from the gouernment of one man onely, willingly suffred themselues to be ruled by the nobility. But shortly after, Aristobulus escaping frō Rome raised new troubles: who gathering a great army partly of those that desired a change, partly of them that loued him before, took Alexandrium, & began to compasse it again with a wall: but hearing that Gabinius had sent Sisenna, Antonius, & Seruilius against him with an army, he went to Macherunt; & forsaking those that were not fit for war, he tooke with him almost 8000. armed men, amongst whom was Pytholaus gouernor of them that were reuolted, who with 1000. men fled out of Ierusalē. But the Romans followed & pursued them: & ioining battell with them, Aristobulus with his men fought valiantly, till being by force ouercome;
C the Romans slue fiue thousand of them, and almost two thousand fled into a mountaine; and the other thousand breaking the rankes of the Romans with Aristobulus, were forced to Macherunt; where the king hiding himselfe the first night amongst the ruines, hoped that hauing respite hee might gather another army, & fortifie the castle: but hauing for two daies sustained the forces of the Romans although vnable to doe it; at last he was taken: & with his son Antigonus, who had bin imprisoned with him at Rome, he was carried to Gabinius, and from thence to Rome, and the Senat put him in prison: but his sons they sent into Iudæa, because Gabinius writ that hee had so promised Aristobulus his wife vpon condition the castles might be yeelded. Now Gabinius being prepared to war against the Parthians, Ptolomeus hindred him, who returning from Euphrates went into Egypt, leauing Antipater and Hircanus his friends to dispose of all things belonging to the war: for Antipater helped him with money, weapons, corne, and men, and hee perswaded
D the Iewes who kept the waies that lead vnto Pelusium, to suffer Gabinius to passe. Now in the other part of Syria, at the departure of Gabinius there began a commotion, and Alexander Aristobulus son once more incited the Iewes to rebellion; & hauing gathered a mighty power purposed to destroy all the Romans that were in that countrey: which Gabinius fearing (who was returned out of Egypt at the beginning of these tumults) he sent Antipater before, who perswaded some of the rebels to be quiet, yet 30000. remained with Alexander. For which cause he was very forward to fight, and went out to battell: the Iewes came against him, and neere vnto Itabyrium they fought, where 10000. were slaine, and the rest were put to flight: and Gabinius returned to Ierusalem through the counsell of Antipater: who hauing established that estate, went frō thence E and ouercame the Nabathæans in battel: he likewise permitted Mithridates and Orsanes priuilie to depart, who were fled from the Parthians, saying that they had escaped from the souldiers. In the mean time Crassus who was appointed to be his successor, had Syria deliuered him, who toward the maintenance of the Parthian wars tooke all the golde that was in the temple of Ierusalem, and 2000. talents which Pompeius had foreborne to doe: who passing ouer Euphrates was both himselfe and his whole army vtterly ouerthrowne: of which thing it behoueth vs not to speake in this place. After the death of Crassus, the Parthians endeauoured themselues to enter Syria; but Cassius who succeeded him in the gouernment, repulsed them: and hauing gotten the vpper hand he speedily resorted into Iudæa, & taking Tarichea, he caried away about 3000. men captiues; & put Pytholaus to death, for gathering a company of seditious people vnto Aristobulus his part. He that caused and counsailed his death was Antipater, who was maried vnto a
F noble woman of Arabia called Cypris, by whom he had foure sonnes, Phasaelus and king Herod, Ioseph, and Pheroras, and one daughter called Salome; who sought the friendship of all potentates round about him by courtesie and hospitality, and especially he got the good will of the king of Arabia by affinitie, vnto whose fidelitie he committed his sonnes, because he had vndertaken the wars against Aristobulus. But Cassius made a truce with Alexander, and in the meane time went to Euphrates to hinder the passage of the Parthians, of which we will speake hereafter.

Of the death of Aristobulus, and the warre betweene Antipater and Mithridates.

Ant lib. 14. cap. 14. Cæsar deliuereth Aristobulus from his bonds.

AFter that Cæsar had forced the Senate & Pompey to fly beyond the Ionian sea, and by that meanes made himselfe sole master of all at Rome, he set Aristobulus at liberty, & with two legions of men sent him in haste into Syria, hoping through his meanes speedily to win both it & also al places adioining to Iudæa: but both the hope of Cæsar and the forwardnes of Aristobulus was ouerthrowne through enuy: for he was poisoned by Pompeis fauourites, and euen in his own countrey his body lay vnburied, which notwithstanding was preserued from putrefaction with hony, till such time as Antonius sent it vnto the Iews, commanding them to bury it in the kings sepulcher. His sonne Alexander also was beheaded at Antiochia by Scipio, being first according to the tenour of Pompeis letters accused before the tribunal seat, of such things as he had committed against the Romans. Ptolomæus the son of Minæus, who ruled Chalcis which was vnder Libanus, hauing taken his brethren sen- his sonne Philippio vvith them to Ascalon; and he violently taking away Antigonus and his sisters from the wife of Aristobulus brought them to his father, and falling in loue with the yongest, tooke her to wife: for which cause he was afterward put to death by his father. For Ptolomæus hauing slaine his sonne, married Alexandra; and for that affinitie sake, was more carefull for her brethren. After the death of Pompey, Antipater sought all meanes to get Cæsars fauour: and when Mithridates of Pergamenus was hindred by the garrison at Pelusium to passe any further, with an army into Eygpt, and was by that meanes staied at Ascalon, he perswaded the Arabians to assist him, the rather, because he vvas but a stranger, and he himselfe also seconded him vvith almost three thousand armed Iewes.

Moreouer, he incited the potentate of Syria, & Ptolomæus who inhabited Libanus, & Iamblicus and another Ptolomæus to assist him; for whose sakes the cities of that country did willingly vndertake the wars. And now Mithridates strengthned by Antipaters meanes came to Pelusium, and becausethey would not suffer him to passe, he besieged the city, in which siege Antipater shewed his valour: for making a breach on that side of the wall, where his quarter was, he first of all with his company brake into the citie, and so Pelusium was taken. But the inhabitants of Onias country who were Egyptians & Iewes, suffered him not to passe any further: yet did Antipater handle the matter so discreetly with them, that they did not onely suffer him to passe, but also prouided victuals for his army. Wherupon the citizens of Memphis would not fight, but yeelded of their own accord vnto Mithridates: so that passing through Delta, he fought with the other Egyptians in a place called the tents of the Iewes; & being with al his cõpany in danger, he was rescued by Antipater, who marching along the riuer side, set vpon & discõfited the left wing of the enemies battel, & rushing vpon them that presled vpon Mithridates, he slew many, & pursued the rest that fled till he got their tents, & all with the losse of foure score men. But Mithridates flying lost eight hundreth men, & being against all hope preserued out of those wars, was without all enuy a true witnes before Cæsar of al that which Antipater had both done & deserued. Whereupon Cæsar redoubled his courage with praise & promises vnto him, & made him forward to hazard himselfe for him. In a word he proued & shew'd himself a stout warrior, & hauing many wounds in euery part of his body he bare a badge & testimony of his valour & vertue. Afterwardwhen the state of Egypt was quiet he returned into Syria, where he made him a citizen of Rome, and granted him the immunities therof: & did so honour him in other things & vse him so friendly, that he made him a patterne for all to imitate: and for his sake he confirmed Hircanus in the high Priesthood.

For which cauſe Hircanus who loued Herod, and was willing ſo to do of his own accord, did acquite him. Whereupon, he ſuppoſing that he had eſcaped againſt the kings will, went to Damaſcus vnto Sextus, purpoſing not to obey, if hereafter he were ſent for. Natheleſſe, Hircanus was once againe incited by bad people againſt Herod, who certified him that he was gone away in a rage, and that he would enterpriſe ſomething againſt him: which Hircanus belieuing, knew not what to doe, ſeeing his enemie more potent H then himſelfe.

Hircanus abſolueth Herod.

Hircanus once more incited by the wicked.

Shortly after, Sextus Cæſar proclaimed him Generall of the army, both in Syria and Samaria: ſo that now he was greatly to be feared, not onely for that he was highly in fauour with the cõmunalitie, but alſo for the forces which he cõmanded. So that hereupon Hircanus fell into an extream feare, verily perſwading himeſelf that Herod with his whole army wold preſently come againſt him. Neither was his ſuſpicion in vaine: for Herod angry at the pretẽded crime wherof he was accuſed, came with a great army to Ieruſalem, intending to depoſe Hircanus; which he had effected, had not his father and brother gone foorth to meet him, and pacified him, intreating that he would account that terror (wherin he had put put his enemies) and his owne indignation I for a ſufficient reuenge, & that he ſhold ſpare the king, by whoſe fauour he came to be ſo potent: adding moreouer, that he ſhould not thinke it a diſdaine that he was called to anſwer his accuſations; but ſeeing that he was accquited of them, hee ſhould ſhew himſelfe grateful to the king. Neither ought he ſo to reuenge the diſcontent he had taken, that hee ſhould ſhew himſelfe vnthankfull to him who had ſaued his life. Moreouer, he was to conſider the fortune of warres, together with the cauſe thereof, and thinke that the warres hee now pretended, were very vniuſt; bidding him not to be too confident of the victorie, being to fight againſt his owne king, who had alwaies bin gratious vnto him, and neuer cruell; onely beeing as it were vrged therunto by ſome of his councell, who beeing meerely enuious, rather to ſatisfie their owne miſlikes, then in re- K regard of his diſgraces, framed a ſhadow of an accuſation. Herod pacified heerewith, ſuppoſed it to be ſufficient for him to obtaine the thing he hoped for, to haue ſhewed his forces vnto his nation.

Herod gathering a great army, cometh to Ieruſalem to depoſe Hircanus.

Herod diſſwaded by Antipater from attempting againſt Hircanus.

At this time began ciuill war among the Romans neere vnto Apamia: for Cæcilius Baſſus, for the loue hee bare to Sextus Pompey, ſlue Sextus Cæſar at vnawares, and made himſelfe gouernour of his army: and other captaines of Cæſars, to reuenge his death, made after Baſſus with all their forces; vnto whom Antipater by his two ſonnes ſent aide both for Cæſars ſake that was ſlaine, as for Cæſars ſake that was yet aliue: for he was an entire friend and wel willer vnto them both, and theſe warres continuing long, Marcus came out of Italy to ſucceed Sextus.

By reaſon of which murther their troubles daily increaſed, & the nobility being at variance amongſt themſelues, euery one followed that courſe, that they thought moſt expedient for themſelues. Whereupon Caſsius preſently marched into M
Syria, to take poſſeſſion of the gouernment of the army which was about Apamia, where hee made Marcus and the legions that were at variance, and Baſſus friends: and raiſing the ſiege from Apamia, and leading the army in his owne perſon, he forced euery citie to be tributarie: ſo that he grew to exact without meaſure. Whereas therfore he commaunded the Iewes to contribute ſeauen hundreth talents; Antipater, who feared his diſpleaſure, appointed his ſons, and other of his friends preſently to gather the mony, & eſpecially among the reſt he gaue this charge to one Malichus a friend of his, beeing by neceſſitie inforced thereunto. But Herod firſt of all got Caſsius his fauour, who brought a hundreth talents which hee had collected out of Galilee, which was his part or prouince: for this cauſe Caſsius accounted him as a deere friend. But Antipater (preſently disburſing vnto Caſsius a hundreth talents) ſaued both him and all the reſt of the Cities. Yet Malichus after Caſsius was departed, did no more remember how beneficiall Antipater had been vnto him, but oftentimes did treacherouſly lie in wait for to murther Antipater, who hindred and withſtood his villanous pretence; notwithſtanding that himſelfe had often confeſſed that Antipater had ſaued his life. Antipater, fearing both his power and ſubtilltie, paſſed ouer the riuer Iordan to gather an army that he might reuenge thoſe treacheries. Now for that after the ſurpriſall of Laodicea, all the reſt of the citie came to Herod, bringing gifts and crownes, he appointed this for a fit time of his intended reuenge. Now Malichus, ſuſpecting that Herod would worke reuenge at Tyre, purpoſed ſecretly to get away his ſon, who was there a pledge, and hee himſelfe purpoſed to flie into Iudæa: But deſpaire of his owne ſafetie vrged him to greater matters, for hee hoped to incite the Iewes to take armes againſt the Romans, for that Caſsius was now buſie in the warres againſt Antonius: ſo that hee thought hee might eaſily depoſe Hircanus, and ſo make himſelfe king. CHAP. X.

How Herod was accused and reuenged.

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 20.

AFter Cassius was departed from Syria, there arose another sedition amongst them in Ierusalem: for Fælix came with an armie against Phasaelus, thinking so to bee reuenged vpon Herod for killing Malichus. It chanced that Herod at that time was at Damascus with Fabius a Romane captaine, who comming to assist Phasaelus, by the way fell sick; so that hee could not succour him: but it so fell out that Phasaelus without any help, did of himselfe ouercome Fælix, and therewithall reproued Hircanus as vngratefull, who had bothfauoured Fælix, and suffered Malichus his brother to take and keepe his castles (for already had hee seized many of them, and especially one of greatest strength called Massada) yet all these did not protect him from the violence of Herod, who was no sooner recouered of his sickness, but presently he tooke all the rest, and Massada: and at Hircanus humble sute, permitted him to depart from thence. He also chased Marion the tyrant of the Tyrians out of Galilee, who occupied 3. castles in that countrey: as for all the Tyrians that he tooke, he spared their liues, and sent some away with rewards, wherby he got the good will of the citie, and the hatred of the Tyrant. This Marion was made Tyrant of Tyria by Cassius, who through the meanes of such like instruments had gotten into his hand all Syria: & Marion for the hatred he bare to Herod, tooke with him Antigonus, Aristobulus his son: & by Fabius his meanes, whom Antigonus had gained vnto himselfe for money, he also got Ptolomæus to assist him in this expedition. Now Ptolomæus who was father in lawe to Antigonus, furnished him with all necessaries: Herod likewise preparing himselfe against them, gaue them battell in the entrance into Iudæa, and got the victory: & hauing put Antigonus to flight he returned into Ierusalem, where he was honoured by all men for his desert in that victory, so that euen they that before despised him, by reason of his affinity newly contracted with Hircanus, sought his friendship & familiarity. This Herod long before this time had a wife which was a noble woman of that country, named Doris, & had by her a son named Antipater: but he then married Mariamme, Alexanders daughter, who was Aristobulus his son, & Hircanus his neece, by reason wherof he came to be familiar with the king. But when Cassius was slaine neer vnto Philippi, Cæsar departed into Italy, & Antonius into Asia: at which time the chiefe of the Iewes came and accused Phasaelus and Herod, alledging that they by force got vnto themselues the rule & disposition of the countrey, & left Hircanus onely the bare name of a king. But Herod beeing thē present, so won & wrought himselfe into Antonius fauor by a great sum of money, that he permitted not his enemies to speak one word more; who therupon returned home. Afterward, a hundreth men of the most honorable amongst the Iewes, repaired to Daphne neer Antiochia vnto Antonius (now doting on the loue of Cleopatra) who being chosen frō amongst the rest, because of their eloquence & nobility of birth, propounded an accusation against the two brethren. Messala presented himselfe to return them answer, being assisted by Hircanus by reason of the affinity that was between him & Herod. Antonius hauing heard both parties, demanded of Hircanus whom hee thought to be the fittest to gouern their cōmon-wealth: who answered, Herod & his brethren. Whereat Antonius was exceeding glad (for he had bin their fathers guest, and was most courteously entertained by Antipater, when he came with Gabinius into Iudæa) and thereupon hee made them both Tetrarchs, leauing vnto them the rule of all Iudæa: which when the Iewes Embassadors misliked, he took 15 of them & put them in prison, where he almost killed them, & reiected & derided the rest: wherupon there arose greater tumults amongst them in Ierusalem. At last the Iewes sent another embassage of a thousand men vnto Tyre, where Antonius soiourned with an intent to come to Ierusalem with violence. Antonius hearing their exclaimes, sent out the Magistrates of Tyre against them, comanding them to kill all they could catch of the Iewes, charging them also to confirme their authority, whom he himselfe had constituted Tetrarchs. But Herod & Hircanus went before them toward the sea shore admonishing them earnestly to be contēted, lest they by this their indiscreet proceeding should becom not onely the cause of their own deaths, but also of war against their country: but for that they would not be reclaimed by these admonitions Antonius sent out certaine armed men, who killed many of them, & wounded the rest. Hircanus after this disaster both caused the dead to be buried, and the wounded to be cured: notwithstanding all this, they that escaped would not containe themselues in peace, but they so troubled the citie, that Antonius in his displeasure slue those that he had in hold.

Of the warre of the Parthians against the Iewes: of the flight of Herod and his fortune.

TWo yeeres after this, Barzapharnes gouernour of the Parthians, accompanied vvith Pacorus the kings ſonne, ſeized vpon Syria; and Lyſanias who ſucceeded his father Ptolomæus, ſon of Mineus, promiſing a thouſand talents and fiue hundreth vvomen, perſwaded him to put Antigonus in poſſeſſion of the kingdome of Iudæa, and depoſe Hircanus. Pacorus induced by theſe promiſes, went himſelfe along the ſea coaſt, giuing commaundement to Barzapharnes to paſſe through the midſt of the country; but amongſt the reſt of the places bordering on the ſea, the Tyrians would not receiue Pacorus (notwithſtanding that the citizens of Ptolemais and Sidon had giuin him entertainment) wherfore he gaue part of his horſmen vnto one who was the kings butler, called Pacorus, as himſelfe was; commaunding him to paſſe into Iudæa, and learne what their enemies meant to do, & to help Antigonus where need required. Who as they waſted the countrey about Carmelus, many Iewes came of their owne accord and ioyned with Antigonus, ſhewing themſelues very prompt to fight: for which cauſe he ſent them before to take a place called Drymos; where hauing fought with his enemies and put them to flight, he purſued them with all ſpeed as far as Ieruſalē: & his number beeing augmented, he came vnto the kings houſe. But Hircanus and Phaſaelus met them with a ſtrong company, & fought with them in the market-place: where the enemies were forced to flie, & part of them were by Herod ſhut vp in the temple; and he appointed ſixtie men to keep them, which he placed in the houſes next adioyning: but the people bearing a grudge to the two brethren, burnt them with fire: whereat Herod being angry (for that his men were conſumed with fire) ſette vpon the people, and killed a great many of them, and euery houre one laid wait for another: ſo that euery day ſome was murthred. Now the feaſt of Pentecoſt drawing nigh, all places about the temple, and all the whole citie was filled with people of the country, wherof the moſt part was armed, & Phaſaelus kept the walles, and Herod with a ſmall company kept the kings palace, who aſſaulting their enemies vpon a ſuddaine as they were in the ſuburbs, kild a great many of them, and put all the reſt to flight: part of them he couped vp in the citie, others he ſhut in the temple, and the reſt between the vttermoſt Rampire. Whereupon Antigonus requeſted that Pacorus might com and conclude a peace betwixt them. Phaſaelus moued by theſe his praiers receiued the Parthian into the citie, & entertained him into his houſe, accompanied with 5. hundreth horſemen, who came vnder a pretence to make peace; but in effect he reſorted thither to help Antigonus: he craftilie conſpiring againſt Phaſaelus, perſwaded him to repaire vnto Barzapharnes as an Embaſſador to treat a peace; notwithſtanding that Herod altogether diſſwaded him, willing him to kill the traitor, and not to truſt his ſubtiltie: adding that the Parthians were naturally vnfaithfull.

Pacorus departing out of the citie, tooke Hircanus with him that he might bee the leſſe ſuſpected, & leauing ſome horſemen with Herod named * Eleutheri, he followed Phaſaelus with the reſt. When they came neer vnto Galilee, they found the inhabitants at variance and vp in armes, and met with Barzapharnes (who craftily with pretence of courteſie and friendſhip hid his treacherie) who after hee had beſtowed gifts vpon them, and that they were retired, laid an ambuſh for them: wherof they had intelligence at ſuch time as they came to a place of the ſea coaſt named Ecdippon. For in this place they vnderſtood of the thouſand talents that were promiſed, & how that Antigonus had giuen the Parthians more then fiue hundreth women of thoſe that were amongſt them, and that oftentimes they had been laid wait for, and that they had been latelie taken, but that delay was made till ſuch time as Herod was ſurpriſed in Ieruſalem, for feare leaſt he hearing what was becom of them, might prouide for himſelf. Now they might perceiue that theſe were not only words: for they might behold their keepers not far off, yet would not Phaſaelus forſake Hircanus, notwithſtanding that Offilius often exhorted him to flie (vnto vvhom Saramalla the richeſt among the Syrians had declared all the platform of their treaſō:) but he chooſe rather to go vnto Barzapharnes, & to vpbraid him to his face that hee had treacherouſly laid wait for him: but eſpecially for that in regard of mony he had ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted, wheras he himſelfe wold haue giuen more for his life & liberty, then Antigonus had done for the kingdom. Herod is laid for to be betraied.

In the meane time a butler was ſent out for that purpoſe, who ſought to ſurpriſe Herod, & by ſome ſtratageme to toule him out of the Citie, who wrought by all the meanes he could, according as he was inſtructed. But Herod, who was alwaies wont to miſtruſt the perfidious practices of barbarous nations, being certaine that thoſe letters which diſcouered the treaſons, were fallen into the enemies hands, would not goe foorth; though Pacorus pretended a iuſt cauſe, inciting him to ride out and meet them that brought the letters: wherein was contained neither the taking of Phaſaelus, nor the treaſons, but onely vvhat Phaſaelus had done. But long before this, Herod by others vnderſtood, that his brother Phaſaelus was taken; and Mariamme a very vviſe vvoman, Hircanus daughter, vvith many intreaties perſwaded Herod not to goe forth: but that hee ſhould beware how he truſted himſelf to the mercy of that barbarous people, who did now as it H were openly aſſault him. Whil'ſt Pacorus was conſulting with his accõplices how he might priuilie effect his treaſons (ſeeing it was not poſſible openly to circumuent a man of ſo great vviſedome) Herod in the night time whil'ſt his enemies neither knew nor ſuſpected his intent, took his neereſt kinsfolke & fled into Idumæa: vvhich beeing once knowne, the Parthians followed him. For which cauſe, he made his mother, his brethren, and the young maiden deſpouſed, and her mother and youngeſt brother to keep on their iourney, and he with his ſeruants warily aſſaulted the Parthians; and hauing in euery aſſault killed a great number of them, hee haſted towards the Caſtle of Maſſada, and in his retreat ſuſtained more harme by the Iewes, then by the Parthians: who as they had bin alwaies troubleſome, ſo now ſome threeſcore furlongs from the towne, ſet vpon him; where Herod obtaining the victorie, killed a great many of them, and in remembe- I rance of that valiant act, hee builded vpon that place a moſt rich palace for the king, and erected there a moſt ſtrong tower, which by his owne name he called Herodium. And when he fled many ioyned with him: but vvhen hee came to Threſa, a towne of Idumæa, his brother Ioſeph met him, and perſwaded him to leſſen the number of his followers: for Maſſada vvould not receiue ſuch a multitude (for the number of the multitude was aboue nine thouſand:) for vvhich cauſe Herod according to his counſell diſmiſſed thoſe that were vnfit for his turne, & ſent them into Idumæa, giuing them neceſſaries for their iourney. As for thoſe that vvere choſen men & fit for his purpoſe, he retained them vvith him, and ſo vvas he receiued into the Caſtle: vvhere leauing eight hundred ſouldiers to defend the women, and prouiſion ſufficient for thoſe that were with- K in, he himſelfe vvent vnto Petra, a citie of Arabia.

Now the Parthians at Ieruſalem began to ſack the houſes of them that were fled, & the kings palace; they onely abſtained from Hircanus mony, vvhich did amount to more then three hundred talents: as for other mens goods they found not ſo much as they expected; for Herod long before that time ſuſpecting the infidelitie of the Parthians, had caried all his riches & iewels into Idumæa; & euery one of his followers did the like. When the Parthians had taken the ſpoile, they were ſo impious that they left no place of the whole countrey free frõ their tyrannous war. They deſtroied the citie of Marſa alſo, and bound Phaſaelus and Hircanus, and deliuered them to Antigonus to be ſcourged, who preſently with his teeth bit off Hircanus eares, to the end that if by ſome alteration he chanced hereafter to get looſe, he might be no more high prieſt: for none L might offer ſacrifice that wanted any member of his body. But Phaſaelus his fortitude preuented the crueltie of Antigonus; who hauing neither weapon nor his handes at libertie, beat out his owne braines againſt a ſtone and died, demonſtrating himſelfe by that act, to be the true brother of Herod, and that Hircanus had degenerated: hee died manfully by a worthy death, and anſwerable to ſo famous a life. Yet ſome reported that hee recouered after that hurt, and that Antigonus ſent a Chirurgion vnder pretence to cure the wound, who filled the ſame with venemous medicines, and ſo killed him. Well, be it as it was, it was in him a gallant reſolution.

It is reported likewiſe, that vnderſtanding before his death by the meanes of a certaine vvoman that Herod vvas eſcaped, he ſpake theſe words: Now I ſhall die with a courage, who leaue behind me one that will take vengeance of my enemies, and ſo he died. Although the Parthians M had not yet receiued the women (which was the chiefe thing they lookt for) yet leauing them, they eſtabliſhed Antigonus in Ieruſalem, and led Hircanus priſoner into Parthia. But Herod vvith all ſpeede haſted into Arabia, as if his brother had beene yet aliue, to the intent hee might borrow money of the king of Arabia, wherewith onely hee hoped that the crueltie of thoſe barbarous Parthians might be mitigated towards Phaſaelus: for his opinion was that although the Arabian had now forgot his fathers friendſhip and were hard harted, yet at leaſt hee would lend him

Phaſaelus words before he died.

The Parthians eſtabliſh Antigonus king.

A him money seeing it was to redeem his brother, whose son he meant to leaue in pawn for it. For Herod took with him a son of his brothers into Arabia that was seuen years old, and purposed to haue giuen three hundreth talents for his ransome, and had made the Tyrians intercessors for him to the Parthians: but fortune preuented his endeuours, so that his loue and care for his brother preuailed nothing. He found also that the Arabians had now cast away the league of amity: for Malichus their King sent to him as he was yet in the way, charging him with all speed to depart out of his dominions, framing an excuse that the Parthians had sent Embassadors vnto him, to request him to driue him out of his country; but indeed the cause was, that he would not repay that which Antipater had deserued, nor recompence his sonnes now comfortless, for those good turnes that he had receiued at their fathers hands: and those who counselled him to this, were such as offered to forswear those summes, which Antipater had put them in trust with, who were the chiefest men about him. For which cause, Herod perceiuing the Arabians to be his foes, for that which he thought would haue procured him friendship, answered the messenger according as griefe moued him, and took his iourney towards Egypt: and the first night he lodged in a countrey temple, to the intent that those of his company that were behinde him might ouertake him. The next day comming to Rhinocolura, his brothers death was told him; where, after he had there mourned his fill, he went forward.

Herod perceiueth the Arabians to be his enemies.

Now the King of Arabia (though too late) repented himselfe of that which hee had done to Herod, and sent speedy messengers after him, to will him to returne, repenting himselfe that hee had so iniuriously intreated him. When Herod was come to Pelusium, the watchmen of the citie C would not permit him to passe: for which cause he himself in person went to the gouernors, who reuerencing the fame and dignity of the man, conducted him to Alexandria; whither he no sooner resorted, but Cleopatra receiued him very honorably, intending to make him the generall of her army which she was preparing at that present. But he neither regarding the offers & request of the Queen, nor yet discouraged by the hard winter season, nor the dangers of the seas, tooke his iourney towards Rome; and being in great danger of shipwrack neer vnto Pamphilia, both he and the rest of the passengers were inforced to cast away the most part of their loading: with much adoe he arriued safe at Rhodes, which had been sore molested by Cassius wars; there was he intertained by certaine of his friends, Ptolomæus and Sapinius: and although his money grew scant, yet there he builded a great galley with three ranks of oares, and in it (being accompanied D with his friends) he sailed to Brundusium, and from thence went presently to Rome. Where first of all (in regard of familiarity between his father and him) he went to Antonius, declaring vnto him both his own calamity, and the miserable desolation of the whole countrey; and how leauing his deerest friends besieg'd in a Castle, himself in humble maner through the stormy winter seas was come vnto him, humbly craving succour at his hands. Whereupon Antonius compassionating his calamity, and remembring his familiarity with Antipater, and contemplating the vertue of Herod who stood before him, determined vpon the present to make him king of the Iews, whom before he himselfe had made Tetrarch: for he loued not Herod so well, but he hated Antigonus as much: for he held him both for a seditious person, and for an enemy to the Romans. Now to the accomplishing of this, he found Cæsar farre more ready then himselfe, who called E to mind the seruice that Antipater did in Egypt vnder his father, and his entertainment & friendship in all things: and beside all these, hee was wrought and won by Herods courage and valour. For which cause, he procured the Senate to be assembled; at which time Messala and after him Aratinius in the presence of Herod recounted his fathers deserts & fidelity towards the Romans, declaring Antigonus to be an enemy; not only because that not long before he had reuolted, but for that now lastly in despite of the Romans hee had by the assistance of the Parthians vsurped the kingdome. Vpon which considerations the Senat being moued, and Antonius affirming it to be expedient for the Roman warres, that Herod should be created King, the whole Senate condescended: and after the Senate was dismissed, Antonius and Cæsar went forth with Herod between them, and the Consuls went before accompanied with other Magistrates to offer sacri- F fice, and to register the decree of the Senate in the Capitoll. And Antonius feasted Herod the first day of his raigne.

CHAP. XII.

Of Herods warre after he returned from Rome to recouer Ierusalem, and against the theeues.

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 23. Antigonus getteth Massada.

AT this time Antigonus besieged those that were left in the castle of Massada, who had great store of victuals, and wanted nothing but water. For which cause Iosephus Herods brother purposed to flie vnto the Arabians with two hundreth of his deerest friends, for that hee had intelligence that Malichus repented him that he had giuen Herod no better entertainement. Yea hee had forsaken the Castle, had not great store of raine fallen that very night, wherein hee intended to flie: for the wels and cisterns being now filled with water, there was no cause to flie: so that voluntarily issuing out of the Castle, he assaulted Antigonus souldiers, and killed very many of them; sometime in open warre, and sometime by policy: yet fought they not alwaies with fortunate successe, but returned sometimes with losse.

The wars between Antigonus soldiers & Ioseph, Herods brothers.

In the meane time, Ventidius (who was General of that Roman army which was sent to expulse the Parthians out of Syria) after he had repulsed them resorted into Iudæa, vnder pretence to succour Ioseph and the rest that were besieged, but in effect to get Antigonus money. When as therefore he drew neere vnto Ierusalem and had receiued the mony he looked for, he departed with the greatest part of his army, leauing Silo behinde him with a few to colour his pretence: and Antigonus hoping for a second supply from the Parthians, fee'd Silo not to molest him for the present, seeing hee was in great possibility. By this time Herod hauing sailed from Italy to Ptolemais, and gathered a great army of strangers and his owne countrimen together, came into Galilee against Antigonus, being assisted with the forces of Ventidius & Silo, whom Delius who was sent from Antonius, perswaded to establish Herod in his kingdome. But Ventidius was busie in appeasing the broiles that the Parthians had made in the cities, and Silo was corrupted by Antigonus: yet did not Herod want aide, for euery day the further he marched into the country, the more his army increased, for all Galilee (a very few excepted) yeelded vnto him. Whereupon he purposed first of all to go to Massada, to deliuer his friends that were there besieged, but Ioppe hindered his purpose; which for that it was an enemy towne, he thought it best to take it before he went further, lest that whil'st he was going to Ierusalem, his enemies should haue a place behind him to fly vnto. Now Silo ioyned armies with Herod, reioycing that hee had found occasion to resist, because he was persecuted by the Iewes; whom Herod with a loose wing of his army and a small company of men, terrified, and presently put to flight, and saued Silo also who had much adoe to make resistance against them. This done and Ioppe taken, he hasted to Massada, and the people of the countrey (some of them for his fathers sake, other some for his owne, and many for both) ioyned themselues vnto him: many also came vnto him for hope, because he was now King; so that now he had a very puissant army: but Antigonus hindred his iourney, by planting certain ambushes in places conuenient where Herod was to passe, and yet for all this he little harmed him.

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 24. Herod against Antigonus.

Herod intendeth, after he hath taken Massada and Ioppe, to besiege Ierusale.

Herod hauing easily taken Massada, and rescued his friends from thence, he went to Ierusalem; where both Silaes souldiers, and many of the Citie came and followed him, being now terrified with the greatnesse of his forces: there pitching their tents at the west side of the towne, they that guarded that part assaulted them with darts and arrowes; and others issuing by troupes foorth of the Citie, assaulted the forefront of the army. Whereupon Herod caused one to goe about the wals of the Citie, and to proclaime how that he was come for the good of the whole Citie, and that he would not take reuenge of any, though hee were his open enemy; and that he would pardon euen them that had been most seditious. But when Antigonus his followers with loud exclamations hindred the cryers voyces from being heard, least any man should alter his minde: Herod presenly commanded his men to beat the enemies off from the wal; who with their arrowes speedily forced all that were in the towers to fly. At this time Silo was detected to haue been hired with money: for he sollicited many souldiers to cry out, that they wanted all things; and to aske money and victuals, and to craue to be dismissed and sent into some place of opportunity, there to abide during the winter, nay hee himselfe sought to bee gone. But Herod went vnto the captaines that serued vnder Silo, and called many of the souldiers together, requesting them not to forsake him at that exigent, whom Cæsar, Antonius, and the whole Senate as they knew had sent thither, promising them that within one day he would relieue all their necessities. When he had thus entreated them, himselfe went about the fields, and brought them

A so much prouision that he cut off all Siloes excuses: and forecasting least hereafter there should be any want, he sent letters to Samaria (for that citie about this time had rendred it selfe vnto him) willing them to bring victuals, and wine & oyle, and cattell vnto Iericho. Antigonus hearing this, presently sent certain of his men to lie in ambush in the fields, & suddenly to set vpon those that came for prouision, and kil them, & so hinder them from carrying any victuals to the camp: who obeying his commandment, went with a great number of souldiers to Iericho, & placed themselues vpon the mountains, with an intent to espy if any body carried prouision to the army. In the meane time Herod rested not; for taking with him ten companies (fiue of the Romans, and fiue of the Iewes, amongst whom were mixed three hundreth that were hired, and besides them a few horsemen) he came to Iericho, where he found the citie without inhabitants, and 500. with
B their wiues and families had placed themselues vpon the tops of the mountaines; whom when he had surprised, he permitted them to depart. But the Romans brake into the citie, and sacked it, where they found the houses stored with all maner of riches: and the King leauing a garrison at Iericho, returned. He sent likewise the Roman souldiers to the cities which were on his side, to wit, Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria, that they might abide there till winter was past. Antigonus also through Silo his meanes (whom he by money had made his friend) obtained that a part of his army might (during the winter time) abide at Lydda, for Antonius sake: and the Romans being now discharged from the warres, abounded in all things.

Herod accompanied with ten troups commeth to Iericho.

The Romans got a great prey.

All this time Herod was not idle, for accompanied with two thousand foo men and fiue hundreth horse, he went about Idumæa, & sent also his brother Ioseph, least by Antigonus his meanes
C the people should rebell. And he himself hauing carried his mother and the rest of his kindred, whom he tooke from Massada, into Samaria; and hauing placed them where no danger might betide them; himself went into Galilee, to subdue that part of the country, which as yet was not in his hands, and to expell from thence the garrisons left by Antigonus. And when he was come to Sephoris, notwithstanding it stew mightily, he easily took it; for the garrison before he assaulted it fled; and finding there great store of prouision, he refreshed his souldiers, which now with winter weather were sore tired, and then sent them against the theeues, that lay lurking in dens and caues; who making often incursions vpon the country, molested the inhabitants no lesse then if they had been an army of enemies. And sending before three companies of footmen, and one troupe of horsemen, into a village called Arbela, himselfe forty daies after came thither with
D the whole army. For all this the theeues feared him not, but arming themselues, came to meet him, trusting to to their experience in warlike affaires, and their owne desperate courage: and ioyning battell, the right wing of their battell put the left wing of Herods to flight: but he with his right wing presently succoured them, and recalled his men that fled; and rushing violently vpon his enemies, he a little asswaged the forces of the enemy, till at last the forefront of their battell, not able to stand any longer, fled. Herod pursued them euen vnto Iordan, and killed many of them; those that escaped fled ouer the riuer; and thus he freed Galilee from that feare; saue that yet he had left some lurking in the caues, and therefore he was constrained there to make a longer abode. Wherefore first of all hee gaue the souldiers the fruit of their labours, and distributed to euery one of them an hundreth & fifty drachmes of siluer, and vnto the captains more,
E and so sent them where they should passe the winter. Also hee writ vnto his youngest brother Pheroras to prouide necessaries for them in the market; and to build a wall about the castle of Alexandrium: which he performed.

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 24. Herod taketh the citie of Sephoris.

Herod setteth forth against the theeues.

In the meane while Antonius passed the time about Athens, and Ventidius sent for Silo and Herod to assist him in the warre against the Parthians, charging them, that before their comming they should settle the estate of the Iewes. Now Herod gladly & willingly sent Silo vnto Ventidius: and in the meane time he with his army went against the theeues in the caues. These caues were
M in very steepe mountaines, so that there was no way to come vnto them, saue onely by crooked and very narrow passages: and these mountains were all rocks of stone cleane throughout, hanging ouer the vallies; so that the King a great while was doubtfull what to do, seeing the place
F was so difficult to come to. At last, Herod deuised a way scarcely heard of before; for he put the valiantest of all his men into coffers, and so let them downe into the edge of the caues, and they killed the theeues and their families, and cast fire at them that resisted. And Herod seeking to saue some of them, caused a cryer to bid them come vnto him: but there was not one that willingly came vnto him, and those that were forced chose rather to die, then to be his captiues. So that an old man hauing seuen sons and a wife, who all requested that they might goe forth to the King, and saue their liues, killed them all after this manner. Himselfe stood before the doore of the caue, and bade them come forth one by one, & alwaies as one of them came forth he killed him. And Herod being in a place where hee might behold this spectacle, being moued with compassion stretched forth his hand and requested him to spare his children: but hee being nothing moued to compassion by Herods words, vpbraided Herods base mind: and hauing butchered his sons, he also killed his wife, and casting the dead bodies down into the vallies, finally he cast himself likewise downe headlong. G

Herod hauing thus taken the caues, and slaine those that were in them, leauing a part of his army, so much as he thought might suffice to represse any that should attempt any rebellion, and making Ptolomæus chiefe ouer that part, returned into Samaria, carying with him three thousand footmen, and six hundreth horsemen against Antigonus. After whose departure those that were accustomed to trouble Galilee, and molest it, hauing now (as they thought) opportunity, assaulted Ptolomæus at vnawares & killed him: and wasted the country, retiring themselues into marish grounds & secret places. Which when Herod vnderstood, he presently came to succor the countrie, and killed the most part of the enemies, and hauing taken all the castles by force, he exacted a hundreth talents for recompence of that reuolt to be paied by the cities. Now the Parthians being put to flight, and Pacorus slaine, Ventidius being willed thereto by letters from Antonius, sent vnto Herod a thousand horsmen, and two legions of footmen to assist him against Antigonus. Now Antigonus writ letters to the generall of the foresaid company named Machæra, desiring him to help him, and complaining that Herod iniured him, promised him a summe of mony. But he thinking it not best to forsake him hee was sent to succor, especially seeing that Herod would giue more, would not bee suborned by him: yet counterfaiting himselfe to bee Antigonus his friend, meaning vnder that pretence to creep into the knowledge of his secrets, which not regarding Herods counsel he went to discouer, notwithstanding that Herod disswaded him from it: But Antigonus perceiuing his intent, shut him out of the citie, & like an enemy draue him away from the walles, till such time as Machæra was ashamed of that he had done, and so returned to Amathunt vnto Herod. And being in a rage that things fell out against his expectation, hee killed all the Iewes he found, not respecting whether they fauoured Herod or Antigonus. Herod heereat was moued, and thought to be reuenged vpon Machæra as vpon an enemy, yet he bridled himselfe and hasted to Antonius to let him vnderstand Machæras cruelty. Machæra remembring how he had offended, followed the King, and with many entreaties besought him to be friends, and obtained it. Yet Herod kept on his iourney to Antonius, and hearing that hee was now with a great armie besieging Samosata (which was a very strong citie neer vnto Euphrates) he made the more haste, thinking it now a fit time to shew his vertue, and that hereby he might win Antonius fauour the more. So soone as he came to Antonius he ended the siege, killing a great number of enemies, and had for his labour a great part of the spoile: and Antonius though before that he admired his vertue, yet then was his opinion encreased, so that he had a greater hope of his honor and attaining to the kingdome. So Antigonus was constrained to render the Citie.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the death of Ioseph: how Herod besieged Ierusalem: and how Antigonus was slaine. L

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 25.

IN the meane season Herods affaires in Iudæa went backward: for hee left his brother Ioseph gouernour of all, commanding him to doe nothing against Antigonus till his returne. For hee little trusted to Machæras helpe, because of the parts hee had plaied before. But Ioseph vnderstanding his brother to bee farre off, not regarding what charge was left him, went to Iericho accompanied with fiue companies which Machæra sent with him, thinking now in haruest time to haue taken away their corne: but being assaulted by the enemy vpon the mountaines and in difficult places, himselfe was there slaine, shewing himselfe in that fight a worthy & valiant man: and there was not one left aliue of all the Roman soldiers, for they were all newly gathered out of Syria, and they had no old soldiers amongst them to assist them who were ignorant in warfare. Antigonus not contented with the victory became such a tyrant, that hee caused the dead corps of Ioseph to be scourged: and hauing the dead bodies in his power, hee cut off Iosephs head, although Pheroras his brother offered fifty talents to redeeme the same. M

After Antigonus had obtained this victory, there was such a change in Galilee, that those who

A who fauoured him, tooke the chiefeſt of Herods fauourites, and drowned them in a pond. Alſo there aroſe a great change in Idumæa; where Machæra repaired the wals of a certaine Caſtle called Githa. All this while Herod heard nothing of the newes; for after Samoſata was taken, Antonius made Soſius gouernour of Syria, leauing order with him, that hee ſhould helpe Herod againſt Antigonus, and ſo he departed into Egypt. Soſius ſent two companies of ſouldiers with Herod into Iudæa to help him, and hee himſelfe with the reſt of the army followed. When Herod was at Antiochia neere Daphne, his brothers death was manifeſted vnto him in a dreame: And whileſt he was troubled thus, ſo that hee leapt out of his bed, euen at the ſame inſtant the meſſengers who brought tydings of his death, entred into the houſe: and weeping a little for griefe, as it were deferring his ſorrow till another time, hee went towards his enemies; ſo that he
B haſted aboue his ſtrength. When hee came to Libanus, hee tooke eight hundreth inhabitants of that mountaine to helpe him, and ioyned vnto them one of the Romane legions; and not expecting the day time, with them he entred into Galilee, and meeting with his enemies, hee forced them to fly vnto the place from whence they came: and euery day he aſſaulted their Caſtle: But before he could take it, being wearied with cruell winter, he was conſtrained to lead his armie into the next village. Within a few daies his number being increaſed by one other legion which Antonius ſent, he put his enemies in ſuch a feare, that they in the night time fled and forſooke the Caſtle. And now he haſted to Iericho to be reuenged vpon thoſe that killed his brother: where there befel him a moſt ſtrange accident, from the which being againſt all hope deliuered he perſwaded himſelfe that God bare an eſpeciall loue vnto him. For when many no-
C bles that night had ſupped with him, ſupper being ended, and euery one being gone forth, incontinently the houſe wherein he ſupt fell downe: Herod took this as a Præſagium both of the dangers and proſperous ſucceſſe hee was to haue in his warres. And the next morning early hee remooued from thence, and about 6000. of the enemies deſcending from the mountains aſſaulted the vantguard, but they durſt not ioyne battell with the Romans, but moleſted them ſtanding afarre off with ſtones and darts, and they wounded many: ſo that alſo Herod himſelfe paſſing along, was wounded in the ſide with a dart. Antigonus deſirous to ſhew himſelfe moſt potent, as well in multitude of men, as alſo in courage, ſent Pappus a friend of his with an army into Samaria, who there got the victory of Machæra. Herod went about the enemies country and tooke there fiue townes, and deſtroied two thouſand of the inhabitants, and firing the houſes, he returned to D his army neere vnto a village called Cana.

Herod certified of his brothers death in a dreame.

Herods dining roome fell after he had forſaken it, and gone to bed.

Euery day there came flocking vnto him a very great number of Iewes, both from Iericho and from other parts of the countrey, ſome of them hating Antigonus, other ſome louing Herod for his valiant deeds: for many without any reaſon deſired an alteration. Whileſt thus hee haſted to fight, Pappus with his men neither fearing the multitude, nor ſtrength of their enemies, came fiercely vpon them, and offered battell. The battell being begun, the others a while abſtained, only Herod remembring his brothers death ventured more then the reſt, to the end to be reuenged vpon them that were the authors therof: and ſo he eaſily ouercame the enemies army; and ſtill aſſaulting the freſh men, hee put them all to flight. There was a mighty ſlaughter: for many being forced to fly into the village from whence they came, he purſued them and ſlew an E infinite number. Laſtly, ruſhing amongſt the enemies that fled, he brake into the village, where all the houſes were full of armed men, and euery houſe toppe full of men to defend it: and becauſe he eaſily ouercame thoſe that were abroad, he ouerthrew the houſes, and ſo forced them that were within to come foorth. Others hee killed in companies with the ruines of the houſes wherein they were; and if any one chanced to eſcape, the ſouldiers without that were already armed, with ſwords kild them: ſo that there were ſuch heaps of dead bodies, that they who had the victory could not paſſe thorow the ſtreets for them. The enemies were ſo diſcouraged with this ouerthrow, that the whole multitude of them (ſeeing thoſe that were ſlain in the village) fled away: and Herod by the benefite of his good fortune had euen then come to Ieruſalem, had not winter ſtormes hindred him, which was the onely cauſe that he at that time got not a full con-
F queſt; and that Antigonus was not vtterly ouerthrowne, who thorow feare and deſperation was purpoſed to leaue the Citie. But Herod towardes night hauing giuen his friends leaue to depart to reſt their wearie bodies, being himſelfe heated with his armour, after the manner of ſouldiers went to waſh himſelfe, accompanied onely with one Page. And before hee came to the bathe, one of his enemies met him hauing a ſword drawne in his hand; and then another; and afterwards a third; and after them more: and theſe eſcaped out of the battel, and came to the bath to hide themſelues; and ſeeing the King there, they were ſore affraid, and ſought to hide thēſelues, and so passed by him being astonished and amazed, although the King at that time was naked G and weaponlesse: and in so much as none were present there to surprise them, they escaped; and Herod was very well contented that hee had no harme by them. The next day after, hee beheaded Pappus who was the Generall of Antigonus his army, and sent his head to his brother Phero- ras; who was ruler of his army, in reuenge of his brother that was slaine: for Pappus was he that slew Ioseph.

Herod beheadeth Pappus Antigonus captaine. Antiq. lib. 14. cap. 12.

The winter being past, hee with his army came to Ierusalem, and besieged it, pitching his tents before the temple, where it was easiest to take the Citie, and where before time Pompey had entred it (which was about the third yeare after Herod was made king in Rome.) Now when he had quartered his army as he thought best for his purpose, and cut off the suburbs, he caused three rampiers to be raised, and towers to be builded vpon them: and leauing there his trusty H friends that would not slack their busines, he went into Samaria to visit his betrothed which was the daughter of Alexander, who was son to Aristobulus, who (as we before made mention) was despoused vnto him: and he wedded her euen in the time of the siege, as who should say, now he contemned his enemies: after his mariage rites were performed, he returned to Ierusalem with a farre greater army: Sosius also seconded him with a great army of footmen & horsmen, whom he sent before him through the midst of the country; and he himselfe came after by Phœnicia.
Now when all his whole army was assembled together, to the number of about some 11. legions of footmen, and six thousand horsmen, beside the Syrians that came to helpe him, which were no small number, he laied his assault and battery to the northermost wall, and the rather because he thought himself warranted by the decree of the Senate, whereby he was declared to be King. I Sosius also was warranted by Antonies letters, whereby he commanded him to help Herod with all the army that was vnder his gouernment. Mean while those Iewes that were within the citie were diuersly troubled: for a multitude of the weaker sort, gathering themselues together about the Temple, grew to this resolution, that whosoeuer should fortune to die in this attempt should bee most happy and beloued of God. But those who were hardiest amongst them, ioyning themselues together, robbed and took away from the rest what they could, but in especial they tooke victuals from that part that was next the citie: so that they neither left meat for horses nor men, and the valiantest of them all being set to defend the wals against those that besieged them, hindred the aduersary from erecting their rampiers, so that they still found some new deuice to hinder the force of their engines; neither did they any waies preuaile so much as by their mines K which they made. As for the theeues, the King fought to represse their incursions by placing an ambush of men to intercept them; by which meanes he relieued the want and scarcity of victuals, by fetching prouision from places farre distant: But notwithstanding they in their fight failed in no sort to expresse their incredible valour; yet did that military experience which the Romans had, ouer-master them by ods. Natheless, notwithstanding the imminent danger wher-in they were plunged, they fought with them in open field: but where it chanced that the Romans by digging two seuerall mines, brake all at once into the midst of them; yet suddenly repaired they the breach that was made in the wall, and fortified the other part therof. In a word, they neither spared hands nor engines, but were all of them determined to fight it out euen vnto
the last cast: and although they were besieged with so huge an army, yet they defended the town L from them fiue moneths, till such time as certaine of Herods chosen men valiantly scaling & clearing the wals, brake into the Citie, and after them Sosius his Centurions. Those places that nee-rest adioyned the temple were the first of all that they intercepted, and the whole army entring
the citie, it was lamentable to see how in euery corner the people were massacred: for the Romans being displeased that the siege continued so long time, became more cruell, and Herods army endeuoured to let no one of the aduerse part escape. By which meanes many were slaine, both in the narrowest places of the streets, as also in their owne houses: yea euen then also when they fled into the temple, without respect of age or womanhood. For although the King intrea-ted the soldiers to spare the people: yet for all that, they neuer restrained their cruell hands, but like madmen they raged against all; men, women, and children. At that time also Antigonus nei- M ther respecting his former condition, nor his present estate, came & prostrated himself at Sosius his feet, beseeching him to be mercifull vnto him; but Sosius nothing compassionating his calamity, cruelly derided him, and called him Antigona: yet did he not permit him to depart free as a woman, but put him in prison.

A holy veſſels therein: but he reſiſted them, appeaſing ſome by threatnings, reclaiming others by force, and the reſt by intreaties, ſuppoſing that it had been better for himſelfe to haue been conquered, then by obtaining the victory, to miniſter a means whereby thoſe things ſhould be diſcouered which were not lawfull to be reuealed. Hee therefore preſently repreſſed the ſouldiers from ſacking the citie, inueying much againſt Soſius, & obiecting againſt him, that the Romans would deſolate the citie both of men and mony, and leaue him King of a place without ſubiects: adding further, that he eſteem'd not the Empire of the whole world to be a recompence for ſuch a maſſacre of his citizens. Hereunto Soſius replied, that in equity the ſouldiers were to haue the ſacking of the towne, in recompence of that labour they had ſpent in the ſiege. But Herod gaue him this anſwer, that he had rather recompence euery man out of his own treaſury; and by this
B meanes he redeemed as it were the reliques of his deſolate countrey: and in the end performed that which he had promiſed. For he bountifully rewarded euery ſoldier and captain, according to his merit, and gaue Soſius a kingly reward; ſo that no man went away without money. This done, Soſius dedicated a golden crowne vnto God, and ſo departed, leading Antigonus captiue with him, to the end to preſent him vnto Antonius. This man deſirous to continue his life, and entertaining himſelfe with this cold hope euen vntill the laſt, receiued in the end that reward which his faint heart deſired, and was beheaded.

Herod being now King, made a diſtinction betweene the citizens; and thoſe who had fauoured him, hee vſed very honourably, and put thoſe to death who had followed Antigonus: and when money failed, he diſtributed all his kingly ornaments, and ſent them to Antonius and his
C company. Yet did he not quite redeeme himſelfe from all annoiances: for Antonius being now captiuate through Cleopatra her loue, in all things yeelded vnto her deſire: and Cleopatra hauing raged ſo againſt her owne kinred, that ſhee had not left one of them aliue, now turned her furie vpon ſtrangers, and accuſing the nobilitie of Syria vnto Antonius, ſhee perſwaded him to put them to death, that ſhe might thereby the eaſier obtaine their poſſeſſions. Afterward, her couetous minde ſought to effect the like againſt the Arabians, and the Iewes alſo: inſomuch that ſhee ſecretly went about to cauſe the kings of thoſe places, Malichus and Herod, to be put to death. Antonius made a ſhew as though he would haue granted her requeſt; yet he thought it great impiety to kill good men, and ſo great kings: yet notwithſtanding, hee no more accounted them his friends, but tooke a great quantity of ground from the limits of both their countries, and a vine-
D yard in Iericho, where Balme grew; and gaue her all the Cities on this ſide the riuer Eleutherus (Tyre and Sidon onely excepted.) Now when ſhe had obtain'd the dominion of theſe cities, ſhe followed Antonius vnto Euphrates, who ſet forward to make war againſt the Parthians, and afterward by Apamia and Damaſcus ſhee came into Iudæa: where Herod, hauing ſomething pacified her angry mind with great gifts, obtained to pay her yeerly two hundreth talents for that part of his country, which Antonius had giuen her; and ſeeking by all meanes poſſible to get himſelfe an intereſt in her fauour, he conducted her vnto Peluſium: and not long after, Antonius returned out of Parthia, and brought Artabazes, the ſon of Tigranes, captiue, and gaue him to Cleopatra: for all the money and riches which he had got, and the captiues likewiſe, were beſtowed on her.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the treacherous practice of Cleopatra againſt Herod: of Herods warre againſt the Arabians, and of a very great earthquake.

ABout ſuch time as the Actiacum war was afoot, Herod prepared himſelfe to attend Antonius; ſeeing for the preſent all troubles were pacified in Iudæa, and he had already got the caſtle of Hircanion, which Antigonus ſiſter had in her poſſeſſion. But Cleopatra craftily preuented him in this his iourney; ſo that he could not go with Antonius: for F ſhe deſiring the ruines of both the kings (as was before mentioned) perſwaded Antonius that he ſhould cauſe Herod to make war againſt the Arabians: whom if he ouercame, then ſhe ſhould be made Queen of Arabia; and if ſo be himſelf were ouercom, then ſhe ſhould be queen of Iudæa: intending hereby, that one of theſe potentates ſhould ruinate the other. But this practice of hers was greatly to Herods gaine: for firſt of all making head againſt thoſe of Syria that were his enemies, with all the power of horſemen he could make, which was very many, and meeting them at Dioſpolis, he ouercame them, though they valiantly reſiſted: who hauing the ouerthrow, ſtir-

red vp a mighty army of the Arabians to help them, ſo that an infinite company was gathered together about Cœloſyria, expecting the Iewes neere vnto a citie called Canatha. Where King Herod meeting them, purpoſed not to fight vnaduiſedly, but to compaſſe his owne army round about with a wall: but his army remembring their former victory, would not be counſelled, but violently aſſaulted the Arabians, & at the firſt onſet put them to flight. Herod purſuing his enemy was greatly endangered by the treaſon of the inhabitants of Canatha (who were ſet on by Athenio, that was one of Cleopatras captains, who had alwaies born him ill will) for the Arabians encouraged by their help, returned again to battell; and they two ioyned their forces together, & ſet vpon Herod in ſtony & difficult places, and put his army to flight, and ſlew many of them: and thoſe that eſcaped fled into a little village hard-by, cald Ormiza; where the Arabians cõpaſſing them about, took both the men & their tents with all their furniture. Not long after this ouerthrow of Herods ſoldiers, he came & brought help, but too late, & to little purpoſe: but the cauſe hereof was, for that the captaines of his army would not obey his commandement: for if they had been obedient, Athenio had not had opportunity to work him that iniury; yet was he reuenged vpon the Arabians, and daily made incurſions vpon their borders, and ceaſed not to inuade and ſpoile them, vntill by many, he had cried quittance with them for their one victory.

The Arabians deſeat Herods army.

The Actian warre between Antonius and Auguſtus.

While thus he purſued his enemies, a great calamity befell him in the ſeauenth yeare of his raigne, and in the midſt of the Actian warre: for about the beginning of the ſpring time, there chanced a great earthquake, which ſlew an infinite multitude of beaſts, and thirty thouſand people: yet the army had no harme, for it lay in an open place. With the report hereof the Arabians were highly encouraged (for ſuch as report an euill occurrent, doe alwaies redouble the miſery thereof in relating it) for which cauſe, the Arabians, making account that all Iudæa was ouerthrowne, and that there was no man left aliue to reſiſt them, entred into Iudæa, aſſuring themſelues to conquer the countrey: and before their comming, they ſlew the Embaſſadours of the Iewes that were ſent vnto them. Herod, perceiuing his countrimen terrified by the ſuddaine approach of their enemies, and not onely broken, but wearied with the greatnes & continuance of their calamities, rowſed vp their drouping ſpirits that were tired with ſuſpect, and encouraged them on this wiſe. I ſee no reaſon of your preſent feare, neither do I admire, that you were terrified with the puniſhment of Gods indignation: but it is a cowardly minde to be daunted by the comming of your enemies, who are but men; and whoſe violence, if your ſelues pleaſe, yee may repreſſe. For mine owne part, I am ſo farre from being diſcouraged by the approach of my enemies, that I rather think that God hath of his prouidence ſent this earthquake as a bait to allure and incite the Arabians to inuade vs, to the end, that through our meanes he may puniſh them: for the cauſe that moueth them to aſſault vs, is, not the truſt they repoſe in their owne valour and great armie, but it is our miſery that inuiteth them. Yet who knowes not that the hope is fruſtrated that is founded not vpon a mans priuate vertue, but vpon another mans misfortune? There is nothing aſſured in humane affairs, in reſpect either of proſperous ſucceſſe, or aduerſe fortune, which a man may perceiue to alter vpon all occurrents: as we our ſelues may witnes by our own experience. For in the firſt conflict ye ouercame; in the ſecond ye were ouercome; and now the third time (for ought I can coniecture) they, thinking themſelues ſure of the victory, ſhall by vs be ouercome: for they who miſdoubt nothing are raſh in their proceedings, whereas they that are fearefull and timorous, prouidently ſeeke to preuent their dangers: ſo that I am encouraged to hope for victory euen by your feare.

Another calamity of Herods.

Herods oration to his diſmaied ſouldiers.

Feare giueth confidence.

For when as you were too confident, and againſt my will and direction ruſhed in vpon your enemies, Athenio found opportunity to hurt vs: but now ſith I perceiue in your mindes a certaine remiſneſſe and a forecaſt, it is an euident token vnto mee of aſſured victory. It behooueth you therefore not onely before the conflict to continue your accuſtomed mindes, but alſo in the conflict to ſhew that yeare men, armed both with hearts and hardineſs; to the end, that our impious enemies may well ſee, that neither anie humane calamitie, nor diuine puniſhment can daunt the courage of the Iewes, whil'ſt the breath is in their bodies: and that neuer a one of you all will ſuffer the Arabians to domineere ouer your goods and poſſeſſions, whom manie times you haue almoſt made your ſlaues. Bee not therefore terrified with this motion of a body that hath no ſoule: neither yet perſwade your ſelues, that the earthquake portendeth any maſſacre; for euen the elements themſelues by their owne nature are ſubiect to ſuch defects, and portend no other miſhappe, but that which they bring with them. Perhaps the plague and famine, and earthquake haue ſome tokens demonſtrating them before they come: but when they are once come, they ſignifie nothing elſe; but at laſt end, and ceaſe of themſelues. But ſay we ſhould

A be ouercome, can war enforce more harme against vs, then the earthquake hath done? Truely, it is an euident token of our enemies ruine, and that by their owne cause, who most cruelly, contrary to the law of all nations, butchered our Embassadors, offring to God such sacrifice for the good successe of their wars. They cannot hide themselues from the sight of God, and from his mighty power, but presently they shall feele punishment for their offence, if filled with the courageous spirit of our nation, we be stird vp to reuenge that impious violating the law of all nations, and so euery one march on to fight, not for his wife and children, or country; but to reuenge the murther of our Embassadors: who will lead our army, and knowe better then we that are aliue to direct the same. For mine owne part (if you will bee ruled by me) I will be the first that will lead you, and will hazard my selfe for you: for you know ful wel, that if your valour be not
B eclipsed by some headlong rashnes, there is nothing that may make head against you.

After he had by these or such like perswasions sounded his souldiers, and found them in some sort encouraged therby, he offred sacrifice to God. And presently after, with all his army he passed ouer Iordan: and pitching his tents at Philadelphia, not far from his enemy, he made a shew to assault a Castle that was between them and him, and so skirmished with them afarre off, desirous to draw them to the battell: for the enemies had sent to intercept the castle, but Herods forces gaue them the repulse, and in despight of them kept the hill. Thus euery day made he an offer to fight, brauing the Arabians: & seeing they would not come to the shocke (for they were in great feare, and Athemus their generall for very feare was ready to giue vp the ghost) hee assaulted them in their trenches, and cast down their rampier, so as they were constrained to come
C forth to battell, without any order; and their horsemen and footmen were confusedly mixt together. And although the Iewes in number were inferiour vnto them, yet they were inferiour to the Iewes in courage; yet they became now more hardy, because they despaired of the victory: and so long as they stood to it, they had no great losse: but when they turned their backes, then many were slaine by the Iewes, and many perished being troden on by their fellows. Those that escaped, were forced to retire themselues into their trenches, where Herod besieged them: and although they were all ready to be put to the sword, yet was there such penury of water, that for drinke they were all like to perish. For which cause, they sent Embassadours to the king, offring him fifty talents to let them go: but he contemned them, and so much more earnest was he, by reason that their want of water was so great, that comming out by flocks of their owne accord,
D they offred themselues to the Iewes: so that in this sort there came forth foure thousand in fiue dayes, and the sixt day the whole multitude (despairing of their liues) came out to fight, with whom Herod conflicting, slew about seauen thousand. Hauing in this sort weakned the Arabians, that he had now extinguished all their strong men, the countreymen admired him, and were so much daunted at his puissance, that they wished him for their Ruler.

E IN continent after this his prosperous successe, there did betide vnto him a sea of cares and griefes, in respect of the loue which he bare vnto Antonius, whom Cæsar had now lately ouerthrowne at the battell which was fought at Actium: yet was hee more affraid then hurt by this his suspicion: for Cæsar accounted not Antonius fully conquered, so long as Herod and hee kept together. Wherefore, the king timely foreseeing those dangers that might ensue, went to Rhodes, where at that time Cæsar abode: in which place, in the habite of a priuate man, and without a crown, but with a kingly courage, he presented himselfe before him, and with vnfained constancy spake vnto him in such manner as followeth; I was, O Cæsar, made king of Iudæa by Antonius his meanes: and I must confesse, that I haue beene a king, who, what in mee lay, haue serued his turne, and sought his profit: yea, I must not deny, but that (had not the Arabians
F hindred mee) I had with all the power I could haue made, seconded and assisted Antonie against thee: yea, although personally I could not go, yet did I what I could to help him, and sent him many thousand measures of corne. Nay, though he had the ouerthrow at Actium, yet did not I forsake him, who had deseru'd wel at my hands; & althogh I was not able to assist him with force of armes, yet I confirmed him by my counsell the best I could, inculcating oftentimes vnto him, that there was one onely way to redresse his aduersity, to wit, by the death of Cleopatra; whom if he killed, I promised him to assist him with money, strong holds, and an army; yea, and with mine mine owne person against thee: but the loue of Cleopatra, and God who had already designed the victory vnto thee, stopped his eares. For which cause, O Cæsar, I am conquered with Antonius, and haue forsaken my crown & dignity with his fortunes: & I am come vnto thee, hoping that at thy hands I may obtaine pardon. To this Cæsar answered: Liue in safety, and raigne now with greater securitie then before; for thou deseruest to rule others, who with such constancie didst defend and maintaine thy friendship. At this time endeuour thy selfe to continue faithful toward them that are more fortunate then Antonius was: for, for my part I haue conceiued a great hope and expectation of thy valour and prowesse; yet did Antonius well, in that he rather obeied Cleopatra then thee: for by his follies haue we now purchased thy friendship. That thou hast begun to do well, it hereby appeareth, because Ventidius hath signified vnto me, that thou hast sent him succours against his enemies. For which cause, by this my present decree, be thou established in thy kingdome, and I will shortly let thee know, that I wil be beneficial vnto thee: so as thou shalt haue no cause to bewaile the losse of Antonius. By this speech he exhorted the king not to misdoubt of his friendship, and withall put a crown vpon his head, and made a decree, and sealed it, testifying how he had remitted all things done by Herod, and confirmed him in his kingdom, and rehearsed many things therein, greatly tending to Herods praise. Herod (hauing first pacified Cæsar with many gifts) requested him to pardon Alexander, one of Antonius his friends, who earnestly and in humble manner desired the same: but Cæsar being very angry, answered, that hee for whom he entreated, had greatly and many times offended, and so repeld Herod with this answer.

Cæsars answer to Herod.

Herods gratulation toward Cæsar.

Afterward, Cæsar, trauailing into Egypt through Syria, was entertained by Herod with all royall pomp possible: and that was the first time that hee shewed himselfe to take part with Cæsar, when neere vnto Ptolemais he took a view of the souldiers with Cæsar, and made a banquet for him and all his friends, and feasted the whole armie likewise. And in as much as he trauailed to Pelusium through dry grounds, when they returned againe, he prouided water for them, & furnished the army with all necessaries: so that both Cæsar and the souldiers thought the kingdom a small recompence for his deserts. For which cause, after he came into Egypt, and that Antonius and Cleopatra were now dead, hee did not onely increase his honour, but also restored vnto him that portion of his country which was taken away, and giuen to Cleopatra: and besides that, Gadara, and Hippon, and Samaria, and other cities, about the sea-coast; to wit, Gaza, & Anthedon, and Ioppe, and Stratons tower: and moreouer gaue him foure hundreth Galathians, which before were Cleopatra her guard: and there was nothing that so much moued Cæsars liberalitie, as the courageous minde of him vnto whom he was so liberal. After the first Actian solemnitie, he added vnto Herods dominion Trachon, and Batanæa, and Auranitis bordering vpon it. For this cause Zenodorus (who for money hired Lysanias his house) continually sent theeues out of Trachon to robbe the people of Damascus: who in humble maner went to Varus (who was at that time gouernour of Syria) entreating him to informe Cæsar of their calamity. Cæsar, vnderstanding thereof, writ back againe, commanding him to extinguish all the thieues: whereupon Varus with an armie went to those places which were most suspected, and rid the countrey of the theeues, and tooke the territorie from Zenodorus: and Cæsar (least it should againe bee a refuge for theeues to spoile Damascus) gaue it to Herod, and made him ruler ouer all Syria. And tenne yeeres after, returning to his owne countrey, hee commanded the gouernours to doe nothing without Herods counsell: and after Zenodorus his death, hee gaue him all the countrey betweene Trachon and Galilee. But that which Herod esteemed aboue all the rest, was, that Cæsar lou'd him best of all next to Agrippa: and Agrippa loued him most of all men next vnto Cæsar. Thus now he touched the very top of felicity: and so increasing in high mind, he imploied himselfe chiefly to piety.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Cities and buildings reedified and built by Herod, and of his liberalitie towards strangers, and of his felicity.

The yeare of the world, 3947. before Christs Natiuitie, 17. Ant. lib. 15. ca. 10. 12. 13 14 Herods buildings.

IN the fifteenth yeer of his raigne hee repaired the Temple, and enclosed twice so much ground as was before about the Temple with a strong wall, wheron he bestowed great costs and charges to beautifie it: as the great porches will testifie, which hee built about the Temple, and a Castle on the North-part thereunto adioyning, which he built euen from the foundation. The Castle was so rich and sumptuous, that it was equall vnto the kings palace, and

A in the honour of Antonius, he named it Antonia. He builded himselfe also a palace in the vpper part of the City, and in it two houses, huge, and richly adorned: so that the Temple was not to be compared vnto them. And calling them by his friends names, he tearmed one of them Cæsarea, and another Agrippa; whose names and memories he did not onely solemnize, and write in his priuate houses, but also throughout the whole country, and in euery part of the city. For in the countrey of Samaria he compassed a towne with a wall, which was about twenty stounds, and called it Sebaste, and he sent thither six thousand inhabitants, giuing them a most fertil soile and demeasnes. There also amongst other buildings, he erected a very huge temple, and dedicated it to Cæsar, and gaue the inhabitants of that place especial priuiledges. About the temple was there a piece of ground containing three stounds & a halfe. For this monuments sake, Cæsar added vnto his dominion another country; for which cause he erected another temple vnto him, neere vnto the head of Iordan, of white marble, in a place called Panium, where there is a mountaine rising an infinite height into the aire, at the side whereof there is an obscure valley, where there are high rocks, that (by drops of water falling on them) are made hollow: so that the water, standing in their concauity till they run ouer, falleth downe with a stream of such a length as is admirable. At the foot of this valley on the out-side, there spring certaine fountaines, and many think this to be the head of the riuer Iordan; which, whether it be true or no, we will declare hereafter.

The yeare of the world. 3947. before Christs birth. 17.

The fountain-head of Iordan.

At Iericho also (betweene the castle of Cyprus, and the other ancient kings houses) he erected other buildings, fairer & more commodious for them that came thither, calling them after the
C names of his friends. Finally, there was no conuenient place in the whole kingdome, wherein he erected not some thing in honour of Cæsar: and hauing in euery place of his own kingdome deuised and dedicated temples vnto him, he in Syria also where he ruled did the like, founding in very many cities, temples, which he called by the name of Cæsar. And perceiuing, that amongst the cities of the sea coast, there was one called Stratons tower, which, being very old, was ruinated; and for the situation thereof deserued reparation and cost: he repaired it all with white stone, and built a very roiall palace therein, wherein chiefly he shewed a mighty minde. For this city standing in the midst betweene Dora and Ioppe, there was no port or hauen in that coast: so that whosoeuer sailed from Phœnicia into Egypt, were in great danger, by reason of the violent windes that blew frō Africa, which blowing but a very easie gale, inforce the water with such a
D violence against the rocks on the shore, that the waues, rebounding back again a good way within the sea, make the whole sea tempestuous. But the king, with his liberality and cost ouercomming nature, builded a port or hauen in that place, far bigger then that of Piræum, and within it made most safe stations for ships. And although the nature of that place was altogether contrary to his intent, yet he so ouercame that difficulty, that the sea could do that building no harme: and it was so gallant and beautifull to behold, as though there had bin no let any way to hinder the adorning thereof. For hauing measured out such a place (as we haue spoken of) for the port, he laid a foundation in the bottome twenty elles deep of stone, whereof most of them were fifty foot long, nine foot thicke, and tenne foot broad, and some bigger; and all the bottome of the hauen where the water came, was laid with these stones. Which done, he raised a wal of two
E hundreth foot; whereof a hundreth foot was builded to breake the violence of the waues, and had a name according to the vse it serued for. The other hundreth foot serued for a foundation of the wall whereof the hauen was compassed, which was repleniished with many goodly towers; the greatest and faireſt whereof he named Drusius, after the name of Cæsars kinsman. There were very many vaults also to conduct such things into the towne as were brought into the hauen, and about them a paued place for them to walk in, that came out of the ships: The entrance therunto was on the north side; for by reason of the situation of the place, the north-wind there is the calmest.

Herod makes a greater port then that of Piræum.

An apt description of a hauen.

Before the entrance were 3 great colossus held vp on euery side with pillers: they which are on the left hand, are propt vp by a tower being a solid rock of stone. But at the entrance on the right
F hand were two huge stones ioind together, which make a greater tower then the other. There is also a house adioining vnto the hauen built of white stone: The streets of the cities comming to that place, are of one bignes & proportion. Vpon a hill opposite to the mouth of the hauen, was there builded a temple very beautiful and exceeding great, which he dedicated to Cæsar, wherin was placed Cæsars colossus, fully as great as Iupiters at Olympus: for it was made after that example, equal to that at Rome, & that of Iunoes at Argos. The city he builded for the inhabitants of that prouince, and the port or hauen for seafaring men. The honour and credit he attributed to Cæsar, and by his name called it Cæsarea. He also made other buildings, as the Market, the Theater, and the Amphitheater, which are worth the memorie. And he euery fift yeere ordained certaine sports, and called them after the name of Cæsar. And himselfe first proposed very ample rewards in the 192 Olympiade; in so much that he not only gaue roiall gifts to the victors, but also to the second & third after them. He repaired Anthedon also, which was destroied by the wars, and called it Agrippium: and loving Agrippa very dearly, he caused her name to be engrauen ouer the portall hee builded in the temple. Neither was he vnmindfull of his parents: for in the richest soile of the whole kingdom he built a city for a monument of his father: and by his name called it Antipatris, being a very rich soile, both for trees and riuers. At Iericho also he built a very gorgeous and strong castle, and called it Cyprus, in honour of his mother. Hee likewise built a tower in memorie of his brother Phasaelus, at Ierusalem, and cald it Phasaelus his tower (of the compasse and beauty of this tower we will speak hereafter.) He also called another city Phasaelus, which is situate in a valley beyond Iericho, toward the north.

Hauing thus eternized the memorie of his friends and kinsfolk, hee did not forget to doe the like to himself: for he built a castle on a mountain neer Arabia, hauing on one side a strong place of defence, and this castle he called Herodium after his owne name. By the same name also hee called a tomb, which he builded sixtie stounds from Ierusalem, artificially made in manner of a womans dug, which hee richly adorned: for within compasse of the top of it, hee caused round turrets to be placed: & round about it he builded princely houses, gallantly adorned both within and without. He also brought water from a great way off, with great cost & charges, and made a paire of stairs of pure white marble, to go vp, which had two hundreth steps. For the whole hil was made by art, and it was made of an exceeding height: at the foot thereof likewise hee built another palace, and houses to receiue his friends and their cariages: so that this castle, for the abundance of all necessarie places, seemed a city, and yet was it all the kings palace. Hauing erected thus many buildings, he shewed his braue mind in strange cities likewise: for at Tripolis, and Damascus, and Ptolemais he builded publike bathes, which are called exercises. He builded the wall of Biblus; and seats, porches, temples, and markets at Berytus and Tyre: at Sidon and Damascus he builded a Theater, and a water-conduit at Laodicea, a sea-towne. At Ascalon he built fountaines or lakes very sumptuous, and bathes with pillers, that for greatnes and gallant worke were miraculous. To other places he gaue woods and ports: and to many cities he added fields, as though they had been fellow-cities of his kingdome. Also, toward the maintenance of bathes he gaue a yeerly annuitie for euer: as namely, to those at Cous, to the intent hee might be an eternall benefactor. Moreouer, he gaue all poore people corne; and hee often and in sundry places gaue the Rhodians money to build a nauie of ships. At his owne proper cost he repaired Pythium, which was burnt with fire. What should I say of his liberality which he extended to them of Lycia and Samia? or the magnificent gifts which he vsed toward all the people of Ionia; yea, all things that their hearts could desire: whereby he relieued all their necessities? Nay, both the Athenians, and Lacedemonians, and Nicopolites, and the citizens of Pergamus in Mysia, receiued very many benefits at his hands. He paued also a large street in Antiochia of Syria, which was in length twenty stounds, and that with faire marble. This street before that time was so full of durt, that no man could go through it; and all along it hee built galleries, that people might go dry through it in rainy weather.

Some one may say, that these benefits he thus bestowed, were done for the proper vse of those people on whom he bestowed them: but no man can deny, but that which hee did for the citizens of Elis, was not onely common to those of Achaia, but to all the world, where the games, called Olympica Certamina, were solemnized. For, Herod seeing them decay onely for want of maintenance, and that this was the onely remainder of all the ancient monuments of Greece, he not onely in his person at that time became one of the proposers of rewards in that Olympiade which he assisted when hee went to Rome; but also gaue a yeerely stipend to maintaine the same, lest for want it should be left off. It is not to be told what debts and tributes he remitted; for he deliuered the Phasaelites & Balaneotes, and other townes of Cilicia, from the paiment of a yeerly tribute: yet was he not so liberall to them as he would haue been, fearing lest the enuy of some might accuse him of some further meaning, if he should be more bountiful to the cities then those that were the owners thereof. He exercised his body likewise in exercises fit for so valiant a mind: for he was a very skilful hunter, wherin he had alwaies his purpose, by reason of his skill in riding; so that in one day he kild forty wilde beasts. That country hath many Boars, but it hath more store of Harts & wilde Asses. He was such a warriour as no man was able to encounter

CHAP. XVII.

Of the diſagreement betweene Herod and his ſonnes, Alexander and Ariſtobulus.

B BVt his priuate and domeſtical ſorowes ſeemed to enuy him his publike felicity, and moſt aduerſe fortune befell him through the means of a woman, whom he loued as himſelfe. For being now made King, he put away his wife, which he firſt maried (which was a Ladie borne in Ieruſalem, whoſe name was Doris) and maried Mariamme the daughter of Alexander, who was Ariſtobulus ſon, which cauſed troubles in his houſe, both before, but eſpecially after he returned from Rome. For he baniſhed his eldeſt ſon Antipater, whom he had by Doris, out of the citie, only for his childrens ſake that he had by Mariamme, licenſing him only at feſtiual times to come vnto the citie in regard of ſome ſuſpicion of treaſon intended againſt him. And afterward he ſlew Hircanus his wiues vncle (notwithſtanding that hee returned out of Parthia vnto C him) becauſe after he ſuſpected that he intended ſome treaſon againſt him; whom Barzapharnes, after he had taken all Syria, took away priſoner with him. But his owne countrimen that dwelt beyond Euphrates, in commiſeration redeemed him from thraldom; and had he bin counſelled by them and not come vnto Herod, he had not bin killed: but the mariage of his neece cauſed his death: for, for that cauſe, & eſpecially for the loue of his natiue ſoil, he came thither. That which moued Herod to kill him was, not for that he ſought the kingdome, but becauſe he had right vnto the kingdom. Herod had fiue children by Mariamme, two daughters, and three ſons. The youngeſt was ſent to Rome to ſtudy, where he died. The other two he brought vp like Princes, both for their mothers nobility ſake, and for that they were borne after he was King. But that which aboue all other was moſt forcible, was the loue hee bare to Mariamme, which from day to day D tormented him more violently, in ſuch ſort, that he felt not any part of thoſe griefes which this his beſt beloued enforced againſt him. For Mariamme hated him as much as hee loued her: and hauing a iuſt cauſe and colour of diſcontent, and moreouer being imboldned by the loue which he bare her, ſhe euery day vpbraided him with that which he had done vnto Hircanus her vncle, and vnto her brother Ariſtobulus. For Herod ſpared him not, although he was a child; but after he had made him high Prieſt in the ſeuenteenth yeare of his age, he preſently put him to death, after he had ſo honoured him: who when he came to the altar clothed in ſacred attire vpon a feſtiuall day, all the people wept: and the ſame night was he ſent to Iericho, and drowned in a lake by the Galathians, who had receiued commiſſion to perform the murther. Theſe things did Mariamme daily caſt in Herods teeth, and vpbraided both his mother and ſiſter, with very ſharpe and E reproachfull words: yet he ſo loued her, that notwithſtanding all this he held his peace. But the women were ſet on fire: and that they might the rather moue Herod againſt her, they accuſed her of adultery, and of many other things which bare a ſhew of truth: obiecting againſt her that ſhe had ſent her portraiture into Egypt vnto Antonius; and that through immoderate luſt ſhee did what ſhe could to make herſelfe knowne vnto him, who doted vpon womens loue, and was of ſufficient power to doe what wrong he pleaſed.

Herods mother and ſiſter do falſely accuſe Mariamme to him.

Hereat Herod was ſore moued, eſpecially for that he was iealous of her whom hee loued, bethinking himſelfe vpon the cruelty of Cleopatra, for whoſe ſake King Lyſanias and Malichus King of Arabia were put to death; and now hee meaſured not the danger by the loſſe of his wife, but by his owne death which he feared: For which cauſe being drawn by his affaires into the countrey, he gaue ſecret commandement vnto Ioſeph his ſiſter Salomes husband (whom hee knew to be truſty, and one who for affinity was his wel-willer) to kill his wife Mariamme, if ſo be Antonius ſhould haue killed him. But Ioſeph not maliciouſly, but ſimply to ſhew her how greatly the King loued her, diſcloſed that ſecret vnto her: and ſhee when Herod was returned, and amongſt other talk with many oaths ſware that he neuer loued woman but her; indeed (quoth ſhe) it may well be known how greatly you loue me by the commandement you gaue to Ioſeph, whom you charged to kill mee. Herod hearing this which he thought to be ſecret, was like a mad man, and preſently presently perswaded himselfe that Ioseph would neuer haue disclosed that commandement of his, except he had abused her; so that hereupon he became furious, and leaping out of his bed, he walked vp and downe the palace: whereupon his sister Salome hauing fit opportunity, confirmed his suspicion of Ioseph. For which cause, Herod growing now raging mad with iealousie, commanded both of them to be killed. Which done, his wrath was seconded by repentance; and after his anger ceased, the affection of loue was presently renued: yea so great was the power of his affection, that he would not beleeue she was dead, but spake vnto her as though she were aliue, vntill in processe of time being ascertained of her funeral, he equalled the affection he bare her during her life, by the vehemency of his passion for her death. Mariammes sonnes succeeded their mother in her wrath, and recogitating what an impious act it was, they accounted their father as a mortall enemy, both before and after they went to study at Rome, and especially after they came againe into Iudæa. For as they encreased in yeares, so did the violence of their minde increase. And they being now mariageable, one of them married the daughter of their aunt Salome, who accused their mother; the other married the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. And now to their hatred was there ioyned a liberty to speake more freely against them, and by this occasion of their boldnes many were animated to calumniate them: so that some did openly tell the King that both his sonnes sought to worke treason against him, and that the one of them prepared an army to helpe the other to reuenge the death of their mother; and that the other (to wit hé that was sonne in law to Archelaus) purposed to flie, and accuse Herod before Cæsar. Herod giuing eare vnto those calumniations, sent for Antipater whom hee had by Doris, to the end he might defend him against his two sonnes, and sought to aduance him aboue them. But they thought this alteration intollerable; seeing one, whose mother was but a priuate woman, so preferred: and they moued with their owne nobleness of birth could not containe their indignation, but vpon euery occasion shewed themselues offended; yet were they euery day lesse accounted of. As for Antipater, he wrought himselfe into fauour: for he knew how to flatter his father, and raised many slanders on his two brethren, partly inuented by himself, partly diuulged by some of his fauourites, whom he set a worke about the matter, till that at last hee put his brethren out of all hope of hauing the kingdome. For he was now by the Kings Will and Testament declared King, so that hee was sent as a King vnto Cæsar in a kingly habit and pompe, onely he wore no Crowne: and in time he so preuailed, that hee wrought his mother into Mariammes steed; and with flatteries and calumniation so mooued the King, that hee began to deliberate about the putting to death of his sonnes. For which cause, he conducted his son Alexander with him to Rome, and accused him before Cæsar, that he had giuen him poyson. But hee with much adoe hauing obtained liberty to pleade his own cause, and that before an vnskilfull Iudge, yet more wise then Herod or Antipater, hee modestly held his peace in all things that his father had offended in: and first of all he purged his brother from danger of that crime, and taking the whole matter vpon himselfe, he in very good sort acquited himselfe thereof. And afterwards he inueighed against Antipaters subtilty, and complained of those iniuries, which had been offered him, hauing beside the equity of his cause, sufficient eloquence to acquit himselfe: for hee was a vehement orator; and knew well how to perswade. Last of all, hee obiected that his father hauing a desire to put both him and his brother to death, had laid an accusation vpon him: wherat the whole audience wept, and Cæsar was so moued, that not regarding the accusations that were laid vnto them, he presently made Herod and them friends, vpon these conditions, that they in all things should be obedient vnto their father; and that their father should leaue the kingdome to whom he pleased.

A reconciliation betweene Herod and his sons.

Hereupon Herod returned from Rome, and though he seemed to haue forgiuen his sonnes; yet laid he not his iealousie and suspicion aside. For Antipater still vrged his argument to make Herod hate his other two sons, though for feare of him that reconciled them, he durst not openly shew himselfe an enemy vnto them. Afterward Herod sailed by Cilicia, and arriued at Elæusa, where Archelaus receiued him very curteously, thanking him for the safety of his sonne in law, and very ioyful for that they were made friends: for he wrote vnto his friends at Rome with all speed possible, that they should be fauourable vnto Alexander, when he came to plead his cause. And after this entertainement, he conducted Herod vnto Zephyrius, giuing him gifts to the value of thirty talents, and so took his leaue of him. Herod as soone as hee came to Ierusalem assembled the people together, & being assisted by his three sons, he shewed vnto them the cause of his going to Rome, and blessed God, and thanked Cæsar, who had appeased the discord of his house, and that had made his sons friends; which he esteemed more then his kingdom: and I (quoth he) will

A will make their friendſhip firme. For Cæſar appointed me king, & gaue me leaue to chuſe whom I pleaſed for my ſucceſſour, for the which I giue him harty thankes. And now I heere conſtitute al three of my ſons kings: which purpoſe of mine firſt I beſeech Almighty God, & ſecondly you to fauor: for the one of them for his yeeres, the other for their nobility of birth, haue right to the crowne and kingdome: which is ſo large, that it may ſuffice many; ſo that you for your parts reuerence them whom Cæſar conioyned and I their father ordained, giuing them not vnfit, nor vnlike honours, but ſuch as they haue deſerued. For a man cannot do a greater pleaſure vnto him whom he honoureth aboue his yeeres, then he ſhall giue diſcontent vnto him whom hee diſhonoureth. For which cauſe, I will conſtitute to euery one of them ſuch friends and wel willers, as with whom they be moſt conuerſant, and of them I will require pledges of a concord and vnity B amongſt them. For I know that diſcords and contentions ariſe by malice of thoſe who are conuerſant with Princes, & that if they be wel diſpoſed, they will increaſe friendſhip. And I requeſt not onely theſe, but alſo all ſuch as beare rule in my army, that they hope in mee onely for the preſent: for I giue not my ſonnes the kingdome, but the honour and dignitie thereof; and they ſhall haue pleaſure as though they were kings themſelues, yet I my ſelf will beare ſway, although I am vnwilling to do it. Let euery one of you conſider my age, my courſe of life, and piety: for I am not ſo old that any one may quickly deſpaire of me, nor I haue not accuſtomed my ſelfe to ſuch kind of pleaſure, as is wont to ſhorten yong mens daies; and we haue been ſo religious that we are in great hope of long life. But if any one deſpiſe me, and ſeeke to pleaſe my ſons, ſuch a one will I puniſh. I doe not forbid them to be honored, whom my ſelfe haue begotten, for that C I enuy them: but becauſe I know well that ſuch applauſes nouriſh pride and arrogancy in the fierce minds of yong men. Wherefore if all they that apply themſelues in their ſeruice, conſider that I will be ready to reward the good; and that thoſe who are ſeditious, ſhall find their malice to haue an vnprofitable euent at their hands, whom they ſo flatter: I eaſily perſwade my ſelfe that all men will be of my mind, that are of my ſons mind. For it is good for them that I raigne, and that I am friends with my ſons. And you O my good ſonnes, retaine in your minds that ſacred nature, which maketh the very brute beaſt to entertaine naturall affection: then reuerence Cæſar who reconciled vs: and laſt of all obey me who requeſt, and entreate that at your hands, which I might command, namely that you remaine brethren. And I will now giue you both kingly attire and honour, and I pray God that if you will continue and remaine friends, I may D continue in this minde.

Herod giueth not the kingdome to his ſons, but the honors of the kingdome.

Herod conuerteth his ſpeech to his ſonnes.

After he had thus ſpoken, he ſaluted them very louingly and diſmiſſed the people, ſome praying that it might bee as hee had ſaid: others (who deſired alteration) made as though they had heard nothing. Yet for all this, the diſſenſion amongſt the brethren was not appeaſed, but each of them miſtruſting worſer euents, departed from one another. For Alexander and Ariſtobulus ſtomached the matter, that Antipater had his deſert confirmed, and Antipater was grieued that his brethren ſhould haue the ſecond place after him; yet he could ſo craftily carry himſelfe, that no man could perceiue his hatred towards them. And they deriued of a noble race ſpake all they thought, and many endeuored to ſet them on; and others as friends inſinuated themſelues into their company, to learne what newes: ſo that Alexander could not ſpeake a word, but preſently it E was carried to Antipater, & from him to Herod with an addition; ſo that when Alexander ſpake any thing ſimply, meaning no harme, it was preſently interpreted in the worſt ſenſe poſſible: and if he chanced at any time to ſpeake freely of any matter, preſently it was made a great thing. Antipater ſuborned men to ſet him on, that ſo his lies might be ſhadowed with colour of truth; and that if he could proue any one thing true, all lies and tales elſe diuulged might thereby bee iuſtified to be true. Now all Antipaters familiars were either naturally ſecret, or elſe hee ſtopped their mouthes with bribes, leaſt they ſhould diſcloſe his intents: ſo that one might iuſtly haue tearmed his life a ſecrecy of malice. All Alexanders friends were either corrupted by money, or flattering ſpeeches, wherewith Antipater ouercame all, and made them theeues and proditors of ſuch things as were either done or ſpoken againſt him: and himſelf doing all things, F he dealt ſo warily, that at laſt thoſe calumniations came vnto Herods eare: and he counterfeited his brothers perſon, and ſuborned other tale-carriers, telling what they could againſt Alexander; and pretending good will towards his brother, at firſt fainedly reproued them, and afterward ſeriouſly alledged their ſayings as accuſations: ſo that hereby Herod was very wroth, but turned all as though Alexander went about treaſon, and ſought to kill his father: and nothing made ſo much credit be giuen to theſe calumniations, as that Antipater colourably excuſed his brother. Herod incenſed hereat, euery day withdrew his affection more and more from the two brethren, and daily encreased his loue towards Antipater. The nobility also were inclined after G

the same maner: partly of their own accord, and partly for that they were so cõmanded: so did Ptolomæus the chiefest of all the nobility, and the Kings brethren, and all his kinred; for all mens expectation was vpon Antipater. And that which grieued Alexander the more, was, that all these mischiefes, wrought to his ouerthrow, were done by the counsell of Antipaters mother; for shee being a stepmother, was cruell, and hated them being borne of a Queene, farre more then a stepmother doth her sons in law. And although all men followed Antipater for the hope which they had of him; yet were they also compelled thereunto by the Kings cõmaund, who gaue an especiall charge to their deerest friends, that none should follow Alexander or his brother: so that he did not onely terrifie those of his owne kingdom, but also those of other foraine nations. For Cæsar had giuen him such authority: for hee gaue him licence to take any one that H was a fugitiue from him, out of any Citie, although it were not vnder his dominions. And the young men were ignorant of the offences laide vnto their charge, and so were more easily entrapped being vnaware of them: for their father did not openly tel them of any matter, but they euery day perceiued their fathers good will towards them to decay, which so much the more encreased their griefe. In like manner Antipater by little and little mooued Pheroras their vncle and Salome their aunt against them, daily consulting with his wife, whom he should incite against them.

Glaphyra Alexanders wife increased his conceiued suspicion by her words.

Now Glaphyra Alexanders wife encreased their malice euery day, recounting her owne nobility, and bearing her selfe aboue all that were in the whole kingdom: for she deriued her pedigree by the fathers side, from Timenus; by the mothers side, from Hystaspis his sonne called Darius: in- I ueying very much against the baseness of Herods wiues, and his sister, who were chosen for their beauty, and not for their nobility of birth. For Herod (as we haue said) had many wiues, both for that it was lawfull by the custome of their countrey, and because Herod delighted in many; and all of them hated Alexander, for Glaphyras pride and contumelious speeches. And Aristobulus made Salome his enemy, although shee was his wiues mother: for shee was before mooued by Glaphyras speeches, and he often vpbraided his wife with her base birth, still telling her that hee had married a priuate woman, and his brother Alexander a Queene. And his wife often with weeping teares told this to her mother: adding moreouer, that Alexander and Aristobulus threat-ned, that if they got the kingdom, they would make their other brethrens mothers weaue with their maides; and that they would make them notaries of villages, deriding that they applied K themselues to learning. Salome moued hereat, could not containe her selfe, but told all to Herod, who easily beleeued her, because she spake against her sonne in law. Moreouer, another accusation was laid to their charge, wherat the King was greatly moued: for he was enformed that A- lexander and Aristobulus did often bewaile their mother, and lament her hard hap with sighes, and curse him: and that often when hee bestowed some of Mariammes cloathes vpon his later wiues, they threatned that in short time in steed of princely attire, they should weare a black ha-bite. Whereupon Herod, though he feared the constant mindes of the yong men, yet because he would not take awy all hope of amendement, he called them vnto him (for hee was to saile to Rome) and as a King threatned them in few words, and like a father gaue them many admoniti-ons, and requested them to loue their brethren, promising them forgiuenes of their former of- L fences, so that hereafter they amended all: But they beseeching him not to beleeue accusations forged against them vpon malice, and answering that the effect of matters would easily acquite them, requested him not so easily to beleeue tales, but refuse to giue malignant people opportunity and recourse vnto him: for that there would alwaies be some that would maliciously inuent tales to tell, whilest there was any one that would giue them the hearing and beleeuing thereof. For they knew that Salome was their enemy, and Pheroras their vncle, and both of them bare cruell minds, and were hard hearted; and especially Pheroras, who was fellow with his brother of all, sauing only the crowne, and had his owne reuenues amounting to a hundreth talents a yeare, and receiued all fruits of the whole countrey beyond Iordan, which was giuen him by his brother. Herod also had obtained of Cæsar, to make him Tetrarch, and bestowed vpon him M a Princesse for his wife, despousing vnto him his wiues sister, after whose decease he despoused vnto him his eldest daughter, and gaue him three hundreth talents with her for a dowry. But Pheroras fell in loue with his maid, and forsooke a Princesse: wherat Herod being angry married his daughter vnto his brothers sonne, who was afterwardes slaine by the Parthians; but Herod presently pardoned Pheroras offence. Diuers before this time were of opinion that in the lifetime of the Queene, hee would haue poisoned Herod; and Herod although hee loued his brother

A very well; yet becauſe many who had acceſſe vnto him told him ſo, he began to miſdoubt: and ſo examining many that were ſuſpected, laſtly he came to Pheroras friends, & none of them confeſſed it: yet they confeſſed that he was determined to fly vnto the Parthians with her whom he was ſo in loue withall; and that Coſtabarus Salomes husband was priuy thereunto vnto whom the King married her, after her firſt husband for ſuſpicion of adultery was put to death. Salome her ſelf alſo was not free frō accuſation: for Pheroras accuſed her that ſhe had contracted matrimony with Syllæus, who was procurator to Oboda King of Arabia, who was a great enemy of the Kings: and ſhe being conuicted both of this and all things elſe, whereof her brother Pheroras accuſed her, yet obtained pardon as likewiſe Pheroras did: ſo that the whole tempeſt of all their family was turned againſt Alexander, and light vpon his head. The yeare of the world. 3956. before Chriſts birth. 8.

B The King had three Eunuches whom he loued dearly, and euery one knowne by their offices: for one of them was his butler; the other was his cooke; and the third got him to bed, and lay with him: theſe three Alexander with great gifts ouercame. Which the King vnderſtanding, by torments forced them to confeſſe it, and declared with what promiſes they were therto by Alexander induced, and how he had deceiued them: affirming that there was no truſting to Herod who was a ſhameleſſe old man; and that he died his haire, to make himſelfe ſeem yong: and that he in deſpite of him would be his ſucceſſor, and then hee would be reuenged vpon his enemies, and make his friends happy, and eſpecially them: and that the whole nobility did ſecretly obey him, and the captaines of the army and gouernours did priuily come vnto him. Hereat Herod was ſo terrified, that he durſt not preſently diuulge their confeſſions, but night and day he ſent C ſpies to learne what was ſaid or done; and whom he ſuſpected, them he preſently killed: ſo that his whole kingdome was full of iniquity. For euery one as his malice moued him fained calumniations, and many deſirous of bloodſhed abuſed the Kings wrath as they pleaſed againſt their enemies, and credit was giuen to euery lie, and no man was ſo ſoon accuſed, but preſently he was puniſhed; and he who preſently before accuſed others, was now accuſed himſelfe, and carried to be puniſhed with him whō he accuſed. For the Kings perils ſhortned the time of triall for their liues, and he became ſo tyrannous, that hee afforded not a good looke vnto them that were not accuſed, and ſhewed himſelfe moſt fierce and violent euen to his deareſt friends: ſo that he baniſhed many out of his kingdome, and railed againſt ſuch as hee had no power ouer. Antipater increaſed this miſchiefe more & more, and gathering together a great company of his friends, he D omitted no kind of calumniation. The King likewiſe was terrified by the rumours and tales of pickthankes, that he thought alwaies that hee ſaw Alexander before him with a drawne ſword. For which cauſe he ſuddenly tooke him and caſt him in priſon, and tortured his friends, many of which died in torments, becauſe they would not confeſſe more then in conſcience was true: others not able to endure the torments, were forced to confeſſe that Alexander and his brother Ariſtobulus thought to haue wrought treaſon againſt their father, and that they expected their time till he went a hunting; reſoluing in themſelues that hauing kild him, they would preſently flie to Rome. Although theſe and ſuch like calumniations were no waies probable, yet extreamitie of paine forced men extempore to inuent them, and the King willingly belieued them, as it were comforting himſelfe thereby in that hee might not bee thought to haue impriſoned his E ſonne vniuſtly. Alexander perceiuing that it was impoſſible for him to aboliſh his fathers ſuſpicion, thought it better to yeeld himſelfe guilty: and ſo wrote foure books againſt his aduerſaries, and confeſſed the treaſon: affirming that he had many partakers therein, namely Pheroras, and Salome, who were the chiefe; auouching that before that time he had had the vſe of her bodie in the night time: and how though he himſelfe was vnwilling, yet ſhe forced him therunto. Now the bookes came vnto Herods hands, which charged the greateſt amongſt the nobilitie with moſt hainous matters. Archelaus fearing his ſon in law and daughter to be in great danger, ſpeedily came into Iudæa, & ingeniouſly appeaſed the Kings wrath: for ſo ſoon as he came vnto Herod, he cried, Where is that wicked ſonne in law of mine, or where may I ſee the face of that wretch that goeth about to murther his father, that I may teare him in peeces with mine owne F hands, and marry my daughter anew to a better husband? for although ſhe be not priuy to his counſell, yet is ſhe defiled for that ſhe was wife to ſuch a man. Nay I admire thy patience who art in ſuch danger, and ſuffereſt Alexander yet to liue: for I came thus haſtily out of Cappadocia, thinking hee had beene put to death, to talke with thee concerning my daughter, whom I married to him for thy ſake and honour. Wherefore now let vs take counſell what to doe with them both: and ſeeing thou art too fatherlike and not able to puniſh thy ſonne, thy treacherous ſonne, let vs change roomes, and let me be in thy place to reuenge thee: with ſuch like inuectiues

he deceiued Herod (though otherwiſe firme in his purpoſe.) Then Herod ſhewed him the books G that Alexander had writ: and reading euery chapter with deliberation, Archelaus took occaſion fit for his purpoſe, and by little and little laid all the fault on Pheroras, and thoſe that were accuſed in the book. And perceiuing the King to giue eare vnto him, let vs (quoth he) conſider whether the yong man was not circumuented by the treachery of ſo many lewd perſons, & not thou by the yong man: for there appeares no cauſe why he ſhould fall into ſuch wickednes, who now enioyed the kingdome and hoped to ſucceed thee therein, had hee not been perſwaded thereto by other men, who ſeeing him a yong man, entiſed him vnto ſuch naughtineſs. For we ſee that through ſuch men, not only yong men, but alſo old men, and moſt noble families, yea, and whole kingdoms are ruinated. Herod vpon theſe ſpeeches began ſomewhat to relent, ſo that he appeaſed his wrath toward Alexander, and encreaſed it towards Pheroras; for he was as it were the ſub- H iect of the whole booke. Who perceiuing the King ſo to truſt to Archelaus friendſhip, that hee was led by him to doe what he pleaſed, leuing Alexander, he in humble manner came to Archelaus, ſeeking impudently for ſuccor at his hands, of whom he had not deſerued any fauour. Ar-chelaus anſwered him, that he knew no waies to obtain his pardon, who was guilty of ſo hainous crimes, and conuicted manifeſtly to haue practiſed high treaſon againſt the Kings owne perſon, and to be the cauſe of all theſe miſeries that had now befallen the young man, except that hee would lay aſide all ſubtle dealing, and denying of his fact, and confeſs the crimes wherof he was accuſed; and ſo in humble wiſe go vnto his brother who loued him dearely, and craue pardon; promiſing him that if he would ſo doe, he would do him what good he could. Hereupon Phero-ras obeyed Archelaus his counſell, and putting on a black attire, hee in pitifull manner and with I teares proſtrated himſelfe at Herods feet, and crauing pardon obtained it, confeſſing himſelfe to be a moſt wicked & vile perſon, and to be guilty of all that which was obiected againſt him, and that the cauſe which moued him to do all thoſe things, was the frantick and mad fits he fell into for the loue of that woman. Now when Pheroras became his owne accuſer, and a witnes againſt himſelfe, then Archelaus endeauoured to mitigate Herods wrath towardes him, and excuſe his faults with fit examples: for he alledged that his brother attempted greater matters againſt him, whom notwithſtanding for natures cauſe hee pardoned: adding that in euery kingdome as in mighty bodies, alwaies ſome part began to ſwell, which notwithſtanding was not preſently to be cut off, but to be cured by eaſie meanes.

Archelaus vſing many ſpeeches vnto Herod to this purpoſe, at laſt quite appeaſed his wrath K toward Pheroras, ſtill counterfeiting himſelfe to be angry with Alexander, affirming that hee would take his daughter away with him, till at laſt he forced Herod of his own accord to entreat for the yong man, requeſting him againe to deſpouſe his daughter vnto him. Archelaus after much entreaty anſwered, that hee was willing that the King ſhould beſtow his daughter vpon any ſaue Alexander, for he greatly eſteemed the law of affinity. Herod replied, that if he did not diuorce his daughter from Alexander, he ſhould thinke that hee beſtowed his ſonne vpon him:
for they had no children, and his daughter was dearely loued of the young man; ſo that if hee would permit her to ſtay ſtill there, for her ſake he would pardon all Alexanders offences. Hereto Archelaus with much adoe agreed, and ſo was reconciled vnto his ſonne in law, and he vnto his father. Yet Herod affirmed that he muſt needs be ſent to Rome to ſpeake with Cæſar, for hee L had written the whole matter vnto Cæſar. Thus Archelaus craftily deliuered his ſon in law from danger, and after his reconciliation was made, they ſpent the time in feaſting & mirth. Vpon Ar-chelaus departure, Herod gaue him ſeuenty talents; and a throne of pure gold adorned with precious ſtones, and Eunuches, and a concubine named Panichis; and rewarded euery one of his friends according to their deſerts. And all the Kings kinred by the Kings appointment and con-ſent, beſtowed rich gifts vpon Archelaus; and both hee and all his nobility accompanied him to Antiochia.

Herod diſmiſſeth Archelaus & his friends with great preſents. Ant. lib. 16. cap. 11.

Not long after there came one into Iudæa far more ſubtle then Archelaus, who both diſannulled the reconciliation made for Alexander, and cauſed his death alſo. This man was a Lacedemonian borne named Eurycles, who by mony ſought to haue obtained the kingdome. This man M brought vnto Herod rich gifts as it were for a bait of that he intended; hee had ſo behaued him-ſelfe in Greece that it could no longer tolerate his exceſſe: and Herod againe rewarded him with farre greater gifts then thoſe were that he gaue him: but he eſteemed his liberality as nothing, except he bought it with the blood of Princes. For which cauſe hee circumuented the King, partly by flattering him, partly by praiſing him fainedly, and eſpecially by his owne craft and ſubtilty: and quickly perceiuing his inclination, he both in word and deed ſought to pleaſe him;

Eurycles the Lacedemonian ſecretly accuſeth Alexander to his father, and is the cauſe of his death.

A So that the king accounted him among his chiefeſt friends. For both the king and all the nobility honoured him the more for his country ſake, in that hee was a Lacedemonian. But hee very eaſily perceiuing the feeble ſtay of Herods houſe, and the hatred between the brethren, and how the king was affected towards euery one of them; he firſt of all entertained himſelfe at Antipaters houſe, making a ſhew in the meane while of good will towards Alexander, pretending and proteſting, that in times paſt he had been Archelaus companion; and by this meanes he quickly crept into fauour with him, as an approued friend: which was the cauſe that he was ſuddenly entertained for a faithfull man. He preſently likewiſe brought him into friendſhip with Ariſtobulus; and hauing ſounded euery mans diſpoſition, he accommodated himſelfe to all humours: and to begin withall, he became Antipaters penſioner, and a traytor to Alexander. And he often vſed hote
B words to Antipater, as it were chiding him, that he being eldeſt of the brethren, ſo ſlenderly looked after them, who pretended to put him beſides the crowne, which was his right. Hee many times likewiſed vſed the like words to Alexander, admiring him who was borne of a Queen, and husband to a queen, and yet would permit ſuch a one who was deſcended of a priuate woman to ſucceed in the kingdom, eſpecially ſeeing he had ſuch occaſion & opportunity to effect the contrary: for he might aſſure himſelfe of Archelaus his help in any thing. Alexander ſuppoſed he had ſpoke as he thought, becauſe he counterfeited friendſhip with Archelaus: ſo that he miſdoubting nothing, diſcloſed vnto him all his minde concerning Antipater, ſaying, that it was no wonder though Herod diſinherited them of the kingdom, ſith before time he had ſlaine their mother.

Eurycles, counterfeiting himſelfe both to pity them, and to be ſorrowfull for their miſchance,
C enticed Ariſtobulus to ſpeak the like: and hauing animated them both to complaine in this ſort againſt their father, he preſently went to Antipater, and diſcloſed to him all their ſecrets, forging alſo the treachery which thoſe two brethren intended againſt him, which was to diſpatch him with their ſwords. For this cauſe Antipater gaue him a great ſumme of money, and commended him to his father, and being hired to effect the death of Alexander and Ariſtobulus, he himſelfe became their accuſer: Whereupon he came to Herod, and told him how in regard of thoſe benefits hee had receiued at his hand, he would now beſtowe his life vpon him, and the light of this world for recompence of his hoſpitality; affirming that Alexander had lately ſtretched out his hand with his ſword drawne to kill him, and hee onely was the cauſe that hee performed it not, by ſtaying his hand, and promiſing him to aſſiſt him in the matter: adding that Alexander v-
D ſed theſe ſpeeches; That Herod was not contented to enioy a kingdom which was another mans right, nor yet as it were to diſmember his kingdome after Mariammes death, but hee would alſo leaue the kingdome, belonging vnto their anceſtors, vnto a pernicious baſtard, Antipater: and for that cauſe he would reuenge Hircanus and Mariammes death: And that it was not conuenient to receiue the kingdom from ſuch a father without bloud, and euery day he had occaſion giuen him ſo to do: for he could ſpeake nothing without calumniation. For if any mention were made at any time of any ones nobility, preſently he was vpbraided without cauſe, for his father would preſently ſay, There is none noble but Alexander, whoſe fathers baſe birth is a ſhame and diſcredit vnto him. And that going a hunting, if he held his peace, his father was offended; if he praiſed, then it was ſaid he mocked: ſo that in euery thing hee found his fathers affection tur-
E ned from him, and that he was onely fauourable to Antipater: ſo that hee would die with all his heart if he failed of his purpoſe; if he kild him, his father in law Archelaus would worke his ſafety, to whom he might eaſily flee. And after, he would goe to Cæſar (who as yet knew not Herods manners) for he would not ſtand before him then, as he did before, being terrified becauſe his father was preſent: neither would he onely ſpeak of his owne wrongs, but of the wrongs of the whole nation, who were oppreſſed by exactions euen vnto death. And then he would lay open in what pleaſure, and after what ſort the money gotten with bloud was conſumed: and who and what kind of men they were that were thereby enriched; and what was the cauſe of the affliction of the city: and that there he would bewaile the death of his vncle, and his mother, and vnfold all Herods wickednes: which being once made manifeſt vnto the world, no man would ac-
F count him a murtherer of his father. Eurycles hauing falſely reported this of Alexander, fell preſently to praiſe and extoll Antipater, affirming that he onely loued his father, and hindered ſuch practices.

The king, yet not throughly appeaſed for that which had paſt, grew into an exceeding agony, and Antipater once againe ſuborned other falſe witneſſes againſt them, who affirmed that they were wont to haue ſecret talke with Iucundus and Tyrannius, who ſometime were generals of the kings horſemen, who were then diſplaced for ſome offence they had committed. Herod being very angry, presently tortured them: and they affirmed, that they were ignorant of G all that which was laid to their charge. But there was found and brought to the king a letter, as though it had beene written by Alexander, vnto the Gouernour of the Castle of Alexandrium; requesting him, that he would receiue him and his brother Aristobulus into the Castle, when he had killed his father, and to assist them both with weapons and other necessaries. Alexander af-firm'd, that this letter was counterfeited by Diophantus, the kings Secretary, who was both bold, and could counterfeit any ones hand; and hauing counterfeited many, was at last for the same put to death.

Diophantus, the kings notary, writeth fained letters in Alexanders name.

Herod caused the Gouernour of the Castle to be tortured, but hee confessed nothing that was laid against him: and although he had no good proofe of any thing, yet he commanded his two sons to be kept in hold. He likewise called Eurycles (who was the bane of his house, and the bree- H der of all the mischiefe) authour of his safety, and one who had well deserued at his hands, and gaue him fifty talents: who, departing from Iudæa before matters were well knowne, went to Archelaus, and faining that he had reconciled Alexander and Herod, he receiued there a peece of money. From thence he went into Achaia, and spent that he had euilly gotten, in as bad manner as he got it. Lastly, he was accused vnto Cæsar, that hee had caused dissension in all Achaia, and spoiled the cities: for which cause he was banished. And this was the punishment which was inflicted vpon him for Alexander and Aristobulus troubles.

Cous Euaratus.

It is not amisse heere in this place to compare Euaratus of Cous vnto this Eurycles: who bee-ing a deare friend vnto Alexander, and arriuing about the same time that Eurycles did, being put to his oath, sware that hee heard the yong men say nothing: yet his oath nothing preuailed nor I profited them poore soules. For Herod would onely heare and giue eare vnto accusations; and he highly esteemed them that would beleeue them with him, and shewe themselues moued thereat.

Ant. lib. 16. cap. 12.

Moreouer, Salome increased his cruelty towards his sonnes: for Aristobulus minding to bring her into the same trouble with himselfe, who was his mother in law and his Aunt, sent vnto her, willing her to looke to herselfe, as though the king was minded to put her to death. Who being now cald in question for the matters whereof she was before accused, to wit, that she purposed to marry with the kings enemy, Syllæus the Arabian, to whom she priuily reuealed the kings secrets: this was the vtter ruine of the young men, wherewithall they were ouerthrowne, as it were with a violent tempest. For presently Salome went vnto the king, and told him what Aristo- K bulus had admonished her of: and he being now outrageous, caused both his sons to bee bound and imprisoned in seuerall places. Then sent he Volumnius, who was the Generall of his Armie, and Olympus, one of his familiar friends, vnto Cæsar, to carry the informations against his sons in writing: who saying to Rome, after their arriuall deliuered the kings letters. And Cæsar was very sorie for the young men, yet he permitted the father to do what he would with his children:
and so wrote vnto him, that he should haue licence to do what he thought good: yet he signified vnto him, that he should do better to call his Nobles together, and let them make enquirie concerning the treasons: and then if he found them guilty of these things wherof they were accused, to put them to death.

Hereupon Herod, according to Cæsars letters and appointment, came vnto Berytum, and there L gathered an assembly to sit in iudgement; the chiefe in that iudgement were the Gouernours that Cæsar in his letters appointed, Saturninus and Pedanius Embassadours, and with them Volum- nius, Procurator: next, the kings kinred, and Salome and Pheroras: and then the nobility of Syria, Archelaus onely excepted, who because hee was father in law to his son, Herod suspected him to be partiall. But he suffred not his sons to come into iudgement: for he knew that the very sight of them would haue moued all men to compassion. And moreouer, if they were permitted to speake for themselues, that then Alexander would easily haue acquited them both: for which cause they were kept in Platan, in a castle of Sidonia. The king beginning his oration, was as vehement, as though they had been present against whom he spake; and he was halfe afraid to obiect any treason against them, for that he had no proofe therof: and therfore he prosecuted their M opprobrious words, iniuries and offences which they had committed against him, the which he affirmed to be more grieuous then death.

Herod accuseth his sons in open iudgement.

At last (when no man contradicted him) hee began to lament, as though by ouercomming in such sort, himselfe was also ouercome, and thereupon requested euery one to giue their verdict.
And first of all Saturninus condemned his sons, but not to die: saying, that he had three sons present, and he thought it not lawfull to adiudge other mens sons to death. The two Legats also affirmed,

Herods sentence against his sons.

A firmed the ſame, and many followed their aduice: But Voluminius was the firſt that pronounced the ſorrowfull ſentence: after whom all the reſt followed, ſome to flatter Herod, ſome for hatred they bare him, but none for any indignation againſt the yong men. Then all Iudæa and Syria expected an end of this tragedy; yet no man thought Herod to be ſuch a tyrant, as that he wold haue put his two ſons to death. Herod cauſed his ſons to be brought to Tyre, and from thence by ſhip he conuaied them to Cæſarea, bethinking himſelfe what death hee ſhould put them to. In the mean time, there was an old ſouldier of the kings, named Tiro, who had a ſon belonging to Alexander, and highly in his fauour, and he himſelfe greatly loued the two yong men: who being very much grieu'd in minde at that which had paſt, went about, crying, that iuſtice was troden vnder foot, truth oppreſt, that nature was confounded, and the life of man full of iniquity; and B whatſoeuer elſe griefe put into his minde, who nothing eſteemed his owne life. At laſt, this Tiro came boldly to the king, and ſaid vnto him: O king, thou ſeemeſt to me moſt vnhappy, who doſt giue credit to wicked and vile perſons againſt thy deareſt ſons. For Pheroras and Salome thou beliueſt before thine owne children, whom notwithſtanding thou haſt often found to haue deſerued death; and thou perceiueſt not that they do this, to the intent to make thee want lawfull ſucceſſors, and leaue thee none but Antipater, whom they with their harts would haue king, becauſe they can rule him as they liſt. But bethink thy ſelfe (O king) how all thy ſouldiers will hate him for the death of his two brethren; for there is no man that doth not pity the two yong men, and many of the Nobility are diſpleaſed hereat. After he had ſpoken this, he named them who were diſpleaſed: whereupon the king commanded them, and him, and his ſon to be laid hold on: and C preſently one of the kings Barbers, named Tryphon, ſhewing himſelfe to bee in I knowe not what fury, came forth, and ſaid vnto Herod; Tiro perſwaded me to kill thee with my razour, promiſing me, that if I would ſo do, Alexander would giue me great rewards. Herod hearing this, cauſed Tiro and his ſon, and the Barber to be tortured; and they denied all, and the Barber affirmed nothing more then he had already ſaid. Then he commanded Tiro to be more tormented. Whereupon his ſon, moued with compaſſion towards his father, promiſed to diſcloſe all the matter to the king, ſo that he would pardon his father: who being releaſed of his torments, preſently declared how his father through Alexanders meanes and procurement was purpoſed to haue kild him. Many that were preſent thought this was a deuice of the yong man, to free his father from torments: and yet others were perſwaded that it was true. Vpon this, Herod made a ſpeech vnto D the people, wherin he inueighed againſt the Gouernors of his army, and Tiro, and made the people arme themſelues, and kill both them and the Barber with ſtaues and ſtones. Now he ſent his ſons vnto Sebaſte, which was not far from Cæſarea, and there he cauſed them to bee ſtrangled: and hauing quickly diſpatcht the matter, he cauſed them to be brought into the Caſtle Alexandrium, there to be buried with their mothers vncle. CHAP. XVIII.

Of Antipaters conſpiracy againſt Herod his father.

E BVt Antipater now hoping without all controuerſie to ſucceed in the kingdome, was generally hated of the whole nation: for it was openly knowne that he by falſe calumniations had cauſed his brethrens deaths. And on the other ſide, hee ſtood in no little feare of his brothers children, whom he perceiued now to beginne to growe to yeeres; for Alexander had by Glaphyra two ſonnes, Tigranes and Alexander: and Ariſtobulus had by Berenice, daughter to Salome, fiue children, to wit, three ſonnes, Herod, Agrippa and Ariſtobulus, and two daughters, Herodias and Mariamme. Herod, after hee had put Alexander to death, ſent away Glaphyra with her dowry into Cappadocia, and married Berenice Ariſtobulus his wife vnto Antipaters vncle: for Antipater deuiſed this match to become friends with Salome, whom he before time hated and enuied. Hee alſo by his great gifts ſought to get Pheroras fauour, and the friendſhip of F ſuch as were friends vnto Cæſar, ſending to that end great ſummes of money vnto Rome. Hee gaue Saturninus and all the reſt great riches in Syria. But the more he gaue, the more hee was hated of all men: for euery one iudged that he did not conſume ſuch wealth, for that he was liberall, but that he lauiſhed it out for feare, ſo that he got not the loue of them, vpon whom he beſtowed it; and they to whom he gaue nothing, were ſo much the more his enimies. Yet he becam euery day more bountifull, ſeeing, againſt his expectation, Herod made much of their children, whoſe parents he had ſlaine; intending to ſhew how much he repented their deaths, by the pitie and and compassion he took vpon their children. For assembling togeather his friends, he caused the children to be placed by him, and the tears standing in his eyes, he said: Hard, cruell, and sinister fortune took away from me the fathers of these children: but I pitie to see them orphans, and naturall affection commendeth them vnto me. Wherfore I will endeuour, that seeing I haue bin an infortunate father, I may be a wiser & happier grandfather, and leaue them who are most dear vnto me, to raigne after me. Wherfore brother Pheroras, I betroth thy daughter vnto Alexanders eldest son, that for that cause thou maist be carefull to prouide for him, and assist him: and vnto thy sonne Antipater I assure the daughter of Aristobulus, that so thou maist be a father to her who wants a father; and my son Herod, whose mothers vncle was high priest, shall marry with her sister. And this is my will and pleasure touching this matter, and let no man who loueth me seek to alter this. And I beseech Almighty God, for the good of my country, and of these my nephews, to prosper these mariages, and to look vpon these children with a more fauourable eie then hee did their fathers. Hauing thus spoken, hee wept, and ioyned the childrens hands, and curteously saluting euery one, he dismissed the Councell. C H

Herod grieuously bemoned his sons, expressing the same by his commiseratiō toward the children.

Herod betrotheth his nephewes.

Vpon this, Antipater was amazed, and all the Orphans well perceiued how sorrowfull he was: For now he thought himselfe dishonored by his father, and that his good fortune was endangered, seeing that Alexanders son was like to haue both Archelaus and Pheroras the Tetrarch to assist him. Moreouer, he considered how he was hated, and how the people did compassionate the children, for that they were fatherlesse; and affected them, remembring their fathers who were dead, and were terrified at his wickednes. Wherefore he attempted all meanes possible to break off the mariages, yet he feared to insinuate any thing to his father cunningly, who was now very I seuere, and wary, and mistrustful. And therefore went openly vnto him to make his humble sute, and request him, that he would not leaue him without honour, nor depriue him of that dignity, which before time he had iudged him worthy of, giuing him onely the bare title of a king, and leauing the substance of the kingdome in other mens powers. For it would bee impossible for him to obtaine the kingdome, if Alexanders sonne (beside Archelaus his fauour) were by marriage made sonne in law vnto Pheroras. Wherefore he earnestly besought him, that seeing he had a great many daughters, to change the marriages: for the king had nine wiues, and by seauen of them he had children: Antipater by Doris, Herod by Mariamme, daughter of the high priest, and Antipas and Archelaus by Malthace, the Samaritane, and his daughter Olympias, whom his brother Ioseph maried: and by Cleopatra of Ierusalem, Herod and Philip; and by Pallas, Phasaelus: K he had two other daughters also, Roxane and Salome; one of them by Phædra, and the other by Elpis. He had likewise two wiues, by whom he had no issue, his cousin, and his neece: and beside these, he had two daughters by Mariamme, sisters to Alexander and Aristobulus. Wherefore Antipater seeing his father had such choice of daughters, he requested the mariages to be altered.

Herods children by his seuen wiues.

The king, well perceiuing his minde and purpose towards the Orphans, was very angry: and calling to remembrance the misfortune of his sons, whom he had put to death, he greatly feared, lest Antipater by some false accusations should ouerthrowe them, and so with sharpe words did driue him off for that time; yet afterward he so flattered Herod, that he got the mariages to be altered. And first of all he ioined Aristobulus daughter with Antipater himselfe, and his son to Pheroras daughter. Heere one may see what Antipater could do by flattering speeches: for Salome in the like matter could not speed, although shee was his sister, and procured manie times Iulia, Cæsars wife, to speake for her, that she might marry with Syllæus the Arabian: yet was uot she permitted so to do. But Herod sware that he would account her as an vtter enemy, except she would desist from that purpose, and afterward against her will he married her vnto one Alexas, a friend of his: and one of her daughters to Alexanders sonne, and the other to Antipaters vncle. L

Herod is perswaded by Antipaters flatteries to break off the mariages.

As for Mariammes daughters, one of them was married to Antipater, his sisters sonne, the other vnto Phasaelus, his brothers sonne. When Antipater had quite ouerthrowne the hope of the Orphans, and ioined affinity as he thought good, he now held himselfe on a sure ground: and adding confidence to his malice, hee became intolerable to all men. And seeing hee could not M auoid their hatred, he now sought by feare to work his owne safety; and so much the more, because Pheroras now assisted him, as one that was confirmed and established for king. Also the women in the court fel at variance, and raised a new broil: for Pheroras wife, with her mother & her sister, and the mother of Antipater did vse themselues very insolently in many things, abusing also two of the kings daughters very contumeliously: to which matter she was chiefly set on by Antipater, who hated them, hauing the others at his command, onely Salome hindered their agree-

The women vnderstanding how she had informed the king, & that Herod was offended thereat, they came no more together openly, and abstained from their wonted familiarity, and in the kings hearing fained themselues to fal out one with another. Antipater also made the same shew, so that he stuck not openly to offend Pheroras: notwithstanding, they had meetings & banquets in the night, and the vnity was the more confirmed because they perceiued themselues to be noted: for Salome knew all this, and tould it to the king. The king was very angry, and especially against Pheroras wife, whom chiefly Salome blamed: and hauing called together his kinred and friends, he laid many accusations against her before them; and told them how contumeliously she had behaued herselfe toward his daughter, and that she hired the Pharisees against him, and Ant. lib. 17. cap. 4.

B that by her poison she had made his brother his enemy. And turning himselfe vnto Pheroras, he asked him whether he had rather haue him for his brother, or haue his wife. And he answering, that he had rather dy then lose his wife: Herod doubtfull what to do, turned him to Antipater, and commanded him neuer to talke with Pheroras, nor his wife, nor any one belonging to them after that time. But he obeied his fathers cõmand openly in shew, but secretly lay in their house: and fearing that Salome should perceiue it, hee by his friends in Italy caused himselfe to make a voiage to Rome, by letters brought to Herod, wherein it was commanded, that shortly after the receit thereof, Antipater should be sent to Rome vnto Cæsar. Wherfore Herod vsing no delay, sent him presently, furnishing him with all things necessary, and a great sum of money: giuing him likewise his last Will and Testament to cary with him to Cæsar; wherein was written, that Anti-

C pater should be king, and after him, Herod, the son of Mariamme, daughter of the high Priest. But Syllæus the Arabian, neglecting Cæsars commandement, at the same time sailed to Rome, there to contend with Antipater about matters which were before in controuersie between him and Nicholaus. He had also a great contention with Aretas his king, whose friends he had slaine, and also Soemus, the most potent in all the towne of Petra: and seeing Fabatus, Cæsars Procurator, he vsed his fauour also against Herod. But Herod giuing Fabatus a greater summe of money, alienated him from Syllæus, and by this meanes dispatched that which Cæsar commanded: and because Fabatus restored nothing to him, he accused him that hee was Procurator, not for Cæsar, but for Herod: wherewith Fabatus was moued; and being as yet in great estimation with Herod, hee did Fabatus, Cæsars gouernor, discouereth Syllæus secrets.

D disclose Syllæus his secrets, and signified to the king, how that Syllæus corrupted Corinthus, one of his guard, whom he willed to be taken and kept in hold. And the king followed his counsell: for this Corinthus, though he was alwaies brought vp in the kings court, yet was he borne in Arabia. Wherefore he presently tooke him, and two other Arabians that were found with him; one of them was Syllæus friend; and the other, Phylarchus: who vpon their examination, confessed that Corinthus for a great summe of money was hired to kill the king. After this, they were sent to Saturninus, gouernour of Syria, and from him to Rome.

How Herod should haue been poysoned, and how it was knowne.

HErod still vrged Pheroras to forsake his wife: for hee knew not how to punish her, hauing many matters against her: at last he was so moued that he banisht his brother & her. Pheroras taking this iniury patiently, departed into his Tetrarchy, taking an oath that his banishment should endure so long as Herod liued, and that whilst he liued, he would neuer come any more to him; Insomuch as he would not come at his brother to visit him when he was sick, notwithstanding he was often sent for, when (as he thought) he lay now on his death-bed, & would gladly impart somthing vnto him: but contrary to all hope he recouerd, & afterward Pheroras fell sick. At which time Herod shewed his patient and humble minde: for he went vnto him, and very kindly sought help for him; but he was too far spent, for a few daies af-

F ter he died: and although Herod loued him vntill his dying day, yet was it bruted abroad that he poisoned him. Herod caused his body to be brought vnto Ierusalem, and commanded all his nation to mourne, and buried him with a sumptuous funerall. And thus one of the murtherers of Alexander and Aristobulus came to his end: but shortly after, the reuenge of that wicked fact did fall vpon Antipater, who was the chiefe author thereof: it did but begin with Pheroras. For certaine that belonged to Pheroras came in mournefull wise vnto Herod, and complained vnto him, how that his brother Pheroras was poisoned, and that one of his wiues gaue him meat that

And that two daies before his death, there came a Witch out of Arabia, who was sent for by his mother and his sister, to giue Pheroras a loue potion, and she in steed thereof, through Syllæus inducements, gaue him poison, for she was of Syllæus acquaintance.

A Witch of Arabia.

The king, daunted with so many suspicions, caused diuers of Pheroras maids and libertines to be put to torments, and one of them impatient herein, exclaimed in this wise: O thou God, ruler of heauen and earth, reuenge vs vpon Antipaters mother, who is the cause of these our euils! When the king vnderstood thus much, hee ceased not to search out the truth: and then the women disclosed Antipaters mothers familiaritie with Pheroras and his women, & their secret meetings: and that Pheroras and Antipater, after they came from the king, vsed to drink with them all night long, not suffering any seruant or maid to bee in the roome with them; and one of the H Libertines wiues reuealed this. And when euery one of the maids were tortured apart, all their examinations agreed; so that now it was euident wherefore Antipater had compacted to goe to Rome, and Pheroras beyond the riuer Iordan. For they were often wont to say, that Herod hauing killed Alexander and Aristobulus, now hee would come to them and their wiues: and that it was vnlike that he would spare any one, who spared not Mariamme and her sonnes: and therefore it was best to flee as far as it was possible from such a beast. And that Antipater was wont often to complaine vnto his mother, that now he grew gray-haired, and his father wexed young and lusty; and that it might so chance, that he should neuer liue to be king; or if euer his father died, he should enioy the pleasure of the kingdome but a short time. And moreouer, the heads of Hydra, that is to say, Alexanders and Aristobulus sons, began to spring vp againe: and that his father I had iniuriously cut off all hope from his sons, appointing none of them to succeed him, but the son of Mariamme: wherein he was perswaded that he doted, if so be hee thought his will should be of force; for he would take such an order, that he would leaue none of all his progeny aliue, and that Herod was the greatest hater of his sons of any father in the world: and was not therewithall contented, but he also hated his owne brethren. Furthermore, that he not long ago gaue him an hundreth talents that hee should haue no conference with Pheroras: and when Pheroras asked wherein they hurt him, Antipater answered, I would to God that hee would take away all men else, and leaue onely vs two naked, so that he would grant vs life: but, quoth he, it is impossible to escape this dangerous beast, who will not suffer men openly to shew friendship to one another. Lastly, though we now secretly meet, yet if wee beare the hearts and hands of men, the K
time will be when we may talk & meet openly. The maids in torments disclosed these speeches, and that Pheroras was determined to flee with them into Petra. Herod beleeued all their sayings, and the rather for that which was said concerning the hundreth talents. For he said nothing of them to any one but to Antipater.

Doris, Antipaters mother, is spoiled of her iewels, and thrust out of the palace.

And first of all hee bent his furie against Doris, Antipaters mother: and taking from her all the ornaments which he had bestowed vpon her, and bought with many talents, he banisht her. When his wrath was somewhat appeased, he released Pheroras maids from torments: and now he became timorous & feareful, and prone to any suspicion, torturing many that were innocent, for feare he should let any escape that were guilty. Hereupon hee set vpon Antipater the Samaritane, who was Procurator for his sonne Antipater; who through torments confessed that his L sonne Antipater had procured poison out of Egypt to kill him, by the meanes of a friend of Antiphilus; which poison Theudion, Antipaters vncle, took of him, and deliuered to Pheroras: whom Antipater charged to dispatch Herod whil'st he was at Rome, far from suspicion, and that Pheroras gaue his wife the poison to keep. Wherefore the king calling for her, commanded her to bring forth that which was deliuered vnto her. And she, making as though she would haue gone forth to fetch it, cast her selfe downe from a house toppe, thereby to preuent the torments, which, if she were conuicted, they would inflict vpon her. But by the prouidence of GOD (as it should seeme) it came so to passe that she fell not on her head, but on her side, and so escaped death, to the end that God might inflict punishment vpon Antipater. And beeing brought vnto the king, so soone as she began to come to herselfe (for she was amazed with the fall) the king demanded M of her, wherefore shee had done so, and sware vnto her, that if she would truely disclose all, he would pardon her for all; but if she tould an vntruth, her bodie should bee torne in peeces with torments, and not be buried. Shee awhile held her peace, and at last said: Wherefore should I keepe any thing secret, seeing Pheroras is dead, to saue Antipater, who hath caused all our ouerthrowes? Heare O king, & God be witnes of the truth hereof, who cannot be deceiued. When I sate weeping by Pheroras, as he lay a dying, he cald me vnto him and said; See wife, how much

A I am deceiued concerning my brothers loue towards me, for I hated & ſought to kill him, who thus loueth me, and ſorroweth ſo much for me, though I am not yet dead: but truely I am iuſtly rewarded for my iniquity. And now (wife) bring me hither the poyſon which was left by Antipater in thy keeping for my brother, & make it away before my face, that I carry not with mee to hell a guilty conſcience for that crime. So I brought it as he willed mee, and the moſt part of the poiſon I caſt into the fire, where it was conſumed, & kept a little therof to my ſelfe, for feare of miſchances, and of thee. And hauing thus ſaid, ſhe brought forth a box which had in it a very little of the poiſon. And then the king tortured the brother and mother of Antiphilus, & they alſo confeſſed that Antiphilus brought a box out of Aegypt, & that he receiued poiſon from his brother, who practiced phyſicke at Alexandria. The ghoſts alſo of Alexander and Ariſtobulus B went all about the whole kingdome, and became as it were ſpies, to giue notice of ſuch things as were vncertaine; who alſo cauſed thoſe that dwelt in the vttermoſt parts of the kingdome, to come & giue euidence of ſuch things as were ſuſpected. At laſt is was proued that Mariamme the daughter of the high Prieſt was acquainted with theſe conſpiracies, for her brethren being tortured did confeſſe it. Wherfore the king reuenged the mothers fault vpon her childe: for hauing writ in his will, that Herod her ſon ſhould ſucceed Antipater in the kingdom, now for her fault hee blotted that out.

CHAP. XX.

How Antipaters malicious practices againſt Herod were knowen and reuenged.

C

AFter all this, Bathyllus ioyned himſelfe with Antipater, as it were to adde the laſt hand vnto all his practices. This Bathyllus was one of his libertines, who brought another ſort of poyſon, to wit, of Aſpes, and the poyſon alſo of other ſerpents; that if the firſt prooued too weake and took not effect, that then Pheroras and his wife ſhould make an end of the King with theſe. And beſide theſe ſhamefull practices of his againſt his father; hee alſo had letters which hee had counterfaited againſt his brethren. For Archelaus and Philip, two of the kings ſonnes were at that time at Rome to ſtudie, who were very toward young men: and for that Antipater feared they might be ſome hinderance to him, in that which he expected, hee haſted by all means poſſible to make them away. And the better to effect his purpoſe, he counterfaited D letters in his friends names that were at Rome, and he for money got others to write, that theſe two young men vſed in taunting wiſe to raile againſt their father, and openly to complaine of the death of Alexander and Ariſtobulus: and that they took it in bad part that they were ſent for home (for their father ſent word that they ſhold come away) & thereat Antipater was moſt troubled. For he before his departure from Iudæa to Rome procured ſuch like letters to be forged againſt them at Rome; and ſo deliuering them to his father, that hee might auoid all ſuſpicion, ſeemed to excuſe his brethren, affirming ſome things that were written to be lies; other things to be offences, whereunto young men were prone. At which time he gaue great ſummes of money to them in whoſe names he had counterfeited the letters againſt his brethren: hereby as it E were hyring them to be ſecret. He gaue them alſo rich apparell, and Tapiſtrie of curious work: alſo ſiluer and golden cups, with many things more, to the end that by the precious gifts and rewards which he beſtowed, he might haue all things kept cloſe; ſo that at his returne hee made his father account that he had ſpent two hundred talents, the greateſt portion whereof was conſumed in following the law againſt Syllæus. Antipaters ſmall faults were all hid by a greater: for al they that had bin tortured gaue euidence againſt him, how that he practiſed his fathers death, and the letters witneſſed how againe hee went about to make away other two of his brethren: and yet for all this, none of thoſe who came out of Iudæa to Rome, bare him ſo much good will as to giue him intelligence what troubles were in the court at home, although it was ſeuen moneths after hee was conuicted, before hee came to Iudæa from Rome. Peraduenture they F who were minded to tell him all, were forced to hold their peace by the ghoſts of them who were put to death. At laſt he ſent letters from Rome to his father, that now hee would ſhortly returne home, and that Cæſar had diſmiſſed him very honorably. The King deſired greatly that the Traitor were in his power; and fearing that if he had an inkling of any matter, that he would looke to himſelfe, fained great kindneſſe towards him, and ſent backe againe vnto him very louing and familiar letters, willing him to haſten his returne: for if he made haſte, it might be hee ſhould obtaine pardon for his mothers offence: for Antipater vnderſtood that ſhe was baniſhed.

Ant. lib. 18. cap. 8. Antipater is ſolicited by Herod with many kind wordes to haſten his returne.

The yeare of the world, 3961. before the Nativitie of Christ, 3.

About this time he receiued a letter at Tarentum, wherby he vnderstood the death of Pherorás; and greatly lamented it, which diuers thought well of. Yet as farre as one may coniecture, the cause of his griefe was, that his treason went not forward as hee wished; and hee did lament Pherorás so much, as though hee had lost one to effect his treacherie. Moreouer, hee feared least that which had passed should come to light, and least the poyson should be found: yet when he came to Cilicia, & there receiued his fathers letters, which before we mentioned, he then made great haste homeward: yet when he came to Celenderis, he began earnestly to thinke vpon his mothers mishap, his minde as it were presaging some sinister fortune. And the wiser sort of his friends about him counselled him not to goe to his father, till such time as he were certaine for what cause his mother was banished and diuorced. For it was to be feared, that he should be accused also of the same that was laide to his mothers charge: But the vnwiser sort beeing more desirous to see their countrey, then to bethink them selues what was expedient for Antipater, admonished him to make haste, least that his long delay should breed any suspicion in his father, and least thereby he should giue occasion vnto malignant people ro raise vp slanders. For (sayde they) if any thing hath passed against you, it was in your absence, & were you in presence no man durst do nor speake against you; and it were a very vnwise part, for vecertaine suspicions to depriue him selfe of certaine felicity, and not to returne speedily vnto his father, and receiue the kingdome at his hands, who had him in whom onely his hope was. This counsell (for fortune wold haue it so) Antipater followed, & so arriued in the hauen of Cæsarea passing Sebaste, where contrarie to his expectation, he fell into great sorrow and admiration: for all men eschewed his companie, and no man durst come neer him. For although that hee was alwaies hated of them, yet then they had libertie to shew their hatred. Many abstained from comming to him for feare of the king: and now the rumour of those things which Antipater had done was knowne in euery Citie, and to euery man, only Antipater himselfe was ignorant thereof. For there was neuer any man brought thither with more maiestie then he, when he was to saile to Rome, nor neuer any man more basely entertained at his returne. And now vnderstanding of the massacre at home, he craftily made himselfe ignorant thereof; and notwithstanding that he was almost dead for feare, yet in his countenance hee counterfaited confidence. For hee could not now possibly make any escape, nor rid himselfe out of those present dangers: and yet hee heard no certaine newes of matters at home, nor there: for the king by an edict had forbidden all men to giue him notice thereof: So that many times he comforted himselfe thus, that either all matters concerning him were yet secret, or if any thing was come to light, that he by policie and impudencie could aquit himselfe thereof; for these two were his refuge and hope. Being thus determined, hee went into the the kings palace alone without any of his friends and followers; which at the verie first gate were most contumeliously repulsed. And by chaunce Varus the ruler of Syria was there within: then he boldely going in to his father, came neere vnto him, as though hee would haue saluted him. But Herod stretching forth his hand and shaking his head, cried out, O thou that hast attempted to murther thy father, darest thou yet presume to offer to embrace me, who art guilty of so many treacheries! God confound thee, wicked wretch, and come not neer me till thou hast cleared thy selfe of all that which is laid against thee: for thou shalt haue iustice, and Varus shall be thy iudge, who is by good fortune now here. Go and premeditate how to acquite thee against to morrow, for I will giue thy subtill and crafty braine some time to do it.

Antipater hated in Cæsarea.

Antipaters entertainment at his fathrs hands.

Hereat Antipater was astonished with feare, that hee was not able to reply any thing, but so went his way. Presently his mother and his wife came vnto him, and told him all the proofes of treasons against him. Then he calling his wits together, bethought himselfe how to answer euery point. The next day the king caused an assembly of his friends and kinsfolks, and to them admitted Antipaters friends: and he and Varus sitting in iudgement, commanded all proofes to be brought, and witnesses to appeare: amongst whome were certaine of Antipaters mothers seruants, lately apprehended, who had letters from her to carry vnto him, to this effect. Forasmuch as all those things are now knowen vnto thy father, beware that thou return not vnto him before thou hast obtained some warrant of thy safety from Cæsar. These and others being brought in, Antipater also came in with them, and prostrating himselfe before his fathers feet, hee said: I beeseech thee, O father, beare no preiudicate opinion against me, & lend me an open eare whilst I purge my selfe: for if you please to giue me leaue, I will proue my self guiltlesse. But Herod with a vehement voice commanding him to hold his tongue, spake thus vnto Varus. I know Varus, that both thou, or anie other iust and indifferent Iudge, will adiudge Antipater to haue deserued death: and I feare me least you also should disdaine me for my bad fortune, and think me worthy

A of all calamities, who haue begotten ſuch ſonnes as you ſee. And yet this ſhould mooue thee ſo much the more to pitie mee, who haue been ſo mercifull and carefull for ſuch wicked caitifes. For I had alreadie appointed thoſe young men that are dead to be kings, and brought them vp at Rome, & gotten them Cæſars fauour: but they whom I had ſo much honored, & exalted vnto the crowne, became traitours againſt mine owne life, whoſe death was much available to Antipater. For his ſecuritie I ſought their in, becauſe he was a young man, and the next that ſhould ſucceede me: but this cruell beaſt being more then full gorged with my ſufferance & patience, hath emptied his ſtomach euen vpon my ſelfe, and thinketh my life too long, & is grieued that I liue to be old, & hath attẽpted to make himſelf king, not any other way but by murthering his father. And for what cauſe did this come to paſſe? for that I recalled him out of the field, where he was con-
B temptible; and caſting them off whom I had begotten of a Queene, appointed this to bee heire of my kingdom. I confeſſe vnto thee, Varus, my errour: for I incited them againſt mee, becauſe that for Antipaters ſake I depriued them of their right. For wherein had I ſo well deſerued of them, as at this mans hands? vnto whom, being yet aliue, I committed the ſway and rule of my kingdom, and openly in my will and teſtament declared him to be my heir and ſucceſſor: whoſe charges I with mine owne money haue ſtill ſupported, notwithſtanding that I had beſtowed vpon him the yearely reuenues of fifty talents. And lately when he was to ſail to Rome, I gaue him three hundred talents, and commended him vnto Cæſar, as the onely man of all my houſe, who had preſerued his fathers life. And what was their offence, if it bee compared with Antipaters? and what proofe was there of that, for which they ſuffered? none but that which this fellow trecherouſly inuented. Nay, I may boldly ſay ſo of him, who hath attempted to murther his father, C and now doth hope to colour all againe with craft & deceit. Beware Varus, that hee deceiue not thee: for I know this beaſt, and I euen now ſee by his fained teares, how probable a tale hee will tell. This fellow once warned me, that whileſt Alexander liued I ſhould beware of him, and not put euerie one in truſt with my perſon. This is he who was wont to go before mee into my bedchamber, and looke about in euerie corner, leaſt ſome ſhould haue lien in waite to haue effected any treaſon againſt me. This is he who watched me in my ſleepe, and through whom I thought my ſelfe ſecure: who cõforted me when I mourned for them that were put to death. This is hee who cenſured the good wil of his brethren when they were aliue. This was my defender & chãpion. O Varus, when I remember his crafts and ſubtilties, and all his counterfeitings; I ſcarcely thinke my ſelfe aliue, admiring how I eſcaped the hand of ſuch a traitor: and ſeeing that For-D tune ſtirreth vp thoſe of mine owne houſe againſt me, and that thoſe whom I moſt eſteeme of, are my greateſt enemies, I will bewaile mine owne fortune, and alone lament mine owne deſolation; and not one that hath thirſted after my blood ſhall eſcape, although proofe bee brought againſt euerie one of my children. And thus his heart being ſurcharged with ſorrow, hee was forced to kreake off his ſpeech: and preſently he commaunded Nicholaus, one of his friends, to ſhew all the proofes and euidences.

All this while Antipater lay proſtrate at his fathers feete, and lifting vp his head, hee cried aloud: Thou thy ſelfe, O father, ſufficiently purgeſt me. For how ſhould I be one who ſought to murther thee, when thy ſelf doſt confeſſe, that I alwayes haue preſerued thee from all dangers?
E Or if, as thou ſaiſt, I did it fainedly, was it probable that I wold be ſo circumſpect in other affairs, and at other times, and now in ſo weightie a matter, play the part of a fooliſh and ſenſeleſſe man? Nay, I might well think, that although ſuch a thought might haue beene kept ſecret from men, yet it could not be hidden from God, who ſeeth all things. Was I ignorant what befell my brethren, whom God ſo puniſht for their wicked intents towards thee? Or what ſhould cauſe mee to enuie at thy life? The hope of the kingdome? Why? I had the kingdome. Or a ſuſpicion of thy hatred towards mee? I knew thou louedſt me. Or any feare which I had of thee? Nay: in obeying thee I was feared of others. Perhaps want might cauſe mee thereto. Much leſſe. For who might ſpend more then I? Truly, if I had been the wickedſt perſon in the world, or the cruelleſt beaſt vpon the earth, yet ſhould I haue relented, being ouercome by the benefites of ſo lo-
F uing a father; ſeeing, as thy ſelfe haſt ſaid, thou didſt recall and prefer me before ſo many ſonnes. And thou yet aliue, didſt proclaime me king, and made me a ſpectacle to all men for to emulate, through the benefits thou beſtowedſt vpon me. O wretch that I am! O vnhappie time of my abſence out of my coũtry! what a head did I giue to enuy, & what opportunitie to malicious & deceitfull people? Yet, O father, it was for thy ſake, & about thy affaires that I went to Rome, that Syllæus might not triumph ouer thy old age. Rome can witneſſe my pietie, and Cæſar the Prince of the whole world, who often called me a louer of my father. Receiue here, O father, his letter, farre truer then theſe fained calumniatiõs againſt me: let theſe plead my cauſe, let theſe ſhew my affectiõ towards thee: remẽber how vnwilling I was to ſaile to Rome, knowing I had here in thy countrey many ſecret enemies. Thou like an vnwiſe father haſt caſt me away: thou forcedſt me to giue enuie time to frame accuſations againſt mee: but now I will come to the proofs of theſe matters. Behould here I am, who notwithſtanding a murtherer of my father, yet did I neuer ſuffer any misfortune by ſea nor land: Is not this, O father, a ſufficient argument of my innocencie? For I know father, that before God and thee I am condemned: & being condemned, I beſeech thee, giue not credit to reports extracted by torments: let me be burned, inflict all tormẽts vpon me, ſpare not my wicked bodie. For if I be a murtherer of my father, I muſt not die without torments: crying out aloud after this manner, and weeping, he moued all that were preſent, and Varus alſo to compaſſion; but Herod onely abſtained from teares, for his anger gaue attention to the truth. And preſently Nicholaus at the kings commaundement making a long ſpeech of Antipaters craft and ſubtiltie, tooke away all hope of mercie, and began a verie bitter accuſation, aſcribing all miſchiefe which had befallen that kingdome vnto him, and eſpecially the death of the two brethren, who through his calumniations were made away: affirming alſo that hee vſed treacherous practices againſt thoſe who were yet aliue, fearing leaſt they ſhould ſeek to ſucceed in the kingdome: for he who had prepared poyſon for his father, would much leſſe ſpare his brethren. And then comming to the proofe of his pretence to poyſon his father, hee declared in order all euidence thereof, aggrauating his offence by Pheroras; as though Antipater alſo were the cauſe why hee purpoſed to murther his brother; and how he had corrupted the kings deereſt friends; and ſo filled the whole court with wickednes. And when he had accuſed him of many other things, and brought proofe thereof, he ended his ſpeech.

Nicholaus by the kings commaund beginneth a moſt hainous and bitter accuſation againſt Antipater.

Nicholaus peroration.

Then Varus when hee had commaunded Antipater to make anſwer vnto thoſe things, and that he ſaid nothing more, then God is a witnes of my innocencie, hee called for the poyſon and gaue it to one that was condemned to die, who hauing drunke thereof preſently died. Then Varus talked ſecretly with Herod, and what was done there in that councel he wrote vnto Cæſar. Yet notwithſtanding when Herod had ſent Antipater to priſon, he ſent meſſengers vnto Cæſar, to ſhew him his hard fortune and calamitie. After this it was prooued that Antipater wrought treaſon againſt Salome. For one of Antiphilus ſeruants came from Rome, and brought letters in the name of Acmes, who was one of Iulia her maides, which ſhe writ vnto the king, telling him that ſhe found a letter of Salomes amongſt Iulias letters; and ſo for good will ſhee had ſent it him: the letter which ſhe affirmed to be Salomes, contained many bitter inuectiues againſt Herod, and many accuſations. But theſe letters were written and fained by Antipater, who for money had perſwaded Acmes ſo to doe, as wee haue ſaid: for the letter which ſhee writ to Antipater euidently ſhewed it to bee ſo: for ſhee wrote as followeth. I haue written vnto thy father as you requeſted me, and ſent alſo other letters: and I aſſure my ſelfe he will not ſpare his ſiſter, if he doe but reade the letters: and you may do well, ſeeing I haue performed all your requeſts, that now you would be mindfull of your promiſe. This letter againſt Salome & others being found to be counterfaited, the king began to doubt that Alexander was made away by ſuch counterfaited letters: and he was verie angrie that he had almoſt put his ſiſter to death, through Antipaters deuice. Wherefore he no longer delaied to puniſh him for all, yet hee was hindred by a great ſickneſſe from accompliſhing his purpoſe. Hee alſo ſent letters vnto Cæſar concerning Acme the maid, and Salomes falſe accuſation, and changed his teſtament, and blotted out the name of Antipater, and in his roome wrote Antipas, leauing out Archelaus and Philippus, who were the elder brethren, becauſe Antipater had accuſed them. And hee bequeathed vnto Cæſar a thouſand talents, beſide many other rich gifts: and to his wife and children, and kindred, and libertines, about fiue hundreth, and gaue euerie one a great gift, either in ground or money, and honoured his ſiſter Salome with moſt rich gifts. And thus he corrected his will.

The venome tried vpon a condemned man.

Herod intendeth Antipaters puniſhment, & therfore blotteth his name out of his Teſtament.

Of the goulden Eagle, and of Antipaters and Herods death.

Ant. lib. 17. cap. 8.

HErods diſeaſe encreaſed, partly through age, & eſpecially for his griefe and ſorrow: for he was now threeſcore and ten yeares olde; and his mind was ſo troubled by the death of his children, that though he were in health, yet he tooke no pleaſure in any thing: and his ſicknes was ſo much the more grieuous vnto him, becauſe that Antipater was yet aliue; for he purpoſed to put him to death when he was recouered of his ſicknes. To encreaſe his calamitie

A ty, there aroſe a tumult amongſt the people. For there were in the City two ſophiſters, who made a ſhewe as though they were very skilfull in their country lawes, & for that were renowmed all ouer the countrey. One of them was named Iudas who was ſonne vnto Sepphoræus : the other was called Matthias ſonne vnto Margalus. Theſe two were followed by a great many yong men, ſo that when they expounded the law they had an aſſembly like a great army, all yong men. Theſe two hearing that the king partly by griefe, and partly by his diſeaſe was very like to die, ſpake vnto their acquaintance, ſaying, that it was now a fit time wherein God might be reuenged, & thoſe things which were made againſt their countrey lawes taken away: for it was a great offence to God to permit the Images or ſhapes, or likeneſs of any liuing thing to be in the temple. This they ſaid, becauſe the king had ſet a golden eagle vpon the chiefeſt porch of the temple, B which the Sophiſters now willed the yong men to take away, ſaying that it was meritorious, although danger might enſue thereon, yea euen to die for their countrey lawes. For they that died for ſuch a cauſe ſhold haue their ſoules immortall & enioy euerlaſting bliſſe: & that many vnwiſe men ignorant of that doctrine, ſo loued their liues, that they choſe rather to dy by ſickneſſe then to ſpend their liues in a vertuous quarrell. Whilſt they ſaid thus, there was a rumor ſpred that the king was now at the laſt caſt : whereat the young men beeing incouraged, about noon when many were walking in the temple, they let themſelues downe from the top of the temple with great ropes, and ſo with hatchets cut downe the Eagle : Whereof the Captaine of the ſouldiers being aduertiſed, accompanied with a great many ſoldiers, went ſpeedily to the temple, & took almoſt fortie of the young men, and caried them to the King. Who firſt of all asked them, if they C were ſo bold as to cut downe the golden Eagle: and they confeſſed they had don it: then he demanded by whoſe commaundment? they anſwered by the commandement of their countrey lawes. After this it was asked them why they who were preſently to die were ſo ioifull? they anſwered, for that after death they hoped to enioy many good things and eternall bliſſe. The king hereat greatly moued with anger, ouercame his diſeaſe and went forth and made a ſpeech to the people, wherein he inueighed againſt them as Church-robbers, and that vnder pretence and colour of their countrey lawes and religion they attempted great matters, and adiudged them as impious people worthy of death. The people fearing that he would torture many to learne who fauoured that act, requeſted him that firſt the authors of that crime, & then thoſe that were found guiltie therin ſhould receiue puniſhment: and that he wold remit the offence to al the people beſides. The king with much ado entreated, cauſed the yong men that let themſelues down in cords, D and the Sophiſters to be burned, and the reſt which were taken in that act to be beheaded. After this the kings ſickneſſe ſpred ouer his whole body, and he was afflicted with moſt grieuous pain; for he had a vehement ague, and an itch ouer all his body, which was intolerable, and a daily colicke, and his feete were ſwollen, as though he had the dropſie: his belly was ſwollen, and priuie members putrefied, ſo that wormes bred in the putrefied places. He was alſo ſhort-winded and he was grieuouſly tormented with difficultie of breath, & a conuulſion of the whole body: ſo that ſome ſaid that this was a puniſhment laid vpon him for the death of the two Sophiſters. Herod notwithſtanding he was afflicted with ſo many & grieuous ſickneſſes, yet was hee deſirous to liue, and ſought remedy wherby he hoped for health. At laſt he paſſed ouer Iordan, where he E vſed the warme waters of Calliroe which runne into the lake of Aſphaltites, & are ſo ſweet that men vſe to drinke of them. There the Phyſicians cauſed his body to bee bathed in hot oyle, and it was therewith ſo diſſolued that his ſight failed, and he was as though he were dead: whereat thoſe that were about him being troubled with their cries cauſed him to look vp, & now deſpairing of life he willed fiftie Drachmes to be diſtributed vnto euery ſouldier, and great ſummes of money to the captaines and his friends.

Herod ſeeketh remedy in his ſickneſs at the hot bathes.

As he returned, when he came to Iericho, hee was in very great likelihood to die of melancholy, and there he deuiſed a wicked fact: for he cauſed the chiefe men of euery towne and village in all Iudæa to be aſſembled together, and then he ſhut them vp in a place called the Hippodrome: and calling vnto him Salome his ſiſter, and Alexas her husband; I know quoth he, that the F Iewes will make feaſts for ioy of my death, yet if thou wilt do my command, I ſhall be mourned for, and I ſhall haue a princely funeral. Therfore ſo ſoon as I haue giuen vp the ghoſt, cauſe ſouldiours to compaſſe theſe men, whom I haue here in hold, and kill them all: for ſo all Iudæa and euery houſhold thereof ſhall againſt their will bewaile my death. As thus hee commanded this to be done, the Legates came which he had ſent to Rome, bringing him letters, wherin was ſhewed how Acmes Iulia her maid, was by Cæſars command put to death, and Antipater condemned to die: yet Cæſar writ that if his father had rather baniſh him, he would condeſcend therun-

to also. Herod with this newes was something refreshed, yet presently with paine he was ouer- G come: for he both was troubled with a vehement cough, & almost pined with fasting, so that he thought to hasten his owne death; and taking an apple in his hand, he called for a knife: for hee was accustomed to cut the meate which he did eate; and then looking about him, least any standing by might hinder him, he lifted vp his arme to strike himself. But Achiabus his cousin ran hastily vnto him, and stayed his hand: and presently there was made great lamentation throughout the kings palace, as though the king had been dead. Antipater hauing speedy newes hereof, was glad, and took courage, and promised the keepers a peece of money to let him go. But the chiefest of them did not onely deny to doe it, but also went presently to the king, and told him all what Antipater requested. Herod hearing this, lifted vp his voice with more strength then was meete for a sicke man, and commanded his guard to goe and kill Antipater, and bury him in the H Castle called Hyrcanium. And then againe he altered his testament, and writ Archelaus his eldest sonne, who was brother to Antipas, for king, and appointed Antipas for Tetrarch. Fiue daies after the death of his sonne Antipater, Herod died: hauing reigned thirty and foure yeares after he slew Antigonus, and thirty seauen yeare after that the Romans had declared him king. And in all other things he was as fortunate as any man; for he being but a priuate person, got the crowne and kept it, and left it vnto his posteritie: but in his household affaires hee was most infortunate. Salome, before it was knowne that the king was dead, went forth with her husband, and released all those that were in hold, whom the king commanded to be slaine; saying, that the kings minde was now altered, and therefore he gaue them all licence to depart: and after their departure the I kings death was published to the souldiers, who together with the other multitude were assembled in the Amphitheater at Iericho. Where Ptolemaus keeper of the Kings seale made a speech vnto them, and began to to say that Herod was now happy; and comforted the multitude, and so he read vnto them a letter which the King left, wherein he earnestly requested the souldiers to fauour and loue his successor. After the Epistle read, hee recited the Kings testament, wherein Philip was appointed heire of Trachon, and the places thereunto adioyning; Antipas designed Tetrarch, and Archelaus King. Him also he commanded to beare his ring vnto Cæsar, and withal notice and intelligence of the estate of the kingdom, whereof he had been gouernour, fast sealed in writing: for he appointed Cæsar to be ouerseer of all his ordinances, vnto whose pleasure hee left the performance of his testament. This was no sooner read, but presently the skies were filled with the voyces and cries of the people, who did congratulate Archelaus; and the souldiers and the people came in companies vnto him, promising their fauour and furtherance, and desired God alwaies to assist him. This done, euery one was busied about the Kings funerals: where Archelaus spared no cost, but buried the King with all royall pompe possible. The Beere whereon he was carried was adorned with gold & precious stones: vpō it lay a bed wrought with purple, whereupon was laid the dead corps of the King couerd also with purple, with a crowne on his head, and a diadem of pure gold, and a sceptel in his right hand. About the Beere were his sonnes and kinsfolke: and the guard, and bands of Thracians, Germans, and Gauls all went before in order, as though they had gone to L warres. The rest of the souldiers in warlike order did follow their Captaines and leaders, and 500. seruants and libertines carried perfumes. And thus the corps was carried the space of two hundreth furlongs into the Castle named Herodion: where, as himselfe had appointed, it was interred. And this was the end of king Herod.

CHAP. I.

Of Herods ſucceſſour Archelaus, and how he entred into the Temple, and the mutinie that aroſe for the reuenge of thoſe that vvere executed for taking downe the golden Eagle.

F ARchelaus being appointed ſucceſſor in the kingdome of Herod late dead, neceſſitie conſtrained him to go to Rome, which iourney gaue occaſion of new broyles. For after that for ſeuen dayes ſpace hee had celebrated his fathers funerals, and largely feaſted the people (for this is a cuſtome amongſt the Iewes, which bringeth manie of them to pouertie; yet he that doth not ſo is reputed impious) hee went vnto the Temple attired in a white garment, where he was with great ioy receiued of the people; and he himſelfe ſitting in a tribunal ſeat & a throne of gold, did verie curteouſly admit the people to his preſence: and than-thanked them for their diligent care vſed in his fathers funerals, and for that they exhibited honour vnto him, as though he were alreadie King. Yet he ſaid that hee would not take vpon him the authoritie nor name of a king, till ſuch time as his ſucceſſion was approued by Cæſar, vvho by his fathers teſtament was Lord & maiſter of all: and for that cauſe he withſtood the ſouldiers at Iericho, when they would haue crowned him. But he promiſed, that if he were confirmed king by thoſe who were in authoritie, he would largely recompence both the ſouldiers and the people for their good will; & that he fully purpoſed to be better vnto them then his father was. The multitude hereat greatly reioyced, and made preſent triall of his minde and purpoſe; for ſome cried out, requeſting that the tribute might be no more exacted. Others deſired that the yearly paiments might ceaſe. Others requeſted to giue all priſoners libertie. Archelaus in fauour of the people granted all their requeſts: & then offering ſacrifices, he banquetted with his friends: when ſodainly after the noone time of the day a great multitude deſirous of alteration (the common lamentation for the kings death being ceaſed) began a priuate mourning, bewaling their miſchance whom Herod had put to death for pulling down the goulden Eagle frō off the porch of the Temple. This ſorrow was not ſecret, but the whole citie did reſound with laments for them, that were thought to haue loſt their liues for the temple and their countrie lawes. They alſo cried that reuenge was to be taken vpon them, whō Herod for that fact rewarded with money. And that firſt of all, he who by Herod was conſtituted high Prieſt, vvas to bee reiected, and another more holy & deuout to be put in his place. Archelaus, although hee was hereby moued to reuenge, yet becauſe he was preſently to take ſuch a iourney, abſtained frō it, fearing leſt that if he brought the multitude into hatred of him, they might hinder him. Wherfore he ſought rather by admoniſhing them, then by force to reclaime thoſe that were ſeditious, and ſent the Gouernour of the ſouldiers to requeſt them to bee pacified. But the authours of that ſedition ſo ſoone as he came to the temple, before he ſpake one word, threw ſtones at him: and in like manner they vſed others ſent after him to appeaſe them (for Archelaus diſpatcht many meſſengers vnto them) whom they ſpitefully intreated, making a ſhew that if they had beene more in number, they wold not haue beene appeaſed. Therfore when the feaſt of vnleauened bread drew nigh, which the Iewes call Eaſter, vvherein an infinite number of ſacrifices were appointed; an innumerable multitude of people came out of all villages thereabout for deuotion ſake to that ſolemnitie: and they who ſo lamented the death of the Sophiſters, remained in the Temple, ſeeking by all meanes to nouriſh their ſedition. Which Archelaus fearing, ſent a band of ſouldiers and a Tribune with them, to take the chiefe of the ſeditious, before ſuch time as they had drawne vnto them the multitude of the people: againſt whom the whole number being ſtirred vp, ſlew a great many of them with ſtones; and the Tribune himſelfe being ſore hurt, had much ado to eſcape. And when they had ſo done, they preſently went and offered ſacrifice, as though that no hurt had beene done. But Archelaus perſwaded himſelfe that the multitude would not bee appeaſed without ſlaughter: wherefore he ſent vnto them the whole armie, the footmen into the citie, and the horſemen into the field, who inuading the ſeditious people as they were ſacrificing ſlew of them almoſt three thouſand, and ſcattered the reſidue into the mountaines neere adioyning. There were alſo Criers who followed Archelaus, and proclaimed by vertue of his commaund that euerie one ſhould depart home to his houſe: ſo euerie one notwithſtanding the holineſſe of the day departed. But hee accompanied with his mother Popla, Ptolemæus and Nicholaus his friends, went vnto the ſea coaſt, leauing Philip for Gouernour of the kingdome, and ouer his houſhold: with them departed Salome and her children, and the kings brethren and kinred, vnder pretence to aſſiſt Archelaus to the crowne, but indeed it was to informe Cæſar of that which was done in the Temple againſt the law.

And ſo Sabinus for the loue of Varus, neither entred the Caſtles, nor ſhut vp Herods treaſure from Archelaus, but promiſed that he would let all alone till Cæſar vnderſtood thereof. Antipas elected king by Herods former teſtament ſtriueth with Archelaus for the kingdom.

A crowne alleaging that Herods firſt teſtament was of more force then the laſt, and that hee in the firſt was declared king; and both Salome and many more of his kinred, who ſayled with Archelaus, promiſed him their aide. He tooke with him his mother, and Ptolemæus, brother vnto Nicholaus, perſwading himſelfe that they for their truſtineſſe and loyaltie vnto Herod, would ſtand him in great ſteed: for this Ptolemæus was Herods deareſt friend. Hee had alſo great confidence in Irenæus his orator, becauſe he had an excellent grace in pleading, in ſo much as he refuſed the counſell of them who ſought to perſwade to yeeld vnto Archelaus, both for his age, and for the laſt teſtament of his father. Now he was well beloued of all his kinred at Rome, becauſe they hated Archelaus, and eſpecially thoſe that deſired to liue at libertie, and either to bee gouerned by the Romans, or elſe to haue Antipas for their king. And to further him the more, hee vſed Sabinus letters vnto Cæſar, wherin Archelaus was accuſed, and Antipas commended. Therefore Salome, and the reſt of their complices brought the accuſations vnto Cæſar. And after them Archelaus deliuered al that which he had done, in writing, & withal his fathers ring by Ptolemæus; & the reaſons of that which he had done he ſent incloſed vnto Cæſar. Cæſar pondering with himſelf what both parties alledged, and the greatneſſe of the kingdome, and large reuenues, & number of Herods children, reading alſo the letters of Varus and Sabinus, hee called the chiefe of the Romanes to counſell. Wherein Caius the ſonne of Agrippa, and his daughter Iulia, by his aſſignment, ſate in the firſt place (this Caius was Cæſars adopted ſonne) and ſo hee licenced the parties to pleade their rights. Then Antipater Salomes ſonne being the moſt eloquent of all Archelaus aduerſaries, offered himſelfe to be his accuſer, for that Archelaus ſeemed now in wordes to contend for the kingdome, which he had alreadie poſſeſt himſelfe of: and that hee did now trouble Cæſars eares with vaine cauillations, whom he would not wiſh to iudge of his lawfull ſucceſſion. For after Herods death, hee ſuborned ſome to put a diadem vpon his head: and then ſitting in a throne of gold in kingly manner, he partly changed, partly aduanced the orders of the ſouldiers, and granted vnto the people their requeſts, which could not be effected but by a king. Hee had alſo ſet at libertie many men, who for great crimes were impriſoned by his father: and hauing done all this, he came now vnto Cæſar, to craue the ſhadow of the kingdome, the ſubſtance and bodie whereof he alreadie occupied: ſo that herein hee left nothing vnto Cæſar but a bare title. Moreouer, hee alledged that Archelaus did but counterfait ſorrow for his fathers death, faining himſelfe to mourne in the day time, and in the night he would be drunke, and rioted. Finally, he ſaid, that the ſedition of the people came by hatred thereof. But the force & drift of his ſpeech was altogether bent to declare the multitude ſlaine about the Temple: for he ſaid, that they only came againſt that feſtiuall day to offer ſacrifice, & that they themſelues were ſacrificed, as they were offering their ſacrifices which they brought; and that there were ſuch heapes of deade bodies in the Temple, as neuer by any forraine warres were ſlaine the like. Therefore Herod foreſeeing his crueltie, neuer iudged him worthie of the kingdome, till ſuch time as his memory fayled him: and that now being more ſicke in mind then bodie, hee knew not whom he named his ſucceſſour in his laſt will; eſpecially for that he had nothing wherein he could blame him, whom in his former will he appointed his ſucceſſour, when hee was in health both of mind and body. Yet (quoth he) put caſe Herod in his extreamitie knew what he did, yet (ſaid he) Archelaus hath depriued himſelfe of all kingly dignitie, hauing committed many things againſt the lawes. For (ſaid he) what will he be after he hath receiued authoritie from Cæſar, who before he receiued any, hath murdered ſo many? Antipater hauing ſpoken much to this effect, and at euerie accuſation taking witneſſe of his kinred that ſtood by, ended his ſpeech.

For they, for whoſe death Archelaus was now accuſed, were not only enemies of the kingdome, but alſo of Cæſar: and for other crimes obiected, hee ſhewed how that they were done euen by the counſell & perſwaſion of the aduerſaries. He alſo requeſted that the ſecond teſtament might be of force, for that therein Herod requeſted Cæſar to be a confirmer of his ſucceſſour. For he who had ſuch remēbrance, as to leaue the performance of his will to the diſcretion him who was Lord of all, did neither miſtake himſelf in appointing his heire, nor yet was depriued of his ſenſes, ſeeing hee knew by whom he ſhould be eſtabliſhed. When Nicholaus had ended his ſpeech, and declared all that he thought might make for Archelaus, Archelaus comming into the midſt of the Councell, proſtrated himſelfe at Cæſars feet: whom Cæſar curteouſly taking from the ground, ſhewed that he was worthie to ſucceed his father. Yet did he not pronounce a definitiue ſentēce: but the ſame day the Councell being diſmiſſed, he deliberated with himſelf, according to the euidence he knew, whether any of thoſe nominated in the two wils ſhould ſucceed

CHAP. II.

Of the fight and maſſacre at Ieruſalem betweene the Ievves and the Sabinians.

Ant. lib. 17. cap. 14. Sedition in Ieruſalem.

BEfore ſuch time as Cæſar determined any thing concerning this matter, Malthace the mother of Archelaus fell ſicke and died; and many letters came out of Syria, ſignifying that the Iewes had rebelled. Which Varus foreſeeing after the departure of Archelaus from thence, went vnto Ieruſalem to repreſſe and reſiſt the authours of that ſedition: and becauſe the multitude would not bee quiet, hee left one legion of the three which he brought out of Syria, in the Citie, and ſo hee returned vnto Antiochia. But Sabinus comming afterward to Ieruſalem, was the cauſe that the Iewes beganne a new broyle. For one while he forced the garriſons to render to him the Caſtles, another while hee rigorouſly made ſearch for the kings treaſure: and he was not onely aſſiſted by thoſe that Varus left there, but alſo hee had a great multitude of his owne ſeruants all armed to further his auarice. And in the feaſt of Pentecoſt (ſo called becauſe of the number of ſeuen weekes) the people aſſembled themſelues togither, not for religion ſake, but for anger and hatred: ſo that there was an infinite multitude of people which came out of Galilee and Idumæa, and Iericho, and the Countries beyond Iordan. Yet the Iewes which were inhabitants of the Citie ſurpaſſed the reſt both in number and courage: and they therefore parted themſelues into three bands, and made three camps: one vpon the North part of the Temple; the other on the South part, neere vnto the Caſtle called Hippodromus; the third on the Weſt part neere the palace, and ſo they beſieged the Romanes on euerie ſide. Sabinus greatly fearing them, both for their multitude, and for their courage, ſent many letters vnto Varus, earneſtly requeſting him with all ſpeed to bring ſuccour: for if hee did not, the whole legion would bee extinguiſhed. Hee himſelfe got him into the higheſt tower of the Caſtle Phaſaelus, which is ſo called by the name of Herods brother, whom the Parthians killed; and from thence he gaue a ſigne vnto the ſoldiers to iſſue out ſuddainely vpon their enemies: for himſelfe was in ſuch a feare that he durſt not come downe to the ſouldiers of whom he was gouernour. The ſouldiers obeying his commaund, iſſued into the Temple, and there fought a ſore battell with the Iewes: who hauing no bodie to aſſiſt them, being vnexperienced in warlike affaires, were ſoone conquered by them that were skilfull. At laſt, many Iewes got vpon the Porches, and caſt darts at them from the toppe thereof, ſo that they killed many: but the other could not reuenge themſelues of them, who fought againſt them from ſo high a place; neither could they ſuſtaine the force of them, who ioyned battaile with them; till at laſt they fired the porches, which for greatneſſe and curious worke were admirable. And ſo, many were either deſtroyed with the ſodaine fire, or elſe leaping downe amidſt their enemies, were by them ſlaine: others going backeward were caſt headlong from the wall: others deſpiaring of life killed themſelues with their owne ſwords: and they who priuily came came downe the walles, and aſſaulted the Romans, being aſtoniſhed with feare, were eaſily ouercome: till at laſt, all being eyther put to the ſworde, or caſt downe through feare, the treaſure dedicated to God, was left deſtitute of keepers; ſo that the Souldiers tooke away thereof about foure hundred talents, and that which they left Sabinus got.

But this loſſe of men and money ſtirred vp many moe Iewes, and thoſe more warlike then the firſt, againſt the Romans; who beſieging the kings palace, threatned all their deſtructions, vnleſſe they would preſently depart from thence: promiſing Sabinus and the legion leaue to depart if he ſo liked. Part of the kings ſouldiers, who of their owne accord fled vnto them, did aſſiſt them. But the moſt warlike and valiant amongſt them were three thouſand of Sebaſte, whoſe rulers were Rufus and Gratus; one, leader of the foot-men, and the other of the horſe-men; both which, although they had had no ſouldiers with them, for their valour of bodie, and counſaile, might yet haue beene a great helpe vnto the Romanes in thoſe warres. The Iewes earneſtly continued the ſiege, and aſſaulted the caſtle walls, crying vpon Sabinus to depart, and not to hinder them now after ſo long time to haue their countries liberty. Sabinus though with all his hart he wiſhed himſelf away, yet durſt he not truſt them; but he ſuſpected that their courteſie was but a plott M

A a plot to entrappe him: and on the other ſide hoping that Varus would come and help him, ſtill indured the daunger of the ſiege. At the ſame time there were tumults in many places of Iudæa, and many through opportunitie of the time aſpired to the kingdome. For in Idumæa two thouſand old ſouldiers, who had borne armes vnder Herod, gathering togither and hauing armed themſelues, came and fought with the kings forces, vvhome Achiabus the kings couſen reſiſted in the ſtrongeſt villages, alwaies eſchewing to fight in the open field. At Sephoris alſo a towne of Galilee, Iudas the ſonne of Ezechias the captaine of the theeues, vvho before was taken by king Herod, and had waſted that countrey, gathered togither a great multitude, and brake into the kings armory, and armed all his company, and fought againſt them who affected the royall dignitie. Alſo beyond the riuer, Simon one of the kings ſeruants being faire and of a huge ſta-
B ture, put a crowne vpon his owne head, and gathering together a companie of theeues, vvent about with them vnto Iericho and burned the kings palace and many faire and ſumptuous houſes there, and ſo got great prey by burning the houſes: & he had ſurely fired al buildings of account, had not Gratus captain of the kings footmen made haſte to meet him with the bowemen of Trachon, and the moſt warlike men of Sebaſte, where many footmen were ſlaine. But Simon though he fled into a ſtreight valley, yet he ouertooke him, and cut him ouerthwart the neck, and ſo hee fell down. In like manner other of the kings palaces neere Iordan by Bethara were burned, by a multitude of others gathered together in bands frō beyond the riuer. At this time a ſhepheard named Athrongæus preſumed to vſurpe the crowne: he was thereunto induced by the courage he bare, and the diſdaine of death. With this reſolution he armed his foure brethren, and euerie
C one of them had a companie armed, and they were as his captaines and champions to make incurſions: and he like a King medled onely with great affaires, and then he put a crowne vpon his head; and thus he continued a long time waſting the country, & killing eſpecially the Romans, and alſo the king ſouldiers; ſo that none of the Iewes eſcaped if they were in hope to gain by them. They alſo preſumed to meete a company of the Romans at Ammauns, who caried corne and armour vnto the legion, where they killed with darts one Arius a Centurion, and fortie of the moſt valiant amongſt them: and the reſt, being in like daunger, through the helpe of Gratus with the ſouldiers of Sebaſte eſcaped. When they had done many things in this manner againſt the inhabitants & ſtrangers, at laſt three of them were taken: the eldeſt by Archelaus: & the two others who were eldeſt after him, fell into the hands of Gratus and Ptolemæus: and the fourth yeelded himſelfe vnto Archelaus vpon compoſition: and thus at laſt they came to their end.

WHen Varus had receiued the letters of Sabinus, and of the nobles with him, fearing the whole legion, hee haſted to ſuccour them: Wherefore hee came to Ptolemais with two other legions and foure cornets of horſemen, where hee willed the kings forces,
E and the nobles to meete him. Moreouer, as he paſſed by Berytum, they accompanied him with 15. hundreth armed men. Aretas alſo the King of Arabia, for the hatred hee bare to Herod, vvas come with a great number of horſemen and footmen. Aſſoone as the hoſt was aſſembled, Varus incontinently directed part of his armie into Galilee adioyning thereto, and appointed a friend of his the ſonne of Caius for their gouernor, who preſently put them all to flight againſt whom he was ſent; and hauing taken the caſtle of Sephoris he fired it, and made the inhabitants thereof bond-ſlaues. Varus with the reſt of the armie went into Samaria, and tooke it; yet hee did the City no harme, becauſe he found that amiddeſt all thoſe tumults they had been quiet. When he had pitched his tentes at a village called Aun, which was in the poſſeſſion of Ptolemæus, the Arabians ſacked it, for they hated them who loued Herod. Frō thence they went to Sappho another
F ſtrong borough, which they in like manner ſacked & deſtroyed, with all the fruits & reuenewes they found there. All was filled with the ſlaughter and fiers which the Arabians made, and there was no end nor hinderance of their auarice. Alſo Varus commaunded Ammaus to bee burned, being angrie for the death of Arius, and the reſt that were ſlaine there: and the inhabitants thereof were ſcattered, euery one by flight ſeeking to ſaue himſelfe. From thence hee went to Ieruſalem, and at the ſight of him the Iewes fled and ſcattered themſelues, ſome here ſome there, all about the country: they that remained in the Citie excuſed themſelues, that they were not con-

After this, Nicholaus ſtood vp againſt them, and firſt of all acquited the Kings of the crimes laid to their charge: and then reproued his countrimen, for that they would not be eaſily gouerned, and by their owne nature would not, except they were forced, obey their King: and he alſo blamed the kinſmen of Archelaus, who ioyned with his accuſers. Cæſar hauing heard what both parts could ſay, diſmiſſed the Aſſembly. And within few daies after he gaue Archelaus halfe of the kingdom vnder the tittle of an Ethnarch, promiſing him moreouer to make him King, if he behaued himſelfe well: the other halfe he diuided into two Tetrarchies and gaue them to the reſt of Herods ſons: one vnto Philip, the other vnto Antipas, who contended with Archelaus for the crowne. Antipas his part lay from Galilee beyond the riuer Iordan, the reuenues wherof was two hundreth talents a yeare. And Philip had Batanæa and Trachon, and Auranitis, and part of Zeno his houſe neere Iamnia, the reuenues wherof amounted to one hundreth talents a yeare. Archelaus had in his Ethnarchy Idumæa and all Iudæa and Samaria, which was freed from the fourth part of their tribute, becauſe they rebelled not with the reſt. And theſe Cities were giuen him, ouer which hee was Lord, Stratons tower, Sebaſte, Ioppe and Ieruſalem. The reſt, Gaza and Gadara, and Hippon, Cæſar took from the kingdome, and ioyned them to Syria. Archelaus yearely reuenues amounted to foure hundreth talents a yeare. Cæſar alſo (beſide that which Herod left her) made Salome Lady of Iamnia, Azotus & Phaſaelis, and the Palace at Aſcalon, all which amounted to threeſcore talents a yeer. But Cæſar made her houſe ſubiect vnto Archelaus his Ethnarchy. And hauing diſtributed vnto the reſt of Herods kinred that which in his teſtament he left them, he gaue his two daughters that were virgins, ouer and aboue, fiue hundreth thouſand drachmes of ſiluer, and married them vnto Pheroras ſonnes: and hauing diuided Herods patrimony amongſt them, he alſo diſtributed that which Herod bequeathed vnto him, amounting vnto a thouſand talents, leauing himſelfe onely ſome iewell of ſmall value, which he reſerued in honour and remembrance of the dead.

Of the falſe ſuppoſed Alexander, and how he was taken.

AT the ſame time a certaine young man, a Iew borne, brought vp by a Libertine of Rome in the towne of Sidonia, being very like vnto Alexander whom Herod put to death, went to Rome, hauing one of his countrimen for his companion, who knew very well all the eſtate of the kingdome: by whom he receiuing inſtructions, affirmed, that they who ſhould haue put him and Ariſtobulus to death, being mooued to compaſſion, let them goe, and took two others in their roome like them. With this tale he deceiued many Iewes liuing in Creete, where he was honourably receiued, and from thence he ſailed to Melos, where he was yet entertained with greater pompe: and enriching himſelfe he vſed ſuch meanes, that hee got his hoſtes (which gaue him entertainement) to ſaile with him to Rome: and after arriuing at Dicæarchia, he receiued all manner of rich gifts of the Iewes which dwelled there, and there by his fathers friends was honoured as a King. For he was ſo like vnto Alexander, that they that had ſeene Alexander, and knew him well, would haue ſworne hee had beene Alexander. Wherefore all the Iewes at Rome deſired to ſee him, ſo that an infinit multitude followed him whitherſoeuer hee went in the ſtreets: and they ſo doted vpon him, that they carried him in a horſelitter, and at their owne proper coſt and charges prepared for him a royall traine.

ting of this offer, followed him to Cæsar, and declared himselfe to be a Iew, who for lucre sake (being very like him) counterfeited himselfe to be Alexander: affirming that hee had receiued such great gifts of the Cities by which hee passed, that he thought if Alexander had been aliue, hee should not haue receiued the like. Cæsar laught at this iest, and made false Alexander (for the ability of his body) a galley slaue, and put him to death who induced him thereto. Of the banishment and death of Archelaus.

Ant. lib. 17. cap. 19.

Archelaus being now made Prince, remembred the discord past, and in reuenge thereof he tyrannized not only ouer the Iewes, but also ouer the Samaritanes: and in the ninth yeare of his raigne the Iewes and Samaritanes sent Embassadors against him vnto Cæsar: and finally he was banished and sent to Vienna, a Citie of Gallia, and all his patrimony was confiscate vnto Cæsar. Before he was summoned to appeare before Cæsar, he reported that hee had a maruellous dreame: for he saw nine great eares full of corne deuoured by oxen; and presently sending for Prophets and Chaldæans, he demanded what that dreame betokened. Some interpreted it one way, and some another: but one Simon an Essean told him that the eares of corne I betokened years, and the oxen signified the changes & mutations of this world, for as much as in labouring the land, they turned vp and altred it: and therfore he was to raigne so many years as there were eares of corne in number; and then, after he had bidden many mutations hee should die. Fiue daies after this interpretation, Archelaus was sent for to Rome, to answere that before Augustus, whereof he was accused. I also thought it worth rehearsing to set downe the dreame of his wife Glaphyra daughter to Archelaus King of Cappadocia, who was first maried vnto Alexander brother vnto this man, and sonne to King Herod, by whom he was put to death, as we haue said before: after whose death she was maried to Iuba King of Lybia; and he being dead, she returned home to her father: and liuing in her widowhood at home with her father, Archelaus the Ethnarch beholding her, was so inflamed with her loue, that presently being diuorced from his K wife Mariamme, he maried her. Who shortly after she came into Iudæa, dreamed that she sawe Alexander her first husband standing before her, and saying vnto her, It had bin enough for thee to haue married the King of Lybia: but thou not contented therewith, commest againe to my house, greedy of a third husband; and which is worst of all, now married to mine owne brother. I will not conceale nor dissemble this iniury which thou dost me, but I will recouer you against your will. And she scarcely liued two daies after she had recounted this dreame.

Of Simon the Galilean, and the three sects amongst the Iewes.

Ant. lib. 18. cap. 12.

After that Archelaus his dominions were made a Prouince, a certaine Roman knight called Coponius was made gouernor thereof, receiuing authority from Cæsar to punish and put to death. In his time a Galilean named Simon incited his countrimen to reuolt, reprouing them for paying tribute to the Romans, and for being subiect to any mortall men, but God. This Simon was a Sophister, hauing a sect of his owne deuising, nothing like other sects. For there are three sects of Philosophers amongst the Iewes: one is that which the Pharisees do follow; another which the Sadduces do follow; the third is that which the Essens follow, which is the most famous of the three. The Essens are Iewes born, but they are most friendly to one another, who beside all other pleasures do eschew witchcraft: neither do they suffer themselues to be led with M their own affections, but account it a great vertue to abstaine from all vices and to keep chastity. For they refuse mariage, and account other mens children, put to them to be taught whil'st they be yong, as their kinsmen, whom they do diligently instruct in their manners and opinions; not for that they condemne mariage & propagation of mankind, but for that they think men should auoid womens intemperance, for they thinke that none of them keepe themselues truely to one man. Also they contemne riches, and all things with them are common, and no man amongst them

Three sects among the Iews, of which the Essens were the best.

The Essens doctrine of mariage.

Among the Essens, goods are common.

A them is richer then other. And they haue a law amongſt themſelues, that whoſoeuer will follow their ſect, he muſt make his goods common to them all: for ſo neither any amongſt them ſhall ſeeme abiect for pouerty, nor any great for riches ſake, but they haue as it were all equall patrimonies like brethren. They account it a ſhame to vſe oyle: and if any man againſt his will be anointed therwith, they vſe all diligence to wipe it away: for they account homelines beſt, and all their chothes are white. They haue amongſt them procurators, to ouerſee and vſe all things for their common benefit, and euery one ſeeketh the good of all, who are choſen from among them by a common conſent. They haue not one certain citie, but are in many cities: and if any of their ſect come vnto them from another place, they giue him any thing they haue, as if hee himſelfe were owner thereof. And in briefe, they goe boldly into thoſe, whom they neuer in their liues
B did ſee before, as though they were very familiarly acquainted with them: and therefore when they take a iourny, they only arme themſelues againſt theeues, and carry nothing with them els. In euery city there is one of them appointed, whoſe office is to haue a care of the gueſts, and ſee that they neither want clothes nor any thing elſe neceſſary for them. Al children vnder gouernment, brought vp by them, go apparelled alike, & they neuer change their apparell, nor ſhooes, except they haue clean worn their firſt apparel, or that by reaſon of long wearing they wil do no more ſeruice. They among themſelues neither buy nor ſell: but euery man that hath any thing that another wanteth, giueth him it, and taketh that of him which himſelfe needeth: yet euery one of them may take any thing he hath need of from whom hee pleaſeth, without any change. Aboue all, towards God they are very religious: for before the ſunne riſe they haue no profane
C talke, but they make certain vowes & praiers after the cuſtome of their country, as it were, praying that it may riſe vpon them. After this, euery one is diſmiſſed to practice the art he knoweth: and when euery one hath diligently labored till fiue of the clock, they all gather themſelues together again, and being couered with linnen clothes, ſo they waſh their bodies with cold water: and hauing thus purged themſelues, they haue a ſecret aſſembly, vnto the which no man that is not of their ſect is admitted: and ſo they come into the refectory as into a holy temple, all ſitting down with ſilence, & the baker ſetteth euery man in order a loafe, & the cook euery man a meſſe of pottage of one ſort. Then before meat the Prieſt giueth thankes, and no man may taſte any meat before they haue made their praiers vnto God. Likewiſe when dinner is ended, they pray againe: for both before and after they giue thanks vnto God the giuer of all, and then putting off
D that apparell as ſacred, they apply themſelues vnto their worke till euening. This done, they do as before, cauſing their gueſts to ſup with them, if by fortune any come. Their houſe is neuer troubled with cries or tumults, for euery one is appointed to ſpeake in his turne: ſo that they who are without the houſe eſteem their ſilence as ſome ſacred myſtery. The cauſe hereof is their continuall ſobriety, and that euery one is limited how much he ſhould eate or drinke. And although that in all others matters they are ruled by their gouernour, yet in theſe two, to wit compaſſionating and helping, they may doe as they thinke good: for euery one may when hee pleaſeth helpe thoſe whom he thinketh deſerue help: and when they pleaſe, giue meat to them that are in need. Yet may not they giue any thing to their kinred without the leaue of their Gouernour. Theſe men giue not place to anger, but refrain from wrath, keep their promiſe, and main-E taine peace, and account euery word they ſpeake of more force, then if they had bound it with an oath: and they ſhun oathes worſe then periury: for they eſteem him condemned for a lyer, who is not beleeued without he call God to witneſſe. They ſtudie diligently ancient Writers, chiefly gathering out of their writings, what is moſt conuenient for the ſoule and the bodie. Out of them they learne remedies for diſeaſes, and medicinable hearbs, and what is the proper effect of euery ſtone. Thoſe who are deſirous to be of their order, doe not ſtraightway conuerſe with them, but for a yeare before they liue out of their Colledge, and haue the ſame diet, giuing them alſo a little hatchet, and ſuch a girdle, as is before ſpoken of, and a white garment. But at the years end, if they perceiue him to be continent, then they take him into their refectory, and he is made partaker of purer waters (to the end he may continue chaſte) yet is he not admitted in common F amongſt them: for two years after this his tryall, they obſerue his life and manners: and at laſt, when he is thought worthy, then is he admitted to their common companie. And before he be receiued to the common table, firſt hee proteſteth with great and ſolemne oathes, that hee will worſhip God, and obſerue iuſtice & fidelity towards all men, & neither willingly hurt any man, nor iniure any one for another mans command, but that he will alwaies hate the wicked, and aſſiſt the good, and euer keep his faith to all, but eſpecially to his ſuperiours. For no man can obtaine the power of principality without the will and good pleaſure of God: and that if he be put in authority ouer others, he neuer will abuſe it to the preiudice of thoſe that are vnder him, and neither exceed the reſt in apparell, nor in any other ambitious pompe: that he will alwaies loue the truth, and euer endeuour to confute liers: and that he will keep his hands from ſtealing, and his ſoule pure from all vniuſt gaine: and that he will not conceale any myſteries, or ſecrets from his companions, nor reueale them to any ſtrangers, although he ſhould be therto compelled by death. Adding moreouer, that they will neuer deliuer any doctrine, ſaue that which they haue receiued; and that they will auoid theft, and diligently keep the books of their doctrine, and the names of Angels. And with theſe oathes they try, and as it were arme thoſe who enter into their order. Thoſe of their congregation, who ſhall be condemned, they thruſt out of their compa-nie: and whoſoeuer is ſo puniſhed, for the moſt part dieth a miſerable death; for hauing once taken his oath, it is not lawfull for him to take meat of any ſtranger; ſo that feeding on graſſe like beaſts, at laſt he periſheth through famine. For which cauſe oftentimes they moued with compaſſion, receiue many into their order againe, euen ready by famine to yeeld vp the ghoſt; iudging them to haue endured penance enough for their offences, who with famine were almoſt brought vnto deaths doore. They are very ſeuere, and iuſt in their iudgement; and to decide any matter, there is neuer fewer of them then a hundreth, and that which by them is agreed vpon, is an irreuocable ſentence. Next after God they reuerence the lawmaker, inſomuch as if one reuile him, they forthwith condemne him to death. They greatly reuerence old men, and a multitude: ſo that if ten of them ſit together, no man of them muſt ſpeake without hee be licenced thereto by nine of the company. They alſo muſt not ſpet in the midſt of the aſſembly, nor on the right hand. And they are more ſeuere then any other Iewes in obſeruing the Sabbaths: And they do not only abſtaine from dreſſing meat that day, but alſo they may not remoue any veſſell out of his place, nor go to the priuie. Vpon other daies they dig a pit a foot deep into the ground with the hatchet, which (as we before ſaid) euery one at his entrance into their order hath giuen him, and then couering themſelues diligently with their garment, leaſt they ſhould doe iniury to the light of heauen, in that pit they eaſe themſelues; and then couer their ordure with the earth they tooke out of the pit: and this they do in moſt ſecret places.

The Eſſeans eſteeme the ſoule immortall, but they beleeue not the reſurrection of the dead.

The Grecians opinion of the ſoule of man.

And although this purging of their bodies be naturall, yet do they by waſhing purifie themſelues after it, as after great vncleannes. Furthermore they amongſt themſelues are diuided into foure orders, according to the times which they haue taken to follow this exerciſe of life, & they who are iuniors, are ſo far different from the ſeniors, that if they do but touch one of them, they preſently purifie themſelues, as though they had bin profaned by a ſtranger. They are long liued, ſo that moſt of them liue a hundreth yeares, which I iudge is by reaſon of their wel ordered diet and their temperancy. They contemne aduerſity, and by counſell and diſcretion ouercome torments. They preferre an honorable death before life. And the warres which the Iewes made againſt the Romans, ſhewed what courage & hardineſs they haue in all things. For being then cõpelled by breaking of the members of their bodies, and fiery torments, and all kinde of tortures which were laid vpon them, to reuile their lawmaker, and to eat any meat forbidden: yet could they not be forced to any of theſe; neither would they intreat the torturers, nor ſhew any ſorow amidſt their torments. Nay, in the very midſt of their griefs and paines they ſcoffed at their tormenters; and laughing, ioyfully yeelded vp their ſoules, as though they hoped to receiue them againe. For it is an opinion amongſt them, that the body is corruptible, and that the matter therof is not perpetuall: but yet the ſoules remain for euer immortal; who paſſing out of a moſt pure & ſubtle aire, wrap themſelues in bodies as in priſons, being as it were drawn therunto by a natural inclination. And when they are deliuered out of theſe carnall bonds, then preſently as freed frõ a long bondage they ioyfully mount aloft. And of the good ſoules they ſay, as did the Grecians; that they liue beyond the Ocean ſeas in a place of pleaſure, where they are neuer moleſted with raine, nor ſnow, nor heat, but haue alwaies a ſweet & pleaſant aire coming out of the Ocean. But the wicked ſouls (as they ſay) go into a place very tempeſtuous, where there is alwaies as it were winter weather, alwaies ful of lamentations of thoſe, who for euer are to be puniſhed. But I iudge that the Greekes are of this opinion, when they ſay there is an Iſle for the vertuous, whom they call Heroes & half-gods: and that the ſoules of the wicked go to a place in hell, whereas it is fained, ſome to be tormented, as Syſiphus, Tantalus, Ixion & Titius. Which they did firſt inuent for this purpoſe, becauſe thoſe who are of good diſpoſition, are made better in this life by hope of ſome reward in the life to come: and the wicked are (as they thought) hereby reſtrained for feare of eternall torments, which if they continue in wickednes they ſhall endure. There is another colledge of theſe Eſſeans agreeing with the former, both in apparell, meat, and kind of life, and obſerue the ſame lawes and ordinances; only they differ in the opinion of mariage, affirming that they who abſtain from mariage, do cut off the greateſt part of mans life, to wit, ſucceſſion of mankind. For (ſay they) if all men ſhould follow that opinion, preſently all mankind would periſh: yet notwithſtanding theſe people are ſo continent, that for three yeares ſpace they make triall of the women they are to marry, and when they haue proued them fit to beare children, then they marry them. None of them muſt lie with their wiues when they are B with child, to ſhew that they do not marry to ſatisfie luſt, but for to haue children. When their wiues waſh themſelues, they are couered with a garment as the men are: & this is the maner and cuſtome of this ſect. Of the two former ſects, the Phariſees are ſaid to be moſt skilfull in interpreting the law, and are of opinion that all things are to be attributed to God, and Fate: and that euery man may of his owne power doe good or ill, yet (ſay they) deſtiny helpeth in euery action: and that the ſoules of men are all incorruptible, but onely the ſoules of good men goe into other bodies, and the ſoules of wicked men are ſent into euerlaſting paine. But the Sadduces deny Fate and Deſtiny, and affirme that God is the author of no euill; auowing likewiſe that a man hath free will to doe well or ill, and euery man may chuſe whether he will be good or bad: and they generally deny both paines and rewards for the ſoules after this life. The Phariſees are ſo- C ciable and louing one to another: but the Sadduces are at diſcord among themſelues, liuing like ſauage beaſts, and as vncurteous to their owne ſect as to ſtrangers. This is all which I haue to ſpeake concerning the Philoſophers among the Iewes. Now I will returne to my purpoſe.

Of the Cities which Philip and Herod builded, and of Pilates gouernment.

D ARchelaus his Ethnarchie being now made a Prouince, the reſt of his brethren, to wit Philip and Herod who was ſurnamed Antipas, gouerned their Tetrarchies. And Salome dying left vnto Iulia by her teſtament the Toparchie which ſhe ruled, as alſo Iamnia and a ground ſet with palme trees in Phaſaelis. When Tiberius Cæſar after the death of Auguſtus was made Emperour of Rome, after that hee had raigned ſeuen and fifty yeares, ſix moneths, and two daies, Herod and Philip remaining in their Tetrarchies; Philip bulded a citie neere vnto the head of Iordan in the countrey of Paneade, and called it Cæſarea; and another hee built in the lower part of Gaulanitis, and named it Iulias. Herod in Galilee built the Citie called Tiberias, and another in Peræa on this ſide Iordan, which alſo he named Iulias. Pilate being ſent by Tiberius to be gouernour ouer the Iewes, cauſed in the night time the ſtatua of Cæſar to be brought into Ieruſalem couered: which thing within three daies after cauſed a great tumult among the Iewes; for they who beheld it, were aſtoniſhed, and moued, as though now the E law of their countrey were profaned: for they hold it not lawfull for any picture or image to be brought into the citie. At their lamentation who were in the citie, there was gathered together a great multitude out of the fields adioyning, and they went preſently to Pilate then at Cæſarea, beſeeching him earneſtly that the Images might bee taken away out of Ieruſalem, and that the lawes of their countrey might remain inuiolated. When Pilate denied their ſuit, they proſtrated themſelues before his houſe, and there remained lying vpon their faces, for fiue daies and nights neuer mouing. Afterward Pilate ſitting in his tribunall ſeat was very carefull to call all the Iewes together before him, as though there hee would haue giuen them an anſwere: when vpon the ſudden a company of armed ſouldiers (for ſo it was prouided) compaſſed the Iewes about with a triple rank: the Iewes were hereat amazed, ſeeing that which they expected not. Then Pilate F told them that except they would receiue the Images of Cæſar, he would kill them all, and to that end made a ſigne vnto the ſouldiers to draw their ſwords. The Iewes, as though they had agreed therto, fell all downe at once, and offered their naked necks to the ſtroke of the ſword, crying out that they would rather loſe their liues, then ſuffer their religion to be profaned. Then Pilate admiring the conſtancy of the people in their religion, preſently commanded the ſtatuaes to be taken out of the Citie of Ieruſalem.

Corban, which Pilate vsed to bring water in vnto the Citie, foure hundreth furlongs off: for this cause the people murmured; so that when Pilate came to Ierusalem, they flocked about his tribunall, crying and exclaiming. Pilate foreseeing that tumult, caused soldiers secretly armed to mingle themselues amongst the people in priuate apparrell, and commanded them not to vse their swords, but to beat those with clubs, whom they saw make such clamors. And when he had thus plotted the matter, sitting in his Tribunall, he gaue a signe vnto the souldiers; and presently the Iewes were beaten: and many of them, partly with blowes, and partly troden vpon by the multitude, died miserably. The multitude amazed at the calamitie of those that were slaine, held their tongues. For this cause Agrippa sonne to Herod the Tetrarch, whose father Aristobulus Herod the king put to death, went to Rome, and accused him to Cæsar. Tiberius not admitting his accusation, hee remained still at Rome, and sought the fauour of other potentates there, and especially he reuerenced Caius the sonne of Germanicus, he being yet a priuate person: & vpon a certain day being with him at a banquet, he stretcht forth his hands, & openly began to beseech almightie God that Tiberius Cæsar might quickly die, that he might see him Lord of all the world. Tiberius hauing notice hereof by one of his familiar friends caused Agrippa to be imprisoned; where he endured a hard & streight imprisonment, vntill the death of Tiberius, which was six moneths after. After he was dead (hauing raigned 22. yeares, sixe moneths, and three daies) Caius Cæsar vvho succeeded him in the Empire, freed him from prison, and gaue him the Tetrarchie of Philip who was now deceased, and the title of a King. When Agrippa came into his kingdome, Herod the Tetrarch began to enuy his estate; and Herodias his wife still vrged him forward to hope that he should be made a King: for (said she) thou wantest that dignity onely for slouthfulnesse, because thou wouldest not go to Cæsar: for if Agrippa be made a King, being before but a priuate man, how canst thou doubt to be made a King, who art already a Tetrarch? Herod herewith perswaded, went vnto Caius Cæsar, who greatly reproued his auarice, in so much as hee fled into Spaine; for Agrippa followed him to Rome to accuse him before Cæsar: and Caius gaue vnto him Herods Tetrarchy. And so Herod remained in Spaine with his wife.

CHAP. IX.

Of the pride of Caius, and of Petronius the President.

CAius Cæsar so abused himselfe & his authority, that he would be thought to be a god, and be so called. Also he put many noble men of his countrey to death. Hee likewise extended his impiety euen vnto Iudæa: for he sent Petronius with an army to Ierusalem, commanding him to set his statuaes in the temple; and if the Iewes refused to receiue them, that those who withstood him hee should put to the sword, and lead the rest away captiue. Almighty God did otherwise dispose this proud commandment. But Petronius accompanied with three legions, and many assistants out of Syria, came with all speed from Antiochia to Iudæa: many of the Iewes would not beleeue any warre towards, notwithstanding that they heard a generall report therof: and they that belieued it, could not bethink themselues of any means to resist. Suddenly all were in a great feare: for the army was now come to Ptolomais, which Citie is situate by the sea shore in Galilee in a large field, and on the East side it is compassed about with mountaines, distant from it threescore furlongs, which appertaine vnto Galilee; on the South side it is enclosed with the mount Carmel, which is an hundreth and twenty furlongs off from it: on the North side it is inuironed with an exceeding high mountain, which the inhabitants call the Tyrians ladder: this mountain is an hundreth pases distant from the city. Two miles from this citie there is a riuer running by, called Beleus, a very little one, neer vnto which is the sepulchre of Memnon, hauing adioyning vnto it a place of the compasse of an hundreth cubits, worthy of admiration. This place is as it were a round valley couered with sand like glasse, which when many ships comming together take away for ballace, so that they empty the place of it, that place is presently after couered with the like sand again. For there are winds, which as it were vpon purpose carry this sand from the higher places round about it thither, & and whatsoeuer is within the mine of metall there, it is presently changed into crystall or glasse. And that which in my mind is more to be wondred at, is, that the sand being turned into glasse, if afterward any part thereof be cast vpon the brinke of this place, it is againe turned into ordinary sand. And this is the nature of that place.

Now the Iewes with their wiues & children gathered themselues together in the field where the Citie Ptolemais is situate, and humbly besought Petronius, first not to violate their countrey

A try lawes; and next, to be good vnto them. Petronius, seeing the multitude of them who humbly sued vnto him, and how earnestly they besought his fauour, left his army and Cæsars statuaes at Ptolemais, and himselfe went from thence to Galilee, and at Tiberias cald all the Iews and their Nobility together, recounting to them the force of the Roman army, and Cæsars threatnings: adding moreouer, that the Iewes supplication was indeed a contumely, seeing all nations vnder the dominion of the Romans (the Iewes onely excepted) had already placed Cæsars statuaes in their temples among the rest of their gods: and herein they did as it were reuolt frō the empire, and iniure the President. They answerd, it was against their lawes & custome of their country: for it was not lawful for them to haue the image of God, much less of a man; and that they were not onely forbidden by the law to haue an image in the Temple, but also to haue it in any other
B prophane place. Petronius sodainly answered: Well, I must doe my Lords commaund: for if I doe not, but spare you, I shall be iustly punished: and not I, but hee that sent mee, will fight against you. For I my selfe, as wel as you, must do as I am commanded. At these words the whole multitude cried out at once, that before they would see their religion violated, they would willingly suffer themselues to be destroied. When the noise of the people was ceased, Petronius said; Are ye then prepared and minded to fight against Cæsar? The Iewes answered, We euery day offer sacrifices for Cæsar and the Romans. But if Cæsar would needes place his image in their Temple, he must first offer their whole nation for sacrifice: for they would willingly with their wiues and children offer themselues to any that would kill them. Hereat Petronius greatly maruelled, being moued to compassion when he beheld the constancy of the Iewes in their religion,
C and so great a multitude prepared to dye for it. And for that time they departed, nothing being done. The next day following he assembled only the Nobility of the Iewes, one by one, compelling them to accord to Cæsars commaund, and spake publikely to the people, sometime admonishing them, otherwhile threatning them, and putting them in minde of the power of the Romans, and Cæsars indignation, and that he must of necessity do as he was commaunded. But they were moued by none of these. And Petronius fearing the ground would be left vntilled (for it was now seed time, and all the people had remained idle in the Citie for fiftie dayes space) calling them together, he sayd, that he would go about a thing which might greatly endanger himselfe. For (sayd he) I will either (God working with me) appease Cæsars wrath, or else I will lose mine owne life to saue such a multitude as you are. And dismissing the people, who made daily
D prayers to God for him, he led the armie from Ptolemais vnto Antiochia, from whence he presently sent vnto Cæsar in all haste, recounting vnto him with how great an armie he went into Iudæa, and that all the whole nation made supplication vnto him: whose request and humble suit if he denied, he must vtterly destroy the men and their country; for they had constantly remained in their country religion, and vehemently resisted any new law. Caius writ an answere of these letters vnto Petronius, threatning that it should cost him his life, because he made no more haste to execute his commaund. The messengers that brought these letters were tossed in a tempest vpon the Sea three whole months together: and others comming after them to bring news of Caius his death, had a prosperous wind; so Petronius receiued the letters of Caius Cæsars death twenty and seuen dayes before the other threatning letters came.

Of the Empire of Claudius, and of the raigne and death of Agrippa.

Caius Cæsar being slaine by treason when he had raigned three yeeres and sixe months, Claudius was made Emperour by the armie which was at Rome. The Senate by the instigation of the Consuls Sentius Saturnius, and Pomponius the second, commanded three legions of Souldiers to keepe the Citie, during the Councell holden in the Capitol: and for Caius Cæsars cruelty they determined to fight against Claudius, intending to re-F duce the Empire to the ancient gouernment; that as before time, so for euer after, those should rule that the Senate iudged worthy. It chanced that at this time Agrippa came to Rome, and the Senate sent vnto him, requesting him to come and be one of their Councell. Claudius also desired him to take part with the armie, intending to vse his helpe where neede required. Agrippa perceiuing that Claudius was already as it were Emperour for his power, hee tooke part with him: who presently sent him as Embassadour to the Senate, to tell them his purpose; how that first of all, the souldiers whether he would or no, set him in that dignitie, and it had beene in him an vndiscreet part to haue forsaken such an offer at the souldiers hands, who did it for good wil: G nay, if he had refused it, his life should be in continuall danger, for it was sufficient cause of enuy that he had been elected Emperor. Moreouer, he purposed to rule, not as a tyrant, but as a most milde prince: for hee would bee contented onely with the title of an Emperour, and doe nothing without the common consent of them all. And although hee was not naturally inclined to modest and curteous behauiour, yet he had a sufficient example to beware that he abused not his authority, by Caius Cæsars death. Agrippa bare this message to the Senat, who answerd (as though they trusted to their souldiers and learned councell) that they would not thrust themselues into wilfull bondage. Claudius, receiuing this answer, sent Agrippa againe to tell them, that nothing could cause him to betray them, by whom he was made Emperour: and that hee was forced to make war against them, with whom he was very loth to striue, and therefore wild them to chuse H a place out of the city for the battell to be fought in: for it stood with no reason to deface the city with ciuill wars and massacres for the obstinacy of some few. Agrippa did also this message to the Senate: and one of the soldiers that were for the Senate drew his sword, and said; Fellow souldiers, what should moue vs to massacre our friends and kinred, and parents, who follow Claudius? especially, seeing we haue an Emperour with whom we can finde no fault, vnto whom we should rather go forth with intreaties then with armes. When he had said this, he passed through the midst of the court, and all the souldiers followed him.

The Senates answer to Agrippa.

The Senate follow the souldiers to Claudius.

The Senate, being thus left desolate, and the lords abãdoned of their force, began to be in great feare: and seeing it was no standing out for them, they followed the souldiers, and went to Claudius. Before the city wals there met them some that endeuoured to shew themselues dutifull to I Claudius for his fortune sake, hauing their swords drawne, and they almost kild fiue before Cæsar vnderstood the outrage of the souldiers: and they had done it, had not Agrippa ran and told him of the matter, saying, that if hee did not presently appease the souldiers furie, now raging against the citizens, all his Nobility would presently be extinguished, and he should be left an Emperor of a desolate place. When Claudius heard this, he represt the souldiers fury, and very honourably receiued the Senate into his camp, and went forth presently with them, and offred sacrifice to God (as the manner is) for the good estate of the Empire. Also, he presently made Agrippa king of all his fathers dominions, giuing him likewise that which Augustus gaue Herod, to weet, Trachonite and Auranite, and beside them another kingdome, called the kingdome of Lysania, and published this his gift by an edict vnto the people, and commanded the Senate to engraue K that donation in brazen tables, and to place it in the Capitoll. Moreouer, hee rewarded his brother Herod, who was his kinsman, with the kingdome of Chalcis, and maried him to the Queene Berenice. Agrippa receiued greater reuenues of his kingdome then he could desire, which he spent not vainely, but in building such a wall about Ierusalem, as, had he finisht it, the Romans could neuer haue taken it: but before he could end that work he died in Cæsarea, hauing raigned three yeeres with the title of a king, and other three yeeres before in the state of a Tetrarch. Hee left behinde him three daughters which he had by Cypris; Berenice, Mariamme and Drusilla, and one son by the same wife, named Agrippa: who, because hee was very young, Claudius reduced the kingdom into a prouince, and made Cestius Festus Gouernor thereof. But after him, Tiberius Alexander, who nothing violating the lawes of the nation, ruled them in peace. After this, Herod L king of Chalcis departed; leauing behinde him two sons, which he had by his brothers daughter Berenice, to wit, Berenicianus and Hircanus: and by his first wife Mariamme, Aristobulus. His other brother also, Aristobulus, died a priuate person, leauing one daughter, Iotapata. And these were the posterity of Aristobulus, king Herods sonne, and Herod had Alexander and Aristobulus by Mariamme, whom he put to death: but Alexanders posterity raigned in the greater Armenia.

Of diuers tumults in Iudæa and Samaria. M

The yeare of the world, 4011, after Christs birth, 49.

AFter the death of Herod who raigned in Chalcis, Claudius created Agrippa the son of the former Agrippa king of Chalcis in his vncles kingdome: and Cumanus was made ruler of the other prouince after Alexander, vnder whom there were many tumults and new calamities, which befel the Iewes. For when they were assembled together at the feast of vnleauened bread in Ierusalem, the Roman souldiers standing in the porch of the temple (for alwayes

A alwaies armed men kept that place vpon feſtiuall daies, leſt the people gathered together ſhould make any tumult) one of the ſouldiers, taking vp his coat, turned his bare buttockes againſt the Iewes faces, ſpeaking words as vnſeemely as was his geſture. Whereat the whole multitude began to murmur; ſo that they flocked about Cumanus, requeſting him to puniſh the ſouldier for this miſdemeanour: and ſome of them, raſh young men, and as it were prone to ſedition, began to reuile the ſouldiers, and threw ſtones at them. Then Cumanus, fearing that the whole multitude of the Iewes would violently ruſh vpon him, cald vnto him many armed ſouldiers, & ſent them into the porch of the temple. The Iewes being in a great feare fled and left the temple, and there was ſuch a throng, that as they ruſhed out to flee, aboue tenne thouſand people were preſt and troden to death: ſo that this feſtiuall day was turned into woefull lamentations and mourB nings in euery place. This calamity was increaſed afterward by a company of thieues: for neer Bethoron one Stephanus, ſeruant vnto Cæſar, carried ſome houſhould ſtuffe, which the theeues tooke from him in the high way. But Cumanus, ſending for thoſe in the villages next adioyning, to make enquiry of theſe theeues, commanded them to be bound and brought vnto him, becauſe they had not taken the theeues: in one of which villages a certaine ſouldier finding the book of the holy ſcripture, cut it in peeces and burnt it. Hereupon the Iewes gathered themſelues together from all places, as though their religion were now violated: and drawne by the force of their ſuperſtition as with an engine, all of them at one cal went to Cæſarea to Cumanus, there beſeeching him, that the ſouldier, who had blaſphemed God and their law, might not eſcape vnpuniſhed. But Cumanus perceiued, the Iewes would not bee appeaſed without ſome ſatisfaction: C wherefore hee condemned the ſouldier to death, and ſent him to execution before their faces; which done, they all departed.

At laſt there aroſe a tumult betweene the Galileans and Samaritanes; for at a village called Geman, ſituate in the great field of Samaria, a certaine Galilean, of the number of the Iewes that came to the feaſt, was ſlaine: for which fact many Galileans ran to fight with the Samaritanes: and the nobilitie of the countrey went vnto Cumanus, requeſting him, before any more harme were done, to go into Galilee, and puniſh the authours of this euill. But Cumanus, beeing buſied in greater affaires, ſent them away without granting their requeſt. When this murther was knowne in Ieruſalem, all the multitude left the ſolemnitie of the day, and went into Samaria without any guide, refuſing to be reſtrained by the Nobilitie. Of this their tumult and ſedition D the ſonne of Dinæus, called Eleazar, and one Alexander, were captaines; who with violence entering the borders of the countrey of Acrebatena, killed man, woman and childe, ſparing no age, and burning the townes. When Cumanus heard this, he tooke a cornet of horſemen, called the Sebaſtians, to come and helpe them that were thus oppreſſed, and ſo tooke and killed many of them who tooke part with Eleazar. Now the Nobles of Ieruſalem came out to the reſt of that multitude, which ſo waſted Samaria, clothed in ſackcloth and aſhes vpon their heads, beſeeching them not to ſeeke reuenge vpon the Samaritans, as thereby to mooue the Romans to deſtroy Ieruſalem, and to be mercifull to their countrey, the temple, their wiues and children, and not at once hazard all, and ouerthrowe their whole countrey and nation in reuenging the death of one Galilean. The Iewes heereby were pacified, and departed: At the ſame time many conE ſpired together to rob and ſteale (as moſt commonly people by long peace growe inſolent) ſo that they robd in euery part of the country, and they that were moſt ſtrong and able, offred violence to thoſe that were weaker. Then the Princes of Samaria went to Tyre, beſeeching Numidius Quadratus, being gouernor of Syria, to reuenge them of thoſe that ſo robbed and ſpoiled their countrey. There was alſo the nobility of the Iewes, and Ionathas, the ſon of Ananus, who was high prieſt, who defended the Iewes againſt the Samaritanes accuſations, affirming, the Samaritans to haue been cauſe of that tumult in killing the Galilean: and after, that Cumanus was cauſe of the reſt of their calamities, who refuſed to puniſh the murtherers. Quadratus for that time ſent away both parties, promiſing them that when he came into their countries, hee would diligently enquire of the matter: and coming from thence to Cæſarea, he crucified all thoſe whom F Cumanus took aliue. And departing from thence to Lydda, he heard the Samaritans complaints, and ſent for eighteen men whom he vnderſtood for certaine to haue been in that broile, and beheaded them, and ſent the two high prieſts, Ionathas and Ananias, and his ſonne Ananus, with ſome of the nobility of the Iewes to Cæſar, and alſo the chiefe of the Samaritans. He likewiſe cómanded Cumanus and Celer the tribune to goe to Rome, and yeeld account vnto Claudius for that which they had done in that countrey.

This done, he went from Lydda to Ieruſalem: and finding there the multitude celebrating the feaſt feast of vnleauened bread, without any tumults or disorders he returned to Antiochia. Cæsar at Rome hearing the allegations of Cumanus, and the Samaritanes (Agrippa was also there earnestly defending the cause of the Iewes, as also Cumanus was assisted by many potentates) hee pronounced sentence against the Samaritans, & commanded three of their chiefe nobility to be put to death, and banished Cumanus, and sent Celer the tribune bound vnto Ieruſalem, that the Iewes might draw him about the Citie, and then cut off his head. This done, hee sent Felix brother to Pallas to rule Iudæa, Samaria and Galilæa. And hee preferred Agrippa from Chalcis to a greater kingdome, making him king of that prouince whereof Philip had been ruler, to wit, Trachon, Batanæa and Gaulanitis, adding thereunto Lyſanias kingdome, and the Tetrarchy whereof Varus was gouernour: And hauing raigned thirteene yeeres, eight months, and thirty daies, Claudius departed this life, leauing Nero to succeed him, whom by the perswasions of his wife Agrippina he adopted to the Empire, hauing a lawfull begotten son of his owne, named Britannicus, by his former wife Meſſalina, and a daughter called Octauia, whom he maried to Nero: he had also another daughter by Agrippina, named Antonia. The theeues and magicians work much mischief to many men.

WHerefore I will begin to recount what Nero did against the Iewes. Hee made Ariſtobulus, Herods son, king of the lesser Armenia, and ioyned vnto Agrippas kingdome foure cities, and the ground belonging vnto them: two of them, Abila and Iulias, were in the countrey of Peræa; the other, Tarichæa and Tiberias, were in Galilee: and he made Felix gouernour ouer the rest of Iudæa. This Felix took Eleazar, captaine of the theeues, after he had robbed and spoiled the countrey twenty yeeres, and many more with him, and sent them bound to Cæsar: and he crucified a great number of them, who either were theeues, and his confederates, or else such as assisted him. The country was no sooner cleansed from these, but presently another sort of thieues arose in Ieruſalem, called Sicarij, with short swords, who at high noon in the midst of the city killed many in euery place: and especially at the celebrating of holy feasts they mixt themselues with the multitude, hauing short swords vnder their coats, and therwithall kild those to whom they bare any grudge; and when men fell downe dead, they among the rest complained of this wickednes. By this deceitfull means they were a long time vnsuspected & vnknown. And first of all, they kild Ionathas the high priest, and after him euery day some were slaine; and the city was put in a fear worse then death it selfe: for each man euery moment expected death, as though it had been amidst open warres: likewise euery one cast a diligent eie vpon those that came neere him; also no man trusted his familiar friends: and yet were they murthered, whil'st they were looking about them to escape danger. So cunningly did these theeues couer and conceale their actions. Moreouer, there arose another sort of mischieuous people, who did not so much harme with their hands as the first, but with their impious counsell more, and did no lesse trouble the quiet estate of the city then did the thieues. These people being vagabonds and iugglers, desiring alteration vnder pretence of religion, made the people as it were mad: for they went into the wildernes, affirming, that there God would shew them tokens of their liberty. Felix, perceiuing that their action tended to rebellion, sent an army of horse and foot against these people, and kild a great many of them.

But a certaine Ægyptian, a false Prophet, caused a far greater massacre among the Iewes then that was: for being a Magician, he came into the country; and calling himselfe a prophet, he gathered vnto him almost thirty thousand Iewes, who were by his magick arts seduced: and leading them from the wildernes to mount Oliuet, he determin'd from thence to go to Ieruſalem, and to driue back the forces of the Romans, and to vse his authority ouer the people. Hee had for his guard those that came to follow him. Felix, foreseeing his intēt, met him with his legions of armed Romans: whom the other Iewes assisting, and fighting against him, the Ægyptian with a few fled, and many that were with him were taken and committed to prison, and the rest of the multitude dispersed themselues euery one in his country. These being thus represſed, the other part (as it hapneth in a sicke body) beganne to rise: for some of the Magicians, and the theeues being gatherd together, they brought many vnto misery, and as it were exhorted them to liberty, threatning present death to those that obeied the Romans; so that they forc't them who were

Theſe people being diſperſt all ouer the country, robbed and ſacked Noblemens and rich mens houſes: moreouer, kild them, and fired the villages, ſo that all Iudæa was in extreame feare of them, and euery day their cruelty encreaſed. The yeare of the world, 4020. after Chriſts birth, 50.

At this time aroſe another tumult at Cæſarea, by a ſedition raiſed betweene the Iewes that dwelt there, and the Syrians. The Iewes chalenged the City to be theirs, becauſe it was founded by Herod, who was a Iew. But the Syrians denying not but that the builder of the city was a Iew, yet they affirmed that it belonged to the Gentiles: for (ſaid they) it had not been lawfull for the founder to haue placed in it ſhrines and ſtatues, if he had meant that it ſhould haue belonged to the Iewes. So that hereupon there aroſe a great controuerſie among the Iewes and Syrians, inſo- Ant lib. 20. cap. 13.

B much as the one fought againſt the other, and euery day thoſe that were the hardieſt of both parts fought together. For the elder ſort of the Iewes could not reſtraine thoſe of their nation from being ſeditious: and the Greeks ſcorned to giue place to the Iewes. The Iewes ouereame them in riches and ſtrength of body, and the Græcians ouercame the Iews by help of ſouldiers: for a great company of the Roman army came thither out of Syria, and they were ready to aſſiſt the Syrians, becauſe they were as it were of their kinred and conſanguinity. The captaines of the ſouldiers endeuoured to appeaſe the tumult, and tooke thoſe that were moſt ſeditious on both parts, and beat them, and caſt them in priſon. But the puniſhment of thoſe that were apprehended terrified not the reſt: nay, they were hereby made more ſeditious. When Felix ſaw this, by a A fight betweene the Iewes and Syrians about Cæſarea.

Of Albinus and Florus, Preſidents of Iudæa.

D BVt Albinus, who ſuceeded Feſtus, followed not his ſteppes: for there was no iniquity ſo great wherein he was not plunged. Furthermore, he did not onely take away by force mens goods from them vnder colour of iuſtice, and at his owne pleaſure exact a greater tribute, but alſo freed and let looſe any one whom either the ſouldiers of the city tooke, or his predeceſſors had left in priſon, ſo that their friends would giue a piece of mony: and they only, who were not able to giue mony, were impriſoned as moſt hainous offenders. At this time, they in Ieruſalem that deſired alteration, began to take courage, and thoſe that were rich amõg them fee'd Albinus with mony, to permit them to be ſeditious, and the common people that could not bee in quiet, ioined themſelues with Albinus fauorites: and each of them had a troup of thieues after him. But Albinus himſelfe was ouer them all as a tyrant, and prince of theeues; and he vſed the help of his guard to rob the meaner ſort: ſo they, whoſe houſes were ſackt and ſpoil'd, were glad to hold their peace; and they, who yet had eſcaped, were glad to be very officious towards *Ant. l. 20. c. 11. Nay, he was not aſhamed by the publike voice of a crier, to proclaim it through the whole country lawfull for any one that would, to rob and ſteale, ſo that they would bring him a part of their booty. In brief, his cruelty was ſuch, that the country was almoſt left deſolate, people forſaking their own natiue home, and fleeing into ſtrange lands. was Gouernour of Syria, no man durſt goe to him to make any complaint againſt Florus. But G when at the feaſt of vnleauened bread Gallus came to Ieruſalem, there mette him a multitude of the Iewes aboue 300000, all beſeeching him to helpe and ſuccour their afflicted countrey, and baniſh Florus, who was the very plague of their nation. Yet Florus was ſo impudent, that beeing with Gallus, and hearing theſe cries againſt him, he was no whit moued thereat, but laughed at it. Ceſtius for that time appeaſed the people, promiſing that hereafter hee would make Florus more gentle vnto them, and ſo returned to Antiochia. Florus conducted him to Cæſarea to ſtoppe his mouth with lies, deuiſing with himſelfe how to make the Iewes rebell, and that he thought was the ſafeſt meanes to cloak his villanies: for if they continued in peace and obedience, he feared, that ſome of them would accuſe him before Cæſar: mary, if he could make them reuolt, then he hoped that their great fault would ſhadow his impieties. Wherfore to bring about his purpoſe, H he euery day oppreſſed them with new calamities, forcing them hereby to rebel againſt the Romans. At this time the Gentils of Cæſarea got the victory ouer the Iews, and brought letters to teſtifie that decree before Nero. This was the beginning of the wars of the Iewes, in the twelfth yeare of Nero his Empire, and the ſeuenteenth of Agrippas raigne, in the moneth of May.

CHAP. XIIII.

Ant. lib. 20. cap. 15.

Florus had no iuſt cauſe for any of theſe calamities which he inflicted vpon the Iews. The I Iewes dwelling at Cæſarea had a ſynagoue neere a peece of ground that belonged to a Gentile dwelling in Cæſarea. The Iewes often ſought to compound with him for that peece of ground, offering him far more then it was worth: but the Landlord of the ſoile did not only contemne their requeſt, but alſo to their great griefe in that place built tauernes; ſo that he left them a very ſtreight and narrow paſſage to go to their ſynagogue. Some young men among the Iewes, being very zealous, reſiſted the workmen, and would not ſuffer them to build. Florus, hearing this, commanded the Iewes to let the workmen goe forward in their work. The Iewes not knowing what to doe, eſpecially one Iohn, a Publicane, offered Florus eight talents to hinder the building: he promiſed for that mony to fulfill their requeſt: and now hauing it, he preſently departed from Cæſarea, and went to Sebaſte without performing any thing, giuing as it were K occaſion of ſedition, & as though he had receiued mony of the Nobility of the Iews to permit them to fight a certain time. The next day, which was the Iewes Sabbath, when they were al aſſembled to go to the ſynagogue, one of Cæſarea, a ſeditious perſons, took a great earthen veſſell, and ſet it euen at the entry into the ſynagogue, and vpon it did offer birds. This fact ſo mou'd the Iewes, that they would not bee pacified, becauſe it was done in contempt of their religion, and thereby the place was profaned. One part of the Iewes that was moſt modeſt & wiſeſt, counſeld the Iewes to complaine to them that were in authority: but thoſe who for heat of youth were prone to ſedition, began contumeliouſly to reuile their aduerſaries. For the moſt ſeditious of the people of Cæſarea were alſo prepared to fight with them, and had cauſed that to bee done before the ſynagogue, only to pick a quarrel, and ſo they fought together. Iucundus, Generall of the L horſemen, that was left to keep all in quiet, preſently came with ſouldiers, and commanded that veſſell to be taken away, and ſo endeuoured to appeaſe the tumult: but not beeing able to doe it through the violence of them of Cæſarea; the Iewes tooke the bookes of their lawes, and retired themſelues to a place called Narbata, belonging to them, which was diſtant from Cæſarea threeſcore furlongs. Twelue of the chiefe of them, together with Iohn the Publican, went vnto Florus, beeing at Sebaſte, to complaine of the iniurie done vnto them, requeſting him to aſſiſt them, and modeſtly put him in minde of the eight talents they gaue him. But he preſently commanded them to bee bound and impriſoned, becauſe they had preſumed to take and carrie their law from Cæſarea. Hereat thoſe of Ieruſalem were greatly moued, yet they ſhewed it not. Florus, as vpon ſet purpoſe giuing occaſion of rebellion, ſent for ſeuenteen talents out of the ſa- M cred treaſury, pretending that it was to bee emploied in Cæſars affaires. At this the people was much troubled, calling and crying vpon the name of Cæſar, praying that he would deliuer them from Florus his tyranny. Some of them being ſeditious, began to curſe Florus bitterly, and tooke a basket, and carried it about, and begged an almes for Florus, which they did in deriſion, as who ſhould ſay, he were as miſerable as beggers that haue nothing. Florus for all this left not his auarice, but was more earneſt to rob the inhabitants of their goods. A gone to Cæsarea to haue quieted the sedition,& remoued the cause of tumults,as also he had receiued money so to doe; taking an army of horse and foot, he came to Ierusalem, that with the help of the Roman souldiers he might effect his pleasure, and terrifie the whole citie. The yeare of the world. 4036. after Christs birth. 68.

The people to pacifie his wrath, went out in curteous sort to meet the army, shewing themselues ready to giue them the best entertainment they could, & to receiue Florus with all honor and reuerence. Florus vnderstanding of them,sent before him one Capito a Centurion,with fifty horsemen; commanding them to depart,and not to mock him with a pretence of honor, whom they had so hainously abused. And that if they were as good as their words, they should flout & reproach him to his face; and not onely in words, but in deedes shew, that they desired liberty. Herewithall the multitude being terrified, and also for that the horsemen that came with Capito B assaulted them with violence; euery one fled before they saluted Florus,or did their accustomed duty vnto the army: and going euery one vnto his house, they past the watch full night in feare and sorrow. Florus for that night lodged in the Kings palace. The next day he caused a tribunall openly to be placed, and the high Priest and all the chiefe of the Iewes resorted thither & stood before the tribunall. Then Florus sitting in the tribunall seat, cõmanded them to bring forth presently all those, that had vsed any opprobrious words against him, threatning to be reuenged on them except they did it. The Iewes made answere, that the people intended nothing but peace and quietnes, requesting that they that had offended in words might obtaine pardon. For it was no maruell in so great a multitude, if there were some rash and foolish yong men: and that it was vnpossible to discerne all that offended, seeing euery one was now penitent for that which was C done, and at least for feare would deny it. And that if he were carefull to conserue and maintain the quietnes of the nation, and preserue the citie still to obey the Romans, hee then must rather pardon a few seditious for so many good mens sake; then to reuenge himselfe of a few wicked persons, to hurt & molest so many that thought no harme. Hereat Florus wrath was encreased,& presently he cõmanded the souldiers to sack the market place (which was the higher part of the citie) where things were sold; and put all they met or found vnto the sword. The souldiers, who were desirous of gaine, hauing now authority from their ruler, did not only sack the place they were sent vnto, but also all houses,and murthered the inhabitants. All streets & gates were filled with them that sought to fly, and the dead bodies of them that did light into the souldiers hands: no sort of spoiling was omitted. They also apprehended many of the nobility,& brought D them to Florus: and he causing them to be whipt, afterward hanged them vp. And there were slaine that day, of men,women and children(for they spared not infants)six hundreth & thirty. Which did not afflict the Iewes so much, as to see the sudden cruelty & tyranny of the Romans; Florus then doing that none before durst euer presume to doe: for he caused knights before the tribunall seat to be whipped, and after hanged them vp,who though they were Iewes borne,yet receiued they that dignity from the Romans.

CHAP. XV.

E AT the same time King Agrippa was gone to Alexandria, to entertaine Alexander, whom Nero sent to be ruler ouer Egypt; his sister Berenice in the mean while remained in Ierusalem,who seeing the cruelty of the souldiers was much grieued: & often sent the lieutenants of her horsmen & her own guard vnto Florus, requesting him to abstaine from the slaughter of the citizens. But he neither regarding the multitude of them that were slaine,nor the dignity of her that intreated,but only his priuate gain,and what he could gather by oppression & rapine, denied her request: so that the rage of the souldiers extended it self also against the Queen. For they did not only before her face beat and kill all that came in their way,but they had also killed her,had she not fled into the palace,where she watcht F all night,keeping a trusty guard about her,fearing that the souldiers would break in vpon her. She came to Ierusalem to fulfil her vow to God: for it is the custom,that if any be afflicted with grieuous sicknes,or be in any other distresse, they must abide in praier 30. daies before they offer sacrifice,and abstain from wine,& shaue their haire; which custom Queen Berenice then obseruing, stood also barefoot before Florus his tribunal seat,to entreat him: whom he not only contemned, but also put her in danger of her life. This was done the 16. day of May. The day after, the multitude gathered together in the vpper part of the citie in the market place, and with great cryes murmured murmured that so many were slain, & especially vsed contumelious words against Florus: which the nobility & high Priests (fearing their deaths) apprehended, beseeching them to abstaine frō such words as had already caused that calamity in the city, & not to prouoke Florus vnto greater indignation. And so the multitude was pacified for their sakes who entreated, & hoped that hereafter Florus would desist from such cruelty. Florus, when he saw the multitude quieted, was sory: and that he might againe prouoke them, he assembled together the nobility & high Priests, telling them that it would be an argument that the people did not seek alteration any more, if they would goe in curteous wise and meet the souldiers which were comming from Cæsarea, whereof were two legions. Hauing thus assembled the Iewes together to go meet the soldiers, he also sent and commanded the Centurions not to salute the Iewes, who came to meet them: and if therfore the Iewes were offended, and gaue any hard speeches, they should fall vpon them with their weapons. The high Priests assembling the Iewes together in the temple, besought them to go, and solemnly to meet and entertaine the souldiers, for feare of a greater inconuenience. Notwithstanding their counsell, those that were seditious refused to do as they were requested: and others for griefe of them that were slaine, tooke part with the seditious.

Florus renueth the discontents of the people. Florus subtilty and treason.

Then all the Priests & Leuites brought forth the holy vessels & ornaments of the temple, and with Harps, songs & musicall instruments came before the multitude, beseeching them to endeuour, that the honour and pompe of the temple might still remaine, & not to incite the Romans through contumelious words to sack the temple. There might you see the chiefe of the high Priests with ashes vpon their heads, and clothes rent, so that their naked breasts were perceiued; and calling euery noble man by his name, & speaking to al the multitude, requested them not for a final offence, to betray their whole country to them, who stil gaped after the destruction thereof. For what commodity should the Romans reap by the Iewes salutation, & what amendment of their miseries could they expect, if they did not go to meet them? Contrariwise, if they would go to them in solemn sort, then they took from Florus all occasion of persecution, & saued their country from ruine, and themselues from further calamities. Adding that it was a great shame that such a multitude should be led away with a few seditious persons, & that it was more fit that so many should force those few seditious people to obey them, and ioine with them in opinion.

The exhortation of the priests and princes to the people.

With these perswasions they did mollifie the malice of the Iewes, and also perswade many of the seditious people, some with threats, and some with reuerence of themselues to be pacified. And so they going before, all the people followed, and went out to meet the Roman souldiers. And comming neer them they saluted them: who answering nothing again, those of the Iewes that were seditious began to raile against Florus, by whose consent this was done: and presently the souldiers apprehending them, did beat them with clubs; and the rest flying, the Roman horsmen pursued them, and trode vpon them with their horses. Many were slaine by the Romans, and more were killed in the throng, one of them tumbling vpon another. There was a great throng in the gates of the citie: for euery one hasting & striuing to get in, hindred themselues and others. Many died most miserably in that throng, and some were stifled, and some prest to death being troden vpon; so that their neighbours comming to bury them, could not know them. The souldiers also cruelly assaulted them, killing all that they could come vnto, & forced the people to goe in by the entrance called Bezetha, who desired to recouer the temple and the Castle called Antonia.

The euent sheweth Florus intent and counsell. The slaughter of the Iewes.

Florus taking the soldiers with him, pursued them thither, striuing to get the castle; yet did he not preuaile: for the people made resistance, and threw down stones from the house top; and killed many of the Romans: who being ouercome with darts cast from aloft, & could not resist the people, who on euery side came against them, retyred themselues vnto the rest of the army at the Kings palace. Those that were seditious, fearing that Florus would againe assault them, and by the castle Antonia make an entrance into the temple, they got vpon the galleries that reached frō the porch of the temple vnto Antonia, and beat them downe, hereby to represse the couetousnes of Florus. Who greedily gaped after the sacred treasure, and striued to enter by Antonia into the temple to take them: but seeing the porches beaten down, he offered no more violence. And calling together the high Priests and nobility, he said that he was content to depart out of the citie, but he would leaue them as great a garrison as they would request. Whereunto they answered, that nothing should be altred if he would leaue one company to keep all quiet: so he left not that, which a while before did fight against the people, because that the people would not easily brook them, for that which they had suffered at their hands. So Florus as he requested, changing the garrison with the rest of the army departed to Cæsarea.

The seditious for feare least Florus should seise their spoiles flie to the temple. Florus taketh the spoiles, and entereth the temple. Florus seeing the Iewes inexpugnable in the temple, surceaseth his violedce, and leauing a band behind him go th to Cæsarea.

Of Politianus the tribune, and how Agrippa made a ſpeech vnto the Iewes, exhorting them to obey the Romans.

The yeare of the world, 4030. after Chriſts birth, 68.

FLorus yet deuiſed another way to ſtir the Iewes to rebellion: for he reported vnto Ceſtius that the Iewes were reuolted, impudently belying them to haue commited that which indeed they endured at his hands. The nobles of Ieruſalem & Berenice certified Ceſtius of all that Florus had done: he receiuing letters from both parties deliberated with his nobles what to do. Some counſelled Ceſtius to go into Iudea with an army, and puniſh the Iewes if they were revolted; and if they were not, then to confirme them in their obedience. Yet it pleaſed him bet-
B ter to ſend ſome about him thither before, to bring him true newes of their eſtate, and what had hapned. So he ſent Politianus the tribune, who in his way met with Agrippa about Iamnia as hee returned from Alexandria, and told him all, for what, and from whom hee was ſent. Where alſo were preſent the Prieſts and chief of the Iewes, to welcome Agrippa. And hauing ſaluted him as curteouſly as they could, they preſently bewailed the miſery which had befallen their nation, and the cruelty of Florus. Which although Agrippa diſallowed, yet made as if he were angry with the Iewes whom he greatly pitied, purpoſing hereby to bridle their affections; that they, perſwaded that they had had no iniury, might abſtain from reuenge. So that all the better ſort, who for their lands and liuings deſired quietneſſe, well perceiued that the Kings reprehenſion was not of malice but for their good.

Ceſtius Gallus preſident of Syria conſulteth with the princes what were beſt to be done. Politianus is ſent to Ieruſalem & meets with Agrippa.

C The people of Ieruſalem went out to meet them threeſcore furlongs off, and receiued Agrippa and Politianus very curteouſly, yet the women lamented the death of their husbands ſlaine, and with their tears moued the whole multitude to ſorrow, who beſought Agrippa to haue compaſſion on their nation; entreating alſo Politianus to goe into the city, and behold what Florus had done: And ſo they ſhewed him the market place deſert, and the houſes deſtroyed, and by the meanes of Agrippa perſwaded Politianus to go round about the city as far as Siloa, onely with one man, & behold with his eyes what Florus had done, and that they were obedient to the Romans in all things, and only were enemies vnto Florus who had vſed them ſo cruelly. Politianus hauing gone about the whole citie, aſcended into the temple, well perceiuing many arguments of the Iewes fidelity towards the Romans: and calling the people there together, he praiſed their loy-
D alty, and exhorted them ſtill to continue in like obedience, and worſhipped God and his rites, as farre as the law permitted him: and ſo he returned vnto Ceſtius. The multitude of the Iewes came to Agrippa and the high Prieſts, requeſting them to ſend Embaſſadors againſt Florus vnto Nero, and not to giue an argument of rebellion by not complaining of ſuch murthers: for Florus would make him beleeue that they had rebelled, except they went vnto him to ſhew that Florus gaue firſt occaſion; and it was certain that the multitude would not be quieted if any one hindered that Embaſſage. Hereupon Agrippa thought that it would be an hateful matter to ſend Embaſſadours to Rome to accuſe Florus; and on the other part he perceiued, that it was to no purpoſe to contradict the Iewes, who were ready now to rebell: wherefore calling the people together he made a ſpeech vnto them, and ſeated his ſiſter Berenice in an eminent place in the houſe
E of the Aſmonæans. The porch wherin he called them together, was in ſuch a place that it ouerlookt all ahe higher part of the citie, for there was only a bridge between it & the temple, which ioyned the temple and it together, and there ſpake he vnto the Iewes in manner following. If I had perceiued that you were bent to fight againſt the Romans, or that the better part of the people were not inclined to peace, neither would I haue come vnto you, nor haue preſumed to haue counſelled you in any thing. For it is in vaine to giue counſell of ſuch things as are expedient, where all the auditors are already determined to follow that, which is contrary to the counſell giuen them. But for that ſome are ignorant what miſery wars induce, becauſe by reaſon of their yong years they haue not known it, others are moued with a raſh and vnaduiſed deſire of their liberty, others are drawne by auarice and hope of gaine in that hurliburly: I thought it good to
F aſſemble you all together, and declare vnto you what meanes is to be vſed to reſtraine ſuch people, and that the good may the better know how to reſiſt and ouercome the practiſes of the wicked. But let no man frowne if he heare that which diſpleaſeth him, and I will tell you nothing but that which ſeemeth expedient for you. For they that are ſo bent to rebellion, that they will not be recalled, may for all my words continue in the ſame mind ſtill. And I will ſpeake nothing at all except you will all keep ſilence. I know that many doe ſeeke to aggrauate the iniuries that are done by the rulers of the countrey, and do highly commend and extoll liberty: yet before

The multitude of the people go out to meet Agrippa & Politianus.

Politianus aſſembleth the people, and inciteth them to peace, and after returnes to Ceſtius. The Iewes require the king that there might be ſom Embaſſadors ſent to Rome to complaine of Florus to Nero.

Agrippa ſtriueth to make the common ſort flexible and attentiue.

The yeare of the world, 4030. after Christs Nativity, 68.

I begin to declare vnto you who you are, and againſt whom ye purpoſe to beare armes, I wil firſt diuide and ſeparate ſuch cauſes as you think inſeparable. For if you ſeeke only to reuenge your ſelues vpon thoſe that haue iniured you, why do you then ſo extoll liberty? or if you think it not tolerable to obey any other; why then, theſe complaints againſt your rulers are ſuperfluous. For G
" although they were neuer ſo milde, ſtil would ſubiection be intolerable. Call all things to mind,
" and conſider what a ſmall cauſe of warre is giuen you. And firſt of all weigh with your ſelues the crimes and offences of your rulers: for you ought to ſhew your ſelues humble, and dutifull to them that are in authority, and not exaſperate, and prouoke them to wrath by reprochfull ſpeeches. For in reuiling them for ſmall offences, you doe incite them againſt you whom you ſo reuile: and that whereas before they did only doe you a little iniury, and that ſecretly, now being

" moued through bad ſpeeches, they openly ſet vpon you and deſtroy you. And there is nothing H
" that ſo reſtraineth cruelty as patience; ſo that oft times the patience of them who haue ſuffered

Agrippa excuſeth Cæſar and the Romans.
Romans do not oppreſſe you, nor Cæſar, againſt whom you would tak armes. For they command no cruell gouernors to come to you, nor can they who are in the furtheſt part of the Weſt, eaſily know what is done in the Eaſt, nor heare thereof. And truely it is a thing moſt againſt reaſon to

of. For there wil not be alwaies the ſame gouernor; and it is credible, that they who ſucceed this, will be more gentle and curteous. But if you once begin to make warre, it is not eaſie to end it I or ſuſtain it without great calamities. And let them who ſo thirſt after libertie, diligently aduiſe themſelues, that they doe not bring vpon their backs a greater bondage. For ſlauerie is a cruell
" thing, and it ſeemeth a lawfull cauſe to make warre, leaſt you be brought into it: yet he that is al" readie in bondage and reuolteth, is rather a peruerſe ſlaue, then one who deſireth liberty. You and purſued that proud Xerxes whom they forced to flie with one ſhip (which Xerxes made the earth nauigable, and the ſea firme land, who had ſuch a nauy that the ſeas had not roome for one ſhip to ſail by another, nor all Europe able to receiue his armie) who alſo had ſuch a victory ouer Aſia, neer the little Iſle of Salamina, yet now are ſubiect vno the Romans, and that kingly Citie is now ruled at the Romans beck. The Lacedemonians alſo hauing gotten ſuch a victorie vpon the Thermopyles, and vnder their generall Ageſilaus ſacked Aſia, acknowledge now the Romans for their Lords. The Macedonians alſo who ſtill imagine they ſee Philip and Alexander

" promiſing them the Empire of the whole world; now patiently beare this change, and obey

where are the armies & armes that you truſt in, or your nauy to ſcoure the Roman ſeas? Where are your treaſures to effect that you intend? thinke you that you are to warre againſt the Egyptians or Arabians? And do you not conſider the bounds of the Roman Empire? Do you not conſider your own inabilitie? Know ye not that your neighbour nations haue often by force taken your citie? and that the forces of the Romans haue paſſed through the whole world vnconquered, and as it were ſearching for ſome thing greater then the world? Whoſe dominion towards the Eaſt is extended beyond Euphrates, and towards the North beyond Iſter, and towards the South beyond the wilderneſſe of Lybia, and towardes the Weſt beyond Gades, hauing found another world beyond the Ocean, and with an army entred Britaine which is England & Scot- M

A you to ſeek their liberty? What ſhall I ſay of the fifty cities of Aſia? do they not all obey one ruler, and the authority of the Conſull, without any garriſon? What ſhall I ſpeake of the Eniochians, Colchians, the people of Taurus, the inhabitants of Helleſpontus, and Pontus, and about Mæotis, who in times paſt had no ruler of their own nation, whom now three thouſand ſouldiers keep in awe, and forty long Gallies keep now peaceably thoſe ſeas, neuer ſailed on before? What thinke you, the Bythinians, Cappadocians, and thoſe of Pamphilia, Lydia, and Cilicia, could ſay for their liberty, who notwithſtanding now peaceably pay tribute vnto the Romans? What of the Thracians? whoſe countrey is fiue daies iourney in breadth, and ſeuen in length, farre more hard and ſtronger then your countrey, where froſt would hinder them that ſhould aſſaile them, yet doe they obey two thouſand Romans, who are in garriſon. After them the B Illyrians, whoſe countrey reacheth vnto Dalmatia, and Iſther, are kept in obedience only by two legions, with help of whom they alſo reſiſt the Dacians. The Dalmatians themſelues, who hauing ſo often attempted their owne liberty being oftentimes conquered, and ſtil as their wealth increaſing rebelling, are now in peace vnder one legion of the Romans. Nay, if any one haue cauſe to rebell, it is the Frenchmen, whoſe country is by nature of the place ſtrong, being on the Eaſt ſide compaſſed with the Alpes, on the North with the Riuer of Rhene, on the South with the Pyrenæan mountains, on the Weſt with the Ocean. Who notwithſtanding, hauing amongſt them three hundreth & fiue nations, who haue amongſt them as it were the very fountain of felicity, and with their goods and commodities inrich the whole world: yet doe they pay tribute vnto the Romans, and account their happineſſe to be builded vpon the felicity of the Romans, C and that neither for want of courage nor nobility of blood, who foureſcore yeares long fought for their liberty; admiring the Romans and fearing them, who ſtill gained more by fortune, then they did by warres: and now obey a thouſand and two hundreth ſoldiers, hauing almoſt againſt euery ſouldier a Citie.

Neither could the Spaniards, though gold grew in their countrey, keep themſelues from being ſubiect to the Romans. Nor the Portugales and the warlike Cantabrians, for all the diſtance of ſea and land between them and Rome. The Ocean, whoſe waues beating againſt the ſhoare, terriſieth the inhabitants adioyning, could not ſtay them but they paſt it: and carried an army beyond the pillers of Hercules, and paſſed the tops of the Pyrenæan mountaines, which reach vnto the cloudes, and ſo made all thoſe people ſubiect vnto them: and for all that they were ſo D warlike a nation, and ſo farre from Rome, they left only one legion for garriſon. Which of you haue not heard of the multitude of the Germanes? whoſe vertue and mighty bodies I thinke you haue often ſeene. For in euery countrey the Romanes haue them for captiues: yet they whoſe countrey is ſo large, hauing harts farre bigger then their bodies, and ſoules that contemn death, who are more cruell then brute beaſts; yet are they now limited by the riuer Rhene, and kept in ſubiection by eight legions of Romans: and thoſe that were taken were made ſlaues, and the reſt choſe rather to ſaue themſelues by flight then fight. And you who haue ſuch confidence in the walles of Ieruſalem, conſider the walles of Britanie; whoſe countrey though compaſſed with the Ocean, and almoſt as great as our whole world the Romans ſayling into it haue conquered, and foure legions keep that Iſland ſo populous. Nay, you may ſee all the nobility of the Eaſt at Rome, who with peace ſhadow their captiuity; and almoſt all the nations vnder the Sun trembling and dreading the Roman puiſſance: and will you only warre againſt them? Doe you not conſider what befell the Carthaginians, who boaſting themſelues of that great Hannibal, ſprung from the noble race of the Phœnicians, at laſt were deſtroyed by Scipio? Neither could the Cyrenæans, who tooke their beginning from the Lacedemonians, nor all the race of the Marmaridans, which extended as farre as the Deſerts (which are very ſcarce of waters) nor the Syrtes, nor the Naſamonians, nor the Moores, nor the innumerable multitude of the Numidians, haue been able to reſiſt the power of the Romans; who by force of armes haue conquered F the third part of the world, the nations whereof can hardly bee numbred, which from the Sea Atlantick and Hercules pillers vnto the red Sea, containeth an infinite company of Æthiopians, and innumerable habitations of them: who beſides that they pay ſo much fruits and Corne vnto the Romans, as for eight moneths in euery year will keep and ſuſtain all the people of Rome, doe alſo pay tribute; and moreouer aſſiſt them any way they can, and neuer murmure at it, as you doe; and there is onely one legion left to keep them in obedience. well perceiue it by that they did in Egypt, hard by: which reaching vnto Æthiopia and rich Arabia, and bordering vpon India, hauing vnder it seuen hundreth and fifty millions of people, besides the inhabitants of Alexandria (which is easie to be counted by the tribute which is paid of euery person by the Poule) liuing in their country, yet disdain not to liue vnder the dominion of the Romans; notwithstanding, that they haue a great entisement to rebel, to wit, Alexandria which is both populous and very rich, in length 30. furlongs, in breadth ten, and paies more tribute in a moneth then you doe in a whole yeare; and, besides their mony, finde all Rome with corne foure moneths in the yeare: and it is on euery side compassed about either with a waste wildernesse, by which none can passe; or the fierce sea, which is boundlesse; or with great and strong riuers, or muddie and durtie quagmires, and marish grounds: all which little auailed them to withstand the force of the Romans. For two legions onely placed in the citie, keepe all the great countrie Egypt, and the nobility of Macedon in awe.

Alexandria acknowledgeth the power of the Romans.

What associates will you haue from some countrie not inhabited, to aide you against the Romans? For all those that at this day dwel in any place of the world, that is inhabited, obey the Romans. Except peraduenture some of you hope for help from beyond Euphrates, thinking that your countrimen of Adiabena will help you: but they wil not entangle themselues in these dangerous wars, for an vnreasonable cause; or if they would consent to so dishoneſt a deed, the Parthians wil not suffer them. For they are carefull to maintaine their league with the Romans, and would thinke it violated, if any vnder their dominions should warre against them. It remaineth then, that you must only trust that God will help you; but God doth assist the Romans: for it is vnpossible that such an Empire should continue without the helpe of God. Consider that this contempt of religion, although you were to war against farre weaker then your selues, yet were it hard to be dispensed withall; and it may so come to passe, that that wherby you hope to make God your partaker, thereby you may make him your enemie: for if you obserue the custome of Sabbaths, and in them doe nothing, it will not be hard to conquer you. For so your ancestors haue made experience by Pompeius, who euer deferred all his enterprises vntill that day, wherin his enemies were idle, and made no resistance. Now if in warre yee transgresse your countrie lawes, I know not then for what you should rebell. For truely all of you at this time are of that mind, that your countrie lawes shall not be changed. And I pray you how will you request help at Gods hands, if wilfully ye break his lawes? All that begin warre, either trust in humane riches, or diuine succor: and they that warre, hauing no probability to hope for any of these, wilfully lead themselues into open captiuity. What letteth you euery man with his owne hands to butcher his wife and children, and from consuming this goodly countrie with fire? for so you shall gaine this, not to abide the shame of a conquest. It is good O friends, it is good, whilest yet the ship is in the Hauen, to foresee & prouide for future tempests, and not then begin to feare when you are amidst the waues and surges of the sea. They who fall into misery not foreseene, are worthy to receiue compassion: but they that runne into wilfull calamity, deserue no pitie, but reproach. Vnlesse perhaps yee thinke that the Romans will fight with you, as you will condition; and that if they ouercome you, they will not vse you hardly, nor fire and destroy this sacred Citie, and all the whole nation as they haue done others. If yee be ouercome, whoso escapeth vnkilled, can haue no place of refuge: for all nations either are already subiect vnto the Romans, or feare that they shall be shortly. So that not onely you shall bee in danger, but also all Cities wherin any Iewes remain. For there is no nation nor people in the whole world, among whom some of your countrie are not, who all shall be most cruelly put to death if you rebell: and for the wicked counsell of a few men, all cities shall flow with blood of the Iewes; and no man shall be punished for killing Iewes, because of your offence. And if the Romans doe not execute all this outrage after your rebellion, then think how impious a thing it is, to rebell against so mild gouernors. Take compassion, if not of your children, and wiues, yet at the least of this city, which is the mother citie of all your nation. Spare these holy wals, and sacred temple, and keepe vnto your selues the law and sacred things of the temple: assure your selues that if the Romans again ouercome you, they will not spare these things, seeing you were no more gratefull vnto them, for preseruing them before. I protest before God, your holy temple, and all the Angels of heauen and our whole countrie, that I haue kept back no counsell, which I think profitable for you. Now if you consider of those things which are profitable for you, ye shal liue with me in peace: but if you follow your private affections, I will not be partaker of the miseries and dangers, you thrust your selues into. When he had thus spoken, he wept, his sister Berenice standing by him, and by his tears mitigated a great part of their fury. Then they cried that they meant not to bear armes

To this, Agrippa anſwered, But your deeds ſhew that you fight againſt the Romanes: for you haue not paid your tribute to Cæſar, and you haue burned the porches belonging vnto Antonia; now if you would hide your rebellion, repaire with ſpeed the porches, and pay your tribute: for this fort belongeth not to Florus, nor the money. Herewith the people were content: and aſcending into the temple with Agrippa and Berenice, they began to reedifie the porches, and the nobility and captains gatherd the tribute in euery village, and quickly brought forty talents (for ſo much mony was behinde.) And thus Agrippa appeaſed the beginning of theſe wars. After this he began to perſwade the people to obey Florus, till ſuch time as another were ſent to ſupply his place. Heerewith the multitude was ſo moued, that they contumeliouſly reuiled the king, and threw

The king ſeeing that their ſedition would not bee quieted, complaining of the iniury done vnto him, ſent the nobility and all the potentates to Florus, who was at Cæſarea, that he might chuſe whom he would amongſt them to gather the tribute through the whole country. And ſo he departed into his owne kingdome.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the rebellion of the Iewes begun againſt the Romans.

C AT this time, ſome of the chiefeſt rebels, aſſembled together, ſuddainly aſſaulted a Caſtle called Maſſada, which at vnawares they took, and killed all the Romans, and in their places put a guard of their owne company. In the temple alſo, Eleazar, ſon of the high prieſt Ananias, a bould and deſperate young man, captaine of the ſouldiers, perſwaded them who offered ſacrifices, not to offer any but thoſe that were giuen by the Iews. And this was the ground and cauſe of the wars that enſued. For they reiected Cæſars ſacrifices, that were wont to bee offered for the good of the Romans. And although the high prieſts & people of account requeſted them not to omit that cuſtom of ſacrificing for their kings and gouernors, yet they refuſed ſo to do, truſting greatly to their faction: all the ſtrength of the city that deſired alteration, were of their mindes, and eſpecially Eleazar, who at that time was Generall, as is before ſaid. Wherefore all the potentates, high prieſts, and chiefeſt of the Phariſes aſſembled themſelues; & perceiuing into how great danger thoſe rebels daily brought the

D citie, they determined to make triall of the courage of the ſeditious people: wherefore they aſſembled them together before the braſen gate, which was in the inner part of the temple toward the Eaſt. And firſt of all, they greatly complained of their raſh and vnaduiſed rebellion, and that they ſought to ſtirre vp ſo great warres againſt their countrey, inueighing againſt the cauſe that moued them therto, as being without reaſon: telling them that their anceſtors for the moſt part, adorned the temple with the gifts of Gentiles; neuer refuſing the offrings of ſtrangers; and not only not to haue refuſed their offrings (for that were an impious fact) but alſo placed in the temple the gifts that they ſent, which were yet to be ſeene. And that now onely to prouoke the Romans to warre, and denounce it againſt them, they began to alter religion: and beſide other dan-

E gers alſo, to make the city ſeeme guilty of impiety; as though it were ſuch a one wherein none might offer ſacrifice but Iewes, nor any but they might adore God. If we ſhould make ſuch a law againſt any priuat perſon, he had iuſt cauſe to accuſe vs of inhumanity. But now the Romãs were deſpiſed, and Cæſar himſelf accounted profane: and it was to be feared, that if the Iews diſdained to accept of Cæſars offrings, Cæſar would hinder them from offering any: And that the City of Ieruſalem would preſently bee accounted as an enemy to the Empire, vnleſſe they preſently accepted Cæſars ſacrifice; and before ſuch time as they heard theſe newes againſt whom this outrage was attempted. And hauing thus ſpoken, they brought forth the moſt learned amongſt the Prieſts, to recount from time to time how their anceſtors had alwaies accepted of the ſacrifices of ſtrangers.

Againſt thoſe who refuſe forraine ſacrifices.

F But none of the rebels gaue eare vnto any thing that was ſaid, and the Leuits came not to ſerue at the altar, as now preparing for war. When the Nobility ſaw that they could not appeaſe this ſedition, and that they themſelues ſhould firſt feele the Romans power, they deuiſed all meanes to pacifie the tumult, and ſent ſome as Embaſſadors vnto Florus: the chiefe whereof was Simon, the ſonne of Ananias: other ſome were ſent to Agrippa, of which the nobleſt was Saulus, Antipas and Coſtobarus, who were alſo akinne vnto the king, requeſting them both to come with an army into the city, and ſuppreſſe the ſedition which was raiſed, before it went further. Florus was glad glad of theſe tidings, and deſiring nothing more then war, gaue no anſwer to the Embaſſadours. But Agrippa willing to ſpare both parts, as well the good as the rebels, and to preſerue the Iewes for the Romans, and the temple for the Iewes, conſidering it not meet for him to buſie himſelfe in ſuch affaires, ſent 3000 horſmen to aid the people againſt the rebels. Which horſmen were of Auranitis, Batanæa and Trachon, and made Darius their captaine; and Philip, ſon of Ioachim, Generall of all the army. Theſe coming into the city, the nobility, with the high prieſts and the reſt of the people that deſired peace, receiued this ſuccour in good part; and occupied the higher part of the city; for the rebels kept the lower part, and the temple: ſo that they inſtantly fought with darts and ſlings, and ſhooting of arrowes; and ſometime one ruſhing vpon another, ſuddenly they skirmiſhed together. The ſeditious were more valiant, but the kings ſouldiers were more skilfull in wars; who chiefly endeuoured to get the temple, and expel out of it thoſe who profaned it. And the rebels with Eleazar endeuoured, beſide that which they had already, to get alſo into their hands the higher part of the city. Wherefore, during the ſpace of 7. daies, there continued a great conflict betwixt them, and either part kept that they had. When the celebration of the feaſt came, cald Xylophoria, wherein euery one carieth wood to the temple, to keep a fire continually vpon the Altar; the rebels would not ſuffer their enemies to do their deuotion.

War in Ieruſalem between the ſeditious & thoſe that fauored peace.

Xylophoria a feaſt.

Now many of the theeues, who caried poyniards vnder their coats, went amongſt the weaker multitude, and boldly followed their old practice. The kings ſouldiers were ouercome, and forced to leaue the higher part of the city: and the rebels preſently coming in, ſet the palaces of Ananias, Agrippa and Berenice on fire, and forthwith went to the place where all charters were kept, purpoſing there to burn all bonds and obligations of debters; thereby to defraud the creditors, and ſo to ioine all the debters with their faction, and ſtir vp all the poore people againſt the rich. But the keepers of theſe publike writings fleeing, the ſeditious perſons ſet all on fire: and ſo hauing deſtroied as it were the ſtrength of the city, they addreſt themſelues againſt ſuch as reſiſted their proceedings. Some of the high prieſts and nobles hid themſelues in vaults; others, fleeing with the kings ſouldiers into the higher palace of the king, ſoone lockt vp the doores after them; amongſt whom was Ananias the high prieſt, and Ezechias his brother, and they who (as is before ſpoken) were ſent Embaſſadors to Agrippa: and ſo the ſeditious were ſatisfied that day with the victory, and firing of the houſes aforeſaid.

The kings ſouldiers are ouercome.

The next day, which was the fifteenth of Auguſt, they aſſaulted the Caſtle Antonia: and beſieging it two daies, they took all that guarded it, and killed them; and placed in it a garriſon of their owne company. This done, they went vnto the kings palace, whither Agrippas ſouldiers were fled: and diuiding their companie into foure parts, they began to caſt down the wals: none of them that were within durſt come out for fear of the multitude, but went vp to the turrets of the palace, and killed all thoſe that offred to come vp, and many of the theeues vnder the walles, with things that they caſt downe. This conflict continued day and night; for the rebels thought that thoſe which were within could not hold out for want of victuals: and they within thought that the ſeditious beeing wearied would ſoone giue ouer. In the meane ſeaſon, one Manahemus, the ſonne of Iudas of Galilæa (that moſt craftie ſubtile ſophiſter, who reuiled the Iewes in Cyrenius time for paying tribute, and would be ſubiect to any but to God) taking with him certaine nobles, went vnto Maſſada, where king Herods armorie was, and breaking into it, hee armed the common people and other theeues; and hauing them for his guard, he returned againe to Ieruſalem as king: & when he was made prince of that ſedition, he diſpoſed of the battery of the fortreſſes. But they wanted engines, neither could they openly vndermine the wals of the aduerſaries, who continually caſt downe darts: wherefore they began a mine a great way off, til it came vnder one of the towers which was ſupported by poſts of wood, and they ſet fire on the wood ſupporting it & went their way: ſo the ſupporters being conſumed with fire, the tower preſently fell downe, and there appeared a very high wall within. For thoſe within, perceiuing their aduerſaries intent, perhaps by the ſhaking of that tower, preſently builded this wall to keep out the rebels betweene them and it. The ſeditious, verily thinking that with the fall of the tower they ſhould be victors, when they ſaw another wall, were amazed. And the kings ſouldiers were ſent vnto Manahemus and others that were chiefe of the rebels, requeſting them to haue licence to depart. Which Manahemus granted onely to the kings ſouldiers, and thoſe of his owne countrey; who preſently accepting thereof, departed, and ſo left the Romans in great feare. For they were not able to reſiſt ſo great a multitude, and they thought it a ſhame to intreat that they might depart, thinking that it were dangerous for them although it were granted. Wherefore leauing the lower place which was cald Stratopedon, becauſe it might eaſily be taken, they fled into the kings

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the death of Ananias the high prieſt, Manahemus and the Roman ſouldiers.

B THe next day following, Ananias the high Prieſt was taken in one of the water Conduits of the kings palace, where he hid himſelfe, and was there kild with his brother Ezechias by theſe theeues: and the rebels beſieged all the towers round about, and kept diligent watch, leſt any of the Romans ſhould eſcape. But Manahemus, both for his good ſucceſſe in deſtroying the ſtrong holds, as alſo with the death of Ananias the high Prieſt, became proud and cruel: and thinking none ſo wiſe as himſelfe, in thoſe affaires, became an intolerable tyrant. Now two of Eleazars companions roſe vp and communed together, that it did not becom them that rebelled againſt the Romans (onely to recouer their liberty) that they ſhould be traytors thereof to their owne companions, who were of the ſame condition, and that they ſhould indure a King or Lord ouer them, who although he be no ſeuere man, yet he was of more abiect & baſe C condition then they. If it were ſo, that it were expedient to haue one Ruler ouer all the reſt, they had rather haue any one then Manahemus: and being thus agreed, they ſet vpon him in the Temple, where he was praying with great pomp, aparelled like a king, and hauing about him a guard of his friends in armour. Now when Eleazar his followers ſet vpon Manahemus, the people did alſo throw ſtones at him, and ſo ſtoned him, hoping that by his death the ſedition would be extinguiſhed. The guard of Manahemus at firſt made ſome reſiſtance; but when they perceiued the whole multitude againſt them, euery one ſhifted for himſelfe as hee could, and thoſe that were taken were put to death, and they that eſcaped were afterward ſought for: onely a few of them fled to Maſſada, amongſt whom was Eleazar, the ſon of Iairus, the ſon of Manahemus kinſman, and afterward in Maſſada becam a tyrant. But Manahemus fled into a place called Ophlas, where hee D baſely hid himſelfe: and being taken, hee was drawne out from thence, and after many torments put to death, and with him, all the Nobility that had aſſiſted him, as alſo Abſalomon, who was his onely helper: And in this matter (as I haue ſaid) the people greatly helped, hoping heereby to haue ſome end of that ſedition. But the rebels did not kill Manahemus to the end to extinguiſh ſedition, but to the intent to rob and ſpoile more freely.

The people with many intreaties beſought them to let the Romans alone, whom they did beſiege, but they were ſo much the more earneſt againſt them: till they beeing no longer able to make reſiſtance, with the conſent of Metilius their Captaine, and ſome other of more authority, ſent vnto Eleazar, requeſting him to giue them licence to depart with their liues, and leaue their munition to the Iewes. Who accepting their petition, ſent vnto them Gorion, the ſon of Nichodemus, and Ananias the Saducee, and Iudas, the ſonne of Ionathas, to confirme the promiſe of their E liues. Which done, Metilius led away the ſouldiers: and whil'ſt the Romans had their weapons, none of the rebels durſt attempt any of their treachery againſt them: but ſo ſoone as euery one according to couenant laid down their ſhields and ſwords, and ſo departed miſtruſting nothing, Eleazars guard ſet vpon them, and kild them, who neither made reſiſtance, nor any intreaty for their liues, onely putting them in minde of their promiſe and oath. So they were all ſlaine ſaue onely Metilius, who greatly intreated for his life; and promiſing that he would become a Iew in religion, and bee circumciſed, they ſpared him. Yet was this a ſmall loſſe to the Romans, who onely had then but a very few ſlaine of their great and almoſt infinite army: and this ſeemed the very beginning of the Iewes captiuity.

F When they ſaw themſelues to haue giuen ſufficient cauſe of wars, and too great, and that the Citie was now ſo filled with iniquitie, that the wrath of God did hang ouer it, though there had been no feare of any harme to them by the Romans, yet the whole Citie mourned, and was ſorrowfull, and quietly minded, lamenting as though they themſelues ſhould anſwer for the ſeditious, for that murder which was committed on the Sabbath, when it is not lawfull for the Iews to do any good vvork.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the great massacre of the Iewes at Cæsarea, and in all Syria.

AT the same houre on the selfe-same day, it hapned, as it were by Gods prouidence, that the inhabitants of Cæsarea did massacre the Iewes that dwelt among them; so that at one time aboue 20000. were slaine, and not one Iew left aliue in all Cæsarea. For those that escaped, Florus took, and brought them forth bound vnto the people. After this massacre done at Cæsarea, the whole nation of the Iewes wexed mad: and diuiding themselues into companies, they wasted and destroied in short time all the borders of Syria, and the cities thereabout, to wit, Piladelphia and Geboni- H

tis, Gerasa, Pella and Scythopolis, and then they made incursion into Gadara, Hippon & Gaulanitis, pulling downe some places, and firing othersome. And from thence they marched towards Cedasa, a city of the Tyrians, and Ptolemais, Gaba and Cæsarea: and neither Sebaste, neither Ascalon could resist them, but they also were consum'd with fire. Likewise they destroied Anthedon, with Gaza, and most places adioining to these cities were sacked, to wit, the fields and villages, and a mighty slaughter was made of them that were taken in these places. The Syrians made as great a massacre of the Iewes as this among them: for all the Iewes inhabiting among them were murdered, not onely for an old grudge, but also for the auoiding of imminent danger. And all Syria was troubled in most grieuous manner, and euery city was diuided into 2. parts, and either parts safety consisted in this, to preuent the other in murdering them first: the I daies were spent in bloudshed, and the nights in feare, worse then death it selfe. For though they onely pretended to destroy the Iewes, yet were they drawne to suspect other nations, that followed the Iewes religion; and because they were as it were neuters, the Syrians thought it not good to destroy them: and againe, for their agreeing in religion with the Iewes, they were constrained to hould them as enemies. Many of the contrary part, who before seemed modest, were now throgh auarice incited to meddle in this murder, for euery one took the goods of them that were slaine, and caried them to other places as conquerers. And he was most renowned that had stolen most, as hauing also kild most. There might you see in euery part of the city the dead bodies of all ages vnburied, old men and children, and women lying in most shamefull maner, their secret parts being vncouered. Briefely, all the country was filled with exceeding great calamity, K and the feare of misery to come was vnspeakeable.

And these were the conflicts betweene the Iewes and strangers. But afterward making incursion vpon the borders of Scythopolis, the Iewes there dwelling were their enemies. For they conspiring with the citizens of Scythopolis, and preferring their own commodity and security before their kinred and consanguinity, ioyned with the Gentiles against the Iewes, who for all that, were suspected for their forwardnes. Finally, the Scythopolites fearing that they would assault the city by night, and excuse their reuolting by their great misery, they commanded all the Iewes, that if they would shew themselues trusty vnto the Gentiles, they with all their children should goe into a wood hard by: who forthwith did as they were wild, suspecting nothing, and the Scythopolites were quiet for two dayes after, and did nothing: But the third night they sent L sand, and afterward took their goods. I think it not amisse to speak of the death of Simon, who was the sonne of Saul, a man of regard: hee was a man of great courage, and strength of bodie, both which hee vsed to the great hurt of his owne nation: for he daily killed many Iewes, who dwelt neere vnto Scythopolis, and he alone often scattred diuers companies, and put whole armies to flight; who had an end woorthie of his deeds, and murdering of his countreymen. For when the Scythopolites had compassed the wood about, so that none could escape their hands, they killed the Iewes in euery part thereof. Simon, drawing his sword, made no resistance to any of his enemies: for he saw that it was bootlesse to striue against such a multitude. Then pitifully M crying out, I receiue, O Scythopolits, a worthy reward for that which I haue done, who to shew my fidelity towards you, haue kild so many of mine own countrimen: & it is a iust plague that a strange nation should be false to vs, who impiously forsook our own brethren. I will do therfore as a profane person, killing my selfe with my own hands, and this death wil be a sufficient punishment for my offences, and a full argument of my magnanimitie, that none of my enemies may boast of my death, nor insult ouer me. When he had thus said, he beheld al his family with compassion

A passion & rage mixt together: he had a wife & children, and aged parents. And first taking his father by the haire of the head, stood vpon him, and thrust him through; after him he kild his mother, who was willing to dy; after them his wife & children, euery one of them as it were offring their bodies to the sword, desirous to preuent the enimies. When he had slain all his kinred, himselfe remaining aliue, he stretcht forth his arme that they might see what he would do, and thrust his sword into his own body vp to the hilts. A yong man, who for his magnanimity and strength of body was worthy to be pitied, had yet a iust and deserued end for trusting forren nations.

CHAP. XX.

Of another grieuous slaughter of the Iewes.

B AFter this so great a massacre of the Iewes in Scythopolis, other cities also did rise against them where they inhabited, and 2000. and 500. were slaine at Ascalon, and 2000. at Ptolemais, and the Tyrians kild diuers, and kept many in prison: Likewise, they of Gadara and Hippon slew the most valiant, and those of least courage they cast into prison. Also all other cities, who either feared or hated the Iewes, rose vp against them. Onely they of Antiochia, Sidonia and Apamia, spared them that dwelt with them, and neither kild nor imprisoned any of them: perhaps they stood in no feare of them if they should haue risen, because their city was so populous: yet I think they spared them only for pity sake, because they saw they were quiet, and not seditious. The inhabitants also of Gerasa did no harme to the C Iewes amongst them: but when they desired to depart, they conducted them safely to the end of their borders. In the kingdome also of Agrippa much cruelty was shewed against the Iewes: for he being gone to Cestius Gallus at Antiochia, left the rule of his country to one of his friends named Varus, kinsman to king Sohemius; and there came vnto him 70. of the chiefe Nobilitie of the countrey Batanæa, requesting a garrison to represse those that should attempt rebellion amongst them. Varus sent certaine of the kings souldiers armed, and kild them all as they were coming to him. But hee did this impiety without Agrippa his consent, onely for auarice: and as it were emboldened by this fact, he ruinated the whole realme, still continuing such crueltie and impiety against his nation, till such time as Agrippa vnderstood thereof, who, for Sohemus sake, durst not put him to death, but dispossessed him of his place. In the meane while the rebels took D the fort called Cyprus, which is situate aboue Iericho, and after they had kild the garrison, they destroied the fortresse. At the same time a multitude of Iewes laid siege before the castle of Macheron, and perswaded the souldiers left in garrison to yeeld the castle: who, fearing that if they denied they should bee compelled thereto, deliuered it vnto them; vpon condition, that they might quietly depart, and they of Macherunt placed a strong guard within it.

CHAP. XXI.

How the Iewes were slaine at Alexandria.

E THe citizens of Alexandria had alwaies a quarrel against the Iews that liued with them, since the time that that famous Alexander vsed their help against the Ægyptians, and therefore permitted them to inhabite in Alexandria, and to haue the same priuiledges that the rest of the citizens had. And this honour was also continued with them vnto the time of the successors and heires of Alexander: who also gaue them a certaine place in the city to dwell in, that there they might liue more cõmodiously. The Gentiles hauing nothing to do among them, permitted them also to call themselues Macedonians. And afterward, when Egypt was brought vnder the rule of the Romans, neither Cæsar, nor any one else, did diminish the Iewes dignity in that place which Alexander had giuen them. So that now there was daily conflicts betwern them & the Greeks: and although the Iudges on both parts still punisht them that were in fault, yet the sedition more and more encreased; and when all cities else were fild with F troubles, there the tumult was more vehement. For when the Alexandrians had called together the people to determine of an Embassage to Nero, certaine Iewes mingled themselues amongst the Greeks, & so went into the Amphitheater: who being espy'd by their aduersaries, the Greeks cried out, that the Iewes were enemies, and came as spies, and so laid violent hands vpon them. Some of them fled, onely three of them were taken by the Greekes, whom they drew to a place to burne them aliue. All the Iewes of the city came to succour them, and first they threw stones at them, and then taking fire-bands, they ranne in a rage into the Amphitheater, and threatned

to burne all the people there assembled: which they had done, if Tiberius Alexander gouernour of the city had not appeased their fury; who did not at the first vse force of armes against them, but sent their nobility to perswade them to cease, and not incite the Roman army against them. But the seditious Iewes refused his admonition, & mocked Tiberius: who seeing that they would not otherwise bee appeased, sent two legions of armed Romans against them which were in the city, and with them 5000. other souldiers, who by chance came out of Lybia to this massacre of the Iewes: and Tiberius gaue them charge not onely to kill them, but also to fire their houses; and take their goods. The souldiers presently went into the place cald Delta (for there the Iews were gathered together) and did as they were commanded, and not without bloudy victory. For the Iewes, gathering themselues together, put those amongst them that were best armed in the forefront, who held out for a long time; but when they began to flee, they were massacred like beasts, and some of them were killed in the field, some were burned in their houses, the Romanes first taking what they found, neither sparing infants nor old men, but killing all ages. So that all that place flowed with bloud, for there were slaine 50000. Iewes: and all the rest had beene extinguished, had not Alexander (moued to compassion by their intreaties) commanded the souldiers to leaue off; who beeing obedient vnto him, presently departed: but the people of Alexandria were hardly withdrawne from that massacre, because of the hatred which they had conceiued against the Iews: and with much ado were withheld from tyrannizing ouer the dead bodies. And this befell the Iewes of Alexandria.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the massacre of the Iewes by Cestius Gallus.

CEstius Gallus now thought it time to bestirre himselfe, forasmuch as the Iewes were now hated euery where: and taking with him the twelue whole legions out of Antiochia, two thousand choosen footmen, and foure companies of horsemen out of euery one of the other legions, and with them the kings forces that came to help him, to wit, two thousand horsemen of Antiochia, three thousand foot all boawmen, and three thousand footmen sent by Agrippa, a thousand horse, and foure thousand which Sohemus brought, whereof the third part were horse, the rest foot, and for the most part boawmen; he went towards Ptolemais: and many ioyned themselues to them out of euery city, who, though they were not so skilfull in warre as the Romans, yet their hatred was more then theirs. Agrippa himselfe was there with Cestius, being ruler of those he brought. There Cestius taking a part of the army, went to Zabulon (which is the strongest city of Galilæa, cald also Andron, and parts the borders of the Iewes from Ptolemais) and when he found it desolate (for the inhabitants thereof fled into the mountaines) who left it full of all riches; giuing licence to the souldiers to sack it, he afterwards set it on fire, although he admired the beauty thereof (for it was built like Tyre & Sidon, and Berytum) and after spoiled all the territories about it. Likewise, when he had burnt all the villages thereabout, he returned to Ptolemais. The Syrians, and especially those of Beryth, staid still behinde to get booties: which when the Iewes vnderstood, and that Cestius was departed, they tooke courage, and came and set vpon them, and kild of them 2000. In the meane while Cestius departed from Ptolemais, and went to Cæsarea, and sent part of his army to Ioppe, commanding them to keep the towne if they could get it: and if the townsmen made any resistance, that then they should stay till hee came with the rest of the army. Some of them went by sea, some by land, by which meanes they did easily take Ioppe: so that the people thereof neither had time to flee, nor to prepare themselues to fight; and setting on them, they killed all men with their families: and thus sacking the towne, they set it on fire, and there were slaine 8000, and 400. In like manner he sent part of his horsemen to Narbatena in the Toparchy neer Samaria, who spoil'd the country, kild a great nũber of inhabitants, robd and burnt the villages, and carried away a great booty with them.

Sephoris and other cities of Galilee do friendly entertaine the Romans.

A example. They that were ſeditious & gaue themſelues to robbing, fled into the mountain which is ſituate in the midſt of Galilee againſt Sephoris, called Aſamon: theſe Gallus incountred with his army; who, ſo long as they kept the higher part of the mountain, eaſily reſiſted the Romans, & killed aboue 200. of them: but when they ſaw the Romans had occupied a higher place then that wherein they kept, they eaſily were ouercome: for not beeing armed, they could not ſtand out, and if they ſhould haue fled, they could not haue eſcaped the horſemen, ſo that onely a few hid themſelues in difficult places, & aboue 2000 of thē were ſlaine. Gallus perceiuing all Galilee in peace, and not minded to reuolt, returned with his companies vnto Cæſarea, & Ceſtius with his whole Army went vnto Antipatris: where vnderſtanding that a great multitude of Iews were gatherd togither in the tower called Aphecy, he ſent ſome before to skirmiſh with them: but the
B Iewes would not abide battel, and the ſouldiers burned their tentes, and the villages adioyning. Ceſtius went from thence to Lydda, and found the citie deſolate, for al the people were gone vnto Ieruſalem becauſe of the Feaſt of Tabernacles: and when he had killed fifty perſons whom he found there, he fiered the towne, and went no further: and going by Bethoron hee pitched his Tent in Gabaus, which is fifty furlongs diſtant from Ieruſalem. When the Iews ſaw themſelues in danger, they left the ſolemnity, & prepared themſelues for war: & hauing a great multitude, they went to fight, obſeruing no order, altogether with indiſcreet cries, not regarding the Sabbath, which they hould in great eſtimation: & the ſame fury, that made them leaue their deuotion, made them alſo victorious in that battel; for they aſſaulted the Romans with ſuch a courage, that they brake their battle array: and killing all that reſiſted, they preſſed into the middeſt there-

So there were ſlaine fiue hundred and fifty Roman ſouldiers, and foure hundreth of them were foote, and the reſt were horſemen, but of the Iewes but two and twenty. The moſt valiant in this combate were Monobazus and Cenedæus, kinſmen to king Monobazus of Adiabena, and next to them Paraides Niger, and Silas a Babylonian, who fled vnto the Iewes from king Agrippa, whom he had lately ſerued: and ſo the Iewes being repulſed, returned into Ieruſalem; and Simon the ſonne of Giora inuaded the Romans, as they were returning towards Bethoron, and ſlewe many of the rereward, and tooke many carts, and much baggage withall, which hee brought into the citie. Ceſtius ſtaied three daies in the field, and the Iewes kept the high places, eſpying which way he went, purpoſing not to be quiet if the Romans departed.

Of the ſiege of Ieruſalem by Ceſtius, and of the maſſare.

AGrippa perceiuing the Romans to be in great danger, for that all the mountaines were couerd with infinite numbers of the Iews, he purpoſed to trie, if through few words he could perſwade them to deſiſt from warre; or if any refuſed, to receiue thoſe that were willing. Wherefore he ſent vnto them Borcæus and Phœbus, whome they well knew, aſſuring and promiſing them pardon from Ceſtius, and from the Romans, of all that they had already done, if they would now lay downe their armes, & ioine with them. But the rebels
E fearing that all the multitude in hope of ſafety would ioine with Agrippa, determined to kill the Legats, and ſlew Phœbus before he ſpake any word, & Borcæus being wounded, eſcaped. But the people were angry hereat, & with ſtones and clubs draue them into the towne that were the authors of this fact. Ceſtius perceiuing them at oddes amongſt themſelues, thought that he had now a fit opportunitie to aſſault them, and ſo came vpon them with his whole army: and putting them to flight he purſued them vnto Ieruſalem. And when he had pitched his Tents in the place called Scopus, he departed ſeuen furlongs frō the citie, & did nothing againſt the citie for three daies ſpace, perhaps hoping that they within would relent: and then ſending a great many ſouldiers into the villages adioining to fetch corne, the fourth day which was the thirtieth of October, he came againſt the citie with his armie in battell array. The people of the Iewes were kept
F in awe by the rebels, who terrified by the Roman diſcipline, forſook the outmoſt parts of the city, & fled into the innermoſt part of the temple. Ceſtius paſſing Betheza, burned Cænopolis and the new market place, and comming vnto the higher part of the citie, he pitched his Tent neere the kings palace: & if at that time he had violently iſſued in at the wals, he had taken the city and ended the wars. But Tyrannus Priſcus, General of the footemen, & many other rulers & captaines of the horſemen, being hired with money by Florus, hindred that his purpoſe, whereby the wars were ſo prolonged, and a thouſand calamities befell the Iewes. chiefeſt among the Iewes,& Ananus the ſonne of Ionathas, called Ceſtius, as though they would haue opened him the gates: but hee was angrie & ſcarce truſted them, till at laſt they delaied the time ſo long, that the rebels perceiued this treaſon, and caſt Ananus down the wal, & with ſtones draue his accomplices into their houſes. Which done, they retired themſelues into the towers, from whence they beat back thoſe that ſcaled the wals. The Romans for fiue daies ſpace aſſaulted the wals on euery ſide, but all in vaine; and the ſixt day, Ceſtius with many choſen ſouldiers and boawmen aſſaulted the temple on the North ſide. The Iews valiantly made reſiſtance out of the porches, & often repulſed the Romans approching the wals: yet at laſt they, with the multitude of their aduerſaries darts, were forced to giue back. Then the Romans that went before, hauing their ſhields vpō their heads, leaned againſt the wall, & they in the ſecōd place held their ſhields againſt theirs in the firſt, and ſo in order vntill the laſt, therby making as it were a couering as the Romans call it; or defence, that all their ſhot and darts could doe them no harme; ſo that the ſoldiers did ſafely vndermine the wals, and attempted to fire the gates of the temple.

Diuers Iewes cal for Ceſtius as if they intended to open their gates vnto him.

The Romans couer themſelues with their ſhields, & vndermine the wals and burne the Temple gates

Now the ſeditious people were hereat greatly amazed, and many fled out of the Citie, as though it would preſently be taken. And the good were hereby encouraged, as much as the rebels were diſmaied, and came vnto the gates to open vnto Ceſtius, who had well deſerued at their hands. And truely had hee but a little longer continued his ſiege, he had taken the Citie. But I thinke that God being angry with the wicked, would not ſuffer the warres to be ended at that time: for Ceſtius neither regarding the good wil of the people, nor the deſperation of the rebels, remoued his armie from thence; and hauing receiued no loſſe, very vnaduiſedly departed from the Citie: at whoſe vnlooked for flight, the rebels tooke heart; and making after him, they killed the horſemen and footemen that came laſt. And then Ceſtius went to the Tents which hee had fortified in Scopion. The next day he went further into the countrie; whereby he more encouraged the rebels, who following him, killed many of his rereward. Afterward, either end of the armie beeing well ſtrengthned, the Iewes aſſaulted them that were behind, and the laſt durſt not caſt any darts againſt them, who wounded them on their backes, thinking that an infinite multitude had followed them; and they were not able to reſiſt thoſe that aſſaulted them on each ſide, beeing as it were heauie, and not daring to breake their order; on the contrarie, ſeeing the Iewes ſo actiue & apt to skip to and fro: ſo that the Romans endured much harme at the hands of their enemies, and did them none; and thus were they beaten all the way along, and many of them killed, amongſt whom was Priſcus captaine of the ſixt legion, and Longinus the tribune, & Aemilius Iucundus captaine of a troupe of horſemen. And ſo with much adoe, they came vnto Gabio; where they firſt pitcht their Tents, caſting away much of their baggage, which might any way hinder them. Ceſtius ſtaied there two daies, doubtfull what to doe: the third day he perceiued his enemies to be increaſed, and all places about to be filled with Iewes: whereby he ſaw that his ſlow haſt was to his diſaduantage, and the number of his enemies would ſtil increaſe if he made any longer abode there. Wherefore that he might flie ſpeedily, he cauſed the ſouldiers to caſt away all thoſe things that might any way be a hinderance vnto them, & killed their Mules and Aſſes, & cattell, ſauing onely thoſe that bare munition; fearing that if hee ſhould not deſtroy them, the Iewes might make vſe of them againſt him, and ſo he led the armie toward Bethoron. The Iewes in large paſſages little moleſted his army: but when they were to paſs a ſtreight, then they killed them of the rereward, and thruſt other ſome downe into the valley, and all the armie of the Iewes were ſpred vpon the eminent places, whereby the armie was to paſſe, expecting to welcome them with arrowes. Where the footmen amazed, and bethinking how to help themſelues, the horſemen were brought into great danger: for they could not keepe their rankes for darts and arrowes, neither could they goe to hurt their enemies, the aſcent vnto the top of the mountaines was ſo ſteepe: & they were compaſſed on each ſide with rocks and deep valleies, ſo that if any went out of the way, he fell down and was killed, inſomuch as there was no way to fly nor to reſiſt. Now not knowing what to doe, they began to weepe, and crie out as men in deſperation: and the Iewes anſwered them with an encouraging one another to play the men; being glad of their enemies aduerſitie, and cruelly bent againſt them: and all the armie of Ceſtius had there periſhed, had not the night come on and helped them, which by her darkneſs gaue leaſure to the Romans to flie into Bethoron. In the meane while, the Iewes kept all the places thereabouts beſieged, and garded the paſſages. Ceſtius ſeeing it not poſſible to march openly, thought it beſt to flie, and choſe almoſt 400. of his ſtrongeſt ſouldiers, and ſet them in very eminent places, commanding them that when they were aloft, they ſhould crie as they did before, that the Iewes might thinke that the whole army was there, and ſo he with the reſt of his army marched

Of the crueltie of those of Damascus against the Iewes, and of Iosephs affaires in Galilee.

The yeare of the world, 4031. after Christs birth, 69.

C NOw continently after Cestius aduerse fortune, many of the chiefest amongst the Iews daily fled and forsooke the citie, as a ship presently ready to sinke. Costobarus and Saul two brethren, and Philip the son of Ioachim Generall of Agrippas army, fled out of the citie and yeelded themselues vnto Cestius. As for Antipas, who was also besieged with them in the kings palace, he would not flie with the rest, and so was killed by the rebels. But Cestius sent Saul and the rest of his company into Achaia vnto Nero, to let him vnderstand the cause of their flight, and to shew how Florus had caused all these wars: for so he hoped that Nero would bend his wrath against Florus, and quit him from danger. Then the people of Damascus vnderstanding the death of the Romans, deuised how to destroy the Iewes which inhabited amongst them: & they thought it was easie to be accomplished, for that the Iewes were already assembled in the common baths, for feare of some such matter: yet they mistrusted their women, who all, except a fewe, were Iewes in religion. Wherfore they tooke great heed to conceale their intent from them: & so assaulting the Iewes altogether in a narrow place, and hauing nothing to defend them, they put them all to the sword, who were in number ten thousand. The rebels that so pur-
D sued Cestius, returned into Ierusalem, and ceased not to ioin all vnto them that fauoured the Romans, either by force or by flatterie: and assembling themselues in the temple, they determined to choose a greater number of captaines. Wherefore Ioseph the sonne of Gorion, and Ananus the high priest were appointed rulers of the Citie, and especially to see the wals therof repaired. Eleazar the sonne of Simon was put in no authoritie, notwithstanding that he had in his custodie all preies and spoiles taken from the Romans, and Cestius his money, and a great part of the publike treasure, becaus they perceiued him through authoritie to waxe proud, and his attendants become stately. Yet in time Eleazar by money and craft, perswaded the people to obey him in all things. And they requested other captaines to be sent into Idumæa, who were Iesus the sonne
E of Sapphas, and Eleazar the sonne of the newe high priest: and they commanded Niger who was borne beyond Iordan, to obey these captaines, who was therefore called Peraides, and was then Gouernour of Idumæa. And they neglected not to doe the like by other regions: for Ioseph the sonne of Simon was sent to Iericho and Manasses beyond the riuer, and Iohn the Essean to Tamna, euery one to rule the gouernment of his country as a Toparchy. Lydda, Ioppe, and Amnaus, were annexed to Iohn the Essean, and Iohn the sonne of Ananias was appointed Gouernour of Gophnitis and Acrabatena. And Ioseph the son of Matthias was made ruler ouer both Galilees, vnto which was ioyned Gamala the strongest Citie in that coast.

Likewiſe Iohn the ſonne of Leuias, at Ioſephs commaund, built the wall of Giſcala himſelfe alone: but in all other places that were fortified, Ioſeph put to his helping hand, and told how they ſhould be done. conſidering that the Roman army was inuincible, for that they were all obedient vnto their rulers and expert in warre, hee could not inſtruct them in martiall diſcipline, other occaſions forcing him to the contrarie: but calling to minde that the multitude of rulers made obedience, hee ordained many captaines & conſtituted diuers ſorts of ſouldiers, as the Romans vſed to do; making ſome gouernours often, otherſome ouer a hundreth, and others ouer a thouſand; and appointed likewiſe rulers ouer them. them in feates of armes, imitating in particular the order of the Romans, often telling them that they were to fight with men, who for ſtrength of body & courage paſſed al nations of the world. Alſo he told them that hereby he ſhould perceiue whether they would be obedient in warre, If now they abſtained from ſuch things as were vſuall to ſouldiers, to wit, robbing & ſpoiling their countriemen, and craftie and deceitfull dealing; nor thinke the ſpoile of thoſe with whome they conuerſed to be their owne gaine : for thoſe wars had alwaies beſt ſucceſſe, where the ſouldiers carried good conſciences; and they that were bad, ſhould not onely haue men, but God alſo for

L
WHileſt Ioſeph thus ordered the eſtate of Galilee, there aroſe a traitor borne in Giſcala, the ſonne of Leuias whoſe name was Iohn, a moſt ſubtil & deceitfull treacher, who by vile meanes was now become the richeſt man in that countrey, beeing before verie poor; where by for a while hee was hindred from putting his villanies in practice :
Iohn a notable diſſembler, and a thirſtie murtherer vnder hope of gaine.
who could lie at his pleaſure & eaſily giue credite vnto lies, who thought deceit to be a vertue, which he vſed euen toward his deareſt friends: & a great counterfeiter of humanity: yet for the hope of gaine became a cruell murtherer. Hee alwaies aimed at high matters, with an aſpiring mind, & at firſt nouriſhed his hope with ſmal villanies. For firſt he was a thief after his own manner, & liued in woods and ſolitarie places; at laſt he got him a company of audacious people like M to himſelfe, at firſt ſmall, but afterward he greatly increaſed it. He had alſo a great care to chooſe no idle perſons, but ſuch as were ſtrong of body, valiant of mind, and skilfull in martiall affaires: of theſe he gathered foure hundreth, the moſt of them out of Tyre, and the villages thereabout: and with them he waſted all Galilee, and put many in minde of the miſerable wars to come. This man a long time before deſired to be gouernour of the army, and aſpired to greater matters, only the want of money hindred him : and perceiuing that Ioſeph tooke delight in his induſtrie, hee perſwaded him to ſuffer him to build the wals of that place where he was borne, which was now deſolate; and to accompliſh this, he gathered great ſummes of money of the richer ſort. Then he deuiſed another ſhift: for hauing perſwaded the Iewes that were diſperſed ouer all Syria, that they

A they ſhould vſe no oile, ſaue onely that which was made by their owne nation, he cauſed diuers veſſels of oile to be brought vnto the confines of Galilee, and buying foure barrels for a piece of Tyrian money (which amounted vnto foure Antique groates) he ſould them againe vnto the Syrian Iewes, the halfe of one barrell for as much as all foure coſt him. And for that Galilee abounded with oiles, and eſpecially at that time, hee conueied it to ſuch places where there was great want, and none was brought but by himſelfe. By this meanes, hee gathered an infinite maſſe of money, which preſently he turned to his preiudice who had giuen him licence ſo to get it. And thinking that if he could depoſe Ioſeph, that then hee might come to bee ruler ouer Galilee, hee commanded his followers to robbe and ſpoile more then they did before, and ſo to trouble the countrey, that he might either kill the gouernour, if hee ſought to redreſſe it, at vnawares; or if

B he let all alone, to accuſe him of cowardice to the people for ſo doing. Moreouer, he had already giuen out ſpeeches, that Ioſeph went about to betray Galilee to the Romans, and deuiſed many things to this effect to worke Iosephs ouerthrow. It hapned that at that time, ſome of the village of Dabarit, who watched in the field, ſet vpon Ptolomæus, who was factor for Agrippa, and his ſiſter Berenice, and ſpoiled them of all cariage, wherein was much coſtly apparell, and many ſiluer cups, and ſix hundreth peeces of gold. And for that they could not doe this ſecretly, they brought all the whole bootie to Ioſeph at Tarichea: who reprouing them for offering violence vnto the kings ſeruants, commanded the things to be kept at the houſe of Aeneas, who was one of the richeſt men in the towne, who ſhould reſtore them to the owner when time ſerued: wherein thinking to doe himſelfe great good, he wrought himſelfe much danger. For the theeues beeing

C offended that they receiued no part thereof, & ſeeing that Ioſeph wold reſtore to Agrippa & his ſiſter Berenice that which they had laboured to get, they went roūd about the villages in the night, and ſpread this falſe report in euery place, that Ioſeph was a traitor to his country, and with the ſame rumour filled the cities thereabout. So that early in the next morning, a hundreth thouſand armed men came againſt Ioſeph. Finally, the multitude aſſembling themſelues togither in the theater at Tarichea, the greateſt part cried out in their choler and fury, that the traitor might be depoſed, or herſome that he might be burned, and Iohn himſelfe incited many, and with him one Ieſus the ſonne of Sapphias, who at that time was gouernour of Tiberias. All the friends of Ioſeph and his guard being terrified with ſuch a multitude, fled, foure onely excepted. But Ioſeph in the

X meane while was aſleepe: and had he ſlept a little longer, they had ſet his houſe on fire. Whereupon he aroſe, and the foure that remained with him, counſelled him to flie: but he not diſmaid

D in that he was left alone, nor for that ſo great a multitude came againſt him, went boldly towards them with his garment all torne and aſhes vpon his head, holding his hands behind him, and his ſword vpon his neck. Whereat they that bare him good will, eſpecially the people of Tarichea, were moued to compaſſion: but the country people and they whom he ouerlaid with taxes and tributes, curſed him, and had him bring forth the publike treaſure, and confeſſe his treaſon: for becauſe of the attire and habite he came in, they thought hee would not haue denied any thing whereof he was accuſed, and that he came ſo to moue them to compaſſion, & ſo to obtaine pardon for his offence. This his humility ſtood him in good ſteed; for hereby thoſe that before were inraged againſt him, now began one to fall out with another in his behalfe, when he promiſed to

E confeſſe the whole matter: and then obtaining licence to ſpeake, hee ſaid: I was neuer minded to ſend back that money to Agrippa, nor to keepe it vnto my priuate vſe. For (God forbid) that I ſhould euer hold him for my friend, who is your open enemy, or that I ſhould ſo ſeeke mine own profit, that I ſhould thereby damnifie you all. But (O ye men of Tarichea) foraſmuch as I perceiued that your citie eſpecially had greateſt need to be fortified, and that you were not able to build the walles, and for that I feared the people of Tiberias, and others adioining, who ſtill gaped after this prey and wealth that was taken from Agrippa; I determined to get thoſe ſpoiles for you to reedifie your walles. If ye miſlike this, I will bring out the treaſure, and giue it to be diuided amongſt you: but if you like thereof, then it appeareth how you moleſt him who is your benefactor.

F This ſpeech of his well pleaſed the people of Tarichea, and diſpleaſed them of Tiberias; ſo that they breathed out threatnings againſt him. Thus they both left Ioſeph, & fought one againſt another. He now hauing many partakers (for the people of Tarichea were almoſt fortie thouſand) ſpake more boldly vnto the multitude, and rebuked their temeritie; affirming that it was neceſſarie to ſtrengthen Tarichea with that preſent money, and that hee would alſo prouide to ſtrengthen other cities and that they ſhould not want money, if they would agree and conſpire togither againſt them, from whom they ſhould take it; and not to offer violence vnto him who would endeuour to get it. So the reſt of the multitude being deceiued, though they were angry, yet departed; and two thouſand armed men offered to ſet vpon him: but he being alreadie retired into his houſe, they ſtood without, threatning him. Wherefore Ioſeph vſed another deuice likewiſe to repreſſe theſe: & getting vp into the top of the houſe, he beckned vnto them with his hand to keep ſilence; and then ſaid that hee was ignorant what they requeſted at his hands: for hee could not heare one for another, becauſe their voices were confounded through the multitude; but if they would ſend ſome into the houſe to talke friendly with him, he would do whatſoeuer they requeſted. The nobles and magiſtrates hearing this, preſently went into the houſe: whom, when he had led into the innermoſt part of the houſe, hauing ſhut the doores, hee cauſed to be beaten, ſo long til that all their bowels appeared: the doores in the meane time being made faſt, the people ſtaied before the houſe, thinking that the cauſe of their long tarrying was, to alledge reaſons to and fro; & preſently Ioſeph opening the doores put them forth amongſt the people all bloudy as they were: wherat they were ſo terrified, that leauing their weapons behind them they ran away. Hereat Iohn tooke occaſion to encreaſe his enuie; and hauing ill ſucceſſe in this policy, he ſtill attempted other plots to bring Ioſeph in danger: and counterfeiting himſelfe ſicke, he requeſted Ioſeph to permit him to goe to Tiberias, and vſe the hot bathes for to recouer his health. But Ioſeph not hauing yet perceiued his treaſon, wrote letters in his behalfe to the gouernour of the towne, willing him to be Iohns hoſt, and to let him want nothing that he needed: which he had in good ſort. And two daies after his arriuall there, hee went about the buſineſſe, which he came to effect, and entiſed ſome with money, others with flatteries, to reuolt from Ioſeph. Silas whom Ioſeph had made gouernour of the city vnderſtanding this, hee preſently by letters gaue notice thereof to Ioſeph: who receiuing them in the night, went to Tiberias, and vvas there early in the morning, and the reſt of the multitude came out to meete him: but Iohn notwithſtanding he iudged that he came againſt him, yet ſtill he counterfaited himſelfe ſick in bed, and ſent a man of his acquaintance to excuſe his abſence for not comming to meete Ioſeph. Then Ioſeph aſſembled the Tiberians togither in a place to ſpeake vnto them, concerning that which was written vnto him: and Iohn ſent armed men thither with commandement to kill Ioſeph. The people perceiuing them to draw their ſwords, cried out: and Ioſeph at their cry looking about him, and perceiuing their ſwords euen almoſt at his throat, he leapt down a little hill vpon the ſhore, which was ſix cubits high, vpon which he ſtood to ſpeake vnto the people: and going into a boat with two of his guard which he found there, he went into the midſt of the lake, & preſently his guard taking their weapons aſſaulted the traitors. Ioſeph fearing that a great conflict would enſue, & ſo the whole city for a few mens fault be deſtroied, ſent to his ſouldiers, charging them onely to worke their own ſafety and no more, and to kill none, nor reprooue any for that wicked fact: who forthwith obeying his command, ceaſed from fight.

But they that inhabited about the citie, and heard of the treaſon, and by whom it was attempted, armed themſelues and came againſt Iohn: but he before they came, fled into Giſcala, where he was borne. In the meane while, all Galilee came and ioined with Ioſeph, and there were many thouſands of armed men gathered together, affirming that they came againſt Iohn, and to fire that citie which had receiued him. Ioſeph thanked them for their good will, ſaying that hee had rather conquer his enemies by policy, then by fire or ſword; and therefore requeſted them to be content. Hee alſo publiſhed an edict, wherein hee declared that all thoſe that had rebelled with Iohn, and did not forſake him within fiue daies next following, ſhould loſe all their liuings, and their manſions ſhould be ſacked, and their houſes & family ſet on fire. Hereupon three thouſand preſently forſooke Iohn, and came and caſt downe their weapons before Ioſephs feete, proſtrating themſelues before him: ſo that there only remained with Iohn but one thouſand of fugitiue Syrians. By who Iohn being aſſiſted, again went ſecretly to worke, hauing ſo ill ſucceſſe by plaine dealing: and ſo priuilie ſent meſſengers to Ieruſalem, who told that Ioſeph had gathered a great armie, and that except he were quickly preuented, hee would come and vſurpe the dominion ouer that mother citie. But the people vnderſtanding before of Iohns hatred, did not regard it: yet diuers rich men and magiſtrates who enuied Ioſeph, ſecretly ſent money vnto Iohn, to hire ſouldiers that where ſtrangers, that hee might warre againſt Ioſeph; and determined amongſt them to diſplace him: & thinking that their decree was not ſufficient to effect it, they ſent moreouer fiue hundreth and foure thouſand armed men, and foure of their principal nobility amongſt them, to wit, Ioazar the lawyer, and Ananias the Sadducee, and Simon and Iudas the ſonnes of Ionathas, all very eloquent & learned men, to withdraw the peoples minds from Ioſeph; giuing them charge, that if hee of his owne accord came vnto them, that then they ſhould permit him to

B Tiberias and Sepphoris were recouered by Ioseph.

NOw Iohn, for feare of Ioseph, kept himselfe within the wals of Giscala: and a few daies after Tiberias reuolted again, the inhabitants calling in Agrippa, who came not at the day appointed, & yet a few Romane souldiers shewing themselues, they reuolted from Ioseph. Ioseph vnderstanding this at Tarichea, hauing sent his souldiers to fetch corne, thought it not good to go alone against the rebells, neither did he think it best to delay the time any longer, fearing that whil'st he delaied, king Agrippa would come & possesse the towne: for the next day, because it was the Sabbath, he could do nothing. Wherfore he thought to ouercom the rebels by policie, & so he commaunded the gates of Tarichea to be kept shut, that his intent C might not be reuealed vnto them of Tiberias. Then taking all the boates that were in the lake, in number two hundreth and thirtie, and in euery one of them foure sailers, hee hastily sailed to Tiberias: and when he came neere the citie, yet so farre off that the inhabitants thereof could not easily descry him, he left all the boates vpon the water emptie, & taking onely seuen of his guard with him, vnarmed, he went neer vnto the citie, that they might see him. When the rebels perceiued him, and thought that the boates had been full of armed men, they cast downe their weapons, and held vp their hands to him, beseeching him to spare the citie. Ioseph, after many threatning and bitter speeches, first, for that hauing vndertaken warres against the Romans, they with ciuil wars consumed their owne forces: secondly, for that they sought his life who had wrought their safety, and that they were not ashamed to shut the gates against him, who had builded the citie walls; yet (said hee) if any would come and talk with him, and confirme a league of their fi- D delitie vnto him, he wold not refuse them. So tenne of the chiefest among them came vnto him, whom hee carried away in a fisher-boat farre from the citie, & sent for fiftie Senators, as though he requested their promise also. And deuising newe causes, he still vnder pretence of agreement sent first for one, and then for another, as he thought good, till he had loaded all the boats: which done, he commanded all the boatmen with all speed possible to go to Tarichea, and put them in prison, so that he carried away all the councell, which were in number 6. hundreth & two thousand people, all whom he brought to Tarchea in boates. But they which remained in the Citie, cried with one voice, that one Clitus was cause of that reuolt, and therfore besought Ioseph to punish him for all. Ioseph told them that he would put none of them to death, but commanded one E of his guard called Leuis, to come and cut off Clitus his hands: but he fearing to trust himselfe amongst all his enemies, refused to doe execution. Clitus perceiuing that Ioseph was angry, and readie to come out of his owne boat to do it himselfe, besought him to grant him one of his hands: which Ioseph did, vpon condition, that hee should cut off the other himselfe. So Clitus drawing out his sword with his right hand, cut off his left, being afraid of Ioseph; and after this, hee returned to Tiberias to bring it againe vnder his subiection: and within a few daies after, hee tooke Giscala and Sepphoris, which were reuolted; hauing giuen the spoils therof to his souldiers, but yet afterward he restored all that was taken away vnto the people, and so hee did to the inhabitants of Tiberias and Sepphoris: and by this meanes got the good will of them all.

F How the people of Ierusalem prepared themselues to warre, and of the tyrannie of Simon Giora.

VNtill this time, there were broyles in Galilee: & now ceasing from ciuill dissension, they prepared themselues against the Romans. And the potentates of Ierusalem, and Ananus the high Priest, with all speed renued and repaired the walls, and made all sorts of instruments

ments for warre, arrowes and other weapons; so that all the Citie was busied heerein, and trayned their men in warlike discipline. All places were filled with tumults; but the grauer sort were verie pensiue, & many as it were foreseeing the calamitie that after ensued, burst out into teares: they that desired peace, receiued no comfort in any thing: all things were don at their beck, who were cause of all this warre. And the estate of the Citie euen then before the Romans came, was like a Citie to be destroyed. Now Ananus omitted that which was necessarie for war, and laboured to reconcile the seditious faction of them that were called Zelous: but how he was ouercom and vvhat his end was, vve vvill declare heerafter. Now one Simon the sonne of Giora in the Toparchie of Acrabatena, hauing gathered together a multitude of seditious people, robbed and spoiled all; and not onely brake into rich mens houses, but also did beate them grieuously, openly exercising his tyrannie. But when Ananus and the rest sent an armie against him, he fled vnto his fellow thieues of Massada, and there hee staied till Ananus and the rest of his enemies were slaine: and then he wasted Idumæa with the rest, so that the gouernours of that place were faine to put a garrison in euery village: so great was the number of them, that were slaine by these thieues. And thus stood the affaires of the Iewes.

Of Vespasians comming into Iudæa, and of the two massacres of the Ievves.

AFter that Nero vnderstood of his euill successe against the Iewes, hee was seized with feare and astonishment; yet hee dissembled it as much as necessitie would permit him. In the meane while he set a good face on the matter, and made as though he were of more courage, saying, that that which happened, was rather by the fault of his Generall, then by the valour of their aduersaries: thinking that it behooued him, who was Emperour, not to shew himselfe mooued with a little bad newes; and the greatnesse of his Empire shewed hee had a mind which yielded to no misfortune. Yet it appeared by the vexation of his spirit that he was much moued, & in great care vnto whom he should commit the charge of the East, which rebelled; who both would conquer the Iewes, and chastise the inhabitants about them, that bare the same mind as they did. At last, he found Vespasian, whom hee thought onelie meet for that purpose; a man who from his infancie had been trained vp in warres, euen vntill he was gray-headed, who had appeased the people of the West, and helped them beeing troubled by the Germans, and recouerd it for the Romans: as also he did Britannie, which was vnknown before; and for that cause made his father Claudius triumph without taking any paines for it. Nero considered all these, and his prudence grounded in old age with his experience, who also had sonnes in the flower of their age to be pledges for his fidelitie, and that represented their fathers wisedom. God, as it should seem, euen then disposing something of the whole common-wealth, Nero sent him to gouerne the armies in Syria, greatly encouraging him with faire speeches and promises, as at that time need required.

B C

Nero is amazed and afraid at the valiant acts of the Iewes.

Nero sendeth Vespasian to gouern in Syria and direct his warres.

Thus he departed out of Achaia, where he was with Nero: and he commaunded Titus his son to leade the fift and tenth legions from Alexandria, and he himselfe crossing ouer to Hellespont, went after by land into Syria, where he assembled all the Romane forces, and all the helpe of the kings adioyning that were confederates. But the Iewes after Cestius vnfortunate successe became proud of their victorie, and could not containe themselues; but like men tossed at Fortunes pleasure, they still gaue more occasion of warre: and gathering all their warlike forces together, they went to Ascalon, which is an old citie seauen hundreth and twentie furlongs distant from Ierusalem, which the Iewes alwaies hated, for which cause also they first assaulted it. The Gouernours in this expeditiõ, were three men excellent aboue the rest for strength & wisedome, to wit, Niger of Peræa, Silas the Babylonian, and Iohn the Essean. Now the citie of Ascalon had very strong walls, but few men to defend it; for it had onely one company of footmen, and one band of horsmen, whom Antonius gouerned. The Iewes made such haste, as though they had dwelt hard by. Antonius perswading himselfe that they would assault him, caused his horsemen to issue forth of the citie: & neither fearing the multitude nor the malice of his aduersaries, he valiantly aboad the first assault of the enemies, and beat them backe that attempted to assault the wall. So the Iewes who were vnskilfull, hauing to doe with them that were expert; & they beeing on foot fighting against horsmen, without order against those that were in good order; being lightly armed, against their aduersaries who were well prouided, were easily repulsed.

Antonie fighteth with the Iewes.

Finally, they were more led by rage and wrath, then by good counsell; and they against whom they fought were obedient, and would doe nothing without the commandement of their Leader. For their first rankes beeing broken, they were forced by the horsemen to turn their backes; and turning themselues to their owne company, who turned toward the wall, became as it were enemies to them-selues. So that euerie one seeking to auoide the horsemem, they were all dispersed about the field, which was in euery place for the aduantage of the horsemen. This greatly helped the Romans to kill so many Iewes: for they that fled were easily ouertaken by the Romans, and killed; and others compassing diuers of the Iewes about, slew them with darts: so that the Iewes were in as great desperation for al their huge multitude, as if they had been alone. The Iewes indeauouring to ouercome their misfortunes, were ashamed to flie, and so fled not hastilie, hoping that fortune would change. But the Romans not wearied in that which they did with great dexteritie, cõtinued the fight the most part of the day: so that there were slaine of the Iewes ten thousand, and two of their leaders, Iohn and Silas. The rest, many beeing wounded, followed their Generall Niger, vvho fled into a little towne of Idumæa, named Salis: manie of the the Romans also were wounded in that fight. But the Iewes were not daunted with this misfortune, but the griefe thereof much encreased their courage: neither were they dismaied with the former losse of so many men within so short time; but rather calling to mind their great victorie they had before, were drawn to vndergo yet another mishap. Shortly after, before the mens wounds were healed, they gathered together all their forces, and went againe to Ascalon in greater number and furie, but with the same successe and skill in warlike affaires which they had before. For Antonius hauing warning which way they meant to come, placed an ambush in the way; & the horsemen setting vpon them at vnawares, they killed aboue eight thousand of them, before they could prepare themselues to fight: and all the rest fled, and Niger with them, shewing as he fled many arguments of a valiant mind: & for that the enemies pursued them, they fled into the safest tower of a towne called Bezedel. Antonius knowing it to be in vaine to stay about the tower that was inuincible, yet loth to let the General of their aduersaries to escape, set fire on the wals; & so departing, triumphed, thinking that Niger had been burned. But he leapt into a deepe vault in the Castle, and so escaped, and three daies after hee shewed himselfe vnto his souldiers, who sought for him weeping, that they might burie his body, for they thoght him dead: whom against all expectation seeing aliue, they were very glad, as though by Gods prouidence he escaped to be still their Leader.

Eight thousand Iewes slaine at Ascalon.

Vespasian came to Antiochia, which is the mother citie of al Syria, and brought his army with him, which for greatnesse and happy successe, doubtlesse was the third in the whole world; and finding that king Agrippa did expect his comming, he hasted with all his forces from thence to Ptolemais. At this place there came vnto him the citizens of Sephoris a citie of Galilee, who had no thought at all of rebellion: these both prouident for their owne safetie, and well knowing the forces of the Romans, before Vespasian came, submitted themselues vnto Cestius Gallus, and receiued from him a garrison of souldiers; and now also curteously entertaining Vespasian, offered their help against their countrimen. To whom Vespasian at their request gaue a guard of horse and foote, so great as he thought was able to resist the force of their enemies, if the Iewes should attempt any thing against them. For he thought it would be a great helpe vnto him in his warre to come, to haue Sephoris the greatest citie of Galilee situate in a strong place on his side, which otherwise might be a safeguard to the whole nation.

CHAP. II.

The description of Galilæa, Samaria, and Iudæa.

THere are two places named Galilæa, the one is called high Galilæa, and the other lowe Galilee: and they are both compassed with Phœnicia and Syria. On the west Ptolemais with the limits of his territorie doth part their borders, and the mount Carmell, wich in time past belonged vnto Galilee, but now vnto the Tyrians. Vnto which adioyneth Gabaa, which signifieth the horsmens citie: so called for becausse king Herods horsemen were sent thither to inhabite. On the South part it ioyneth to the Samaritans and Scythopolitanes vnto Iordan. On the East part it bordereth vpon Hippene, and Gadaris, and Gaulanitis, which are the borders of kings Agrippa his country. On the North it bordereth vpon Tyria. The length of lower Galilee reacheth from Tiberias vnto Zabulon; neere which is Ptolemais by the sea coast. In breadth it reacheth from the Village Xaloth, situate in a great field, vnto Bersabe, where also begins the breadth of high Galilee, and reacheth vnto the village called Baca, bordering vpon the Tyrians; and the length thereof is from a village neer Iordan named Thella, vnto Meroth. And beeing of such bignesse, and enuironed with so many nations, yet did they alwaies resist forraine forces. For the Galileans are from their childhood warlike, and neuer are daunted by feare or penurie: for their countrey is most fruitfull, set with all manner of trees, and very fertile, notwithstanding the inhabitants take small paines in tilling the ground. All parts thereof are tilled by the inhabitants, and there is no waste part.

The fertilitie of Galilee.

There are manie Cities, and in euerie place there are villages populous and rich: so that the least Village there, hath in it aboue fifteene thousand inhabitants. And although Galilee bee lesse in compasse then the region beyond the riuer, yet it is more populous, fertiler and richer then the same: for it is all tilled, and all beareth fruit. But that beyond the water, though it be bigger, yet it is not all inhabited, for there are many deserts and barren places, & only beareth wild fruits. Peræa hath a good soile & large fields, beset with diuers trees, especially oliues, vines and palme trees: and it is abundantlie watred with brookes running from the mountaines, and springs springs that continually come down, when in the dog daies they are almost dry. The length of this place is from Macherunt to Pella: the breadth from Philadelphia to Iordan. This town Pella before mentioned, lieth on the North part, and Iordan on the West, and the countrey of the Moabites bordereth on the South, and on the East Arabia, Silbonitis, Philadelphia and Gerasis. Samaria is seated between Iudæa & Galilee, beginning at a town situate in a place called Ginæa, and endeth in the Toparchy of Acrabatena, nothing differing in nature from Iudæa. For both of them are ful of mountaines and fieldes, and good for tillage; full of trees abounding both with wilde apples and others: for they are of their nature dry, but haue raine enough, and haue passing sweet waters, and aboundance of good grasse, and great store of milch beasts, and which is a great argument of wealth, both places are verie populous. The confines of these countries is Anauth, a village otherwise called Borceos, which lieth on the North part of Iudæa. The South part of Iudæa, if you measure the length, is extended vnto the village of the Arabians, called Iardan: the breadth reacheth from Iordan vnto Ioppe: in the midst thereof is situate Ierusalem; so that some call that citie the nauell of that countrey. Iudæa also bordereth on the sea coast, euen vnto Ptolemais. It is diuided into eleuen portions: the first is Ierusalem, head & chiefe of all, being aboue all the rest, as the head is aboue the body: and the rest are Toparchies. Gophna is the second, after that Acrabatena, then Thamna, afterward Lydda, also Ammaus, and Pella, and Idumæa, and Engadda, & Herodium, and Iericho: besides these Iamnia and Ioppe commaund the places adioyning. Moreouer, there is Gamala & Gaulanitis, & Batanea & Trachonitis, which are portions belonging to king Agrippa his kingdom. This countrey beginneth at mount Libanus, & the fountaines of Iordan, and reacheth in breadth vnto the lake neer Tiberias. And in length it reacheth from Iulias to Arphas, and the inhabitants are partly Iewes, and partly Syrians.

CHAP. III.

How aide was sent vnto the people of Sephoris: and of the militarie discipline of the Romanes.

I Haue alreadie spoken of Iudæa as briefely as might bee, and with what countries it is enuironed. Now Vespasian sent helpe vnto the inhabitants of Sephoris, to wit, one thousand horsemen, and sixe thousand foot, Placidus the Tribune being their gouernour: the horsmen diuided themselues into two companies; lodged in a great Plaine, and the footemen were in garison in the citie for to defend it, but the horsemen staied without. These horsemen made excursions on euery side, and greatly molested Ioseph, who was quietly bent, & also spoiled all that was without the cities, and alwaies repulsed the inhabitants, if at any time they tooke courage to reuenge themselues. Notwithstanding, Ioseph assaulted the city Sephoris, hoping to take it: which he before such time as it reuolted vnto the Romanes, had compassed with so strong wals, that the Romans themselues could not haue taken it; so his hope was frustrate: for neither by force nor fair meanes would the Sephorites yeeld vnto him. Heereat the Romanes beeing angry, troubled the countrey more then before; who now neither night nor day ceased from destroying it, but robbed and spoiled all they found, and all men able to beare armes they slue, and made the rest their slaues: Thus all Galilee was filled with fire and sword, and no man escaped that calamitie, onely they saued themselues, that fled into the cities that Ioseph had walled.

Vespasian sendeth helpe to the Sephorits, but filleth Galilee with sword & fire.

Titus came to Alexandria beeing winter, sooner then hee was expected: and so receiued there the souldiers that hee was sent for: and hauing a prosperous iourney, hee quickly came to Ptolemais; and finding his father there with two of the chiefest legions, to wit, the fift and tenth, hee also adioyned that fifteenth legio that he brought with him. And there followed them eighteen companies, fiue out of Cæsarea, one troupe of horsemen, and fiue companies of horsemen out of Syria: ten of these companies of foot had in euerie one of them a thousand men, the rest onelie sixe hundreth and thirteene, and in euery troupe of horsemen were a hundreth and twentie. The kings also brought great aide: for Antiochus, Agrippa and Sohemus, brought each of them 2000. bowmen, and a thousand horsmen: and Malchus king of Arabia, brought 5000 foote, and 1000 horse, & the most of his footmen were archers; so that the whole army together with the kings aide, amounted vnto the number of threescore thousand horse and foot together; besides them that followed the campe, who were a great multitude, & not inferiour vnto the souldiers in warlike discipline: so that one may admire the Romanes, who so traine vp their seruants in time of peace, that they are verie fit for warres. So that whosoeuer well beholdeth their militarie to cast stones, and such like, that all kind of shot may be in readinesse. They also build foure gates large and wide, both for their cattell easily to come in at, and also for themselues if need require, to enter in or issue out speedily. I

Within the camp, there are streets diuided into certaine spaces: in the midst their rulers, & amongst them all, the Generals tent like a temple, so that it seemeth a citie, and a market full of shops made in an instant. There are also seats builded for the gouernors to iudge of controuer-sies, if any arise betweene the souldiers and others. All this place and all things belonging thereto are made in an instant, partly by reason of the multitude, partly by the industry of such as work:
and if need require they compasse it with a trench foure cubits deepe, and as many broad. Thus the souldiers enclosed with armes, doe liue quietly in their tents, without disorder, and all things are done with good aduice and order, whether they need water, or corne, or wood: for they must all goe to dinner at the time appointed, and all sleep at once, and a trumpet giueth notice K when to watch and guard, and nothing is done that is not commanded.

The reuerence & obedience of the Romans souldiers to their captains
In the morning, all the souldiers come vnto their captaines to salute them, the captaines to the tribunes, and they all to the Generall, and he giueth them a watch word, & telleth them what hee thinketh good, & how they shall behaue themselues towards those that are vnder them, wherby in fight they may demeane themselues, and well know when to assault, and when to retire. When way his tabernacle, & makes all ready for their departure. Then the trumpet soūdeth again, warning them to be ready: & hauing loden their beasts with their baggage, they expect the sound again, as though they were to run a race, & at their departure they burn their camp, because it is ea-sie to build the like again, & also least afterwards it may aduantage their enemies. Whē the trum- L pet hath sounded the third time, which is a signe to sette forward, then they hasten those that are slow, least they forsake their order. And a crier standeth on the right hand of their general, asking thrice if they be prepared to fight, & they as often answere that they are, holding vp their right hands with lofty courage: & so they march on easily, euery man keeping his rank, as though they

the rest armed euery one with bucklers and pikes. Moreouer, they carry a saw, a basket, a sardle, a hatchet, also a cord, a sythe, a chain, and victuals for 3. daies, so that the footmen are as much lo-den as their cattel. The horsmen carry at their right side a long sword, in the left hand a dart, and M a long shield hanging against the horse side, & a quiuer with 3. darts with broad edges, which are

They neuer do any thing vnaduisedly in battaile, but manage all things according to counsel, so that they either do not erre, or if they do, their fault is easily amended. For they thinke that bad successe after deliberation is better then good fortune without it; and they thinke that therein fortune did but flatter them, to worke them some great despight, by reason they haue not deliberated: but that which is premeditated, although it haue euil successe, yet it maketh them wary

A againſt another time. And none of them accounts that good ſucceſs, which cometh by chance, and yet euery one is comforted in their miſfortune, for that they take good aduice. By the military exerciſes they do not only make the bodies of their ſouldiers ſtrong, but their mindes alſo more hardy: and their diligence is the greater by their feare. For their lawes are capital, not only for them that forſake their order, but alſo for them that cõmit the leaſt enormity or negligence; and their generals are more ſeuere then their lawes: who only by rewarding the good, purchaſe fauour, leaſt they ſeem cruell in puniſhing the wicked. Moreouer, they are ſo obedient to their rulers, that in peace they honor them, and in warre the whole army ſeemeth one body vnited together: they ſo keep order, and are ſo ready to turne here or there, and ſo attentiue to any cõmand, and alſo diligent to note ſignes made vnto them, and ſo quick to labour with their hands,
B that they are alwaies apt to do any thing, but ſlow to endure. Inſomuch that they know no place, where they haue been ouercome, either by number or courage, or counſell, or by the difficulty of the place, nor by fortune it ſelfe: For they think victory more certaine then Fortune. Therefore ſeeing that their deeds are ruled by aduice and counſell, and their commandments ſo well fulfilled by the Army, what maruell is it if their Empire in the Eaſt reach vnto Euphrates, in the Weſt vnto the Ocean, in the South vnto Affrick, in the North vnto Rhene and Danubius? ſeeing that one may iuſtly affirme the poſſeſſion leſſe then the poſſeſſors. This I haue ſpoken, not to praiſe the Romans, but to comfort the conquered, and to terrifie thoſe that deſire alteration: and perhaps it may teach them who want good diſcipline, and are ignorant of the manners and cuſtomes of the Romans in their militarie affaires. But I returne to my purpoſe.

How Placidus aſſaulted Iotapata.

IN the meane time Veſpaſian liuing at Ptolemais with his ſon Titus, prepared his army. But Placidus was already entred into Galilee and run through it, where he ſlew almoſt all he found who were of the weaker ſort of people & cowards: And ſeeing that thoſe of courage alwaies fled into the cities that Ioſeph had fortified, he turned his forces againſt Iotapata, which was the ſtrongeſt of them, thinking it might eaſily be taken by a ſudden aſſault, and that he thereby ſhould get great glory, and that by taking it great profits might enſue,
D in that the people ſeeing the ſtrongeſt citie ſurpriſed, they would not fly to any againe. But it fel not out as he expected; for the people of Iotapata vnderſtanding of his comming, met him neer the towne, and ſuddenly encountring the Romans, being a great multitude and well diſpoſed to fight, as thoſe that bare armes for the generall ſafety of the country, and the liues of their wiues and children, they put the Romans to flight, wounding many, only ſeuen being ſlaine: for the Romans in flying kept their rankes: and being armed round about, they were not dangerouſly wounded; but the Iewes being vnarmed, rather truſted to their darts and arrowes then to handy blowes. There were three Iewes ſlaine, and a few wounded: and ſo Placidus when he ſaw himſelfe repulſed from the towne, he fled.

CHAP. V.

How Veſpaſian inuaded Galilee, and how at the very ſight of him the ſeditious fled.

VEſpaſian deſirous to take Galilee himſelf, departed from Ptolemais, making ſuch iournies as ſouldiers ought to keep, which the Romans are wont to follow. And he commanded thoſe that came to help him, and the bowmen becauſe they were lighter armed, to go before & repreſſe the enemies incurſions, and ſearch the wood and forreſt fit for ambuſhes, whereby they were to paſſe: after them followed part of the Roman footmen and horſmen: and after them there marched ten by ten out of euery hundreth, bearing with them their armor, and the meaſures of their camp. After them followed men, whoſe office it was to
F mend the waies, where they were bad, and cut down the woods that were in the way, leaſt with bad way the army were tyred. After them he ſent his baggage and the baggage of the rulers vnder him, and withall horſmen to guard it. And after them he himſelf followed, leading an army of choſen footmen and horſemen, accompanied with his owne guard of horſemen, and he had out of euery legion ſixſcore men for his own guard. After followed they that carried the engins to batter the wals of the cities, and other inſtruments, and with them the Prefects and Tribunes, guarded with their choſen ſouldiers. After them other enſignes, and the Eagle, the which the

Romans hold for chiefe of all, becauſe it is the King of all birds, and is moſt valiant and ſtrong: wherfore they think it a ſigne of dominion and victory, ouer all them againſt whom they bear it. After theſe ſacred enſignes followed the trumpets ſounding in warlike manner; and after them the army marching ſix in a rank; and as the cuſtome is, a Centurion went by them to keep order: the ſeruants were all with the footmen and baggage. After the laſt company who were hired, followed armed footmen and horſmen in great number. And thus Veſpaſian with his whole army came vnto the borders of Galilee: and there pitching his Tents, he ſtaied the ſoldiers who were very eager to fight; as it were boaſting and ſhewing his army to terrifie his aduerſaries, and giuing them time to repent, if any one would alter his minde before the warre began, yet did hee prepare to beſiege the wals and fortreſſes. The only ſight of him made many rebels flie, and danted the moſt of them. For Ioſephs ſouldiers who had pitched his Tents a little from Sephoris, when they knew that war grew on, and that they were preſently to fight with the Romans, they did not onely fly before they fought: but alſo before they ſaw their enemies. Ioſeph being left with a very few, knowing he was not able to abide the enemies; and that the Iews were diſcomfited, and that if he put any truſt in them, they would for the moſt part reuolt vnto the enemies; for that time abſtained from all warre, and thought to get himſelfe out of danger: and ſo accompanied with them them that remained with him, he went to Tiberias.

CHAP. VI.

How Gadara was beſieged and taken.

Veſpaſian went vnto Gadara, and tooke it at the firſt aſſault: for all able men fit for warre were fled out of the citie: and entring the citie, he put all to death. For the Romans had no mercy, partly for the hatred they conceiued againſt the Iewes, and partly in reuenge of that which had befallen Ceſtius. And they burned the citie and all towns and villages adioyning: ſome of them being already deſolate, and the inhabitants of the reſt were made ſlaues. Ioſeph fled into the citie which he made choice of for his ſafegard, and filled it with feare. For the people of Tiberias thought he would neuer haue fled, if there had been any hope of withſtanding the Romans: wherein they iudged not amiſſe, for he did foreſee what euent thoſe warres would haue, and that their only ſafety conſiſted in changing their rebellious minds. He himſelf, though he hoped to obtaine pardon of the Romans, yet had he farre more rather haue died then to haue liued pleaſantly with them againſt whom he was ſent, and ſo become a traitour vnto his countrey committed to his charge. Wherefore he determined faithfully to write all his eſtate, and the eſtate of the countrie vnto the nobility at Ieruſalem, and not to extoll the enemies forces too much, leaſt they ſhould ſay he was a coward; nor yet putting them in any comfort, leaſt perhaps they now penitent for that they had done, againe by his letters ſhould be incited to goe forward in their rebellious courſe: willing them preſently to write an anſwere, whether they thought it good to enter into league with the Romans; or if they would make warre, then they ſhould ſend a ſufficient army againſt the Romans: and hauing written to this effect, he preſently ſent men away to Ieruſalem to beare theſe letters.

Ioſeph is afraid of the Romans, and writeth to Ieruſalem.

CHAP. VII.

Of the ſiege of Iotapata.

Veſpaſian was very deſirous to take Iotapata, for that he knew many of his enimies were fled thither, and for that this was the ſtrongeſt refuge they had. So hee ſent before footmen & horſemen, to plaine the waies which were full of ragged ſtones, ſo that it was hard for footmen to paſſe, and altogether vnpoſſible for horſemen: who within foure daies effected that which they were commanded, and made a large way for the army to paſſe: And the fift day which was the one & twentith of March, Ioſeph before they came entred into the citie, coming thither from Tiberias to encourage the Iewes who were diſmaied. A certain run-away told Veſpaſian that Ioſeph was come thither, willing him to haſten thither, for if he could take Ioſeph he might eaſily take all Iudæa. Hereat Veſpaſian was very glad, & took it as good fortune, that the moſt prudent and potent of his enemies, ſhould (God at that time ſo working) put himſelfe as it were in hold, and ſo preſently hee ſent Placidus before with a thouſand horſemen, and with him captaine Ebutius, a man both ſtrong, valiant and prudent, and commaunded them to compaſſe the Citie with a ſiege, leaſt Ioſeph ſhould priuily eſcape from thence. day

A day after he himſelfe followed with the whole army, and about noone cam to Iotapata, and leading his army vnto the North ſide of the town, he pitched his tents vpon a hill ſeuen ſtounds diſtant from the citie. Vpon purpoſe placing himſelf within the view of his enemies, that the very ſight of his army might terrifie them: which he alſo did; for preſently euery one was in ſuch a feare, that none durſt go out of the citie. The Romans being wearied all that day, would not aſſault the city: wherfore they inuironed the town with two ſquadrons, and the third that conſiſted in horſmen, was placed without to intercept all paſſage, that none of the Iewes could paſſe any whither. Heereby the Iewes now in deſperation tooke heart; for in warre nothing is more forcible then neceſsitie. The next day began the batterie, and euery Iew kept his quarter: and kept themſelues in order, and reſiſted the Romans before their wals. But when Veſpaſian ſent all
B the bowmen, and thoſe who caſt darts and other things to beat them off from the wals, and hee himſelfe with footmen aſſaulted the wals in another place where they might eaſily be entred: then Ioſeph fearing the citie, accompanied with all the people iſſued out of the town, & aſſaulted the Romans fiercely, and did driue them from the wals, ſhewing courage & ſtrength: and they themſelues ſuffered as much harm as they did vnto their enemies. For as they were encouraged with deſperation, ſo were the Romans with ſhame, who were armed with military knowledge and ſtrength, and the Iewes only with anger. And the fight continued all day euen vntill night;
C wherein many Romans were wounded, and only thirteen ſlaine: and of the Iewes there were ſix hundreth wounded, and ſeuenteene ſlaine. The next day alſo they met the Romans, and reſiſted them more ſtoutly then before, taking courage for that they the day before had reſiſted them, contrary to their expectation: and all the Romans fought more valiantly, aſhamed as it were of themſelues, in ſuffering the Iewes to reſiſt them; thinking withall that they themſelues were ouercome, if they did not quickly ſuppreſſe their enemies. Wherfore the Romans for fiue daies together ceaſed not to aſſault the towne, and the Iewes ſtrongly rebatted them: and now neither the Iewes feared their enemies, nor the Romans were diſmaied with the difficulty of taking the town. Iotapata is almoſt all ſituate vpon a rock, and compaſſed about with deep vallies,
D which deſcend ſtraight downe like a wall: ſo that one can ſcarcely ſee the bottome. There is only acceſſe vnto it on the North part, where it is ſeated vpon a mountaine going ouerthwart; which Ioſeph incloſed with a wall, to the end it might be no paſſage for the enemies: all the reſt of the citie is inuironed with high mountaines, ſo that it cannot be diſcerned by any before they be hard at it. And Iotapata was thus ſtrengthned.

The yeare of the world, 4031. after Chriſts birth, 69.

Nothing is more effectual in warre or more deſperate then neceſsity.

A fight between the Romans & the Iewes continued a whole day, and broken off by night.

The ſituation of Iotapata.

Veſpaſian determined both to ſtriue againſt the nature of the place, and hardineſs of the Iewes; and therefore called all his captaines together, and conſulted with them to begin a hot ſiege: at laſt they reſolued to reare a mount in that place where the citie was eaſieſt to be entred. He ſent his whole army to prouide wood to do it, who cut down the mountaines neer vnto the towne: and great ſtore of wood and ſtone being brought, ſetting hurdles before them to beare off the darts and arrowes, he began to raiſe a mount; ſo that they receiued little or no harme by dartes caſt from off the wals: others brought earth from places thereabout, and no man was idle. The Iewes caſt continually great ſtones and all kind of darts vpon that which defended them; which though they pearced not thorough, yet they made a great noyſe and terrified the workemen.
E Which Veſpaſian ſeeing, cauſed all engines that did caſt ſtones and darts, which were in number a hundreth and threeſcore, to be placed againſt the wals, to beate the Iewes from thence. And ſo they caſt ſtones, and darts, and fire, and arrowes in great abundance: ſo that they did not onely beate the Iewes from off the wals, but alſo out of the reach of their ſhot; for both the Arabian archers & thoſe that vſed ſlings and darts, and all the engines continually plaied vpon them. For all this the Iews reſted not, but running out in companies as thecues, they took away that which defended the workmen, and then aſſaulted them hauing no defence: and when they had beaten them away, deſtroyed and fired all that the Romans had wrought for their owne defence and ſafegard. At laſt Veſpaſian perceiued that theſe domages hapned for that there was ſpace left betweene all theſe workes, whereby the enemies had acceſſe to do them ſuch harmes: where-
F fore hee vnited them together, and ſo hindered the priuy excurſions of the Iewes. When the mount was almoſt made and the towers vpon it finiſhed, Ioſeph afraid to doe nothing for the ſafegard of the towne, called all workmen neceſſary together, and commanded them to make the wall there higher; but they ſaid it was vnpoſſible for them to worke, for the number of ſhot in that place. Then Ioſeph made this deuice to defend them: he fixed ſtakes in the ground, and faſtned vnto them hides of Kine & Oxen new ſlaine, by which they were defended from ſhot, and fire; ſo that they labouring night and day raiſed the wall twenty cubits high, erecting also vpon it many towers: and by this meanes made it a strong defence. Whereat the Romans, G who before thought themselues sure of the towne, were now greatly dismaid both by this deuice of Iosephs, and also by the hardinesse of the Iewes.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the siege of Iotapata by Vespasian, and the diligence that Ioseph vsed, and how the Iewes made excursions against the Romans.

THis stratagem and the cariage of the Iewes greatly moued Vespasian: for now they receiuing courage in that defence, made assaults vpon the Romans of their own accord, and H euery day skirmished, running out in companies, and like theeues, taking away whatsoeuer the lighted vpon; and what they could not carry away, they set on fire. At last Vespasian would not permit his souldiers to fight any longer: but determined now to besiege it and take it by want of victuals, purposing either to make them come & yeeld themselues for lack of food, or if they held out, to famish them: and that it would be more easie to take it by force, if ceasing awhile frō assaulting it, he afterward set vpon it, they being in anguish for the danger they were in. Wherfore he cōmanded all passages to be kept, that none could go out of the citie. But they had great store of corne, and of all other things else, except salt & water, whereof they stood in great want: for there is neuer a fountain in the citie, and they haue little raine in sommer time, so that the inhabitants were in great distresse; for now there was hardly any water left in the citie. I Ioseph perceiuing there was abundance of all things else, and that the citizens were valiant, as also the siege like to continue long, he gaue to euery one water in measure: with which they were not contented, thinking it as good to want altogether; as to haue it in that maner; and now they began to faint, as though they had suffred extream drought. The Romans perceiuing this, being vpon a high hill, ouer against the place whither all the Iewes came together to receiue water, they with their shot killed many that came thither, insomuch that Vespasian hoped that within short time their water would be spent, and they constrained to yeeld. But Ioseph to frustrate this hope, commanded a great many garments to be laid in water and hanged vpon the wals, so that the water might run downe on euery side. When the Romans saw this, they were much grieued and affraid, for that they wasted so much water in mockery, and before had thought that they K had wanted water to drink. And now Vespasian scorning to win the citie by siege, purposed to assault it againe by force. The Iewes were very glad of this: and the citie beeing in danger, rather wished to be slaine then perish through hunger or thirst. Ioseph deuised also another way to get such necessaries as he wanted, out of the countrie: for there was a valley out of the way, and therfore not regarded by the Romans: wherefore Ioseph sent men into the countrie to his friends for such things as the citie wanted, by this way; cōmanding them when they came neer the watchmen, to hide and couer themselues with hairie skins, that the watchmen might think them to be dogs: and this he vsed a good space, till at last the watchmen perceiued it, and so set a guard there to stop the passage. When Ioseph perceiued the citie could not hold out long, and fearing his owne life, if still hee continued there, he treated with the chiefe of the citie that he L might fly. But the people perceiuing his intent, flocked about him, and besought him to take pitie vpon them, and not forsake them, who had no hope but in him, affirming that for his sake they were all courageous and bold to fight; and if they were taken, yet he would be a comfort vnto them, telling him that it did not become him to fly from his enemies, nor to forsake his friends, neither as it were to leap out of a ship shaken with a tempest, into the which hee came when the seas were calme, for so by this means he would soon ouerthrow the city; & once gone, no man afterward could or durst resist their enemies; for in him was all their hope.

Vespasian restraineth his souldiers from fight and besiegeth the citie.

Ioseph deliuereth his soldiers water by measure.

Iosephs stratagem.

Another policy of Iosephs.

The people beseeched Ioseph that he would not forsake them.

Iosephs prudence.

Ioseph kept it to himselfe that his purpose was to worke his owne safety: for hee told them the thing which he intended was for their good, affirming that though he staied still in the citie, yet he could do them little good: and if the citie should chance to be taken, then hee and they were M like to perish; but if he were abroad and not besieged, hee could doe them great good: for hee would presently assemble all the people of Galilee, and come against the Romans, and so raise their siege; whereas now in staying with them he saw not wherein he did them any good, but rather incited the Romans against them, making them more earnest to take the towne then they would be, onely because he was there, that they might take him; but if they knew once that hee were fled, they would not then be so earnest in the siege. Ioseph herewith could not perswade the people,

A people,but they flocked faſter about him, and both yong and old of all ſorts came and proſtrated themſelues at his feet,weeping, and beſeeching him to take ſuch hap as ſhould befall them,whether it were good or bad;not for that they enuied his eſcape,but for that they hoped they ſhould receiue no harme if he remained with them. The yeare of the world,4031. after Chriſts birth, 69.

He then bethought thimſelf that if he ſtaid with them,he fulfilled their requeſt;and if he denied, he feared they would force him. Wherfore being partly moued by compaſſion, he determined to ſtay; and being now, as all the citie was, deſperate, he told them that now it was time to fight,ſeeing there was no hope of ſafety: and that it was a goodly matter to ſpend their liues renowmedly, and do ſome noble act to leaue a remembrance vnto their poſterity of their valour: and ſo went about it. And iſſuing out of the city with the moſt valiant among them,when he had B killed the watchmen, at the firſt encounter hee came euen vnto the Romans tents, and tore the skins that their tents were made of, and fired others,and their engines: and ſo he did the ſecond and third day,and for certaine daies & nights afterward neuer ceaſed. When Veſpaſian perceiued the Romans greatly endomaged by ſuch incurſions & very loth to fly for ſhame, and not able to follow them being ſo loaden with their armor, and that the Iewes alwaies did ſome exploit before they retyred themſelues into the citie; he gaue commandement vnto his ſouldiers to leaue their aſſault, & not to fight againſt men who deſired to die, affirming that no men were ſtronger then thoſe in deſperation,and that if they found none to aſſaile, their courage would ſoon be alaid; like vnto a flame of fire,when the matter that nouriſheth it, is conſumed. Moreouer, the Romans muſt ſeeke victory more warily, for that they fought not for neceſſity, but onely to in- C creaſe their dominions: and after that, oftentimes they beat the Iewes by the Arabian archers, and with ſlings and darts, and other ſhot which neuer ceaſed, and ſo the Iewes by this meanes were repreſſed. But ſo ſoon as they were without the danger of the ſhot, they more furiouſly aſſailed the Romans, ſparing neither body nor minde,but continually fought by turnes,and euery one of the citie aſſiſted them that ſo laboured.

CHAP. IX.

How Veſpaſian did beat the wals of Iotapata with a Ramme, and other warlike Engines.

D VEſpaſian thinking himſelfe as it were beſieged, both for the long time which hee had continued the ſiege, and alſo for the diuers aſſaults and priuy excurſions of the Iews; hauing now almoſt raiſed the Rampiers as high as the wals of the citie, determined to batter them with a Ramme. A Ramme is a huge beam like the maſt of a ſhip,whoſe end is armed with a ſtrong maſſiue iron, made in the forme of a Rams head: whereupon it takes his name, becauſe he butteth with his head. It hangeth on another beame with ropes, like the beam of a paire of ballances: the beame it hangeth on lying acroſſe is held vp with two props, which being drawne back by force of many men,and then ioyntly with all their forces ſhooued forward, it ſtriketh the wall with the head of iron: And there is no wall nor tower ſo ſtrong,but though it abide the firſt ſtroke of the engine, yet can it not hold out long. The Generall of the E Romans thought good to vſe this meanes to take the city by force, for that the ſiege was dangerous, by reaſon that the Iewes neuer reſted; ſo the Romans with all kind of ſhot endeuoured to beat the Iewes from off the wals that made any reſiſtance: and the archers and they who vſed ſlings,were hard by: and when they ſaw that none of the Iewes durſt come vpon the wals, they applied the Ramme vnto them; and couered it aloft with hurdles and skins, both for to defend themſelues and the engine, and at the firſt aſſault the wals were ſhaken, ſo that the citizens cried as though the town had been already taken. Ioſeph ſeeing them ſtill beat one place, and that preſently the wall would fall, deuiſed a way to reſiſt the force of the Ramme, and ſo he filled ſacks with chaffe, and let them down off the wall iuſt againſt that place,where the Ram ſtrook ordinarily, and ſo brake the force of the blowes, the looſneſſe of the chaffe making no reſiſtance; and F ſo drowning or abating the violence of the ſtroke. By this meanes the Romans were hindered: for whither ſoeuer they brought the Ramme, thither did they vpon the wals alſo remooue the ſacks of chaffe,and brake the force thereof: till at laſt the Romans alſo deuiſed a way to cut theſe ſacks, taking long poles & binding Siethes vnto the ends of them, and ſo cut theſe ſacks of chaf. And the Ramme ſhooke the wall, and the wall newly built was not ſtrong enough to reſiſt. Then Ioſeph and his ſouldiers ſought to help themſelues by fire workes, and ſo they fired all that was made of dry wood in three ſeuerall places, and withall the engines,and forts, and mounts of the Ioſephs deuiſe how to break the force of the Ramme.

The yeare of the world, 4031. after Christs Nativity, 69.

Romans, who now had much adoe to defend themſelues: firſt, becauſe that they were terrified with the valour of the Iewes: and ſecondly, becauſe euery one had worke enough to defend himſelfe againſt the fire, which ſeiſing vpon dry matter with Brimſtone and Pitch wonderfully encreaſed; ſo that in one houres ſpace it conſumed all the works that the Romans had made with ſo great labour. There was a Iew the ſon of Samias called Eleazar, who deſerued eternall memory: this man was born at Saab in Galilee. This Eleazar took vp a great ſtone, and caſt it down with ſuch force vpon the Ramme, that he brake off the head thereof; and nothing fearing leapt downe amongſt the midſt of his enemies, and brought it away into the citie: at the laſt being vnarmed, & as it were a marke for his enemies to ſhoot at, he receiued in his bodie fiue arrowes; and as though he had not felt them, ſo ſoon as he had gotten vp the wal where all might ſee him, he boldly ſtood ſtill, and ſo through griefe of his wounds hauing the head of the Ramme in his armes fell down. Next vnto him two brethren of Ramath in Galilee ſhewed themſelues valiant, named Netiras and Philip, who aſſaulted the tenth legion of the Romans with ſuch violence, that they brake their ranks, and put all to flight that ſought to withſtand them: which Ioſeph and thoſe that were with him perceiuing, took fire and burnt the engines, workes, and defences of the fift and tenth legions that were fled, and thoſe that followed deſtroied all engines, and other matter that was left. In the euening the Romans againe erected the Ram againſt that part of the citie which before they had beaten, and ſo began afreſh to ſhake the wall in the ſame place that before they had battered: and one of the Iewes ſhot an arrow from the wal, and wounded Veſpaſian in the ſole of the foot, yet the wound was not great, for that the force of the arrow was ſpent before it came to him, hauing come a great way off.

This fact greatly troubled the Romanes, who ſeeing Veſpaſian bleed, preſently ſpread theſe newes through the whole army, and almoſt all of them came running to ſee their Generall, and eſpecially Titus who feared his fathers death: ſo that the whole army partly for the loue of their Generall, and partly for the feare of Titus his ſon, were greatly troubled: but Veſpaſian preſently freed the army from all perturbation; and his ſonne Titus from feare. For the griefe of the wound being paſt, he ſhewed himſelfe to all that were ſorrowfull for him, and incited them to fight againſt the Iewes more earneſtly then before; and now euery one as it were to reuenge their Generall, deſpiſed all danger, and aſſaulted the wals, one exhorting another. Ioſeph & his aſſociates, notwithſtanding that many of them were killed with ſhot, darts and arrowes; yet they forſooke not the wals, but with fire and ſword, and ſtones fiercely aſſaulted them, that being defended with hurdles battered the wals with the Ram, but to little purpoſe: for they were continually killed, being in ſight of their enemies, and for that they could not ſee them, preſently were ſtriken down. for their fire did make ſuch a light as though it had been day, ſo that the Romans eaſily perceiued whither to direct their ſhot: and for that their engines were not perceiued afarre off, the Iewes could not defend themſelues from the arrowes & ſtones that were ſhot againſt them, by which means many of them were ſlain, and the tops and corners of the towers beaten down. And there was no man ſo well guarded, but hee was ſlaine by force of thoſe ſtones; ſo that any man may know of what force that engin is, by that which hapned that night. For one that ſtood neere Ioſeph vpon the wall was ſtriken with a ſtone, and his head carried from his body by violence of that blow three furlongs, as though it had beene caſt out of a ſling: and the next day a woman great with child was ſtriken on the belly with one of thoſe ſtones, and the child carried forth of her from the place where ſhe was ſtriken three furlongs; ſo great was the force of this engine: Therefore the violence of the engines was more terrible, and likewiſe the noiſe of darts, arrowes and other ſhot. And many were ſlaine on euery ſide, and the bodies of thoſe that were killed, ſtriken againſt the wal made a noiſe: and within the citie was heard a pitifull lamentation, and weeping among the women; and without, a heauy mourning and cry of them, that were wounded to death; and all that part of the wall where the fight was, flowed with blood: ſo that now the multitude of dead bodies had ſo filled the ditch before the wal, that the Romans might eaſily paſſe ouer them into the citie, and the mountains about did eccho with the cries of the citizens: and all that night long nothing wanted, that either might by the eie or eare moue terror. And many ſtoutly fighting for Iotapata died moſt valiantly, many alſo were ſore wounded: and notwithſtanding the wall was continually battered, yet it was almoſt morning before it fell, being all night long beaten with the Ramme. And then they of Iotapata repaired the breach with their bodies and armour, before the Romans could ſet bridges to enter it.

How Iotapata was againe assaulted.

ON the morning Vespasian brought his army to enter the breach, hauing giuen them but little rest after their whole nights labour: and desirous to make the Iewes that defended the breach to forsake their place, before such time as he entred, he took the most valiant of his horsemen, and vnhorsed them, being armed from the head to the foot, and placed them in three ranks; that they, being so armed, might besiege round that part of the wall that was battered, and to take long pikes in their hands, so that as soon as the bridges were set, they should first enter the breach. After them he placed the strongest of his footmen: the rest of his horsmen he set round about the city vpon the mountaine, to the end that none might escape thereout: after the footmen he commanded archers to follow with their arrows ready in their hands, and them that vsed slings also, and other engins for shot. And he caused other to scale the wals, where they were not battered, to the intent that the townesmen, busied in resisting them, might leaue the breach vnmanned; and the rest being wearied and oppresst with the thicknes of the shot, should of force forsake their standing. But Ioseph, perceiuing his intent, placed old men and children, and those that were already wearied, vpon those parts of the wals that were not battered: & himselfe with the stoutest of the city went to defend the breach, and placed six men before them, whom he chose out, himselfe being one of them, to sustaine the first brunt of their enimies assault: commanding them likewise to stop their eares, to the end that they might not bee terrified with the cries of the army. He willed them also to defend themselues with shields against the darts & arrowes, and giue back a little, til such time as the archers quiuers were emptied: and if so be that the Romans should offer to make bridges, that then they with their instruments should resist; & that euery one should now fight, not to defend his country, but as it were to recouer it being in a maner already lost; & imagine, that they now did see their aged men slaine with their children, and their wiues almost taken by their enemies, and now to reuenge themselues vpon those that hereafter would massacre their whole city: and thus he appointed men in both places. The weaker multitude, women and children, seeing the city compassed about with three ranks of horsemen, & that the Romans with their swords drawn preased against the breach, that all the mountaines about did shine and glitter with their weapons that were placed there, and certain Arabians to serue the archers with arrowes: they cried out as though the city were now taken, so that a man would haue iudged them already amidst their enemies swords, and not onely in danger to fall into their hands. Wherefore Ioseph commanded the women to their houses, lest their cries should effeminate his souldiers minds; willing them likewise to keep silence, and threatned them if they did not: and so he marched to the breach, which place fell to his lot, and gaue no heed to them that sought to scale the wals, but onely beheld a far of the force of the arrowes.

When all the trumpets began to sound, and the aire to be obscured with the multitude of arrowes; Iosephs companions, remembring the charge giuen them, stopped their eares, and armed their bodies against the shot of arrowes: And so soon as the bridges were set against the wal, presently they ran; and before the Romans could enter vpon them, they got them into their hands, and resisted them that sought to come vpon them, shewing great prowess & strength, and themselues no way inferiour vnto the Romans, though they were in extream danger, and the Romans in none: and did not giue one foot back, till either they did kill or were killed. But the Iewes had not any fresh men to second them that were tired; & the Romans, stil as they were wearied, sent fresh supply; and ioining together their long shields, exhorting one another, they became as it were a wall or defence inuincible; and the whole army like one body did beare backe the Iewes, and so set foot on the wals. Then Ioseph, in this desperate case, deuised some way to repell this present calamity: wherfore he commanded the Iews to fetch scalding oile, which they had ready, and poure it vpon the Romans yet seething, who also cast the pans vpon them. This deuice brake the ranks of the Romans, so that with great paine and griefe they fell from the wal, and tumbled downe: for the scalding oyle easily got between their flesh and armour, and scorched them like fire beeing easily heated, and long continuing hot by reason of the fatnesse; and the Romans, being loaden with helmets & breast-plates, could not flee; so that some leapt down off the bridge, and others for griefe did; others would faine haue retired themselues, but could not, because their enemies followed them so hard. But neither the Romans wanted vertue and valour valour in aduerſe fortune, nor the Iewes prudence & good aduiſe. For the Romans, notwithſtanding they were in intolerable paine, being ſcalded with hot oyl, yet did they freſhly aſſault them that hurt them, and euery one did thruſt him forward that was before him, as it were deſirous to ſhew their courage. Then the Iewes vſed another deuice to make them retire: for they pourd fenugreek boiled vpon the bridge, ſo that they ſlid down: and neither they that would haue fled, nor they who did ſtriue to aſſault the Iewes, could ſtand vpon their feet, it was ſo ſlippery; and many falling downe vpon the bridge, were by their owne company troden to death; others did ſlide downe vpon the Rampier; and alwaies as they fell, the Iewes ſtrook them: and ſeeing that the Romans were retired from the place, ſo that now they were not forc't to handy blows, they had leaſure to ſhoot arrows and darts againſt them. When Veſpaſian ſaw that his men in that fight endured much miſery, towards euening he cauſed them to retire, many beeing ſlaine, and more wounded, and 6. men of Iotapata were ſlain, and aboue 300. wounded: this fight was vpon the 20. day of Iune. But after that Veſpaſian had comforted his ſouldiers for that which had hapned, and perceiuing that they were angry, and deſired to fight to reuenge themſelues, ſo that they needed no exhortation; he raiſed the Rampier higher, and erected 3. towers 50. foot high, couering them aloft with iron, that ſo by reaſon of their waight they might ſtand ſtedfaſt, and not bee conſumed by fire: and theſe he placed vpon the Rampiers, and in them Archers, and men that caſt darts and ſuch like: who not being perceiued of them that were vpon the wall, by reaſon of the highnes of the towers, and the couering thereof, eaſily wounded them who were placed thereon. So the Iewes, when they could not auoid the arrowes, nor be reuenged vpon them whom they could not ſee, nor yet fire the towers being couered with plates of iron, forſook the wals; yet alwaies encountred with them who ſought to enter. And the people of Iotapata thus reſiſted, notwithſtanding that many euery day were ſlaine, and that they did their enemies no harme without great danger to themſelues.

How Iapha was taken by Traianus and Titus.

The taking in of Iapha by Traiane.

AT this time Veſpaſian vnderſtood that Iapha, a city neer Iotapata, minded to rebell, encouraged ſo to do, for that they vnderſtood how they of Iotapata had held out contrary to all expectation: wherefore he ſent thither Traianus, gouernour of the tenth legion, and with him 2000. footmen, and a thouſand horſe: who perceiuing the town able to reſiſt, and the inhabitants prepared for to fight, and come out to meet him (for the towne being for the ſituation ſtrong enough, it was alſo compaſſed with a double wall) ſeeing this, he fought with them, and after a while put them to flight, and the Romans following them, brake in with them at the firſt gate: which the citizens perceiuing, ſhut the ſecond gate, not ſuffering their owne citizens to enter in, for feare that the enemies alſo ſhould ruſh in with them, as they had done into the firſt gate. Truly, God gaue that victory vnto the Romans, whoſe will it was that all warlike men of the city ſhould haue their own gates ſhut vpon them, and ſo fal into their enemies hands, who were moſt greedy to deſtroy them. For many came to the gates, and called thoſe that kept them by their names, pitifully intreating that they might come in: which whil'ſt they did, they were butchered like ſheep, being encloſed between two wals: their own citizens hauing ſhut one gate vpon them, and the Romans the other: and many thus encloſed periſhed with their fellowes ſwords, & an infinit number by the rage of the Romans, hauing no courage to reſiſt and reuenge themſelues. For the treaſon of their owne citizens, and the terror of their enemies together, vtterly diſcouraged them, & ſo they died al in number 12. thouſand, not curſing the Romans, but the Iewes their owne countrimen. Traiane, thinking that the citie was now deſtitute of fighting men, or if any were within, that they durſt not reſiſt being thus terrified, reſerued the taking of the city for the General, and ſent meſſengers vnto him, requeſting him to ſend his ſonne Titus to make an end of the victory. Veſpaſian, fearing that yet there wold be ſome reſiſtance, ſent Titus with 500. horſmen, & 1000 foot: who haſtning thither, placed Traianus on the left ſide of the town, & himſelf on the right: ſo the Romans on euery ſide ſcaled the wals, & the Galileans hauing awhile reſiſted, preſently left them. Then Titus & his followers leaping down, preſently got into the city, & began a vehement fight with them that were aſſembled therein, ſome valiantly iſſuing out of the narrow ſtreets, & aſſaulting them, and the women caſting ſuch things as they could get vpon the Romans from the toppes of their houſes, and thus they held battell ſix houres. How Cærealis conquered the Samaritanes.

B THe Samaritanes alſo were partakers of this calamity, who aſſembled themſelues together in mount Garizin,which they account a ſacred place. But both their aſſembly & their courage did portend their wars: and not warned by their neighbours harmes, nor with any aduice or iudgement conſidering their owne infirmity,and the Romans pow er,began to be tumultuous. Veſpaſian foreſeeing this, thought it good to preuent them: and although all the region of Samaria had garriſons in it,yet for all the great multitude aſſembled,it was thought that the garriſons were able to keep them vnder. Wherefore he ſent thither Cærealis,the Tribune of the fift legion,with 600. horſmen,and 3000.footmen. Cærealis thought it not the beſt way to go vnto the mountaine,and fight with the whole multitude, becauſe a great many of their enemies were vpon it: wherfore he cõmanded his ſouldiers to beleguer the mountaine about at the foot thereof, and ſo keep them there all the whole day. There hapned at that time a vehement heat, and the Samaritans wanted water: for it was then Sommer, and the people had not prouided themſelues of victuals,ſo that many in one day only for want of drink died of thirſt,the reſt preferred death before the miſery they indured,and ſo fled to the Romans: of whom Cærealis learned that thoſe that yet remained on the mount,were euen diſmaid by the miſery they endured. Wherefore he aſcended the mountaine, and compaſſing about the enemies with his army,he firſt exhorted them to yeeld,willing them to ſaue themſelues,promiſing them all their liues,if they would caſt downe their weapons: but nothing preuailing with them, hee ſet vpon them,and kild them all,in number 11000. and 600: and this was done the 27. day of Iune. And theſe were the miſeries that befell the Samaritanes.

How Iotapata was taken.

THe Citizens of Iotapata indured this hard ſiege contrary to all expectation, and in the ſeauen and fortith day the Romans mounts were raiſed higher then their wals: on the ſame day one of the city fled vnto Veſpaſian,and tould him in what caſe the city ſtood, and how few citizens were left,and that with daily watchings & fighting they were farre ſpent,whereby they were not able to reſiſt any more, and that they might be taken by policie if they were followed: for in the laſt part of the night, being wearie,they ceaſed from their labour, and ſlept vntill the morning: wherefore hee perſwaded Veſpaſian to aſſault them at that time. But Veſpaſian knowing how faithfull the Iewes were one vnto another, and how they contemned all puniſhment,gaue little credit to this run-away: for a little before,one of Iotapata being taken, could not by any torments be compelled to confeſſe,or diſcloſe the eſtate of the city, whom the fire nothing mou'd,& ſo at laſt he was crucifi'd,laughing,& ſcorning death: yet a probable coniecture which he had, perſwaded him to giue credit ſomewhat to this traitors words: and for that he knew no great harme could befal him,if he ſo aſſaulted the city as the traitor willed,he commanded the man to be kept, and made all his army in readineſſe to aſſault the towne. So at the houre appointed,he made towards the wals with ſilence; Titus being the firſt, accompanied with one Domitius Sabinus a tribune,& a few of the 15 legion: who killing the watchmẽ, entred into the city,and after them Sextus Cærealis & Placidus, with their companies; ſo the Caſtle was taken,and the enemies were in the midſt of the towne,and it was faire day light, and yet the townſmen knew nothing, beeing now faſt aſleepe after their great labours and watchings: and they that did watch could ſee nothing,there was ſo thick a miſt by chance that morning, & the reſt neuer wakened till death was at their dore; and that they perceiued their calamitie and deſtruction. The Romans,mindfull of all that had befallen them in the time of the ſiege,did neither ther ſpare nor pity any one: but driuing the people out of the higher part of the city into the lo- G wer part therof, they maſſacred them all, where they that would could not fight for the narrowneſſe of the place: ſo being cumbred for want of room, and ſliding downe the banks for haſte, their enemies ſtill purſuing them, they were eaſily ſlaine. Many of Ioſephs guard ſeeing this that they could not fight, gathered themſelues together in a corner of the city, and ſlew themſelues, that the Romans might not kill them. But ſome of the watchmen, who firſt perceiued the city to bee taken, fled into a tower, and reſiſted awhile (this tower was ſituate on the North ſide of the city) and at laſt being enuironed with their enemies, towards euening yielded, and offred themſelues to be ſlain. And the Romans might haue boaſted that that victory had bin without bloud-ſhed on their part, had not Antonius a Centurion been ſlain treacherouſly. For one of them who fled into the caues (as many did) requeſted Antonius to giue him his hand, in token that he might H come out ſafe & without danger: which he doing vnaduiſedly, ſtraightway the Iew with a ſpear

they found, and the daies following they ſearcht all the ſecret places, and drew thoſe out of the caues and dens that had fled thither, and ſlew all but women and infants: ſo that they took away 1000. and 200. captiues: and the number of them who were ſlaine during the ſiege, and at ſuch time as the city was taken, amounted to 40000. And Veſpaſian commanded the city to bee de-

How Ioſeph was taken, and how he redeemed his life with deeds and words.

BVt eſpecially aboue all others, the Romans made diligent ſearch for Ioſeph, both for the hatred they bare him, and alſo becauſe Veſpaſian greatly deſired to get him, for that hee being taken, the greateſt part of the wars were then ended; ſo they ſought him among the dead, and amongſt thoſe that were hid: but hee (fortune fauouring him) when the city was taken, eſcaped from the midſt of his enimies, and leapt into a deep Well, which had a large caue on the one ſide, the which they aboue could not perceiue; where he found forty principal men who had prouiſion for many daies. The enemies being in euery place, he in the day time lay hid, K and in the night he went forth to ſee if he could eſcape; and perceiuing that al places about were diligently watcht for to take him, he returned againe into the caue, and lay there two daies: the third day a certain woman that had bin with them in the caue was taken, and ſo he was deſcri'd. Then Veſpaſian ſent two Tribunes to him to promiſe him ſafety, and bring him before him; the Tribunes names were Paulinus and Gallicanus: But Ioſeph would not accept their offer, fearing that becauſe he had been the authour of all the euils that the Romans had indured, that therfore they ſought him out to puniſh him: till Veſpaſian ſent vnto Ioſeph, Nicanor, the third Tribune, one of Ioſephs acquaintance. Nicanor recounted vnto him how milde the Romans were towards them whom they had conquered, and that the Roman captains rather admired him for his ver- L tue, then hated him. Moreouer, that his Generall intended not to puniſh him (which if he plea- ſed he might do whether he yeelded himſelfe or no) but to ſaue him, who was ſo valiant a man: adding alſo, that if Veſpaſian meant ill, hee would neuer haue imploied his friend in ſuch a meſ- ſage, to vſe friendſhip (ſo noble a vertue) to ſo euill a purpoſe as to worke treaſon: and that he, though Veſpaſian had beene ſo minded, would neuer haue conſented to haue betraied his friend. Ioſeph, after Nicanors words, beganne to ſtudy, as doubtfull what was beſt to doe. Whereat the ſouldiers beeing angry, beganne to caſt fire into the caue: but Veſpaſian hindered them, beeing deſirous to take Ioſeph aliue. Nicanor ceaſed not to intreat him: and hee perceiuing how his ene- mies beganne to wex angry, and calling to minde the dreames he had in the night, wherein God foretold him of al the Iews calamities, and what ſhould betide the Roman princes (for he could interpret dreames, and whatſoeuer God obſcurely ſhewed, beeing inſtructed in the holy books M of the Prophets, and himſelfe a prieſt as his parents were.) So at that time being as it were filled with the Spirit of God, and recording the dreames and horrible viſions which hee ſaw in his ſleepe, hee prayed ſecretly to GOD after this manner; O Creator (quoth he) ſeeing that it pleaſeth thee to ruinate the nation of the Iewes, and that all good fortune is gone vnto the Ro- mans, and that thou haſt choſen my ſoule to foretell future euents, I yeeld vnto the Romans to ſaue my life, proteſting that I meane not to goe to them to play the traytor vnto my countrey, but

But they, who fled into the caue where Ioſeph was, perceiuing that Ioſeph yielded vnto the Romans, flocked all about him, and cried out. How are our countrey lawes violated? Where are thoſe promiſes of God made to the Iewes? where are thoſe gallant mindes that contemn and deſpiſe death? Art thou O Ioſeph deſirous to liue, and ſee thy ſelfe to become a vile bondſlaue? How ſoon haſt thou forgotten thy ſelf? How many haſt thou perſwaded to embrace death for their liberty ſake? Truly thou haſt but a ſhadow of valour and prudence in thee, if thou doſt hope that they will ſaue thy life againſt whom thou haſt ſo behaued thy ſelf: or if they would ſaue thee, to deſire life at their hands. When they had thus ſaid, they al threatned to kil him with their ſwords, if he did yield to the Romans. Ioſeph feared their violence, and perſwaded himſelf, if he died before he had put them in minde of Gods commandements, that then he ſhould die a traitor to God: wherefore he began to make a Philoſophicall diſcourſe vnto them concerning this preſent eſtate, what was to be done.

The Iewes violence & expoſtulation againſt Ioſeph.

Ioſephs oratiõ to his countrimen.

Wherefore (O my friends, quoth he) are we become murtherers of our ſelues? Wherefore do we make war betweene things ſo vnited, as are the ſoule and the body? Will any man ſay that my mind is changed? Why, the Romans knowe that it is a thing moſt honorable to dy in wars, not any way, but according to the law of armes, to wit, by the conquerers hand. If I intreat the

C Romans to ſpare my life, then am I worthy to periſh with mine own ſword & hand: but if they think good to ſpare their enimies, ſhould not we think it good likewiſe to ſpare our own ſelues? Truly it is meer folly to do that to our own ſelues, for the which we fight againſt them. I confeſs it is a commendable thing to dy for ones liberty; but yet to dy in fight, and by their hands who took away that liberty: but now neither do they war againſt vs, nor kil vs. He is not onely to be iudged a coward who refuſeth to dy when need requireth, but alſo he who wil dy when no need vrgeth. Moreouer, what with-holdeth vs from offring our ſelues to the Romans? Truly, feare of death. Shall we therefore make that certain our ſelues, which we feare at the Romans hands? But ſome will ſay, How if not, then we are made captiues: conſider what liberty we now haue. You will ſay it is the part of him that is valiant to kill himſelfe: nay truely, it is the part of a very

Moreouer, it is againſt the law of Nature, and the nature of all creatures to kill themſelues, and thereby we ſhould commit a hainous crime againſt God. There is no liuing creature that of his owne ſeeking would willingly die: for euery one feeleth in himſelfe the ſtrong & forcible law of Nature; wherby they deſire to liue: and for this cauſe we iudge them for our enemies, that ſeek to take it from vs; and puniſh them that do take it indeed. And do you thinke it is not a greater contempt of God for a man to deſpiſe his gift? For wee of him receiued our firſt being, and from him let vs expect our ending. The body is mortal, framed of corruptible matter; but our ſoules are immortal, and there is a little part of God placed in our bodies. If any one abuſe that which another man putteth him in truſt with, preſently we think

We hould thoſe ſlaues worthy to be puniſhed that run away from bad maiſters: and ſhall not we then be held for impious, who flee from ſo good a maſter as God is? Do ye not know that they, who according to the law of nature depart out of this life, and render that to God which they receiued of him, when he who gaue it requires it, ſhall leaue behind them a perpetual name to their poſterity and family? And that vnto thoſe ſoules who are obedient to their Creator when he cals them, he giues a holy & ſacred manſion in heauen, and from thence after a reuolution of the heauens, departing, are againe commanded to dwel in chaſte bodies? And that they who haue wrought their owne death, go vnto dark hell? and that God puniſheth

For if any amongſt vs kill themſelues, it is decreed that til the ſun go downe they ſhall be vnburied, yet we hold it lawfull to bury our enemies. Other nations cauſe their right hands to be cut off, who haue kild themſelues; iudging that as the ſoule thereby was made a ſtranger to the bodie, euen ſo by that fact was the hand made a ſtranger vnto it. ſelues: for it is no diſgrace to receiue our liues at their hands who are witneſſes of ſo many valiant deeds of ours. If we deſire to dy, let vs die by their hands who haue ouercome vs. I will not go into my enemies camp to be a traitor againſt my ſelfe. For I beare not their minde who forſake their own company to flee to their enemies: for they flee vnto them to ſaue their liues, but I go vnto them to work mine owne death, euen the death of my ſelfe. And I would to God that the Romans would break promiſe with me; for if they kill me after they haue promiſed to ſaue my life, I ſhall willingly dy, and with great courage, hauing their breach of promiſe and periurie for a comfort of the laſt victory. G

Ioſeph is in great danger to be ſlaine.

Ioſeph ſpake much to this effect to diſſwade his companions from killing themſelues. But they ſtopping their eares with deſperation, wherewith they had armed themſelues to die, came furiouſly towards him with their ſwords drawne, vpbraiding him, that he was a coward, and euery one was ready to ſtrike him. Then Ioſeph calling one by his name, and looking vpon another with a countenance like a gouernor, holding anothers hand, and intreating the reſt (diſtracted in ſuch danger) at laſt eſcaped from being killed at that inſtant: for ſtill as one came neere him to ſtrike him, he turned his face vpon him like ſome cruell beaſt; and ſome of them who remembred how he had been their captaine in their extreamity, with reuerence of his perſonage trembled, ſo that their ſwords fell out of their hands: and many lifting vp their armes to ſtrike him, of their owne accord let their weapons fall. Ioſeph, notwithſtanding his deſperate eſtate, yet was he not void of counſell, but aſſiſted by Gods prouidence, hee hazarded his life, and ſpake vnto them as followeth. Seeing (quoth he) that yee are all determined to die, let vs caſt lots who ſhall kill one another; and he, to whom the lot falleth, ſhall be kild by him who next enſueth, and ſo the lot ſhall be caſt vpon euery one of vs, ſo that none of vs ſhall be forced to kill our ſelues. For it were iniuſtice, that when ſome of vs be ſlaine, the reſt ſhould repent themſelues, and ſo eſcape. They all liked well of this, and alwaies he vpon whom the lot fel, was ſlain by him that followed, as though they were now to die with their captain: for death was more acceptable, becauſe they thought Ioſeph ſhould dy with them. Now it hapned by the prouidence of God, that Ioſeph remained aliue onely with one other, and then perſwaded him who was left aliue, to liue & not ſeek death, for fear the lot ſhould fall vpon himſelfe: and for that if he ſuruiued, he ſhould be polluted with the murther and ſlaughter of his owne nation. Thus Ioſeph, deliuered both from the wars of the Romans, and alſo of his owne nation, went with Nicanor vnto Veſpaſian. H

Another policy of Ioſeph.

Ioſephs fellowes dye by lots, & Ioſeph and another are reſerued. I Ioſeph reſorteth to Veſpaſian with Nicanor.

All the Romans came about him to ſee him: and preſſing about their Generall, they made a great noiſe, ſome reioicing that he was taken, others crying out to puniſh him, others ſtriuing to come neere to behold him better; and they who were a far off cryed out to kill their enemy: but thoſe who were neere him & beheld him, remembring his proweſſe, were aſtoniſhed to ſee that change. And there was no Captaine nor Ruler, but although before they were all moued againſt him, yet now beholding him, they all beganne to pitie him: and eſpecially Titus, who beeing of a gentle diſpoſition, admired Ioſephs valour, his conſtancy in aduerſity, and his age, and thereby was moued to take compaſſion vpon him, remembring what a manner of man he had beene during the wars, and what hee now was beeing fallen into his enemies hands: calling alſo to mind the force and power of Fortune, and how ſmall a ſtay the chance of warres had, and that no humane affaires had any ſtay or hold in them; wherefore he drew many mens mindes to pity him, ſo that Titus was the chiefe author of Ioſephs life: yet Veſpaſian cauſed him to be carefully kept, as though he meant to ſend him to Cæſar. Which Ioſeph hearing, requeſted that hee might ſpeake a word or two with him alone. Then all but his ſon Titus departing and two of his friends, Thou O Veſpaſian (quoth he) thinkeſt onely that thou haſt Ioſeph for thy captiue, but I am a meſſenger vnto thee of great matters from God, otherwiſe I knew my country lawes, and how it behoued the Generals of our nation to die, and not to bee taken aliue by their enemies. Wilt thou ſend me to Nero? Wherefore? As though Nero ſhould ſtill liue, and thou not ſucceed him? Thou, O Veſpaſian art Cæſar, and the Emperour of Rome, and Titus alſo thy ſonne; and keep mee in bonds with thee, for thou art not onely my Lord, but Lord of all the world, and ſea, and land, and all mankind. And if I now faine theſe things in this ſtate that I am, of mine owne mind againſt God, let me be reſerued vnto a greater puniſhment. After he had thus ſpoken, Veſpaſian gaue ſmall credit to his words, and onely thought that Ioſeph fained theſe things of himſelfe to ſaue his life: yet by little and little he beganne to giue credit vnto him, becauſe God put it in his mind to hope for the Empire: and foretelling his raigne by many ſignes and tokens, he alſo found Ioſeph to tell the truth in other matters. For one of Veſpaſians friends anſwered, that it was marſhaile that hee knowing that, could not prophecie the euent of the warres againſt Iotapata, and what was like K

A to befall himſelf, that ſo he might haue auoided thoſe euils. Ioſeph anſwered, that he foretold the citizens of Iotapata, that after ſeuen and forty daies they ſhould be deſtroyed, and that the Romans ſhould keep him aliue in hold. Veſpaſian ſecretly enquired of theſe matters, and finding by the relation of the captiues that it was true, he began to giue more credit to that which Ioſeph had told him concerning himſelfe. So he commanded Ioſeph to be kept priſoner, yet did he giue him apparell and diuers other things in moſt kinde manner: and Titus did greatly honour him. The fourth day of Iuly Veſpaſian returned vnto Ptolomais, and from thence he came into the ſea coaſt vnto Cæſarea, which is the greateſt Citie of Iudæa, whoſe inhabitants are for the moſt part Greeks: ſo the inhabitants receiued the army and the Generall with all friendſhip poſſible, both for that they loued the Romans, as eſpecially alſo for that they hated them, who were deſtroid;
B ſo that many intreated Veſpaſian to put Ioſeph to death. But Veſpaſian, iudging this a raſh petition, would make no anſwere vnto it: and he left two legions to winter at Cæſarea, becauſe he ſaw it was a fit place, and ſent the tenth and fift vnto Scythopolis, becauſe hee would not ouer-charge Cæſarea with the whole army. This place is warme in winter, and exceeding hot in ſommer, by reaſon it is ſituate on a Plaine by the ſea coaſt.

C IN the meane time a great multitude being gathered together, who either were ſeditious perſons or theeues, or ſuch as had eſcaped out of the ruinated cities, began to redifie Ioppe for their refuge, which Ceſtius before time had deſtroyed: and ſeeing that they could not rob nor ſpoile the countrie which was already waſted, and left deſolate by warres, they purpoſed to become pyrats: and ſo building ſhips for that purpoſe, they robbed the Phœnicians, Syrians and Egyptians, not ſuffering any to paſſe thoſe ſeas without danger. Veſpaſian vnderſtanding their intent, ſent horſemen and footmen thither: who finding the citie not guarded, got into it in the night time: which the inhabitants perceiuing were ſo afraid, that they durſt not make any reſiſtance to expell the Romanes, but they all retired themſelues vnto their ſhips, and there ſtaid all night, a flight ſhot from the ſhore. Ioppe is naturally no road for ſhips (for it is ſituated vpon a turbulent ſhore) and on either ſide hath very high and
D eminent rocks, which trouble the ſeas, and make huge waues: in this place (if we may beleeue the fable) one may ſee the ſignes of Andromedaes chains. When the north wind blowes, it ſtriketh the waues againſt the rocks, and ſo cauſeth a dangerous ſea, that it were farre more ſafe to be in the midſt of the ſeas, then at that ſhore when the ſame wind bloweth. The inhabitants of Ioppe rode there all night, and by break of day the north wind began to blow fiercely, & draue ſome of the ſhips one againſt another, and others againſt the rockes: and many ſtriuing againſt winde and weather, and ſeeking to get into the midſt of the ſea for feare of the rocky ſhore, and their enemies there, were drowned; and they that eſcaped, neither had any place of refuge, nor hope of ſafety; for the tempeſt did driue them from the Sea, and the Romanes from the Citie; ſo that the ayre was filled with cries of the people expecting to be drowned, and with the noyſe
E and ſound of the ſhippes beaten one againſt another. So ſome of the inhabitants of Ioppe were ſwallowed by the waues, others ſuffered ſhipwracke, ſome killed themſelues rather then to be drowned: many with the waues were ſtriken againſt the rocks, ſo that the ſea was bloudy, and all the ſhore was couered with dead bodies: and whoſoeuer eſcaped the ſea and got to ſhore, the Roman ſouldiers there ready ſtanding killed them. There were foure thouſand & two hundreth dead bodies caſt vpon the ſhore. So the Romans hauing without any fight taken the citie, they deſtroied it: and thus was Ioppe taken, and twice deſtroied by the Romans in a ſhort time. Veſpaſian builded there a caſtle, and placed in it ſome few horſmen & footmen, to the end that none of the Iewes ſhould come thither againe to play the Pyrats, and that the footmen might keepe the Caſtle, and in the mean time the horſmen might go forth, and ſpoile all the towns & villages,
F and teritories belonging to Ioppe: which alſo they did. When the newes of the deſtruction of Iotapata was brought vnto Ieruſalem, many gaue ſmall credit to it, partly for the greatneſſe of that calamity, partly for that no one man could ſay, that he had ſeen the deſtruction of the citie: for none eſcaped that maſſacre to bring newes, but only report thereof was ſpread abroad; but at the laſt it was verified to be true by thoſe that dwelt neere vnto that place, and then they beleeued it. Many things alſo which were falſe, were reported as true. It was likewiſe bruted, that Ioſeph was ſlain in the deſtruction of the citie, for whoſe death all Ieruſalem ſorrowed, and euery one mourned for their loſt kinred, all bewailed the ſuppoſed death of the Generall, and ſome of their ſons, others of their brethren and kinsfolke, and others of their acquaintance. They all mourned for Ioſeph thirty daies, and hired many muſicians to ſing funerall ſongs for him. Then the Iewes began as much to hate him now liuing, as before they mourned for him when they ſuppoſed him dead. And ſome ſaid he was a coward, others that he was a traitor vnto his country, and the whole citie breathed out reprochfull ſpeeches againſt him. Theſe heauy tydings encreaſed their rage, and this their aduerſitie (which vnto wiſe men had bin a warning to prouide leaſt the like befell them) made them more outrageous; ſo that alwaies the end of one miſchiefe was the beginning of another. How Tiberias was yeelded.

VEſpaſian was deſirous to ſee the kingdome of Agrippa (for the King had entreated him to go thither, partly to feaſt him and his whole army, partly to repreſſe ſome troubles ariſing in his kingdome, in the time of his abſence) and ſo departed from Cæſarea vpon the Sea coaſt, and went vnto Cæſarea Philippi, where he ſtaied, and refreſhed his ſoldiers twentie daies; and himſelfe alſo feaſted, giuing God thanks for his proſperous ſucceſſe in the warres. This done, he had intelligence that Tiberias and Tarichea were reuolted (both which cities belonged vnto Agrippa his kingdom) and fully determining vtterly to deſtroy the Iewes which inhabited thereabouts, hee thought it good to lead his army againſt theſe two places, eſpecially that he might reward Agrippa for his good entertainement, by ſurrendring theſe cities vnto him. Wherefore hee ſent his ſonne Titus to Cæſarea to bring the ſouldiers there vnto Scythopolis, which was the greateſt of all the ten cities, which alſo is neere vnto Tiberias; whither himſelfe being come he expected his ſonnes comming: and departing from thence with three legions, he pitched his tent in a place called Enabris, where the ſeditious people of Tiberias might behold his army; this place was thirty furlongs from Tiberias: from thence he ſent Valerianus the Decadarch to entreat a peace with them, and ſent fifty horſmen to accompany him: for he vnderſtood that the people deſired peace, and againſt their will were forced to warre, by ſome of the ſeditious amongſt them. Valerianus coming neer vnto the citie wals, lighted from his horſe; commanding all his company to doe the like, that they of Tiberias might not thinke that they came to fight, but in peaceable manner: but before he ſpake any one word, the boldeſt and ſtrongeſt of the ſeditious perſons came out armed againſt him, hauing one Ieſus the ſonne of Tobias, who had been a captaine of theeues, for their gouernour and leader. Valerianus not preſuming to fight without authority from his generall, although he had been certaine of the victory; againe conſidering that it was great danger for ſo few to fight againſt a whole multitude, and withall terrified with the boldnes of the Iewes, contrary to his expectation; hee fled on foot accompanied only with fiue other, leauing his horſe & the reſt behind him, whom Ieſus and his followers took, and brought into the citie, reioycing as though they had taken them in fight and not by treaſon. But the Senators & chiefe of the citie, fearing what might enſue of this fact, went vnto the Romans, and together with King Agrippa came vnto Veſpaſian, and proſtrated themſelues at his feet, beſeeching him not to deſpiſe them, and not to thinke that the whole citie were partakers with thoſe few wicked perſons, that ſo had merited his diſpleaſure; requeſting him to ſpare the people who alwaies had honoured the Romans, but rather that he ſhould puniſh the authors of that reuolt and miſdemeanour: who alſo had withheld the whole Citie, euen vntill now, to yeeld it ſelfe vnto the Romans. Veſpaſian moued by their entreaties, pardoned the Citie, though he was incited againſt them all for taking of Valerianus his horſe; in that hee perceiued Agrippa was ſorrowfull, for feare that the Citie ſhould bee deſtroyed, and ſo by them Veſpaſian promiſed the townes-men pardon. Then Ieſus and his aſſociates thinking it not ſafe for them to abide there, fled vnto Tarichea. The next day, Veſpaſian ſent before him Traianus with certaine horſemen into the Caſtle; to ſee if all the multitude deſired peace: and finding the people to beare peaceable minds, he with his whole army came vnto the citie. The gates of the citie were narrow, so that the army could not quickly enter in: wherfore Vespasian commanded a part of the wall on the south side to be pulled downe, and so entred in: yet did hee not sacke the citie, nor ruine the wals, for Agrippaes sake, who promised that from thencefoorth the citizens would be quiet. And so he pacified that citie greatly troubled with sedition.

CHAP. XVII.

How Tarichæa was besieged.

B VEspasian departed from Tiberias, and pitched his tents betwixt it and Tarichea, and encamped himselfe, foreseeing that there hee should haue some trouble and long abode: for all rebels that desired warres came thither, trusting both to the strength of the citie, and the lake adioyning vnto it called Genesar. For this citie was situate like Tiberias, vnder the mountains: and Ioseph had enclosed it with a wall on euery side, where it was not compassed by the lake. But the wall though it were strong, yet was it not so strong as that of Tiberias: for Ioseph builded that in the beginning of the rebellion, hauing men and mony at will; but that of Tarichea was built only by the remainder of his liberality. The Tarichæans had great store of ships in the lake adioining, to the end that if they were ouercome by land, they might fly by water: and therfore they had prepared their ships for battel by water if need should be. Whi-

Vespasian besiegeth Tarichæa.

C lest the Romans entrenched themselues, Iesus & his followers not dismaied either with the multitude or military discipline of his enemies, issued out of the citie, and slew the workmen, and destroyed a part of the worke: and perceiuing the Romans armed & assembled together against him, he fled again vnto his company without any losse or harme receiued. But the Romans pursued them so fast, that they forced them to take their ships: and so being gone as far frō the shore, as that yet they might easily reach them with the shot of an arrow, they cast anchor & disposed their ships in warlike maner, and fought against the Romans who were on shore. Vespasian vnderstood that a great multitude of them were gathered together in a place neer vnto the city: wherfore he sent his son Titus against them with 600. horsmen, who finding the number of his enemies to be infinit, certified his father, that he needed more forces: and perceiuing many of those

The Romans driue the Iews to their ships.

D horsmen of good courage, before any more aid came, and yet that some of them were afraid of the Iewes, he stood in a high place where all might heare him and said, O ye Romans, I wil first put you in mind who you are and of what nation, that so you considering what your selues are, may also consider who they are with whom we are to fight; neuer yet was there any enemy in any part of the world that could escape our hands. The Iewes themselues though already ouercome, yet do they endure and manfully beare out their misery: if therfore they constantly endure wars, and fight valiantly being in aduersity, what should we do who are in prosperity? I reioyce to see you shew good countenance, yet I feare least so huge a multitude of our enemies discourage some of you: let euery one therfore once againe consider, who himself is, and with whom he is to fight: and that although the Iewes be bold and valiant enough, yet they obserue

Titus Oration to his terrified souldiers.

Iewes are not to be feared.

E no warlike order, and are vnarmed, & so are more fitly tearmed a multitude then an army. I need not speake of your knowledge and skill in wars: nay for this only cause are we trained vp in warlike discipline in the time of peace, to the end that our number should answere to the number of our enemies when we are to ioyne battell: for what fruit shall wee shew of this our perpetuall warlike order & discipline, if we dare only fight with a rude multitude that are no more in number then our selues? Think that you being armed are to fight with vnarmed, and being horsmen are to fight with footmen, and being guided by the aduice of a captaine, with them who haue no head nor ruler: and that these things considered do supply in vs the want of more men, and the contrary in our enemies doth as it were much diminish their number. Victory doth not onely

Victory consisteth not in the multitude, but in the courage of a few that fight valiantly.

F consist in the multitude of men be they neuer so warlike, but also in a few, if they be valiant: for as they are few, so are they easily guided, and may easily come to helpe one another, not being pestered; whereas huge multitudes do more hinder one another then doe good, and doe themselues more harm then their enemies. So the Iewes are led with desperation, rage & fury, which indeed in prosperous successe are of some force, but in a desperate fortune they are quickely daunted: but we are led by vertue and obedience and fortitude, which both are of force in prosperity, and also are good in aduersity. Moreouer, wee haue greater occasion to fight then the Iewes haue: for they fight only for their country and liberty, but we fight for renowne & Empire; that we hauing already gained the Empire of the whole world, it might not be thought that our enemies the Iewes were aduerſaries able to match vs. Conſider moreouer that ye need not feare any great danger, for we haue many to help vs; and that hard by: let vs therefore atchieue the victory before any more ſuccor come vnto vs; ſo ſhall our credit be greater, and our victory more famous. I verily think that now triall is made of me, my father, and you; to diſcerne if he be my father, I his ſon, and you my ſouldiers: for he is wont to be victorious, and ſhall I returne vnto him being conquered? and are you not aſhamed to be diſmaied, ſeeing that I your captain will offer my ſelfe and vndergo the greateſt perils? My ſelf will beare the brunt of the enemies, and firſt encounter with them, and let none of you depart from me: perſwade your ſelues that God will aſſiſt my force, and boldly preſume that we can doe much more being in the midſt of our enemies, then if we ſhould only fight without and not be amongſt them. G H

It becometh ſouldiers to obey ther captaine.

Titus hauing thus ſpoken, as it were by Gods prouidence, all his ſouldiers took heart and courage, ſo that now they were ſory to ſee Traianus come with 400. horſmen more before the fight was begun, as though their victory ſhould be leſſe renowmed, becauſe hee came to help them. Veſpaſian alſo ſent Antonius and Silo with 2000. archers, to take the mountaine that was iuſt oppoſite vnto the towne, and to beat them that defended the citie, off from the wals, and they did as they were commanded. Then Titus with all force poſſible, firſt ruſhed with his horſe vpon the enemies: and all followed him with a huge cry, ſcattering themſelues in ſuch order as they occupied as much ground as the Iewes, and ſo appeared more then they were. The Iewes though terrified by their diſcipline, yet they withſtood the firſt aſſault: but in the end diſmaied, and put out of order with their lances, and killed with the horſmen, euery one fled as faſt as he could into the Citie. And Titus killed ſome as they fled, others as he met them, and thoſe he ouertooke, and many one for haſte tumbling one vpon another; and he preuented all that fled vnto the wals, and draue them back againe into the field, till at laſt the multitude preuailed, and ſo they got into the Citie. Now at their retume into the Citie there befell a great diſſenſion: for the inhabitants conſidering their owne eſtate, and the euent of all former warres, and eſpecially of this laſt fight, miſliked of warre and deſired peace: but the ſtrangers that had fled from other places thither, and were in great multitudes, would needs contend therein; and ſo one part began a mutinie againſt the other, as though they would preſently one haue taken armes againſt another. Titus being not farre from the wall, heard theſe tumults within the Citie, and cried out vnto the Romans; This is the houre (fellow ſoldiers) wherein God hath giuen the Iewes into our hands: why doe we deferre the time any longer? why doe we not take the victory offered? doe you not heare the cries within? they who eſcaped our hands are at variance amongſt themſelues: the citie is ours if we make haſte, and making haſte take courage: for nothing worth renowme can be atchieued without danger: and let vs not only preuentour enemies concord which neceſſity wil ſoone effect, but alſo our owne forces before any freſh aide come vnto vs; that beſide the victory we haue, being ſo few ouer ſo huge a multitude, we may alſo diuide the ſpoile of the citie among vs. No ſooner had he thus ſpoken, but preſently he mounted vpon his horſe, and rode into the lake, and ſo paſſed into the Citie, and all the ſouldiers followed him. They that defended the wals were amazed at his boldnes, ſo that none made reſiſtance againſt him as he came: but Ieſus with his followers leauing his quarter which was his to defend, fled into the fields, others flying towards the lake fell into their enemies hands, who came that way againſt them, and ſo were maſſacred euen as they were getting into their ſhips, otherſome were ſlaine as they did ſwim to ouertake the ſhips that were new launcht from the ſhore: and there was a great ſlaughter of men all ouer the citie. For the ſtrangers that fled not made reſiſtance, and the towneſ-men did not offer to defend themſelues; for they abſtained from fight, hoping for pardon in that they were not againſt thoſe proceedings: till at laſt Titus hauing ſlaine the wicked, tooke compaſſion vpon the towneſ-men and ſaued their liues, and cauſed the ſlaughter to ceaſe. They who fled into the lake ſeeing the citie euen taken, ran away as farre as they could from their enemies. Titus ſent horſmen to let his father vnderſtand what he had done. Wherof he hauing intelligence, being very glad for his ſons valour and magnanimitie, and for the atchieuing of ſuch a victory, wherby a great part of thoſe warres was ended, he commanded preſently the citie to be guarded round about, to the intent that none might eſcape away aliue. Of the lake of Genezar, and the fountaine of Iordan.

The yeare of the world, 4032 after Christs birth, 69.

THe lake of Genezar taketh his name from the countrey adioyning vnto it, the breadth thereof is forty furlongs, the length a hundreth. The water of this lake is ſweet & good to drinke, and is more ſubtill then ordinarily pure waters of mariſh places are, and it is very cleere neere the ſhore, and more temperate to drinke, then either that of the riuer or fountaine, but it is alwaies more cold then one would iudge ſuch a lake to be of that largenes: for the water being ſet in the ſunne, doth not loſe his coldnes: which the inhabitants haue vſed to do in ſommer euenings to allay the naturall coldnes thereof. There are here many ſorts of fiſhes nothing like to fiſhes of other places, either in ſhape or taſte. The riuer Iordan paſſeth through the midſt of it. It is thought that Panium is the head & fountain of Iordan, but in truth is hath his original from Phiala, and from thence paſſeth vnder the ground: this place is a hundreth & twenty furlongs from Cæſarea towards that way which leades vnto Trachon on the right hand. This water is called Phiala, by reaſon of his roundnes: for it is as round as a wheele, and the water ſtill keepeth within the brink of Phiala, neuer encreaſing or diminiſhing; and no man knew that this was the head of Iordan, til Philip the Tetrarch of Trachon found it to be ſo: for he caſting ſtraws into Phiala, found them afterward carried vnto Panium, which before that time was thought to be the fountain of Iordan. Panium, though it be naturally beautified, yet by Agrippa his coſt and charges it was much more adorned. Iordan beginneth with a deep riuer out of this denne, and paſſeth along the mariſh places, and durty lake of Semechonitis, and from thence 120. furlongs vnto the citie of Iulia, and in the way diuideth the lake Genezar, and paſſing a great way further into the wildernes, at laſt it endeth in the lake called Aſphaltites. Vpon the lake Genezar there bordereth a countrey of the ſame name, naturally beautifull and admirable: for there is no kind of plant which groweth not there, and the inhabitants haue repleniſhed it with plants and trees of all ſorts, and the temperature of the aire well agreeth with ſo diuers trees; for there are an infinit company of Nut-trees, which of all trees eſpecially require a cold ſoile: there are alſo abundance of palmes, which deſire great heat: likewiſe great ſtore of figges and oliues, which require a temperate aire: ſo that one may iuſtly ſay, that through the bounty of nature, ſo different and oppoſit qualities are here in one vnited; and at one time, as it were, all difference of ſeaſons of the yeere conioyned for good purpoſe. And it doth not only nouriſh theſe fruits, but alſo conſerueth them for ten whole moneths: there grow figs and grapes, which two one may well call the kings of fruits, all other fruits continue all the yeere long. For beſide the temperature of the ayre, it is alſo watered by a fertile fountain called Capernaum, many think it to be an arme of Nilus, becauſe it hath fiſhes like a Corbe bred in a lake neere Alexandria. The length of this countrey along the lake bearing the ſame name, is thirty furlongs, and the breadth twenty. And this is the nature of the lake Genezar, and the countrey about it.

How the Taricheans were deſtroyed.

Veſpaſian hauing finiſhed his ſhips, and furniſht them with as many men as he thought ſufficed againſt them whom he was to purſue, he embarked vpon the lake, and himſelf alſo went againſt them. The Taricheans could not poſſibly make any eſcape by land, although they would, & they were not able to fight hand to hand with the Romans, for their ſmal pyrat boats were not able to withſtand their enemies great veſſels; and beſide that, they were not ſufficiently manned, ſo that they feared to encounter with the Romans who preſſed all together vpon them: yet notwithſtanding ſometime they came about the Roman ſhips, and caſt ſtones at the Romans afar off, and ſomtime alſo came neere, and skirmiſhed with them: yet they themſelues alwaies had more harme then the Romans; for their ſtones which they caſt did only rattle againſt the Romans armour, but hurt them not, and they were killed by the Romans arrowes: and if at any time they were ſo bold as to come neer the Romans, they were ſlain before that they could do them any harme, or elſe drowned with their boats. And as many as attempted to wound the Romans, were ſlain with Iauelins, and other with ſwords, the Romans leaping into their boats; and many were taken with their boats, the ſhips meeting one another. They that were in the water & did lift vp their heads to ſwim were preuented with arrowes, or ouertaken with Roman boats: and if in desperation they came swimming towards their enemies, their hands or heads were presently cut off. And thus some perished one way, some another, till at last they fled, & arriued vpon the shore, their ships being compassed round about. So the Romans kild many vpon the lake, and many vpon the land, and one might then haue seen all the lake stained with blood full of dead bodies, for not one escaped aliue. A few daies after in that countrey there was a very odious stinch, and a horrible spectacle: for the shores were all ful of boats that had suffered shipwracke, and dead bodies swollen in the water: and those dead bodies taking heat did putrefie and so corrupt the aire all about, that not only the whole countrey and inhabitants thought it a miserable affliction; but also the Romanes who were the authors thereof. And this was the end of that warre by water. And the number of them that were slaine here in the citie was 6500. The fight being ended, Vespasian sate in a tribunall seat, and separated the strangers from the inhabitants, for that they seemed to be the authors of that warre: yet hee deliberated with the captaines and gouernors, whether hee should likewise pardon them: but they told him that that their liues might endomage him; for said they, if thou send those men away and let them liue, they cannot liue peaceably because they want abiding places; and are able to disturbe and disquiet those to whom they shall fly. Vespasian for this cause iudged them vnworthy to liue; assuredly knowing that if they were let go, they would fight against them who pardoned their liues, yet he deliberated what death to put them to. But he thought with himself the inhabitants would not patiently abide so many to be massacred, who had fled vnto them for succor: wherefore he sought to vse no violence vnto them, because hee had promised them security. But at last hee was ouercome by the perswasion of his friends, who told him that all things against the Iewes were lawfull, and that profit was to be preferred before honesty, seeing both could not be had: so licence being granted vnto them to depart, they suspecting nothing, were commanded to take only that way that leadeth vnto Tiberias: and they fearing nothing, willingly obeyed that which was commanded them, not misdoubting the safety of their goods or mony: but the Romans had placed themselues on euery side the way euen vnto Tiberias, to the intent that none might escape, and so shut them all in the citie. Presently after came Vespasian and inclosed them all in an Amphitheater, and soe killed 1200. of them, who were all olde men or young, and vnable for seruice: of the rest that were all strong young men, he sent 6000. vnto Nero at Isthmos neere Corinth. The rest of the multitude he sold, in number 30400. beside others that he gaue vnto Agrippa: for he permitted him to do what he would with those sort that were of his kingdome: But Agrippa sold also those that were giuen him. The rest of them were fugitiues & seditious persons of Trachon, Gaulanitis, and Hippenis, and many of Gadara, whose contempt of peace iustly procured these warrs. They were taken the sixt of the Ides of September.

How Gamala was beſieged.

AFter that Tarichea was conquered, all thoſe that from the time that Iotapata was ſurpriſed til this inſtant, had reuolted from the Romans, did now again vnite themſelues vnto them: ſo that the Romans had now gotten into their hands all Caſtles & townes, Giſcala onely excepted, & Itaburium, a mountaine ſo called. With theſe two rebelled Gamala, a towne ouer againſt Tarichea, and ſituate vpon the lake, belonging to the kingdome of Agrippa, and alſo Sogane and Seleucia: and theſe two laſt were both belonging to Gaulanitis, and Sogane appertained to the higher part called Gaulana, and Gamala vnto the lower, Seleucia vnto the lake Semechonitis, which is thirtie furlongs in breadth, and threeſcore large, whoſe mariſhes reach euen vnto Daphne, which country is very pleaſant of it ſelfe, and famous for that it entertaineth the ſtreame called little Iordane, and at the foot of the goulden mountaine doth deriue it into the great Iordane. Agrippa, in the beginning of the rebellion, vnited Sogane and Seleucia vnto himſelfe: but Gamala, by reaſon of the ſituation apt to reſiſt, did not yeeld vnto him, for it is farre ſtronger then Iotapata. For, from an exceeding high mountaine, there deſcendeth a hil very difficult for any to paſſe, riſing high in the midſt, & then deſcendeth lower and lower both before and behinde, ſo that it repreſenteth the figure of a Camell, which the Hebrewes call Gamal, and ſo thereof it took the name, though the inhabitants do not keepe that exact ſignification. Before it, and on either ſide there are deep vallies, into the which a man can hardly deſcend, onely it may bee taken and aſſaulted on that ſide where it ioineth vnto the mountaine, which alſo the inhabitants haue made inacceſſible, by cutting out there a deep ditch. In that place the city was very well inhabited on the deſcent of the hill, and towards the South part it ſtood on ſo ſteepe a hill, that it ſeemed as if it would haue fallen euery houre, and the South hill ſerued the inhabitants in ſteed of a caſtle, being vnwald: for it was an exceeding high rock, and reached downe euen to the bottome of the valley in the towne, and at the wals therof there was a fountaine. Although this city were of his owne nature inuincible, yet Ioſeph compaſſing it with a wal, and with ditches & mines, made it ſtronger. Wherefore the inhabitants of this place put farre more confidence in their wals then they of Iotapata did; yet were they fewer in number, and not ſo warlike people as they; but for the ſituation of the city, they eſteemd themſelues more then their enemies: for the city was full of men that fledde thither by reaſon of the ſtrength of the place: ſo that for ſeuen moneths they reſiſted them that were ſent by Agrippa to beſiege them. Veſpaſian departed from Ammaus, and pitched his tents before Tiberias, and ſo went vnto Gamala, (Ammaus is interpreted hote waters, for there is a fountaine of hot water which cureth many diſeaſes) & the city was ſo ſituate, that he could not beſiege it round about: wherefore he placed men to keep watch in ſuch places as it was paſſible, and obtaind the higheſt mountaine, where his ſouldiers pitching their tents, laſtly entrenched themſelues. On the Eaſt-part of the city in the moſt eminent place there was a caſtle, where the fifteenth and fift legions laboured againſt the towne, and the tenth legion filled vp the ditches and vallies. King Agrippa went vnto the wals, and ſpake vnto them that defended them, willing them to yeeld to the Romans: but one of them with a ſling ſtrook him on the right arme, and hurt him, and his familiar friends came about him to defend him. Then the Romans, for anger that the king was hurt, and for feare of ſuch miſchances to themſelues, now became earneſt to aſſault the town, perſwading themſelues that they would vſe ſtrangers & their enemies hardly, if it lay in their lot, ſeeing they had ſo euil entreated one of their own nation, for perſwading them vnto what was profitable for them.

Hauing quickly intrenched themſelues by reaſon of the multitude that laboured in that buſineſſe, and by reaſon that they were accuſtomed to ſuch like worke, they began to place the engines againſt the towne wals. Chares and Ioſeph were two of the moſt potent men in the towne: they therefore animated and armed their citizens, and brought them vnto the wals, who trembled for feare. And although they well perceiued that the city could not long hold out, ſeeing they wanted water, and many other things neceſſary to withſtand a ſiege; yet notwithſtanding, they exhorted the townſmen to be valiant, and ſo brought them vnto the wals, and a while they reſiſted, notwithſtanding the ſhot: but at laſt, they were therewith ſo terrified, that leauing the wals, they fled into the city. Then the Romans did batter the wals with Rams in three ſeue-rall places,and where the wall fel,there they issued in with trumpets and a great noise, and cries, G and fought with the townsmen,who in the first conflict so valiantly resisted them,that they permitted them not to enter any further into the towne. At last beeing ouercome both in strength and number,they al fled into the highest part of the city,and from thence they turned again vpon the Romans, who pursued them, and draue them downe into the vallies, and kild many, and diuers in that straight passage were troden to death by their fellowes. The Romans, seeing that they neither could flee, nor resist their enemies aboue their heads, fled into their houses, which adioined vnto the Plaine,and so filled them,that being ouercharged,they fell down,and lighted vpon other houses beneath them,which did beare them downe also,and they likewise others situated beneath them. Many of the Romans this way perished; for being amazed, and not knowing what to do,they fled into their houses, notwithstanding they did see them shake and totter: H aud many seeking to escape,were maimed by some part of the ruines that fel vpon their bodies, and many were choaked in the dust. The citizens of Gamala reioyced thereat,thinking that this aid was sent from God: and not regarding their priuate cõmodities,they ceased not to compell the Romans into their houses; and if any were in the narrow streets, them they slew with darts from aboue our of the high places. Thus the ruines afforded them stones enow,and their slaine enemies swords and armour,which they took from them, being now halfe dead, and vsed them against themselues: many died,who cast themselues headlong from off the houses being ready to fall,and those that sought to flee could not easily escape; for being ignorant of the waies, and there being such a dust that one could not see another, one of them killed another: and so with much ado finding passage, they went out of the city. I Vespasian, who was alwaies among the midst of these hurlyburlies, was greatly moued to see the buildings fall so vpon his souldiers: and forgetting his owne safety, he secretly retired himselfe with onely a few into the higher part of the city, where he was left in great danger, hauing very few about him (for Titus his son was not there,being before this time sent vnto Mutianus in Syria) and now he could not flee safely, nor yet had it bin for his honour if he could. Wherefore remembring all that he had done euen from his child-hood, and his own vertue, he encouraged his men,and with them ioined armes,and couered themselues with their shields; and so as it were moued with some diuine motion,defended themselues from all darts, arrowes & stones, which were cast from aloft vpon them,and so remain'd there not terrified either by the number or might of his enemies, till at last,they wondring at his diuine vertue & courage,asswaged their K fury. And now perceiuing his enemies to assault him but faintly,he retired back,till at such time as he got without the city wals.

The Romans fall down with the ruines of the Iewes houses.

Many Romans slaine and spoiled.

Vespasiãs fortitude & warlike valour.

Vespasians fight with the Iewes.

Many Romans perished in that fight, and amongst the rest, Ebutius a Decadarch, who not onely in that fight shewed himselfe valiant,but also in many wars before,and had done the Iews much harme. Also in that fight a certain Centurion, named Gallus, accompanied with ten souldiers, hid himselfe in a house, and at supper time he heard the people of that house talk,what the citizens of Gamala were purposed to do against the Romans (this Gallus & they with him were Syrians) and in the night-time he slew them all,and after escaped safe vnto the Romans. Vespasian perceiued all his army sorrowfull for that mischance,and so much the more,for that they neuer as yet had so bad a breakfast and especially for that they had forsaken their General,and left L him in danger and distresse; wherefore he thought it good to comfort them, nothing speaking concerning himselfe, lest he should seem to find fault with some in the beginning of his speech. Wherefore he told them,that it behooued them patiently to abide that which was common to all men,affirming that there was no victory without bloudshed, and that fortune was mutable: and that he had already slaine many thousand Iewes,and now had paid a small bribe for his happy successe vnto aduerse fortune. And that as it did not become any but vaine-glorious people to boast in their prosperity,so it behooued none but cowards to feare and tremble in aduersity: For,said he, fortune is very mutable both to the good and bad,and he is a valiant man that is not moued by aduersity: for he,hauing all his wits about him, can euen in the midst of his troubles see where any fault is,and amend it. Yet(quoth he) this hath not befallen vs through the weak- M nes of our courage, or the valour and prowesse of the Iewes, but the difficulty of the place was the cause that they should ouercome vs, and we be ouercomne. Wherefore one may well reprehend the too much rashnesse of your spirits: for when you saw your enemies flee into the higher places, you should then haue held your hands, and not to haue pursued them with so manifest danger to your selues, as euery one might foresee in this pursuit; so you hauing gained the lower part of the city, you might in time haue drawne them to a sure and safe conflict:

but

A but you, being eager of the victory, did not respect your own safety. It is not the manner of the Romans rashly & vnadui sedly to fight, who are wont to do all things orderly and aduisedly: for the other is fit for barbarous people, and as you see proper to the Iewes. Wherefore, let vs cal our owne vertues to minde, and rather be angry for this that hath hapned (and so incite our selues to reuenge) then sorrowfull. And let euery valiant souldier with his owne hand comfort himselfe; so shall we both reuenge the death of our friends, and be reueng'd of them by whom they were slain: and I my selfe (as also now I did) will expose my selfe to all dangers with you, and goe first to fight, & come last from fight. With these & such like speeches he comforted his souldiers.

The yeare of the world, 4031. after Christs birth, 69.

The Roman souldiers do al things with discretion.

The people of Gamala were of great courage, and much emboldned with their prosperous successe, which notwithstanding did not happen through their valour: but presently perceiuing
B that now all hope of pardon was taken away, & that there was no way to escape, they were very sorrowfull, and their hearts relented (for now victuals failed them) yet they omitted not to prouide for their owne safety wherin they could, for the most valiant among them kept the breach: and the rest, other strong places about the wals which were yet vnbattered. The Romans againe built mounts, and attẽpted to assault the city, and many of the citizens fled by the vallies where no guard was, and by secret vaults vnderneath the ground, & they who for feare lest they should bee taken remained in the city, perished for hunger: for all the victuals were reserued for them that fought. And they still continued in this calamity.

The Romans once more attẽpt the assault of Gamala.

C CHAP. II.

How Placidus took the mountaine Itaburium.

DVring this siege, Vespasian made another expedition against them that kept the mountain Itaburium, situate between the great field and Scythopolis, which is 30. furlongs high, and inaccessible on the north side. In the very top of this mountaine there is a Plaine 20. furlongs ouer, enclosed with a wall; all which wall being of so huge a compasse, Ioseph had built in 40. daies: they receiued all necessary prouision from beneath, for they had onely rain water. Vnto this place a huge multitude were gathered, and Vespasian sent Placidus against them with 600. horsemen, who could no waies get vpon the mountaine: wherefore he exhorted many of D them to peace, putting them in hope of pardon: likewise many of the Iewes came downe vnto him, as it were to entrap him, and assault him at vnawares. Placidus for the nonce gaue them faire speeches, hoping to get them downe into the Plain: so they, as though they would haue obeied him followed him thither, meaning when they came there, suddenly to assault him: yet Placidus his deuice took place. For when the Iewes assaulted him, he fained himselfe to flee, and the Iewes hauing pursued him a great way from the mountaine, he turned againe vpon them, and wounded many on the backs as they fled, and killed some, and hindred the rest of the multitude from ascending the mountain: so the rest left Itaburium, and fled vnto Ierusalem, and the inhabitants (now water failing them) yeelded to Placidus, and deliuered the mountaine vnto him.

NOw the most presumptuous among the Gamalians fled and hid themselues, and the weaker sort did perish through famine: yet the most courageous that were left amõg them, defended the wall till the 27. day of October. Vpon which day, three souldiers of the fifteenth legion, towards breake of the day, vndermined the highest tower in their quarter, and entred into it; those that kept it, neither perceiuing them when they came in, nor when they went out, (for it was in the night time.) These souldiers beeing wary lest any F noise should be made, remoued fiue of the greatest stones, and presently leapt away, and incontinently the tower fell with a hideous noise, and with the fall kild those that kept it, and many that kept watch in those quarters fled, being sore afraid: & they who sought to escape the Romans, were killed, amongst whom one Ioseph was strooken with a dart from a part of the wall that was fallen down, and there died. They who were within the city were terrified with the noise hereof, and ranne vp and downe as though all the enemies were already entred into it. And Chares, Iosephs companion, being sick, yeelded vp the ghost, feare encreasing his disease, and helping to shorten shorten his life. The Romans, remembring the bad successe at the last assault, did not enter the City til the 23. day of the foresaid moneth. G

Titus with 200. hundred horse besides chosen footmen, entereth Gamala.

Then Titus, as it were vexed at the misfortune of the Romans in his absence, accompanied with 200. horsemen, and certaine chosen footmen, entered the City, no man resisting him: and hee beeing passed into the same, the watchmen then first perceiuing it, cried to armes. Those within the city fearing that Titus was entred, some tooke their children, some their wiues, and fled into the castle with pitiful cries & weeping: others met Titus, and were all put to the sword: and they that could not get into the castle, not knowing what to do, fel among the Roman watchmen: then the skies were filled with the cries of men dying, and the lower places of the city flowed with bloud. Vespasian led his whole army against those that fled into the castle, which was of a huge height, and scarcely to be come vnto, being all of stone, and full of ditches and deep dens, H and compassed with steepy rocks: so the Iewes did driue downe the Romans that offred to com vp vnto them, partly with darts, partly with stones, which they rouled downe vpon them; and they were so high, that the Romans arrowes could not reach them. But at last, as it were by gods prouidence, who would haue it, a whirlewind arose, which caried the Romans arrowes amongst them into the castle, and the Iewes arrowes from the Romans, and the wind was so violent, that it was not possible for them to stand vpon those high places; and so not being able to stand, nor to see those that came against them, the Romans ascended and took the castle; some resisting for their defence, others yeelding themselues. The Romans now cald to minde their fellowes that perished in the first assault, and so became more cruell. Many despairing of their liues, cast their wiues, their children, and themselues headlong downe those high places, into the deep vallies I vnderneath. So that the cruelty that the Romans shewed against the people of Gamala, was not so great as that which they vsed against themselues: for there were only 4000. that perisht by the Romans sword; and the number of them who so cast themselues downe, was found to bee 5000: and not one escaped, but two women that were sisters, and daughters to Philip, who was son to Ioachimus, a worthy man, and gouernor ouer all Agrippas army vnder him; and these two were saued onely, because at such time as the city was taken, they hid themselues, for they spared not infants, but many took them & cast them downe from the castle. And thus was Gamala destroied the 23. day of October, which began to rebell the 21. day of September.

How Titus took Giscala.

The yeare of the world, 4032. after Christs birth 70.

NOw all the cities and strong places of Galilee were taken, Giscala onely excepted: the inhabitants whereof desired peace, for that they were husbandmen, and their riches consisted in the fruits of the earth; but there were many thieues in the city: to which vice also many of the citizens were addicted. These people were incited to rebell by one Iohn a witch, and a deceitfull person, son to one Leuias; who was of strange manners, & bold to presume any thing, and wonderfully atchieuing all he took in hand, and he was knowne to all men for one that desired war to make himselfe mighty. This man was ringleader of the seditious persons in Giscala: and for feare of them, the people, who perhaps otherwise would haue L sent Legates to the Romans to request peace, were hindered and forced to stay, till the Romans came to warre against them. Against these people Vespasian sent Titus, and with him a thousand horsemen, and the tenth legion toward Scythopolis: and hee with the rest went to Cæsarea to refresh them after their great labour, at the charge of the towns adioining; iudging it necessary to comfort their bodies, and encourage their mindes to sustaine manfully the wars that were to ensue: for he foresaw that he should haue much ado to win Ierusalem, both for that it was wont to be the kings seat, and also because it was the chiefe and head City of all the nation. And his care in this point was so much the more encreast for that he perceiued that many out of all parts fled thither; and that it was naturally strong, and also compassed with almost inuincible wals: and beside this, the boldnes and desperate courage of the inhabitants, who although that they M had no wals at all, yet had been scarcely to be conquered: and therefore he thought it necessary to comfort his souldiers before the fight, like champions who ought to enter the field and fight courageously.

Iohn a poisoner and a deceitfull man, inforceth the citizens of Giscala to rebell.

Vespasia foreseeth his no small trouble in the siege of Ierusalem.

Titus (coming on horseback vnto Giscala) perceiued that it might easily be taken: yet knowing that if it were taken by force, all the people should be destroied by the Romans (and now he was weary of bloudshed) he cõpassionating the wel disposed people, which were otherwise like

A to periſh together with the wicked, attempted to take it by condition. Wherfore the wals being full of people, amongſt whom were many of the ſeditious, he told them that he maruailed what help they had or expected, or by whoſe aduice, al other cities being now taken, they alone wold abide the laſt brunt of the Roman forces, eſpecially when as they had already ſeen many towns, far ſtronger then theirs, ouerthrowne at the firſt aſſault: and contrariwiſe, thoſe who had yielded themſelues to the Romans, liued in peace, and peaceably enioied al that was theirs. Which offer (ſaid he) I now alſo make vnto you, and am not yet incenſed againſt you, becauſe that which you do is for your liberty: but if (quoth he) you do ſtill perſeuere in this impoſſible courſe, my diſ- » pleaſure ſhall be kindled againſt you. And if ſo be they refuſed this kind offer, they ſhould pre- » ſently perceiue the Roman ſword to be ſharpned for their deſtruction, and incontinently ſhould »
B find that their wals were but a mockery, and no waies able to reſiſt the Roman engines: where » contrariwiſe, if they yielded themſelues, and truſted to the fidelity of the Romans, they ſhould » be the moſt happy people of all Galilee. None of the townſmen were admitted to make any an- » ſwer, nor to come vnto the wals: for the theiues were maſters of them; and a guard was placed » at euery gate, leſt any one ſhould go forth to ſubmit themſelues, or any horſemen ſhould be re- » ceiued into the city. Then Iohn made anſwer, that he liked well of the conditions offered, and that he would either perſwade or compell the inhabitants to accept of them, yet hee requeſted, that that day might be granted vnto the Iewes: for it was the 7. day, wherein it was not lawfull for them to entreat of peace, nor make war. For as the Romans knew, the Iewes euery ſeuenth day ceaſt from all work: and which if they profaned, they who cauſed it to be ſo abuſed, though
C it were Titus himſelfe, were as great offenders as they who were forced to it. Moreouer, ſo ſhort time could not preiudice the Romans, to wit, one nights ſpace: for nothing hee could effect in that time to endamage them, except onely by fleeing out of the city (which Titus might preuent by placing a ſtrong guard and watch in euery place thereabout) & that he thought it a great priuiledge to be ſuffred to keepe the cuſtome of his countrey; and that it was his part, who offred peace and ſafety to them that expected it, alſo to keep their laws whoſe ſafety he granted. With theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches Iohn ſought to delude Titus, being not ſo religious about the keeping of the Sabbath, as careful for his own ſafety: for he feard that the city would preſently be taken, & he left alone, and ſo he determined in that night to flee, as the onely way to ſaue his life. Truly God would haue it ſo, that Iohn ſhould then eſcape to be the ouerthrowe of Ieruſalem, and that D Titus ſhould not onely grant him the time he requeſted to deliberate, but alſo that night ſhould pitch his tents neer Cydæſſa, by the higher part of the town, which is the ſtrongeſt village of all that are in the heart of the Tyrian ſoil, which the Galileans alwaies hated. In the night time Iohn perceiuing no Romans to keep watch about the towne, hauing now opportunity, fled not onely with the armed men about him, but alſo with many of the chiefe of the city, and whole families, whom he promiſed to conduct vnto Ieruſalem. But Iohn fearing captiuity, and carefull for his owne ſafety, hauing caried them twenty furlongs out of the city, forſook them: who being ſo left deſolate, began grieuouſly to lament. For euery one thought himſelfe as neer his enemies as he was far from the citie and his friends: and ſtill euery ſtep, they thought their enemies at hand ready to take them, and euer they lookt back, as though their enimies heard the noiſe they
E made as they went, and ſo came againſt them, inſomuch that many ruſhed forward on heaps, and many were killed in the way with the preaſe of them that followed; ſo that women and infants did periſh miſerably: or if they ſpake any thing, only it was entreating their parents or their kinſfolk to ſtay for them.

Then the people ſet open the gates, and with their wiues &
F children came to meet him, all crying that he was their ſafety, and worker of their welfare; and that he had deliuered their city out of captiuity: alſo they certified him how Iohn was fled, and beſought him to pardon them, and execute iuſtice vpon thoſe malefactors that remained in the city. And at their requeſt, he ſent certaine horſemen to purſue Iohn, but they could not take him; for before they came he had gotten into Ieruſalem: yet they ſlew almoſt two thouſand of them that fledde with him, and brought back againe three thouſand women and children. Titus was angry that he ſuffred Iohns deceit to eſcape vnpuniſhed: yet his anger was ſomething appeaſed, for that hee perceiued Iohns purpoſe preuented, in that ſo many of his companie were ſlaine, and so many brought back for captiues. Thus he peaceably entred the city, commanding the souldiers to break down a little piece of the wall, as it were to take possession of it, and so punisht the seditious rather with threats then torments. For he thought that many were accused onely for priuate hatred, and so were in danger to suffer being innocent: and he thought it better to let the wicked liue in feare, then with them to destroy the guiltlesse. Thinking moreouer, that heerafter they would be more quiet, either for feare of punishment, or for shame of their former offence, for which they were pardon'd: and that if any man suffred vnworthily, he could not afterward complain. Then he placed there a garrison, both to repress the seditious, & also to confirm them that desired peace. And thus was Galilee conquered after it had much toiled the Romans.

CHAP. V.

Of the beginning of the destruction of Ierusalem.

SO soone as Iohn was entered into Ierusalem, all the people flocked about him and those that came with him, enquiring what calamity had befallen them without the city. Some of them being yet out of breath, and not able to speake, by signes discouered their necessity: yet amidst these their miseries, they boasted that it was not the Roman power that forced them to flee, but that they of their own accord fled thither to warre against the Romans in a safer place, then that from whence they fled, was; for none but vnaduised and rash-headed men would fight for such a citie as Giscala & other places that were not able to resist, seeing that it behoued them all to reserue their vigour and strength to defend the Metropolitane citie. They also signified vnto them, how Giscala was taken by the Romanes, and that they departed in good sort away, though some reported that they fled. The people of Ierusalem, hearing what these men reported, and how many were captiues vnto the Romans, they fell into a great feare, as though that which they told did portend their ruine. But Iohn, nothing ashamed in that he had so shamefully forsaken them of Giscala who fled with him, went first to one, and then to another, inciting them all to warre vnder a vaine hope, alleaging the weakues of the Romans, and extolling their own puissance, deceiuing the simple people; & perswading them that though the Romãs sought to reuenge, yet could they neuer enter the wals of Ierusalem, who had so much ado, and endured such affliction in entring the little burges & villages of Galilee, against whose wals they had broken all their engines. These words of his incited many yong men to seditiõ: but all the wiser sort foresaw what was like to ensue, and euen now mourned their lost city. And in this case were they of Ierusalem: yet before this sedition in the citie, the countrey people began to be at discord among themselues. For Titus departed from Giscala vnto Cæsarea, & Vespasian went from Cæsarea to Iamnia & Azotus, and took them both: & leauing there garrisons, he returned to Cæsarea, bringing with him a huge company of them who had yielded vnto him. All cities were at ciuill wars among themselues; so that when the Romans did not war vpon them, one part of the Iewes in euery city fought against the other, and there was a great dissension between those that desir'd peace, & the seditious people: and at first this discord began only in priuat houses; but in the end, euery one ioining with them that were of their mind, they now began in companies to rebell openly. Thus euery place was troubled with ciuill discord: and euery where rash yong men, who desired wars, preuailed against wise & graue old men, who, foreseeing the calamity like to ensue, desired peace. At first, the inhabitants one by one robd and spoiled what they could; but at last, in whole troups they ioined together, and robbed openly, and wasted all the country about: & they in their robberies shewed such cruelty, that the harme and iniury they did vnto their owne countrimen, was altogether equall to the miseries which befel them by meanes of the Romans; and they, who by these miscreants were spoiled, wished rather to haue fallen into the Romans hands. But they who kept the city, either because they were loth to weary themselues, or else for that they hated the citizens or people, did nothing or very little succour them that fel into these thieues hands. At last the thieues assembled themselues together from al places, & ioining companies, they brake into Ierusalem. This city had no gouernor; & according to the custom of that country, receiued all that came thither that were their countrimen; and so much more willingly at that time, because they thought that they that came thither, came of good will to help them: which only was afterward the cause that the city was destroyd; setting aside the ciuil dissension. For a great multitude of people vnapt to fight being there, consum'd the victuals that wold haue suffised for the fighting men: & beside the wars, they brought vpon it famine & ciuill dissension. Then other thieues came out of the fields therabout, & ioining themselues with those that were within the city, omitted no kind of villanie; for not content to rob and spoile, they also attempted

A ted to commit murders, not onely priuily, or in the night vpon meane men, but euen in the day time they publikely set vpon the chiefest of the nobilitie. For first of all they took Antipas, who was borne of the bloud royall, a man so eminent amongst them, that the publike treasure was committed to his charge and custodie, and put him in prison: and after him they tooke Sapha a worthy man, and sonne to Raguel and Lenia, both of them of the kings houshold, and after them all that seemed to beare any sway, or were in authority amongst the people. Great fear fel vpon the Inhabitants, and euerie one prouid d to saue himselfe, as though the Citie were euen now surprised by the enemies. But these people were not content thus to haue imprisoned those potentates, neither did they thinke it safetie for themselues any longer to continue, for men alive: for many came dayly vnto them to visit them, and vnto their houses, who were able to reuenge
B their iniuries: and moreouer they feared that the people would make a head against them, being moued with their iniquitie. Wherefore they determined to kill them: and to effect their purpose they sent one Iohn a cruell murderer, who was the son of Dorcas: he accompanied with ten more all hauing swords went vnto the prison, and slew as many as they found there. To excuse this cruell fact of theirs, they alledged this, to wit that all they who were slaine in prison, had conference with the Romans concerning the betraying of the Citie into their hands, and that for this cause they had slaine them, being traytors to their Countrie: they also boasted that this fact of theirs had preserued the Citie, and that therefore they had well deserued of it. The people was brought vnto such slauerie and terror, that the chusing of the high Priest was in their hands to elect whom they pleased: so much was their insolence increased. Thus they not respecting the
C families, out of which it was onely lawfull to chuse the high Priest, they now elected strangers and base persons to that sacred dignitie, and such as would be partakers of their villanies and impieties: for they who not deseruing it, attained to such dignitie, were as it were bound vnto their will in all things, by whom they were so exalted. They also deuised many lies, to make those that were in authoritie one at variance with another, thereby as it were to hold them occupied who were able to resist their enterprises, till that being now satisfied with the bloud of the Citizens, they began to commit impietie against God himselfe, and with prophane and vnpure feete to enter into the sanctuarie. Then the people was incited against them by Ananus his meanes, who was one of the priests, and the most ancient and wisest of them all, who perhaps had saued the Citie, had he escaped the hands of these miscreants. But they vsed the Temple as a Castle & defence for themselues against the people, and made the Sanctuarie a place for them to exercise
D tyrannie in. And that which increased the sorrow of the citizens, was, that amidst these calamities, their religion was also contumeliously abused: for these theeues, to trie of what strength & courage the people were, and their owne forces, did elect by lot a high Priest contrarie to their law: which as we haue already said, requireth that the high Priest shall be chosen by succession. This deed of theirs they coloured with an ancient custome, alledging that in time past the high Priest was chosen by lot. But indeede this their fact was an abrogation of the most firme custom that was amongst the people, and was onely a deuice to get all gouernment into their hands by establishing magistrates at their pleasure.

Then calling one of the holy tribes named Eniachin, they cast lots, & it so fell out that the lot
E fel vpō one, whereby their iniquitie was discouered. This man whose lot it was to be high Priest was named Phanes, who was the sonne of Samuel, a man not onely vnworthy of that dignitie, but who had bin so rudely brought vp, that he neuer knew what the high Priest meant: thus Phanes was borne in a village called Aphthasis. Him, against his will they fetcht out of the field, and as it had beene in a stage-play they graced him with another mans person, and presently gaue him instructions how he should behaue himselfe, putting vpon him the sacred attire of the high Priest, as though that so great impietie had been but a sport. The rest of the priests, beholding a far off the holy lawes to be scorned, scarcely contained themselues from teares, & euen groaned for sorrow, that their sacred dignities were so abused. The people could no longer endure this their tyranny, but now euerie one addrest himselfe to depose these tyrants. And those that were F most earnest herein, were Gorion Iosephs sonne, and Simeon the sonne of Gamaliel, who went about the City to euerie one in priuate, and then in a publike assembly exhorted the people to be reuenged vpon those tyrants, who tooke from them their libertie, and to addresse themselues to purge the holy Temple from such vile & vncleane persons. Likewise the best disposed amongst the priests, to wit, Iesus the sonne of Gamala, and Ananus the sonne of Ananus, often in publike Sermons reprehended the people, and vpbrayded them with their slouth, in that they made no more haste to destroy those Zelous people (for so those wretches tearmed themselues, as though they had beene deuout followers of goodnesse, and not impious malefactors.) The people being all assembled together, euerie man grieued to see the holy place so kept for a denne of theeues, and of their robberies and murders which they committed; yet did they not goe about to reuenge, thinking themselues too weake to deale with these Zelous, as indeed they were. Then Ananus stood vp amongst the middest of them: and hauing often turned his eyes to the Temple, and beholden it till the teares ran downe his cheekes, Oh sayd he, how farre better were it for me to die, then to liue, to see the house of God thus filled with impietie, and the Sanctuarie wherein none should come but the high Priest, prophaned with the wicked feet of impious persons, being cloathed in Priests apparell, and beare the name of the most authoritie amongst all names: and doe I yet liue, and doe I saue my selfe, and to bee gray-headed, abstaine from dying a glorious death? Nay, rather I alone will goe against these murderers, and as though I were in a wildernesse where there were no man beside my selfe, I alone will goe and offer my soule for Gods sake. For what doth it auaile mee to liue amongst a people, that hath no feeling of their owne calamitie, & which seeketh not to redresse their own present miseries? for you being robbed and spoyled beare all patiently, and being beaten you hould your peace, and there is none amongst you that dare openly mourne for them that are most cruelly murdered. O tyrannous gouernment! But why should I exclaime against the tyrants? Did not you your selues make them great, and nourish their power and authoritie by your patience? Did not you, by despising those who before were in authoritie being but a few, make all these, who are many in number, tyrants ouer your selues? haue not you keeping your selues quiet, they being armed, turned their swords vpon your owne heads? and as then it behooued you to resist their enterprises, when first they iniured your kinred; you by suffering haue made them theeues; because at first you made no account, when they destroyed houses and whole families. And this was the cause that at last, the rulers and potentates themselues were set vpon, and none would succour them when they were drawne through the middest of the Citie, and these murderers butchered them in prison whom you thus betrayed. I will not recount what men they were, and of what birth: but I say they being neither accused nor condemned, hauing no man to heare them, they were most cruelly murdered, as we haue seene any: for they were before our faces led to bee slaine, as the fattest amongst the whole herd of beasts; all we beholding this: and yet no man opening his mouth nor lifting vp his hand. And will you also endure? will you suffer the holy Sanctuarie to bee prophaned before your eyes? & will you, hauing so embouldned these miscreants as yee see now, your selues stand in feare of them? assure your selues, they would, if they could deuise how, commit greater impietie then this is. They keep against you the strongest place in the whole Citie; called a Temple, but now indeed it is a fortresse or Castle of defence. What doe yee now thinke, such a tyranny being established ouer you, and your enemies being euen vpon you; what do you deliberate to doe? Doe you expect the Romans to come and helpe you, to saue the Temple and sacred mysteries? Our Citie is now at that stay, and we haue so behaued our selues, that our verie enemies pitie vs. O yee wretches! will you not arise, and as the verie brute beastes doe, will you not reuenge your selues vpon them that haue thus wounded you? Wil not euerie one of you call to minde the massacre of his friends, and what calamitie hee himselfe hath suffered, & so encourage your selues to be reuenged? For ought I can see, you haue all lost that sacred and sweet and naturall desire of libertie, and now we imbrace bondage, as though we had learned to be bondmen euen from our aunce stors. But they endured many and hard warres to liue in libertie, and yeelded neither to the power of the Aegyptians, nor Medes, because they would not bee at their commaund. What neede is it to recount vnto you the warres of our predecessors? To what end doe wee enterprise this war against the Romans (bee it commodious for vs, or to our disaduantage) if not to obtaine our libertie? And we, who cannot indure to bee subiect vnto the Lords of the whole world, abide our owne nation to tyrannize ouer vs. Some may account it aduerse fortune to be once ouercome by strangers: but to be slaues vnto the basest of our owne nation, it argueth that we haue no sparke of generositie in vs, & that we beare base & seruile minds. And seeing I haue made mention of the Romans, I will not sticke to declare vnto you that which now commeth to my mind, to wit, that if we be taken by them (which God forbid) yet shall we suffer no greater miserie at their hands, then now we do vnder these base tyrants. And how can you abstaine from teares, beholding this Temple, enriched by the gift of the Romanes, robbed & spoiled by them of our owne nation, this being our mother Citie? and to see those men murdered, whome the Romans (although they had conquered vs) would not haue touched? True it is, that thoſe that haue thus tyrannized ouer vs, deſerue death, and that no puniſhment can be deuiſed great enough for their offence: and all of you were ſo perſwaded before I ſpake of it, and you were incited againſt them by that which you haue endured at their hands: but yet you feare the multitude of them & their B courage; and moreouer that they are in a higher place then you: yet as all this came by your negligence & ſuffering, ſo by your delaying they will grow ſtronger. For their number is dayly encreaſed, and euerie wicked perſon flieth vnto his like; and they are ſo much the more emboldened, for that as yet no man did once offer to reſiſt their enterpriſes: & be ſure that if they haue time they will make vſe of the higher place, and that to your domage. But (beleeue mee) if you would but once offer to go againſt them, their verie conſciences wold abate their hautie minds, and the remembrance of their miſdeedes would put them ſo farre out of tune, that they will not make any benefit of the higher place. Perhaps God in his vengeance will turne their owne darts againſt them for their impietie, and conſume them therewith. The Epilogue of Ananus Oration to the people.

Ananus thus exhorted the people againſt the Zelous, yet he knew well that it was great difficultie to ouercom them, being luſtie young men, manie in number, of great courage, and the more deſperate for the remorſe of conſcience of the horible crimes, & execrable deeds which they had committed, for they deſpaird of all hope of pardon for their miſdeeds. Yet Ananus thought it altogether intolerable, that the cõmon wealth ſhould be ſo ouerruled. After this exhortation the people cried out that they were readie to go againſt the theeues, and to doe as they were requeſted. Whileſt that Ananus ſelected out the moſt able men for warre, and ſet them in order, the Zelous came and iſſued out vpon him, and (hauing intelligence of all his intents and proceedings D by certaine ſpies which they had appointed vpon purpoſe) being inraged ſalied out, and in companies, ſometime all at once, other times in ambuſhes; ſparing none that they met with. Ananus quickly gatherd together the people, who were more in number then the theeues: yet were they not ſo well armed as they; but what they wanted in armes their courage did ſupply. For the Citizens were armed with furie, ſtronger then armour; & they which wer gone out of the temple, with a more deſperate boldnes, then all the multitude how great ſo euer it was. For the Citizens thought it no abiding for them in the Citie, except they could driue away the Zelous: and the Zelous thought that they could not eſcape torments and death it ſelf, except that they were victors. So at laſt they ioyned battell, each vnder their captaines and leaders, and firſt of all both E parties caſt ſtones one againſt another: and if any part fled, then the conquerors purſued them with drawne ſwords, and many were wounded and ſlaine on both parts. Thoſe townesmen that were wounded, were by their friends carried into their houſes; but the Zelous that were hurt went into the temple, and polluted the ſacred pauements with their bloud: ſo that their religion was prophaned by their bloud. Alwaies the theeues in making excurſions got the vpper hand. Heareat the Citizens being angrie, ſeeing their number euery day encreaſed, reprooued the cowards: ſo that if any of their company offered to flie from the Zelous, they made him ſtand & reſiſt whether he wold or no, not permitting him to paſſe away: And thus they bent all their forces againſt their enemies. At laſt, the theeues not able to make any longer reſiſtance, by little and little retired themſelues into the temple, and Ananus with his company entred the temple by F force with them, and brake the ranke of his enemies. Then they in the vtter temple were in great feare and fled into the inner temple; and ſhut the gates with all ſpeed. Ananus would not offer violence to the ſacred gates, & beſide that the enemies caſt darts from aloft: for hee thought it a great offence againſt God, although he might haue got the victorie, to introduce the people not being purified. Wherefore he elected ſix thouſand of the chiefe of all his men well armed, and appointed them to keepe the porches, & others to ſucceed in their places while they tooke reſt. This man from that time counterfeited himſelfe to bee againſt the theeues, and ſo day and night accompanied Ananus and the reſt, both in their conſultations, and when they went to viſit the watch; and hee diſcloſed all their ſecrets vnto the Zelous: and there was nothing decreed by the people, but he gaue the theeues intelligence therof before it was put in practice; yet he ſeemed to be verie dutifull vnto Ananus, and the reſt of the nobilitie, hereby hoping to conceale his treacherie. But it fell out contrarie to his expectation; for this his too much reuerence cauſed him to be ſuſpected, becauſe they noted him to play the paraſite: and for that vncalled he dayly intruded himſelf into their conſultations, he was miſdoubted to bewray their ſecrets. the enemies knew all their ſecrets, & Iohns deedes did carrie ſuſpicion of treaſon, yet could they not eaſily remoue him, his craft was ſuch: beſides this, he was boulſtered out by many noble men who were emploid in theſe affaires. Wherefore they thought it good to requeſt of him an oath of friendſhip; which he denied not, but added moreouer that he would be true vnto the people, and neither diſcloſe any deede or ſecret counſell of theirs vnto the enemies, & that he with hart and hand would truely endeuour to ſuppreſſe the rebels. So Ananus did no more miſtruſt him, becauſe of his oath, and admitted him afterwarde to all their counſels, nothing ſuſpecting him. Nay, they now truſted him ſo far, that they ſent him for an Embaſſadour vnto the Zelous, to perſwade them to peace: for they were verie carefull leaſt the temple through their deeds ſhould be I

For, ſaid he, now Ananus without delay will ſend vnto Veſpaſian, and he will ſend his army in all haſte and take the citie: and that he had appointed the next day following for purification to purifie the people, that ſo vnder pretence of pietie he might let them into the Citie, or els they might enter in by force: and that hee could not ſee how either K
Iohn ſtirreth vp the Zelous againſt the Citizens
they were able to endure a long ſiege or to encounter with ſo huge an armie: adding moreouer, that it was Gods prouidence that hee ſhould be ſent vnto them to make a peace, when Ananus purpoſed ſo ſoone as they were vnarmed to ſet vpon them. Wherefore if they had any care of themſelues they ſhould either intreat the watchmen that beſieged them to bee good vnto them, or elſe get ſome ſuccour from ſome place without the temple. For (ſaid he) he that amongſt you hopeth for pardon if you be ouercome, doth not remember what hath paſt, and what hee hath done; but let them perſwade themſelues, they that haue been iniured wil not forget and forgiue ſo ſoone, as he that iniured them is ſorie for his fact. Nay, many times the repentance of malefactors maketh them more hated then before, and the wrath of men that are iniured is increaſed by L authoritie, and licence to doe what they pleaſe. And they might bee ſure that the friends and kinſfolks of them that were ſlaine, would alwaies lay waite to requit the iniuries; and that all the people were incenſed againſt them for breaking the lawes: ſo that although ſome few wold take pitie vpon them, yet the greater companie being moſt in number would preuaile. With theſe & ſuch like ſpeeches Iohn terrified the Zelous, yet durſt he not openly tell them what he meant by forraine help, notwithſtanding hee meant the Idumæans. And that hee might more enflame the theeues he went vnto the chiefeſt of them, and ſecretly told them that Ananus was cruelly bent againſt them, and breathed out many threatnings againſt them in particular.

CHAP. VI. M

How the Idumæans came vnto Ieruſalem, and vvhat they did there.

Eleazar one of the Zelous cauſeth the Idumæans to be ſent for.
AMongſt the Zelous there were two principall, Eleazar the ſonne of Simon, who aboue all the reſt was thought moſt fit to giue counſel, and to execute that which was conſulted vpon: and Zacharias the ſonne of Amphicalus, who both deſcended from the line of the prieſts. Theſe two, vnderſtanding, that beſide the generall threatnings their deaths were eſpcially vowed, and that the faction of Ananus to get him into authoritie, had ſent to call the Romans (for this, Iohn had fained) deliberated with themſelues what to doe, hauing ſo ſhort time

A time to prouide. For they ſuppoſed that preſently the people would aſſault them, and they bethought themſelues that now it was too late to ſeek for forraine helpe: for they might endure all calamitie, before they could giue notice hereof vnto any that would helpe them. Yet at laſt they determined to call the Idumæans to aide them, and ſo they wrote a briefe Epiſtle vnto them, letting them vnderſtand how Ananus, hauing ſeduced the people, meant to betray the mother Citie of their nation vnto the Romans; and that they fighting for their libertie, were by him beſieged in the Temple: that the time wherein they expected ſafetie was verie ſhort: and that if they did not preſently ſend ſuccour, they were like to fall into Ananus and their enemies hands, and the Citie to bee brought in ſubiection vnder the Romans: and alſo committed manie things to be ſpoken by word of mouth vnto the rulers of Idumæa. For which purpoſe were
B choſen two principall men eloquent and apt to perſwade; and that, which was in this caſe required, ſwift of foote: it was certaine that the Idumæans would preſently aide them, it being a clowniſh rude nation, and prone to ſedition and alteration, much reioycing therein; and by flatterie eaſily entreated to warres, making as much haſte to them as if they went to ſome feſtiuall ſolemnitie: ſo that there onely was required two ſpeedie meſſengers. Which two were readie and quicke men for ſuch an exploite, and were both called by the name of Ananias. Theſe preſently came vnto the gouernours of Idumæa: & they reading the Epiſtle, and hearing that which the meſſengers were to ſay vnto them, like mad men aſſembled all the people together in poſt haſte, and proclaimed wars; ſo the people in an inſtant gathred themſelues together, and were all armed to fight for the libertie of their mother citie: & twentie thouſand being aſſe-
C bled together vnder the gouernment of foure captains, came with all ſpeed to Ieruſalem: the names of them were theſe, Iohn and Iames, ſons of Soſa, and Simon the ſon of Cathla, and Phineas the ſonne of Cluſoth. Ananus and his watchmen knewe not of the going of thoſe two meſſengers, nor of the watches in the citie, but they vnderſtood of the Idumæans cõming, & ſo ſhut the gates & placed watchmen vpon the wals: yet they thought it not good to go out and fight with them, but firſt with peaceable words to perſwade them to concord and peace. Wherefore Ieſus the eldeſt of the prieſts next after Ananus ſtood in a tower oppoſite againſt them, and ſpake in this manner.

The Zealous require helpe from the Idumæans.

The nature and manners of the Idumæans.

Twenty thouſand Idumæans come to Ieruſalem.

Ieſus oration & exhortatiõ to the Idumæans.

Though many and diuers tumults & troubles haue moleſted this citie, yet did I neuer ſo much admire any of them, as to come with ſuch furie and readines to help theſe wicked people, againſt all expectation: for (ſaid he) you are come againſt vs to helpe moſt vile perſons; & that ſo raſhly,
D as it behooued not you to haue done, if your Metropolitan city had requeſted your help againſt barbarous people. If I ſhould perceiue your maners like vnto theirs that haue requeſted your help, I would then think you had ſome reaſon to com, for nothing cauſeth firmer friendſhip then agreement or ſympathie in maners. But they if they were narrowlie ſought into, haue euerie one deſerued a thouſand deaths. For they are the baſeſt & the verie outcaſt of all the countrie people; who hauing ſpent their patrimonies riotouſly, and played the theeues in all places and cities about them, now at laſt haue got into this holy citie, moſt religious of all cities, and haue prophaned the holy place by their impietie: they tremble not to bee drunke euen in the holy temple,
E and there they conſume in banquetting the ſpoyles they haue gotten from them, whom they haue maſſacred. And you come to helpe theſe men with as great an army & prouiſion, as though that this your mother citie had by publike conſent requeſted your helpe againſt forraine enemies. Is not this the iniurie of fortune, that your whole nation hath conſpired and bent all their forces againſt vs to help theſe miſcreants? Til now I knew not what moued you ſo quickly and ſo ſodainly to arme your ſelues to aſſiſt theeues againſt your natiue countrimen. What? haue you bin informed of the Romans coming, and of the betraying of the citie? For euen now I heard ſome of you mutter, that you came to deliuer your mother citie. Is it not a wonder to ſee this deuice and inuention of theſe malefactors? But they could deuiſe no other way to incite other againſt vs (who euen naturally deſire libertie, & are ready for the ſame to ſpend our deereſt bloud in conflict with the enemy) but to fein vs to bee deſtroiers of libertie: But it behoueth you to F conſider who are theſe calumniators, and againſt whome theſe calumniations are deuiſed; and then to gather the veritie of the matter, not from forged tales, fained at mens pleaſures, but from the thing it ſelfe. What ſhould moue vs now to yeeld vnto the Romans, hauing indured as yet nothing to conſtrain vs therunto? when if wee had liked to liue vnder their obedience, neither needed wee at firſt to haue rebelled; and beſide that, if wee had repented our ſelues wee might haue again ſubmitted our ſelues, and obtained their fauour before this time that all the country round about vs is deſtroyed. Nay if now we would yeeld, it is not eaſie for vs: for the ſpoyle of Galilee,which they hauing already conquered,hath made them proud,and that we in humbling our selues vnto them,being neere vnto vs,should incur an infamie worse then death it selfe. True it is,I thinke peace better then wars;yet being once prouoked to wars,and the fight being begun, I had rather die a glorious death then to liue in captiuitie. Doe they enforme you that we haue secretly sent the chiefe of our city to the Romans,or that by cõmon consent of al the people we haue done it? If they say that we did it secretly,let them then tell what friends of ours were sent, or what seruants of ours were ministers to effect this treason. Did they take any messenger of ours, and find letters about him? How can that be hid from all our citizens,with whom wee do euerie houre conuerse? And is it possible that a few, shut vp in the temple,who could not come out into the citie, should know our secrets, all the whole citie knowing nothing? or doe they now first know it when they are like to bee punished for their impietie? neuer suspecting any of vs to be traytors, so long as they were in no feare. If they say that it was done by common consent of all the people, why then all men were there when the speech was made vnto the people, to exhort them thereunto,and request their good wils, and so the newes thereof would quickly haue come vnto your eares: Or what need had we to send Embassadours, if wee had been now alreadie certaine to come to composition with the Romans? Let them tell you who was appointed for that Embassage. These are but deuices and excuses of them, who feare to haue a death according to their deserts,and a shift to escape punishment.

Peace is better then wars.

Iesus exhorteth the Idumæans,that since they are come,they should oppose themselues against the Zelous.

If fate had so decreed that our citie should be betrayed vnto the enemie,assure your selues that they, who doe thus accuse vs,would haue betrayed it themselues;who haue committed alreadie all sort of impieties,treason only excepted.It is your part, seeing you are come hither in armes, first(as reason & iustice requireth) to assist your mother Citie against them who tyrannize ouer vs,and violate our lawes: who treading downe our lawes make all that iustice, which they can effect with their sword. And first of all they tooke noble men and cast them in prison, drawing them from amidst the publike assemblie; and being neuer accused nor condemned, nothing respecting their intreaties,put them to death. If it please you to come in peaceable and not hostile maner into our citie,your selues shall plainly behold euident tokens of this that I speak vnto you: to wit,houses ruinated and made desolate by their robberies,the wiues and families of them that are slaine in mourning apparell,and howling and crying in euerie part of the Citie: For there is no one amongst vs that hath not tasted the persecution of these wretched men, who are gone so far,that not content to make this citie their refuge(which is the chief, & a spectacle to all others for sanctitie)after they had robbed and spoyled all the country and villages,& cities here about, now lastly they haue made the sacred Temple a refuge and place to carrie all their spoyles,which they haue impiously gotten in this Citie, vnto. This Temple they doe make their bulwarke to issue out, and to retire vnto; and from thence they make incursions vpon the citizens: and this is the place where they practise all their villanies against vs.And this sacred place, which all the world,euen the most barbarous & sauage people thereof do reuerence, is now defiled by the horrible robberies which one born amongst vs committed.And now being in desperation,they reioyce to see nation against nation, and citie against citie, and people against people, and our own countrimen to turn themselues against their owne bowels: when contrariwise, (as I haue already said) it had bin your parts and duties to ioyne with vs, and helpe vs to exterminate these malefactors, and be reuenged of them for this lie,in that they presumed to call you to help them whom they had iust reason to fear as reuengers of their impieties: yet if you make account of these mens praiers,vouchsafe(laying your weapons aside to come into our citie like friends,and bee your selues Iudges betweene vs and them whom you came to helpe. And consider what fauour we shew them,who permit them to plead their owne causes before you, they being guiltie of so hainous crimes, & hauing put to death persons of such account,neuer accused nor permitted to speake for themselues: yet this commoditie we will grant them for your sake. But if you continue in your anger against vs,and refuse this offer to bee our Iudges: then let vs intreat you that leauing both parts,you would neither imbrue your hands in our bloud, nor lend your aide vnto these miscreants against your mother citie. And if you suspect any of vs to bee confederates with the Romans,you may keepe all passages; and then seek to defend your Metropolis, when you haue proofe of any such matter as is alledged against vs; and punish the authors of that treason when you haue conuicted them.The enemies cannot preuent you being already planted so neere the City.If you like of none of these, maruel not that we shut our gates against you,cõming in armed and hostile manner. Iesus spake thus vnto them. But the Idumæans being angrie, were not moued hereby, and so much the more for that entrance into the citie was denied them,

Iesus requireth the Idumæans to iudge the differents betweene the Zealous and them.

A and their generals were exceedingly wroth, thinking it ſlauerie to lay downe their armes, eſpecially at the command of another. The yeare of the world, 4032. after Chriſts birth, 70.

Then one of the captaines named Simon, the ſonne of Cathla, hauing with much adoe gotten his ſouldiers to be ſilent, he ſtood in a place where the prieſts might heare him, and ſaid, That he now did not wonder that thoſe who maintained libertie, were encloſed and beſieged in the Temple, ſeeing that they of the Citie now ſhut their gates againſt his followers, the citie being common and free for all men; and that perhaps they were readie to open the Citie gates for to receiue the Romans. And he ſpake vnto the Idumæans from a tower, and commanded them to caſt down their armes, which they took only for the liberty of the city, when they durſt not truſt their own nation to keep the ſame; yet would haue them iudges of the diſcord: & that accuſing B others for killing ſome not conuicted, they themſelues do condemne all the whole nation of ignominie; and that they had now ſhut the Citie gates againſt their own Countrimen, which was common for all ſtrangers to come vnto for religion ſake. Did we make haſt towards you, to fight againſt our owne nation, which came onely to preſerue your libertie? But this is as true, as that they whom you thus beſiege haue wronged you; and as the accuſation you forge againſt them. And you keeping in hold thoſe that are the defenders of the Commonwealth, do then ſhut the Citie gates againſt men of your owne bloud: laſtly, you impoſe vpon vs contumelious commands, and ſay that they do tyrannize ouer you, ouer whom indeed you do. Who can any longer endure this your mockerie, that perceiueth how vnpoſſible your allegations are? For who can iuſtly accuſe thoſe that yee keep ſhut vp in the Temple, becauſe that they preſumed to puniſh C traytors, whō you grace with the title of noble & innocent, becauſe they were your cōfederats? Onely in this they are blame worthy, that they did not begin with you, but left aliue ſuch members of that conſpiracie. Except alſo you will ſay, that the Idumæans ſhut you out of your Citie, you your ſelues not permitting vs to come & offer ſacrifices. But though they were too merciful yet we Idumæans will conſerue the houſe of God, and will fight for the common good of our Countrey, and will be reuenged both of the enemies that are without the Citie, and the traytors within. And here will we remaine before the Citie, till either the Romans come & deliuer you, or till you change your minds and bethinke your ſelues what a Iewell it is to haue libertie.

Simons anſwer to Ieſus oratiō

The Idumæās are diſpleaſed becauſe the Citie gates were lockt againſt them.

The reproches the Idumæans obiect againſt the high prieſt and Citizens

CHAP. VII.

Of the maſſacre of the Ievves by the Idumæans.

D ALL the whole multitude agreed with a loud crie vnto theſe ſpeeches of Simon. And Ieſus departed ſorrowfull, ſeeing that the Idumæans would agree to no reaſon, & that therby their Citie ſhould ſuffer double warres. For the Idumæans wrath was not yet aſſwaged, who tooke the matter in great diſdaine that they were not permitted to enter into the Citie, and alſo for that they thought the Zelous verie ſtrong, and they themſelues were aſhamed that they could not come to helpe them, ſo that manie repented that they were come thither. Yet would they not for ſhame returne, nothing being done by them: and ſo raſhly placing their Tabernacles neere vnto the Citie walles, they determined to ſtay there. But that E night there fell a moſt huge tempeſt: for there was a great ſtormie wind and an exceeding great raine mixt with fearefull thunder and horrible lightning, and the Earthquake with ſtrange noyſes: whereupon all men thought that this motion of the earth, did ſignifie the death of mankind, and portend ſome great matter. The Idumæans & towneſ-men were both of one minde: for they thought that God was angrie with them, for bearing armes againſt their Metropolis, and perſwaded themſelues that they could not eſcape death if they continued in their purpoſe. Ananus and his followers perſwaded themſelues that they had now ouercome them without warre, and that God had fought for them againſt the Idumæans. But they were falſe Prophets, and what they iudged was to befall their enemies, that fel vpon thēſelues. In the meane while the Idumæans lay as cloſe together as they could, & couered their heads with their ſhieldes, ſo that by this F meanes the raine did them not ſo much harme. The Zelous were penſiue for the Idumæans more then for thēſelues, and deuiſed which way they might ſuccour them. Then the boldeſt amongſt them aduiſed the reſt, by force to oppreſſe the watch men, and ſō to goe into the Citie, and open the gates to the Idumæans that came to helpe them, for it was eaſie to ſurpriſe the watchmen, by reaſon that many of them were vnarmed, and vnfit for warre, and the Citizens could not eaſily be aſſembled together, for euerie man becauſe of this tempeſt kept his houſe. And ſuppoſe that there were danger, yet were it better to endure all miſchiefes that might enſue, then to permit mit ſuch an army ſhamefully to periſh, who came at their requeſt to helpe them. But the wiſer G ſort diſſwaded the reſt from this, ſeeing both a ſtronger watch placed to keepe them in, and the Citie wals diligently guarded becauſe of the Idumæans: and moreouer, perſwading themſelues that Ananus ceaſed not, but went vp and downe, firſt from one watch, and then to another; yet that night hee did not ſo, not for ſlouthfulneſſe, but becauſe that the deſtinies had ſo decreed that thereby both hee and the watchmen ſhould periſh. For about midnight the ſtorm increaſing, the watchmen fell into a ſound ſleepe.

The watchmen are oppreſſed with ſleepe.

Then the Zelous determined to file the barres and bolts of the gates in ſunder; to effect this, they took the inſtruments which were conſecrated to the temple, & this attempt was much furthered by the huge wind and thunder, which made ſuch a noyſe that they could not bee heard:
ſo iſſuing out of the Temple, they went priuily to the walles, and opened that gate neere vnto H which the Idumæans lay; and ſuſpecting that Ananus would make ſome reſiſtance, they firſt of all drew their ſwords, & then together with the Idumæans came in: and if at that time they had aſſaulted the Citie, they had without any let or hinderance deſtroyed all the people therein: ſo great was their rage at that time. But firſt of all they haſtned to aſſiſt their fellowes, whom they left beſieged, and requeſted the Idumæans not to leaue them in danger, for whoſe ſuccour they were come, nor permit them to incurre greater domage: for hauing firſt ſurpriſed the watchmē, it would be more eaſie for them to aſſault the Citie: which if they did not, but firſt ſet vpon the Citizens, they would preſently aſſemble together, and oppoſe themſelues againſt them, and not permit them to aſcend vp vnto the Temple. The Idumæans conſented vnto this, and ſo they I paſſed thorough the Citie into the Temple. And the Zelous remaining in the Temple, carefully expected their comming; at whoſe arriuall they tooke courage, and ioyning with the Idumæans, came out of the inner Temple, and ſet vpon the watch: and ſome being ſlaine who were faſt a-ſleepe, the reſt were awaked by the cries of others, and ſo betooke themſelues to their armes to defend thēſelues, being yet amazed. And at firſt, thinking that they were onely the Zelous that gaue the aſſault, hoped only by their multitude to ſuppreſſe them; but ſeeing others without the Temple alſo aſſailing them, they perceiued the Idumæans were broken in: ſo the greater part of them being diſmaide, laide downe their weapons and cried; and onely a few of them young men well armed, and of good courage encountred with the Idumæans, and for a good ſpace defended their idle fellowes: others went and aduertiſed the Inhabitants what was done, yet none K

durſt come to helpe them, becauſe they now knewe that the Idumæans were got in, but euerie one lamented their hard fortune: and the women made great lamentation, when any of the watchmem fell into danger. The Zelous alſo anſwered their cries with the like, and then the tempeſt and thunder made all more dreadfull. The Idumæans ſpared none, becauſe that they were naturally cruell and fierce to ſhed bloud: and angrie that they were ſo beaten with the tempeſt, they vſed them moſt cruelly, by whoſe meanes they were ſhut out of the Citie, ſparing neither thoſe who requeſted fauour, nor them who made reſiſtance, for they ſlew many euen as they were intreating them to remember that they were of their owne bloud, and requeſting them to ſpare them for reuerence of their Temple. There was no way to fly, nor any hope of eſcape: be- L ing driuen vp into a narrow roome, they hurt themſelues more then the enemies did, by crowding & treading vpon one another, for there was no place to flie, nor their enemies ceaſed not to kill them. Being in this deſperate eſtate; not knowing how to doe, they caſt themſelues headlong downe into the Citie, and ſo died a more miſerable death (in my mind) then they that died by the enemies ſword. The next day there was found ſlaine eight thouſand and fiue hundreth, and all the vtter Temple flowed with bloud. Yet this maſſacre ſufficed not the Idumæans rage, but turning themſelues againſt the Citie, they robbed and ſpoyled all houſes, and killed all they met, making no account of the death of the reſt of the multitude. They made diligent ſearch for the Prieſts, and many laide violent hands vpon them, and killed them: and ſtanding vpon M their dead corpſes, ſomtime they vpbrayded Ananus with the peoples fauour towards him, ſom-time Ieſus with the words he ſpake vpon the wall vnto them, & were ſo impious as that they caſt

that after ſunne ſet they take downe the dead bodies of malefactors, who by ſentence haue bin adiudged vnto the croſſe, and burie them.

The praiſe of Ananus the hie prieſt.

I thinke I doe not greatly miſſe the mark, if I affirme Ananus his death to haue beene the deſtruction of the Citie, and from that time foorth the walles of Ieruſalem to haue beene ouer-throwne, and the common wealth of the Iewes to haue periſhed in that day when they behelde their prieſt and Gouernour ſlaine, euen in the middeſt of the Citie. He was a man that led a lau-

A dable and moſt iuſt life: and being in great dignity, honour, and reputation; yet would hee not exalt himſelf aboue any one, were he neuer ſo baſe. He was a man who thirſted after liberty, and bare the rule and gouernment of the common-wealth. Hee continually preferred the publike commodity before his owne priuat gaine, being alwaies deſirous of peace; for he foreſaw that the Romans could not be withſtood; and that, if the Iewes did not quickly accord with them, their ruine was at hand: briefly I ſay, that had Ananus liued, they had yeelded with him vnto the Romans. For he was an eloquent Orator and could perſwade admirably: whereby he had now gained vnto his ſide thoſe that hindred him, and cauſed the wars; whom if they had had for their captaine againſt the Romans, it had not beene ſo eaſie for the Romanes to haue conquered them. With him was ioyned Ieſus inferiour to Ananus, yet excelling all the reſt. So that I thinke
B Almighty God hauing decreed the totall ruine of the Citie, being now violated and filled with iniquity, and meaning by fire as it were to purifie the holy temple which was now defiled and prophaned, hee firſt tooke away the defenders thereof, and thoſe that loued them moſt dearely. So they who a little before were clothed in ſacred apparell, and reuerenced of all thoſe that from the furtheſt parts of the world came to Ieruſalem, now lay murthered and naked in the open ſtreets, left as it were a prey to bee torne in peeces with dogges or wilde beaſts, who earſt were the authors of pietie and religion. I thinke that Vertue it ſelfe wept to ſee wickedneſſe ſo preuaile.

CHAP. I.

Of another massacre, and of the returne of the Idumæans, and the cruelties of the Zelous.

The cruelty of the Idumæans & the Zelous.

SVch was the end of Ananus and Iesus. After whose death the Idumæans and the Zelous massacred the people, as though they had beene a flocke of pernicious beasts, and euerie one was slaine whereſoeuer hee was found: and taking the nobilitie and younger sort of men, they kept them bound in prison, hoping that by deferring their deaths, some of them would become partakers with them. Yet none was thereby mooued, but euerie one desired H to die rather then impiously to conspire against their owne countrey: yet were they most cruelly whipped before they were put to death, their whole bodie being all as it were one sore place by whipping & stripes: and so when they could not indure these torments any longer, then were they killed. And whoso was taken on the day time was in the night carried to prison, and those that died in prison and torments, they then cast their dead bodies out, that they might haue place to imprison others in their roome. And the people were so terrified, that none durst weepe openly for his friend, nor burie the dead body of his kinsman; yea those that were in prison durst not openly weepe, but secretly, looking about them, least any of their enemies should espie them. For whosoeuer mourned for any that was afflicted, was presently I himselfe vsed in the same manner as he had been for whom he lamented; & somtime some in the night scraped vp a little earth with their hands, and therwithall couered the dead body of their friend; and some bolder then the rest, did the like in the day time. And in this generall slaughter were twelue thousand young noble men slaine by this meanes: and thus being hated for these massacres, they mocked and flouted the migistrates, and made no account of their iudgements. So that when they determined to put one Zacharie the sonne of Baruch to death, a noble man and one of the chiefe of the citie (for they perceiued that hee was an enemie to their wickednes, and loued the vertuous, and one that was rich, by whose death they hoped not onely to haue the spoyle of his goods, but also to be rid of such a one who might be able to resist their bad purposes) they called seuentie of the best amongst the common people together as it were in iudgmẽt, K yet they hauing no authoritie; and before them they accused Zacharie that hee had betrayed the common wealth vnto the Romans, and that for that intent he had sent vnto Vespasian: but neither shewed any euidence nor proofe thereof, but onely they affirmed it to be so; and therefore would haue credit giuen vnto their words. When Zacharie perceiued that vnder pretence of being called vnto iudgement, hee was deceitfully brought into prison; and hauing no hope of life, yet he spared not to speake liberally his minde: but began to scorne the rage and pretence of his enemies, and purged himselfe of the crimes whereof he was accused; and conuerting his speech against his accusers, hee laid open all their iniquities, and much lamented the miseries and troubles of the Citie.

Twelue thousand of the nobilitie executed.

Zacharie condemned to death by the Zelous.

L In the meane while the Zelous gnashed their teeth, and could scarcely containe themselues from drawing their swords, and were desirous that their pretended accusation and iudgement might be ended. Hee also requested them, who by these miscreants were appointed his iudges, to remember iustice, notwithstandiug those dangerous times. The seuentie iudges all pronounced that hee was to be absolued and freed as vnguiltie; and rather chose to die, then to cause his death who was innocent. This sentence being pronounced, the Zelous began to shoute and crie with a loud voice, & they all were angrie at the iudges, who did not vnderstand to what end that counterfeit authoritie was giuen them. Then two of the boldest amongst them sette vpon Zacharie, and killed him in the middest of the temple, & mocked him, saying; Thou hast now our M sentence and absolution, farre more certaine then the other was, and presently they cast him downe from the temple into the valley vnderneath: and then contumeliously with the hilts of their swords they did beat the Iudges out of the temple; yet they did not kill them, to the end that being dispersed through the whole city, they might tell the people as messengers frõ them, of their miserable captiuity. The Idumæans were now sorrowfull for their comming: for they mislikt these proceedings: who being assembled together, one of the Zelous secretly told them all that their faction had done from their beginning; and that the Idumæans had taken armes, because they were enformed, how that the Metropolitan citie was by the priests betraied vnto the Romans; but as they might perceiue there was no proofe nor signe of anie such matter: and that in

A in deed the Zelous who pretended themselues conseruers of the citie, were meer enemies; and exercised tyranny ouer the citizens euen from their beginning. And though they had associated themselues with such wicked persons, and made themselues partakers of such & so many murthers, yet thought now to cease from such wickednes, and not assist men so impious to destroy their country lawes & religion. For although they took it in bad part that the citie gates were shut vpon them; yet now they were sufficiently reuenged of those that were the cause thereof. Now was Ananus himself slain, and almost all the people in one night: whereof many of them ere long would repent, and that they might now themselues perceiue the cruelty of them, who requested their aid, to be more then barbarous: so that they blusht not to commit their villanies openly in the sight of them who had saued their liues; and their misdemeanour and impiety would be im-
B puted vnto the Idumæans, because they neither hindered their mischieuous practices, nor forsook their society. And that therefore it was their parts (seeing that it was now euident that the report of treason was only calumniation, & that no assault by the Romans was to be feared; likewise that an inuincible force was established against the citie) for to depart home, and by forsaking the society of the impious acquite themselues of their impietie, as being by them deceiued, and so against their wils made partakers therof. The Idumæans were hereby perswaded, and first of all they loosed them that were in prison, in number 2000. of the vulgar, and presently leauing the citie, they went vnto Simon; of whom we will speake hereafter, and so they departed home.

The Idumæans depart out of Ierusalem.

Their departure was against the expectation of both parts: for the people, not knowing that I the Idumæans were penitent for that they had done, reioyced as now deliuered from their ene-
C mies: and the Zelous grew more insolent and proud, as though they neuer had needed helpe; but now were deliuered from them, in reuerence of whom they abstained from villany. So now they vsed no delay to effect their impiety: for they spent not much time in taking aduice; but whatsoeuer seemed best vnto them, presently without any delay they put it in practice. But chiefly they murthered those men that were strong and valiant: for they enuied the nobility for their vertue: And they thought it a principall point first to be effected, not to leaue any one man of account aliue. Wherefore they slew amongst the rest Gorion, a noble man of great birth and dignity, one who loued the people, and was very bountifull and a louer of liberty: so that there was none amongst the Iewes like him, who for desire of liberty and his other vertues was put to death. But neither could Niger Peraita escape their hands, a man who in warres against the Ro-D mans had shewed himselfe valiant: who although he often cried out and shewed the scars of his wounds receiued in defence of his country; yet they ceased not for all this most shamefully to draggè him through the citie: and being led out of the citie, despairing of life, he entreated that he might be buried. But the barbarous people denying his request slew him. Who at his death besought God that the Romans might come and reuenge it vpon them, and that plague and famine and ciuill discord might light vpon their citie. Whose prayers God heard, sending all vpon them which he did iustly require, and first of all they were plagued with ciuill warres among themselues. Niger being thus slaine; they were freed from the feare that they had of him, how that hee would resist their wickednes. There was no part of the common people, who were not by some forged tale or other put to death. For some were slaine; for that long since they had
E borne armes against their owne citizens; and they who were innocent in all points were put to death, for some occasion deuised in the time of peace: and they who did not conuerse with them were murthered, as such that contemned them: and they that freely and friendly conuersed with them were slaine, as men that sought to betray them: and the greatest offenders, and the least offenders were all punished alike, to wit, with death: for no man escaped except he was either poor or of very base condition.

The ciuill discord amongst the Iewes.

F

IN the meane while the Romans addressed all their courage against the Citie of Ierusalem; and seeing them at great variance among themselues, thought this to be for their great aduantage. Vpon this they incited Vespasian their Generall, affirming that it was Gods prouidence (who fought for them) that the Iewes should be at ciuill wars among themselues, and that therefore hee should not ouerslip so good an opportunity: for the Iewes would quickly be friends again one with another, either by the wearinesse of ciuill war, or else repenting themthemſelues of that which they had done. To whom Veſpaſian anſwered, that they were ignorant G what was to be done,being rather deſirous as it were in a theater to ſhew their forces & ſtrength, then with him to conſider what was profitable and expedient. For (ſaid he) if we preſently aſſault them,our comming will make concord amongſt our enemies, and ſo wee ſhall bring vpon our ſelues their forces yet firme and ſtrong: but by expecting a little while they ſhould haue leſs adooe to conquer them,their chiefeſt forces being deſtroied by their owne ciuil wars;And that God was more their friend then they were aware of, who without their labour & paine deliuered the Iewes into their hands, and will giue vs the victorie without indaungering of our army:

Veſpaſian expecteth victory by the ciuill diſſenſion of his enemies.

» And that therefore it was rather their parts to bee as it were beholders of that tragedie, then to » fight againſt men deſirous of death,and troubled with the greateſt euill that poſſible could be,to » wit,domeſticall ſedition,and ciuill wars. And if anie thinke that the victorie is not famous being H » gotten without fight,let him know & conſider the vncertain euents of wars:and that it is better,
» if it be poſſible,to get a victory without bloudſhed,then therwith to hazard the victory.For they

» his ſouldiers might take reſt, & ſo be ſtronger & better able to fight when need ſhould require.
» Beſide that, it ſeemed not that there was ſo much haſte required to get the victorie: for the Iews » neither prepared armes or engines of warre,nor leuied any forces,nor ſought for aide, and ſo by » rie was not to be imputed to vs,but to their diſcord.

Many citizens to flie the Zealous reſorted to Veſpaſian.

The captaines all conſented, and thought this aduice of Veſpaſians beſt: And preſently it appeared how profitable his counſell was. For euerie day many fled vnto him to eſcape the hands of the Zealous:yet it was hard & dãgerous to fly,becauſe all the waies were garded with watchmen. And if anie man vpon any occaſion whatſoeuer were taken vpon the way, hee was preſently killed,as one who intended to haue fled vnto the Romans:yet he that fee'd the watchmen with money, eſcaped away ſafely; and hee that did not, was counted as a traytor: ſo that onely K rich men could eſcape,& the poore were left to the ſlaughter. The multitude of dead bodies that lay on heapes together was innumerable,& many of them who had fled vnto the Romans,returned againe into the citie,chuſing rather to die there:for the hope they had to bee buried in their natiue ſoile,made death there ſeeme more tolerable.But they became ſo cruell,that they neither permitted them who were ſlaine within,nor them without the citie, to bee buried. But like men that had now determined together, with their countrey lawes, to aboliſh the law of nature,yea and by their impietie to pollute the ſacred diuinity with iniuſtice, let the dead bodies rot aboue the ground: and whoſoeuer attempted to burie anie one of them that were ſlaine, whether hee were friend or kinſman, were preſently put to death, and left vnburied,as men forſaking their L citie,& flying to the enemie. To be breefe,nothing ſo much increaſed their calamitie as mercie: for the wicked people were herewith, as it were prouoked to wrath,whoſe diſpleaſure and crueltie was extended from the liuing vnto the dead,& frõ the dead vnto the liuing. And ſuch feare fell vpon the whole citie,that thoſe that were left aliue, deemed them happie, that being dead, were at reſt,and free from thoſe miſeries:and they that were in priſon,in reſpect of the torments they endured, thought themſelues vnhappier then they who lay vnburied. All humane iuſtice was by them peruerted, and they ſcorned and mocked at all diuine and holy things,and proudly derided the oracles of the prophets, eſteeming them as fables and ieſts. But hauing now contemned all lawes eſtabliſhed by their forefathers for the puniſhment of vice,& increaſing of ver- M tue,at laſt they found that true which by them was foretold,concerning the deſtruction of themſelues and their countrey. For there was an old prophecy, that when ſedition raigned amongſt them, and their owne hands had firſt violated the temple of God and holy things; that then » their citie ſhould be deſtroyed by warre,& their holy places ſhould bee burned with fire,accor» dinge to the vſe and cuſtome of warre. And the Zealous giuing credit vnto this prophecie made » themſelues the miniſters of this action.

How Gadara was yeelded: and of the massacre there.

BVt Iohn, who long agoe desired to bee in chiefe authority, as tyrant ouer all the rest, thought it not sufficient to bee in as great reputation as his fellowes; wherefore by little and little ioyning vnto himselfe the most impious of all the Zealous, he diuided himselfe from their vnion and fellowship: So that now euery one perceiued (in that hee alwaies neglected what others commanded, and imperiously commanded what himselfe B thought good) that he affected principality; and many ioyned to him for feare, some for fauour (for hee had a smooth tongue, able to perswade them vnto what he would) many also followed him; thinking it better that all the impiety before committed were laid to one mans charge in particular, then vnto all men in generall. Moreouer; being a valiant man of his hands, and one able to giue politike counsell, he wanted not followers, notwithstanding that many of the contrary faction left him, enuying that hee, who before was their equall, should now be their Lord and commander. Feare also terrified them from liuing vnder the gouernment of one man; for they thought that if he once preuailed, he could not easily be ouercome: and againe, if he were deposed, that he would pick quarrels against them in the end, because that they resisted him in the beginning. So euery man determined rather to suffer all misery in war, then to submit him- C selfe, and perish like a slaue. Thus the sedition was diuided, and Iohn was chiefe of the faction against the Zealous: so between them they appointed garrisons in euery place; and if by chance they combated together, they did little or nothing hurt one another, but their chief contention was who should beare most sway amongst the people: and they did striue on both parts who should haue the greatest part of the spoile. Thus the citie at one time was vexed with three intolerable mischiefes and euils, to wit, warre, tyranny, and sedition: and yet warre seemed a lesse euill then the rest vnto the communalty. In brief; many leauing their natiue soile, fled vnto strangers for succor, and found among the Romans safety, who with their owne nation liued in continuall danger. There was also then begunne the fourth euill, which wrought the ruine of the whole nation. Not far from the Citie there was a Castle called Massada, builded by the ancient D Kings of Ierusalem, very strong to lay their treasure in, and their munition for war, and to retire themselues thereunto in time of need, for the safety of their persons. This Castle was taken and kept by that sort of theeues that were called Sicarij, who for feare durst robbe no more. These theeues seeing the Roman army now idle, and the Iewes in Ierusalem at ciuill wars & sedition among themselues, they took courage, and again fell to their villanies. And so on that day which is the feast of vnleauened bread (which the Iewes do keep holy, in memory of their deliuerance out of the Egyptian captiuity) deceiuing the watchmen, they seised vpon a Fort, called Engaddi: and before the towne-men could arme and vnite themselues together, they were by these persons driuen out of the towne, who also killed them that could not flie, to wit, women & children, to the number of more then seuen hundreth; and so sacking the houses, & taking the fruits E that were now ripe, they carried all vnto Massada: and so they wasted all the villages and whole countrey round about them, many wicked persons daily flocking vnto them and ioyning with them: and by their example other theeues that a while had been quiet, now robbed againe, and spoiled in euery part of Iudæa. And as in a body, if the principall member thereof be sicke, all other parts of it are afflicted: so Ierusalem being filled with tumults and discord, those that were without the Citie found licence to rob & spoile: and all they that had their towns destroied where they were wont to inhabit, went into the wildernes. Then they assembling and vniting themselues together, not so many as an army, yet more then a company of theeues, they brake into the townes & temples; and as in warre it commeth to passe, they purposed to assault them, by whom they had suffered such iniury: but they were preuented; for the theeues vnder- F standing of their comming, fled with the spoile they had gotten. And there was no part of Iudæa that did not perish together with Ierusalem their mother citie. Those that fled vnto the Romans certified Vespasian hereof: for although the seditious persons did keep and obserue all passages, and kill them that offered to flie, yet many secretly stole away from them, and besought Vespasian both to helpe the oppressed citie, and to take compassion vpon the reliques of their nation: affirming that many had been butchered for wishing well to the Romanes, and many being yet aliue, were yet in great danger. And Vespasian moued to compassionate their calamities came with his army neerer Ieruſalem, as though he would haue beſieged it: but indeed his intent G was to deliuer it from the ſiege, hoping in the meane time to conquer that part of the countrey that was yet vntoucht, and ſo to leaue nothing to hinder him when hee ſhould begin the ſiege.

Wherefore comming vnto Gadara, the ſtrongeſt place and mother Citie of all the countrey beyond the riuer, he entred into it the fourth day of March: for the chiefeſt of the citie, vnknown vnto the ſeditious people, had ſent Embaſſadors vnto him, partly deſiring peace, partly to ſaue their goods and liues, and promiſed him to yeeld the towne into his hands: for there were many rich men dwelling in Gadara: and their enemies knew not of their Embaſſage, til they ſaw Veſpa- ſian at the citie gates. And ſo deſpairing that they were able to keep the citie, by reaſon they had in the towne many enemies, more in number and ſtronger then themſelues; and moreouer, ſeeing Veſpaſian euen now almoſt at the citie: and thinking it a ſhame to fly and not be reuenged of their H enemies; they tooke Doleſus (who was both a noble man and chiefe of the citie, and alſo the author of that Embaſſage) and killed him, and for anger beating him after he was dead, they fled out of the citie. Now the Romans army approching neere vnto the citie, the people of Gadara went forth and receiued Veſpaſian ioyfully; who alſo confirmed a league betwixt them and him, and left them a company of horſe and footmen to defend them againſt the incurſions of the fugitiues their enemies: for they themſelues before the Romans requeſted it deſtroyed the citie walls, that ſo they might ſhew themſelues to deſire peace, in that deſtroying their walls if after they deſired to rebell they could not.

The Gadarenſians entertain Veſpaſian with ioy and acclamations.

Veſpaſian then ſent Placidus with fiue hundreth horſmen, and three thouſand footmen to pur-ſue thoſe, that were fled out of Gadara, and hee with the reſt of his army returned to Cæſarea. I
But the fugitiues perceiuing themſelues to bee purſued by Placidus, before hee could ouertake them, got into a towne called Bethenabris: and finding there many young men, partly for that they were willing, partly by force they compelled them to arme themſelues, and ſo raſhly they came againſt Placidus. Placidus and his army ſeemed a little to giue backe, to the intent to drawe them further from the wall: and then hauing compaſſed them about in a fit place, they wounded them afarre off with darts and arrowes. Then the Iewes ſeeking to flie, were preuented by the horſemen: and they who offered to fight, were by the Roman footmen all put to the ſword, neuer ſhewing any ſigne of valour. For the Iewes aſſaulting the Romanes being all inuironed and quite couered with their ſhields as with a wall, and not being able to break into their battel, they were ſlain by the Romans darts: but their darts could do the Romans no harm, and ſo like fierce K and ſauage beaſts they wilfully ran vpon their enemies ſwords, and ſo were ſlain, ſome hauing all their face cut with ſwords, ſome killed by the horſmen. For Placidus was carefull to intercept their paſſage vnto the towne, and to hinder their recourſe vnto it, and brought thoſe back again that fled towards it, vſing his darts, and killing thoſe that were next him; and thoſe who fled afar off for feare, he cauſed to returne; till at laſt the ſtrongeſt amongſt them brake away, and got vnto the towne wals: And thoſe that were within the citie knew not what to doe, for they would not ſhut the fugitiues of Gadara out of the citie, becauſe they deſired to let their owne citizens in; and againe they perceiued that if they let them in, they thereby ſhould work the ouerthrow of the citie, as it fell out indeed they did. For the gates being ſet open for them to come in, the Roman horſemen almoſt brake into the towne with them, yet the gates were ſhut before they L could get in. Then Placidus with all his ſouldiers aſſaulted the towne, and fighting a ſore fight which continued euen vntill the Euening, at laſt he got the wals, and the town, and ſlew the weaker ſort: for the ſtronger fled: ſo the ſoldiers ſacked the houſes and then fired the towne. They who eſcaped thence incited the whole country to fly with them, reporting their calamities with the moſt, and affirming that all the Roman army was at hand: and ſo they put all the inhabitants there in great fear; and hauing aſſembled a great multitude, they fled vnto Iericho, which place they put their confidence in, for that it was ſtrong and populous. Placidus hauing horſemen, and being incouraged with his former victory purſued them vnto Iordan, and whomſoeuer he o-uertooke he ſlew, and at the riuer he fought with all the multitude there gathered together; and ſtaying, becauſe that the riuer being waxed deeper by abundance of raine, that had lately fallen, M they could not paſſe ouer it.

Wherefore neceſſity forced them to fight becauſe they could not fly: and placing themſelues along the banks of the riuer, they there receiued the horſemen, and warded their darts; yet many for feare fell into the riuer; ſo the Romanes ſlew there thirteene thouſand, and the reſt not able to reſiſt, caſt themſelues into the riuer; which were an infinite number: alſo the Romanes tooke two thouſand and two hundreth men aliue, and a huge bootie of Sheep, Aſſes, Camels,
and

A and oxen. This maſſacre though it was no greater then the former, yet it ſeemed to the Iewes farre greater, becauſe that many all ouer the countrie flying were killed, and Iordan was ſo filled with dead carcaſſes, that none could paſſe ouer it: and alſo the lake Aſphaltites was full of dead bodies, brought thither out of diuers riuers. Placidus hauing ſo good ſucceſſe, went into the townes and villages adioyning, and took Abila, Iulias, Beſemoth, and all the townes euen vnto the lake Aſphaltites, and placed in them garriſons of them that fled vnto him: and afterward preparing ſhips and furniſhing them with ſouldiers, hee purſued them that were fled by water, and ouercame them: and ſo all the countrey beyond Iordan yeelded vnto the Romans, and euen vnto Machæron all places were by them conquered.

CHAP. IIII.

How certaine townes were taken, and the deſcription of Iericho.

AT this time came newes of the troubles in Gallia, and how that Vindex together with the nobility of that countrey had reuolted from Nero, whereof we haue made mention in another place. This newes cauſed Veſpaſian to be more earneſt to end the wars of the Iewes: for euen then he foreſaw the ciuill wars that enſued, and the danger of the whole Empire: and he thought that if he could before the beginning of thoſe troubles end the warres in the Eaſt part of the world, that then Italy was not in ſo much danger. But winter hindring him, he in the meane time placed garriſons in all townes and villages about the whole countrey, and placed decurions in euery citie, and repaired many places which hee had before deſtroyed. And firſt of all he with his whole army that was at Cæſarea, went to Antipatris; and there hauing ſettled the eſtate of that citie, after his abode there two daies, the third day he departed, ſpoiling and burning all the countrie: as alſo all the countrey about Thamnia the Toparchy, and ſo went into Lydda and Iamnia. But ſeeing that thoſe two places ſubmitted themſelues vnto him, leauing there ſuch inhabitants as he thought good, hee went thence vnto Ammaus, and placing himſelfe in the way to their Metropolitane Citie he there entrenched his army, and then leauing the fift legion there, he with the reſt went into the Toparchy of Bethlepton, firing it and all places thereabout; as alſo the borders of Idumæa: but he reſerued there certaine Caſtles in fit places, and fortified them. And hauing taken two townes in the midſt of Idumæa, to wit, Begabri and Caphartopha, he ſlew there aboue ten thouſand men, and took almoſt a thouſand, and driuing out the reſt of the inhabitants, he left a great part of his army there, who made incurſions and waſted all the high places thereabout: and hee with the reſt returned to Iamnia; and from thence by Samaria and Neapolis, called by the inhabitants Mabortha, the ſecond day of Iune he came into Corea: and pitching his tents there, the next day he came to Iericho, where one of his captaines named Traian met him with the ſouldiers he brought from beyond Iordan, which place he had conquered. But the multitude, before the Romans came, fled from Iericho into the the high countrey ouer againſt Ieruſalem, and many that ſtaied behinde were there ſlain. So he found the citie deſolate, being ſituate in a Plaine vnder a great mountain that is barren, which is of a huge length: for it reacheth on the Northſide vnto the borders of Scythopolis, and on the South vnto the borders of Sodome and the lake of Aſphaltites. It is all rockie and not inhabited, becauſe it beareth no fruit. Ouer againſt this neere Iordan is ſituate a huge mountaine, beginning on the North ſide at Iulias, and reaching vnto Bacra on the South, which is the limits of Petra a citie of Arabia. In this place is that that is called the mountaine of Iron, reaching vnto the countrey of the Moabites.

The countrey between theſe two mountaines is called the great field, reaching from the village Gennabara vnto the lake Aſphaltites, being in length two hundreth and thirty furlongs, and in breadth a hundreth and twenty, and in the midſt it is diuided by the riuer Iordan. There are alſo two lakes of contrary natures, Aſphaltites and Tiberias; for one of them is ſalt and barren, but that of Tiberias ſweet and fertill. This Plaine in ſommer time is burned with the heat of the ſun, and the aire is infected in all places thereabouts, ſaue only about thoſe which adioine to Iordan: and this is the cauſe that the palme trees that grow about the riuer ſide do flouriſh moſt, and are more fertill then the reſt. Neere vnto Iericho there is a large great fountaine, which plentifully watereth the fields thereabout, and runneth with a great ſtream out of the ground neer vnto the old citie: which Ioſue the ſonne of Nun generall of the Hebrewes took by warre, the firſt of all that he took in the land of Canaan. It is reported that in the beginning the waters of this fountain did destroy all fruits of the earth, and also made women be deliuered before their time, G and to infect all places with diseases, and the plague; and afterward by Helizæus the successor of Helias was made sweet and fertill. Who, being once courteously entertained by the inhabitants of Iericho, did so reward them and all the countrey for that their kindnes: and going vnto the fountaine he cast a pitcher full of salt into the water, and hard by lifting vp his hands to heauen, and tempering with the fountain water certain sweet waters, he prayed God to qualifie the rage thereof, to make it flow with more sweet streames: and besought God to giue a better aire vnto the fountain, which both might cause plenty of fruits and also of children vnto the inhabitants: and that the water might haue the vertue to make women fertill, so long as they persist in piety. After these praiers, with his hands he altred the fountaine according to the knowledge hee had: and from that time this fountaine which before was the cause of famine and sterility, was now H the cause of plenty & fertility. And so it watereth the ground, that where a little of it commeth, it doth more good then all the other waters which lie long vpon it: and so they that water their grounds but a little with it receiue much fruits; and they that water their grounds with it much, do not receiue them in that measure: yet it watereth a greater compasse of ground then other fountaines: and in length it runneth through a Plaine seuenty furlongs long, and twenty broad. There are most pleasant & goodly Orchards, and many sorts of palme trees growing by brooks sides, which are diuers in the taste of their fruits; the fattest whereof being pressed, doe yeeld a iuice like hony, nothing inferiour to other hony; yet there is great store of hony in that countrey, and the iuice of balme, which is more precious then all fruits growing. There grow also Cypres trees and myrobalans: so that one may iustly call that part of the earth diuine, where I what fruit soeuer is most deare and precious is in most abundance. Also in all other fruits it surpasseth all countries in the world: for it multiplieth and increaseth all things sooner there. The cause hereof I iudge to be the pleasant waters and warme nourishing aire, which as it were inuiteth all things to spring vp, and then encreaseth them: and the moisture causeth all things to take firme root, and also defendeth them from drought in sommer time, when that country is vexed with such intolerable heats, that all things are as it were scorched, so that nothing then wil grow; yet if they be watered with water drawen before Sun rise, by the blowing of a milde and temperate winde they are refreshed, and it receiues a contrary nature: in winter time it is as it were lukewarme and temperate to them that goe into it. The ayre of that place is so temperate, that when it snoweth in other parts of Iudæa, and is extreame cold, the inhabitants in this place doe K only weare a linnen garment. This countrey is distant from Ierusalem a hundreth and fifty furlongs, and threescore from Iordan, and all the ground betwixt it and Ierusalem is desert & stony, and so likewise between it and Iordan and Asphaltites, though it be lower ground then the other. Thus we haue sufficiently declared the fertility of Iericho.

The description of the lake Asphaltites.

IT is worth the labour to describe the lake Asphaltites, which is salt & sterile; yet what- L euer is cast into it how weighty soeuer it bee, it swimmeth aboue the water: so that one though he would vpon purpose cannot scarcely sinke vnto the bottome. Vespasian comming thither to see it, caused some to be taken who could not swim, & their hands to be bound behind them, and cast into the midst therof, and all of them did swim aloft, being as it were borne vp by the power of some spirit. Moreouer it is admirable, how this lake thrice in euery day changeth colour, and shineth diuersly, according as the beames of the Sun do sundry waies fall vpon it. And in many places it casteth vp peeces of black bitumen, in greatnesse and shape like a bull without a head, and these float aboue the water. They that get their liuing vpon this water, finding this bitumen that is thus gathered together, draw it to their boats, and it is so tough and clammy, that hauing filled their boates heerewith, it is not easie for them to get M them away, but their boat is as it were fastned: so it hangeth vpon the rest of that masse of bituminous matter, till it be separated from it by the termes or vrine of a woman. This bituminous matter is good for to close the rifts of shipps, and also to cure many diseases. This lake is fiue hundreth and eighty furlongs long, beeing extended vnto Zoar which is in Arabia, and it is a hundreth and fifty furlongs broad. Neere vnto this lake is the land of Sodome and Gomorrah, sometime both fertill and rich: now all burnt, being (as it is reported) for the impiety of the inha-

And so the report of the land of Sodome is knowen to be true to them that behold it. The yeare of the world, 4032. after Christs birth, 70. Tertul. in Apologet. ca 39

How Gerasa was destroyed: of Neroes death, and of Galba and Otho.

B VEspasian desirous to besiege Ierusalem on euery side, builded castles at Ierico and Adida, and left there both the soldiers that came to assist him, and also Romans with them. And he sent L. Annius to Gerasa, giuing him many footmen, and part of his horsemen; who at the first assault tooke the citie, and slew a thousand yong men, who thought to haue fled, & led whole families captiue, giuing the soldiers the spoil of their goods: and so firing their houses, he went to other places adioining. They who were able fled, and the weaker sort who could not fly were slaine; and whatsoeuer came in their way they consumed it with fire. Thus all places both mountains and plaines being wasted and oppressed with warres, the inhabitants liuing at Ierusalem had not whither to goe, when they desired to fly from the C Zealous by whom they were kept in. And they who were against the Romans, were kept in themselues, the citie being on euery side inclosed and compassed with the army. L. Annius taketh Gerasa.

After that Vespasian was returned vnto Cæsarea, and with all his army purposing to goe to Ierusalem, newes was brought him that Nero was slaine, hauing reigned thirteen yeares and eight daies. Touching whom I will not recount how hee did dishonour the Empire, committing the whole sway of all the common-wealth vnto two most wicked men, to wit Nymphidius and Tigillinus, and of least worth amongst all the Libertines: and how he being taken by the treachery of these two men, was forsaken of all his Senators; and so fled onely with foure trusty Libertines into the suburbs, and there killed himselfe: and how that long time after, they that deposed him were punished for that offence: and how the wars ended in Gallia; and that Galba being created D Emperour, returned to Rome out of Spaine: and how he was accused by the souldiers, and by them killed in the market place, as one of base condition: and how Otho was declared Emperor, and led his souldiers against Vitellius his army: also Vitellius his broyles and his fight before the Capitoll: and how Antonius Primus, and Mutianus slew Vitellius, and so appeased the Germane troupes and ciuill warres: Of all these I haue refused to speake, because I hope that both the Greeks and Romans haue written these things at large, yet I haue briefely recapitulated all to continue my History. Vespasian hath tidings of Neroes death. Galba. Otho. Vitellius.

After Vespasian heard these newes of Nero, he deferred the siege of Ierusalem, expecting who should be created Emperour after him. And when he was certified that Galba raigned, he determined to doe nothing; but lie quiet till such time as he should write vnto him his minde, whe- E ther he would haue him proceed in those warres against the Iewes. And hee sent vnto him his sonne Titus both to salute him, and also to know his pleasure concerning the Iewes. Likewise King Agrippa went with Titus for the same cause vnto Galba. But as they were passing by Achaia with long ships in winter time, as the custom is, newes was brought that Galba was slaine, hauing raigned seuen moneths and seuen daies. After whom succeeded Otho, who gouerned the Empire three moneths. Agrippa not terrified with this alteration, still kept on his iourney to Rome. But Titus (as God would haue it) returnd from Achaia vnto Syria, and so to Cæsarea vnto his father. They both were as it were in suspence what would ensue, and who should bee Emperour, the Empire being so full of troubles: and so they neglected the wars against the Iewes, fearing their owne country, and therefore thinking it an vnfit time to assault strangers. Vespasian deferreth his siege at Ierusalem. Galba is slain, and Otho gouerneth.

CHAP. VII.

Of Simon of Gerasa, author of a new conspiracie.

FOr all this the war at Ierusalem was increased. For there was one Simon the son of Giora borne in Gerasa, young in yeares, and inferiour to Iohn, who now already had gotten the dominion ouer the citie; yet was he in strength & boldnes more excellent then Iohn. This Simon being for this cause also driuen out of the countrey of Acrabatena, where hee was gouernor by the means of Ananus the high Priest, he came to the theeues that seised vpon Massada. This Simon, at his first comming, was so suspected to the theeues, that they onely permitted him and the women that came with him to dwell in the lower part of the castle, and they themselues kept the higher part: yet afterwards his maners & behauior were such, that they put confidence in him: for he was their captaine alwaies when they went to spoile and rob any part of the country about Massada. So he feared not to perswade them to attempt greater matters: for being desirous of rule, after he heard that Ananus was dead, hee departed into the high places of the countrey, and with the voyce of a cryer promised and proclaimed, that all bondslaues that would follow him should haue their liberty, and all other should be richly rewarded; and so he gathered together all the wicked and desperate people in the countrie. And hauing now a large army, hee robbed and spoyled all the townes and villages thereabout; and his number daily encreasing, he also now presumed to come into the plain countries: so that now cities stood in awe of him, and many Potentates now feared him for his strength and prosperous successe. And his army did not only consist in theeues and slaues, but now many people of the countrie came vnto him, reuerencing him as their Prince and King. So they made excursions into the Toparchie of Acrabatena, and into the greater Idumæa. For hee had fortified a towne called Nain walled about, which he vsed for his defence like a castle. And in the valley called Pharan he made many caues, and found many already made, and in these caues he kept his treasure, and the booties he got: also all fruits of the earth that he robbed and stole, there he laid vp in store; as also munition for diuers companies. And now no man doubted, but that being thus furnished with men and munition, he would go to Ierusalem. The Zelous fearing this, & desirous to preuent him whom they euery day did see encrease his number, and to grow more potent against them; they armed many of their company, and went out to meet him. Simon was not daunted at this, but boldly incountred them, and gaue them so sharp a battell, that he slew many of them in fight; and forced the rest to retire themselues into the towne: yet hauing men sufficient he would not besiege the towne; but first of all he purposed to subdue Idumæa, and so accompanied with 20000. armed men, he hasted towards the borders thereof.

The Princes of Idumæa vnderstanding this, presently assembled fiue and twenty thousand armed men: and leauing at home sufficient garrisons to defend their country against the incursion of the Sicarij, which held the fortresse of Massada, they accompanied with this train, went out & expected Simons comming into the borders of their country, where hauing met him they ioined battel, and fought a whole day, yet neither party got the victory. Then Simon returned to Nain, and the Idumeans home. Not long after Simon with a greater army then before, assaulted the borders of their countrie, and pitching his tents in a village called Thecue, hee sent one of his companions named Eleazar, to them that kept the castle Herodium not farre from that place, to solicite them to yeeld it vnto him. The garrison there presently receiued him into the castle, not knowing the cause of his comming. But so soone as he began to perswade them to treason, they all pursued him with their drawn swords: and he not hauing any place to fly vnto, cast himselfe from off the castle wal into the valley vnderneath, and so presently he died. The Idumæans somthing fearing Simons forces, before they would offer him battell, thought it best to espy what number of men he had: to effect which businesse one Iacob a ruler amongst them offered himselfe, meaning indeed to betray his country to Simon. So departing from Olurus where the Idumæans forces were assembled, he went vnto Simon, & first of al promised him to betray his country vnto him, receiuing of him an oath, that for reward of this deed he should alwaies be next in dignity vnto Simon himselfe, and so hee presently promised to helpe to subdue all Idumæa. For this cause he was welcome to Simon and feasted liberally, and had great promises if hee performed that which he offered: and then returned vnto the Idumæans, and fained that Simons army was farre greater then indeed it was. And so at last terrifying the gouernors of his countrey, and the people, he by little & little perswaded them to receiue Simon, and without any more fight yeeld

For when Simons army drew neere, he firſt of all got vpon his horſe, and together with his aſſociates that were partakers of his treaſon, he fled to the enemy. Then feare fell on the Idumæans, and euery one without any more ado departed home. Thus Simon againſt his owne expectation entred Idumæa without bloudſhed: and firſt of all aſſaulting a little village called Chebron, vpon a ſudden hee tooke it, and in it an exceeding great booty, a great quantity of corne, and many fruits, all which he carried away. The inhabitants report, that this Chebron is not onely more ancient then all cities of that land, but alſo then Memphis in Egypt: for they affirme it to haue been built 2000. and 300. yeares ſince. They alſo ſay,
B that this was the place where Abraham the father of the Iewes dwelt, after he forſook Meſopotamia, and that his poſterity departed from hence to Egypt. And of this there are yet monuments in the city, richly wrought in fine Marble. Six furlongs from the towne there is an exceeding great Turpentine tree, which they affirme to haue endured euer ſince the creation of the world vntill this day.

Simon hauing obtained this place, from hence he inuaded all Idumæa, and not onely robbed and ſpoiled all townes and cities thereof, but alſo he waſted and deſtroyed many territories: for beſides his army, there followed him 40000; ſo that he could not find victuals ſufficient for ſuch a multitude. Moreouer, beſides this calamity that he brought vpon Idumæa, he exerciſed great cruelty and outrage vpon the countrey, and ſo cauſed a greater ſpoile therein. And like as after
C locuſts the trees and woods where they haue bin are left without leaues: ſo whereſoeuer Simon had bin, all the country from whence he came he left deſolate. And either by fire, or ouerthrowing it by ruinating places where he came, or elſe by treading vpon it with the feet of his armie, or by deuouring ſuch as they found, they left nothing ſtanding nor growing either in field or towne: and onely by paſſing through fertile places, hee made the fields harder then barraine ground; and left no ſigne in places which he had deſtroied, that euer they had been tilled.

Simon ſpoiled all Idumea.

Heereat the Zelous were againe moued, yet durſt they not fight with him in open field: but placing ambuſhes in the way he was to paſſe, they tooke Simons wife, and many of her ſeruants, and ſo came againe into the city, reioycing as though they had taken Simon himſelfe. For they perſwaded themſelues, that Simon would preſently, laying arms apart, come in humble wiſe and D intreat them to reſtore vnto him his wife. But Simon was not mooued with compaſſion for the loſſe of his wife, but with fury: and coming to the wals of Ieruſalem, like a cruell beaſt that had been wounded, and could not come to them that hurt him, he kild and ſlew all he met. And taking them that went out of the city to gather herbs and wood, he cauſed them to be whipped to death, whether they were young or old: and this cruelty ſeemed onely wanting in him, that he did not eat the fleſh of the dead bodies. Alſo hee took many and cut off their hands, and ſo ſent them into the city, thereby to terrifie his enemies, and to recall the people from the Zelous: and bad them tell the citizens, that except they preſently reſtored his wife vnto him, hee ſwore by God who gouerned all, that he would break downe their wals, and vſe all that hee found in the city after that faſhion, and that he would ſpare no age, nor reſpect the innocent more then the

Of Galba, Otho, Vitellius and Veſpaſian.

NOt onely in Iudæa, but alſo in Italy at this time were ciuil wars: for Galba was ſlain in the midſt of the market, after whom Otho was created Emperour, and fought againſt Vitellius, who affected the Empire, whom the German legions had elected: So the F battell being fought neere vnto Bebrias, a town in Gallia Ciſalpina, the firſt day Otho got the victory againſt Valens & Cæcinna, the generals of Vitellius his army. But the day following they ouercam Otho: & ſo many being ſlain on both parts, & newes being brought that Vitellius his army had gotten the victory, Otho being at Brixels ſlew himſelfe, when he had ruled the Empire three moneths and two daies. Then Othoes ſouldiers came vnto Vitellius his captains, and ioined with them, and ſo Vitellius came to Rome with his army. In the meane time Veſpaſian the fift day of Iune departed from Cæſarea, and went vnto thoſe parts of Iudæa which were yet vnconquered:

conquered: and first of all he went into the high countries, & subdued the two Toparchies of A- G crabatena and Gophnitis, and after them two townes called Bethel & Ephrem, and placed garrisons in them, and so went to Ierusalem, killing many that he found in the way, and he took many captiues. And one of his captaines called Cerealis, with a part of his horse & footmen, walled all the higher Idumæa, and in the way as he went he took Caphetra a castle, and burnt it, and besieged another called Capharis, enclosed with a strong wal: for the which cause he deemed that he should haue made long abode there: but contrary to his expectation, the inhabitants opened the gates vnto him, and came and yeelded themselues, beseeching him to bee good vnto them.
When he had ouercome them, Cerealis went vnto Hebron an ancient citie, and set it on fire: this Hebron as I haue alredy said, was situated vpon the mountains, not far from Ierusalem: & breaking into it by force, he slew all them that hee found there, and fired the citie. And hauing sub- H dued all places, saue onely three castles, to wit, Herodium, Massada, and Macheron, which were kept by the theeues, now onely Ierusalem remained to be conquered.

CHAP. IX.

Of Simons acts against the Zelous.

WHen Simon had receiued againe his wife from the Zelous, hee went into Idumæa, to rob and spoil that which he had left: & chasing the inhabitans vp and down, at last he forced them to flie vnto Ierusalem, & he himself followed them thither; and besieging the wals, he killed all the workmen he took, that returned out of the fields from their labor. Thus Simon I without the citie, was more terrible to the people then the Romans; and the Zelous within the citie crueller then them both, being incouraged and incited therto by the counsel of the Galileans. For they had put Iohn in authority: and Iohn in reward therof permitted all things to be done which they requested. There was no end of robbing & spoiling rich mens houses, and of slaughtering both of men and women; and now to iniure any person was a pastime. And hauing with bloodshed obtained their prey in security, and without all feare after they had gotten what they liked, they now began to lust after women: yea, they became themselues effeminate through luxuriousnes, dressing their haire, and clothing themselues in womens apparell; and they anointed themselues with sweet oyntments, that their beauty might bee pleasing, and alluring; their eyes wanton-like, they now did not onely imitate the attire of women, but also their impudency, K and became so shameless, that they now thirsted after vnnaturall pleasures, as though they had kept a stewes, and so profaned the whole Citie with their execrable impurities. Yet though they did effeminate their faces, their hands were prone to bloodshed; and although they liued in ignominious maner, as people giuen ouer to pleasure, yet could they quickly become warriors, and vnder the habits of women drawing their swords, they did kill whosoeuer they met. Whosoeuer escaped Iohns hands, Simon crueller, murdered; and whosoeuer escaped the tyranny within the citie, was slaine by the tyrant without. So now there was no way to fly vnto the Romans.
Furthermore, the army of Iohn began to be diuided, for all the Idumæans separated themselues from the other people, and there began a mutiny against the tyrant, partly enuying his puissance, partly hating his cruelty. And so assaulting him, they slew many of the Zelous, and compelled L the rest to flie into the Kings house, builded by Grapta, father of Izata, King of Adiabena. The Idumæans also brake in thither with them, and draue them from thence into the temple, and so seized vpon Iohns treasure: for Iohn liued in that palace, and thither carried all his spoiles. Then those Zelous that were dispersed in the citie, came vnto them that were in the temple, and Iohn purposed to send them against the townesmen, and the Idumæans. But they feared not so much their forces, although they knew them to be the better warriors, as they did fear that now being desperate, they would steale out of the temple in the night, and so slay them, and fire the citie.
Wherfore assembling themselues, they deliberated with the Priests how to auoid their assaults:
but it pleased God to turn their own counsel to be their destruction, and that they should prouide a remedy of safety, far worse then death it self. For to depose Iohn, they deuised to introduce Si- M mon, and as it were to intreat yet another to tyrannize ouer them. So this counsell was thought best: & Matthias the Priest, was sent vnto Simon (who before they stood in great fear of) now to request him to come into the citie. With them also came such as had fled from Ierusalē, for feare of the Zelous, intreating him in like maner, because they desired to return to their wiues & families. So hee entred into the citie proudly, promising them to be their Lord, and all the people cryed with loud voyces as hee came into the Citie, that he was their preseruer, and giuer of life

Beeing now within the city, presently he deliberated with them about him to establish his dominion, thinking as wel them that called him into the city, as those against whom he was called, his enemies. Then Iohn and the Zelous with him, finding no way to come out of the temple, and hauing lost all that he had in the city (for Simon & his followers at his entrance took all that belonged vnto him) beganne now to despaire of his safety. And Simon, being assisted by the Citizens, assaulted the temple; and the Zelous placing themselues vpon the porches, and in towers of defence, made resistance, and hurt many of Simons followers. For the Zelous were vpon the higher ground on the right hand, and so had the vantage against Simon. And although by reason of the place wherein they were, they preuailed against Simon; yet they builded 4. high towers, that from thence they might shoot darts and arrowes against Simons army. One of these
B towers they built vpon the East side of the temple; another on the north, the third vpon a place opposite to the lower part of the towne; and the fourth tower they built vpon the toppe of the place called Pastophorij, where one of the priests do vse to stand before the sun set, and at break of day, to signifie vnto the people with the sound of the trumpet the beginning of the Sabbath, declaring thereby vnto them, somtime holy daies, and afterward that they might go about their businesse. In these towers they placed all kind of engines to cast stones, & men with slings. Then Simon, perceiuing many of his souldiers languish, was more remisse in his businesse: yet when his number increased, he came neerer: for a far off many of his men were slain with the shot of those engines.

CHAP. X.

How Vespasian was elected Emperour.

AT this time the Romans were in great danger: for Vitellius was now arriued out of Germany with his army, bringing beside them an infinit multitude with him; so that his army was so great, that the place appointed for souldiers could not contain it: insomuch that his army occupied all the whole city, and euery house was fild with armed men. And they beholding the Romans wealth greater then euer they saw any, and admiring their abundance of gold and siluer, not able to containe themselues, they began to robbe and kill whomsoeuer that sought to withstand them. And this was the estate of the affairs in Italy. Vespasian hauing wasted all about Ierusalem, returned vnto Cæsarea, and there he vnderstood of the troubles at Rome, &
D how Vitellius was Emperour. Heereat, though he knew as well to obey as to be obeyed, yet was he moued to indignation, and disdained to call him Lord, who had as it were inuaded and vsurped the Empire, beeing destitute of a Ruler. And much grieued hereat, he could not conceal his griefe, nor follow warres against strangers, his owne country being so endangered. But the distance betweene him and Rome did as much represse him, as anger incited him to seek reuenge: for he considered that fortune might cause many alterations before he could get to Rome, especially it being winter: and so he sought to bridle his wrath which daily encreased. But his captaines with the souldiers did now openly consult of a change, and with indignation did exclaim against the soldiers at Rome, who liued in pleasure, & neuer heard so much as the report of war;
E and that notwithstanding this, it was lawfull for them to create whom they pleased Emperour, and vnder hope of gaine, they disposed of the common-wealth at their owne pleasure: where they on the contrary side, hauing ouerpast so many labors and dangers, still continuing in armes till now, wexed old and gray-headed, and did suffer authority due vnto themselues, to be executed by others; when notwithstanding they had amongst them one who deserued the Empire, more then any one; and what recompence could they euer after make him? or what occasion could they find hereafter to shew themselues gratefull to him for the benefits by him receiued, if they did now omit this occasion?

Vitellius encamps his army in Rome.

Vespasiã knew both how to gouern, and how to obey.

The captains consult with the souldiers openly of a change.

And they thought that Vespasian was so much more worthy of the Empire then Vitellius, by how much they, who created Vitellius Emperor, were in very many respects much inferiour vnto them. For (said they) we haue endured no lesse toile then those that came out of Germanie:
F neither are we lesse valiant then they, who bring a tyrant with them out of Germany. And that no body would resist Vespasian: for the Senate and the people of Rome would not rather endure Vitellius his vnsatiable lust, then Vespasians chastity and temperance; nor a cruell Tyrant, rather then a good and curteous Emperor, nor the son should by them be elected Emperor before the father. For true valor in an Emperor is a great defence of peace. Therfore if the empire were due to aged experience, they had Vespasian; if to valiant youth, they had amongst them Titus: & that they might reap cõmodity by both their ages. And that they would not only assist him with the forces forces of the Empire hauing there three legions, beside the help of the kings, but also al the East part of Europe was out of Vitellius his danger. Moreouer, they had in Italy some that would assist Vespasian, to wit, his brother & his son, whereof the one (they hoped) would get many yong men to follow him, and the other was now made prefect of the City, which was no small step to attaine vnto the Empire. Lastly, it might so fall out, that the Senate would declare him Emperor, whom now the souldiers, being as it were their conseruer, had neglected. G

The causes that moued the people to elect Vespasian Emperor.

This was first talked amongst the companies of the souldiers: at last, exhorting one another thereto, they came and saluted Vespasian by the name of Emperor, and requested him now to preserue the Empire, being in great danger to be lost. Albeit Vespasian had alwaies been carefull for the good of the common-wealth, yet he refused to be Emperour: deeming himselfe indeed to haue deserued it; yet he rather did chuse to liue a priuate life, wherein was security, then in the height of fortune and honour with perpetual danger. The captaines were more earnest because he refused it; and the souldiers flocked about him with drawne swords, threatning his death except he would consent to liue as he deserued: yet long time striuing to auert this their determination, being loth to be Emperour; at last, seeing he could not auoid it, he accepted their offer. The description of Egypt and Pharus.

MVtianus and the rest of the captains that had incited him to the Empire, together with the whole army, cried aloud, willing Vespasian to lead them against their common enemy. But Vespasian thought it best, first to settle the estate of Alexandria, knowing that Egypt for the supply of corne was the greatest and best part of the Empire: which if he once were sure of, hee hoped that although Vitellius were stronger then he, yet he could bring him vnder perforce, because the people would not endure that for his sake the city should be famisht: which would haue come to passe, except they had supply of corne out of Egypt. I

Moreouer, he desired to ioine to himselfe those two legions that were at Alexandria. He also thought that that country might be a defence and refuge for him, if any aduerse fortune should betide him: for the country is not easiy to be entred by an army, and the sea-coasts haue no hauens nor harbors to receiue ships. On the West it bordereth vpon the dry & barren part of Lybia; on the South, vpon the frontiers which separate Syene from Æthiopia, and the streames of Nilus not nauigable; on the East it bordereth vpon the red sea, which extends it selfe euen vnto the city Copton; on the North it is defended with Syria, and the Egyptian sea, wherein there is no hauen. Thus Egypt is strong on euery side, and reacheth in length 2000. furlongs from Pelusium to Syene: and from Plinthine to Pelusium they saile 3000. and 600. furlongs. And Nilus is nauigable euen vnto the towne Elephantine. K

The bounds of Egypt.

The length & breadth of Egypt.

Further, by reason of the downfals of Nilus, also the hauen at Alexandria is dangerous to come vnto in time of peace: for the entrance into it is very straight; and beside that, the way goes not directly on, but is made crooked by great stony rocks, and the left side is compassed artificially, but on the right side is the Ile Pharus, hauing a tower vpō it exceeding great: so that the light in it is seen of the mariners 300. furlongs off, that long before they come neer it they may prouide to bring their ships in with safety. L

A most high tower in the Iland Pharos giuing light to those that saile 300 stounds off.

This Ile is inclosed with most huge wals made by art; against which the sea beating, and so returning back again, maketh the entrance into the hauen more dangerous. Yet this hauen within is very safe, and 30. furlongs long: so that whatsoeuer that countrey wants, it is brought them into that hauen, and whatsoeuer aboundeth amongst them which other nations need, is carried from thence all ouer the whole world. So that Vespasian did not vnaduisedly seek to establish the estate of Alexandria, and dispose thereof for his owne profit, being to begin his Empire. Wherfore presently he sent letters to Tiberius Alexander, who was gouernor of Alexandria and Egypt, and told him of the souldiers resolution: and how that he, seeing hee could not auoid it, but that he was forced to take vpon him the Empire, now requested him to help him in what hee could. Alexander, receiuing Vespasians letters, agreed willingly thereto, and presently caused his army and the people also to sweare vnto Vespasian: which both of them did willingly, vnderstanding Vespasians vertue by reason that he gouerned so neer them. And so he hauing now leaue, prepared all things to furnish himselfe like an Emperor, and to be receiued like a prince. M

How Vespasian deliuered Ioseph out of captiuity.

IT is incredible how quickly this newes was caried into al parts of the world, to wit, that Vespasian was declared Emperor in the East; and now al cities reioiced & made triumphs, and offred sacrifices for his fortunate successe. Moreouer, the legions in Mœsia and Panonia, who not long before were reuolted from Vitellius by reason of his cruelty, did now willingly sweare obedience to Vespasian. Vespasian returned by Berytum to Cæsarea: where many B Embassadors came vnto him, bringing him crowns, and applauding & reioicing at his good fortune, who came out of Syria, and all other places thereabout. There was also present Mutianus, gouernor of those parts, who brought tidings how ioyfully al the people receiued him for their Emperor, and how that they had all sworne obedience vnto him. So all things falling out prosperously on Vespasians side, and fortune for the most part inclining as he desired, hee beganne to think with himselfe that it was Gods prouidence that he was made Emperor, and that a iust destiny had brought him to that estate. And so he cald to minde all tokens and signes (as there had hapned many, which did foretel that he should be Emperor) and among the rest, he remembred that which Ioseph had told him; who, Nero being yet aliue, presumed to call him Emperor, and so he admired the man whom as yet he kept in hould. And calling Mutianus and the rest of his C friends together, first of all he told them how valiant Ioseph had been, and what ado he had to win Iotapata onely because of him; and then his prophecies, which at that time hee esteemed onely fables, fained vpon feare; yet now time and euent had proued them true. Affirming it an vndecent thing, that he, who had bin the foreteller of his exaltation, and had bin a messenger to him from God, should still continue in bonds like a captiue, and be left in aduersity. So calling for Ioseph, he commanded him to be let loose. This fact of his made the captaines vnder him hope for great reward at his hands, seeing he had bin so kind to a stranger. Titus being there present, said; It is meet, O father, that as you acquit Ioseph from captiuity, so you also take away the shame of that which he hath already endured. For if wee doe not onely vntie his chaines, but also breake them in sunder, he shall be as though he had neuer been in bondage: for this is the manner vsed D for redresse, when any one being guiltlesse is committed to bonds. Vespasian hereto agreed: and so one came with an axe, and hewed his chaines in peeces. Thus was Ioseph rewarded for his prophecy, and so hereafter he was esteemed worthy to be beleeued.

Vespasian by comon voice is created Emperor, and crowned.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Vitellius his death and manners.

WHen Vespasian had answered the Embassadors, and iustly disposed of all the rulers of his army according to euery ones merit, he now came to Antiochia, and there did deliberate whither to go first, and it seemed best to him to go to Rome, rather then to Alexan- E dria: for he knew that Alexandria was quiet & firme, but Rome was troubled by Vitellius. Wherfore he sent Mutianus into Italy with many footmen and horsemen: who fearing to goe by Sea, went through Cappadocia and Phrygia, for it was winter time. Now Antonius Primus, who was gouernor of Mœsia, brought from thence the third legion remaining there, and came to war against Vitellius. Vitellius sent Cæcinna to meet him with a great army: who departing from Rome, presently met with Antonius at Cremona, a towne of Gallia, situate vpon the confines of Italy; and there beholding the discipline and multitude of the enimies, durst not fight with them: and thinking it very dangerous to flee, he plotted treason, and so calling vnto him the Centurions & Tribunes vnder his gouernment, he perswaded them to goe and ioine with Antonius, debasing Vitellius his power, and extolling Vespasians: affirming the first to haue onely the bare name of the F Emperor; and the last to haue also all vertues meet for an Emperor. Moreouer, that so it would be better for them to do that of their own accord, which otherwise they should bee compelled to; and seeing themselues already ouercom in number, so also now willingly preuent all danger. For Vespasian was able without their assistance to subdue all the rest: but Vitellius was not able with their help to keep that he had: speaking much to this effect, he perswaded them to all that which he would haue done. And so he with his whole army ioyned with Antonius.

Vespasian bethinks himself to returne to Rome.

Cæcinna perswades the souldiers to forsake Vitellius, & honour Vespasian.

The same night, the souldiers repenting themselues of that they had done, and also fearing that that Vitellius should get the vpper hand who sent them against Antonius, drew their swords, and would haue slaine Cæcinna. And had done it, had not the Tribunes come and entreated them to the contrary: wherefore they did not kill him, but kept him bound, meaning to send him to Vitellius as a traitor. Primus Antonius hearing this, came with his army & assaulted them who were reuolted from him, and they awhile resisted; yet at last, forced to retire, they fled to Cremona. And Primus, accompanied with horsmen, preuented their courses, and so slew most of them before the city; and afterward setting vpon the rest, gaue his souldiers the spoile of it, wherin many Merchants of other countries, and many townsmen were slain, and all Vitellius army, 30000. & 200. men: and Antonius lost in that battell 4000. and 500. of those whom he brought with him out of Mœsia. And deliuering Cæcinna from prison, he sent him to beare newes hereof to Vespasian: who coming vnto him, was praised for his fact, and greatly honored aboue his expectation, in reward of his treason.

Cæcinna is apprehended for treason.

Vespasian honors Cæcinna with vnexpected honors, & is acquited of treason.

Sabinus, who was at Rome, hearing that Antonius was at hand, greatly reioiced, and took courage: and gathering together the companies of the watchmen in the night time, hee tooke the Capitoll, and in the morning many of the nobles came and ioined with him: and Domitianus his brothers son, who was a great cause and help to obtaine the victory. Vitellius little esteemed Primus; but he was angry against Sabinus and those that had reuolted with him: and as it were naturally thirsting after the bloud of the nobility, hee set all the army hee brought out of Germanie with him, to assault the Capitoll, where many valiant deeds were shewed on both parts: and at last, the Germans, being most in number, got the Capitoll hill. And Domitian with many braue noble men, as it were by Gods prouidence, escaped safe, the rest of the multitude were there slaine. And Sabinus was carried to Vitellius, and there by his commandement put to death: the souldiers, taking away all the gifts and treasure in the Temple, set it on fire. The day after came Antonius, and Vitellius his souldiers met him: and fighting in three seuetall places of the city, they were all slaine. Then Vitellius came drunk out of his palace, and being full gorged with delicate meat, he was drawne through the midst of the people, and after many contumelies slaine, hauing raigned 8. moneths, and 5. daies: who if he had liued longer, I thinke verely the Empire had not bin sufficient to haue maintaind his gluttony. There were slaine aboue 50000. of other people. And this was done the 3. day of October. The day after, Mutianus with his army came & entred Rome, and represt the souldiers of Antonius, who still sought about in euery place for Vitellius souldiers, and many other of his fauorits, and slew whom they thought good, not examining any matter by reason of their fury: and bringing out Domitian, he declared to the people that he was to gouerne the city till his father came. The people being deliuered from feare, proclaimd Vespasian Emperour, and made feasts & triumphs both vnder one, for his establishing in the Empire, and for ioy that Vitellius was deposed.

WHen Vespasian came vnto Alexandria, newes were brought vnto him what was done at Rome. And Embassadours came vnto him from all parts of the world to congratulate him. And although next after Rome this city was the greatest in the world, yet was it scarcely able to receiue the people that came thither vnto him. Vespasian now beeing established Emperor of all the world, and the common-wealth of the Romans being contrary to his expectation freed from troubles, he now began to think vpon the reliques of Iudæa. And so he himselfe, winter being ended, prepared to go to Rome, and in the mean time he hastned to dispose of all things at Alexandria. Moreouer, he sent his son Titus with certain chosen men to destroy Ierusalem. Who departed from Alexandria to Nicopolis by land, which is distant from it 20. furlongs, and there he did ship his men, and so saild along the riuer Nilus by Medensia to Thmuin, and there landing his men, he cam to the city cald Tanis. And the second place he rested in was the city Heraclea, & the third Pelusiū: and there resting, & refreshing his souldiers 2. daies space, the third day he past the borders of Pelusium, and hauing gone one daies iourney through the wildernes, he pitcht his tents at the temple of Iupiter Cassian, & the next day at Ostracine, where there is no water, but all that the inhabitants do vse, they bring from other places. After that, he rested at Rhinocolura, and from thence in 4. daies he came to Raphia, where begin the borders of Syria, & the fift day he lodged at Gaza, & from thence to Ascalon, and so to Iamnia & Ioppe, from whence he went to Cæsarea, purposing to gather the rest of the souldiers there.

Of the three ſorts of ſedition in Ieruſalem.

TItus being thus come out of Egypt by the deſart into Syria, he departed from thence vnto Cæſarea: for there hee purpoſed to ſet his army in order. And whileſt yet hee was with his father Veſpaſian at Alexandria, diſpoſing of the Empire that God had giuen him, it happened that the ſedition at Ieruſalem was diuided into three parts, whereof one fought againſt another: and one may ſay, it was a good turne that they were ſo equally diuided. Wee haue already ſufficiently declared who were the Authors and beginners of the fac-

A threefold ſedition in Ieruſalem.

F tion of the Zelous, whoſe tyranny ouer the Citie was the ruine thereof: and one may well call this a ſedition raiſed out of a ſedition; which, like a cruell and ſauage beaſt in penury & want of others, turned his cruelty againſt his owne bowels. So Eleazar the ſonne of Simon, who was the firſt that in the Temple diuided the Zelous from the people, faining himſelfe to bee diſpleaſed with that which Iohn euery day did; yet in truth, for that he enuied that a more tyrant of later time then himſelfe ſhould be his ruler, deſirous to obtaine the principality, and make himſelf mighty, he reuolted from the reſt: and with him Iudas the ſonne of Chelcias and Simon the ſonne of Ezron, two of the moſt potent amongſt them. Beſides them, was alſo Ezechias the ſonne of

Chobarus a Nobleman, and all these had many of the Zelous following them: and getting in G possession the inner part of the Temple, they set a guard in the entrance and in the sacred gates, trusting in their abundance of all necessaries: for there was great store of sacred prouision, and they thought it no impiety to vse it; yet fearing their small number, they permitted many of the company that were killed, to remaine in the places where they were slaine. Iohn was superior in multitude and number, but inferiour by the inequality of the place: and hauing his enemies aboue his head, he could not without danger make incursions; and yet for anger he would not cease to persecute his enemie: notwithstanding that therby his part had more harme then those of Eleazars side, yet he still assaulted them though to his owne cost: thus many assaults were continually made and many darts cast, and all the temple was profaned with murders. And Simon the son of Giora (whom the people being in despaire, inuited to be their leader, in hope that he H would haue assisted them, hauing in his hands both the higher part of the Citie, and the greater part of the lower) did now more boldly then before assault Iohn and his followers, because they were assailed by those aboue them: yet he being as it were beneath Iohn and his adhærents, hee sustained as much losse at their hands, as Iohn himselfe did at theirs aboue him. So Iohn had double wars: and Eleazar harmed him because of the higher place wherein he was, so likewise did

Simon & Iohn skirmish in the temple.

he domage Simon for the like cause; and easily without any labour repulsed all his assaults, which he made being on the lower ground, and terrified by engines those that cast darts at him from the top of the temple: for he vsed all engines to cast darts and stones, and killed many not only of his enemies, but also of them that were offering sacrifices. For although that they were carried headlong vnto all vice, yet they permitted those that would, to offer sacrifice, watching and dili- I gently guarding them of their nation. For the strangers that came thither for deuotion were not mistrusted: yet afterward that they had entreated these wicked people to permit them to sacrifice, they when they had done were a prey for them, and consumed by this sedition. For darts and other shot with force of the engines came into the Temple and Altar, and slew the Priest at the Altar. And many who came from the vttermost parts of the world vnto that holy place, were slaine euen as they offered sacrifice, and so imbrued the Altar with their blood, which all the Greeks and barbarous people did reuerence: and strangers and the Priests being now profaned, were forced to be amongst the dead bodies, and the place about the Altar stood full of blood of men that were slaine. O miserable Citie! what didst thou suffer at the Romans hands, to be compared vnto this, although they entred with fire to purge thee from iniquity? For now thou wast K no longer the house of God, neither couldest thou endure being made a Sepulchre of thine inhabitants, and hauing by thy ciuill wars made the holy Temple a graue of dead bodies. Yet maiest thou once againe come into better estate, if first thou appease Gods wrath that hath made thee desolate. But I must not giue place vnto sorrow and write a lamentation of my miserable countrey, seeing I haue vndertaken to write a Historie of all things that past there. Wherefore I will recount the residue of the impietie of these seditious.

The seditious people being diuided into three companies; Eleazar and his followers, who had the keeping of the holy first fruites, and all the sacred oblations, came against Iohn, when they were drunke. And they who followed Iohn spoyling the people, assaulted Simon, and the Iohn assaulted on both sides.

Citie did succour Simon. Wherefore when Iohn was assaulted on both sides, hee turned some of L his souldiers against Simon, and the rest against Eleazar: and against Simon he vsed darts cast from the porches of the temple: and against Eleazar he vsed engines for shot. And alwaies so often as they aboue his head ceased (as they often did being either weary or drunken) hee freely assaulted Simon and his men. Also as farre as he draue them into the Citie, so farre did he fire all, and burne houses full of corne and other necessaries: and that which he left vnburned, Simon at his returne (when Iohn was gone into the temple) set on fire: as if vpon purpose, to the great aduantage of the Roman, they had consumed all that was prouided against the siege; so did they destroy their owne forces and strength. To be short, all was consumed with fire about the temple, and the citie was made a plaine ground to fight in, and all the corne was burnt that might haue sufficed the citie many yeares, and so they were taken by famine, which they could not haue M felt, had they themselues not caused it. The citizens were in euery place a prey vnto those that were seditious on one side, and to them that besieged the citie on the other side, and like a great bodie torne in peeces between these two. The old men and women astonished with these calamities, prayed for the good successe of the Romans, and desired some forraine warre to deliuer them from their ciuill disagreement.

They of Ierusalem had welnie burnt all their corne.

A wretched calamity in Ierusalem.

And

A And forthwith great feare and terror fell vpon them all: beſides, it was no time as now to take counſel to change their mindes, nor hope of agreement or of flight to them that deſired it. For all places were kept, and the rebels within, whomſoeuer they perceiued to wiſh peaceably to the Romans, or offer to flie vnto them, they preſently killed them as their common enemies. And all theſe wicked perſons agreed in this, to wit, to put the iuſt men to death, who beſt deſerued to liue. Day and night nothing could be heard ſaue onely the noiſe of them that fought one againſt another; yet the lamentable cries of them that liued in perpetuall feare was far more miſerable, who euery day had new cauſes and occaſions of ſorrow giuen them; yt durſt they not publikely lament, for feare; and ſo not daring to ſhew their griefe, they ſecretly ſorrowed, and now no man obſerued any reuerence to them that were aliue amongſt them, nor tooke any care to bury the B dead. The cauſe of both which was, that euery man deſpaired of himſelfe. For whoſoeuer were not ioyned with the ſeditious, grew to be careleſſe of all things, as making account preſently to die a thouſand deaths. But the ſeditious gathering the dead bodies vpon heapes, continued their fighting, and troad vpon them; and as it were encouraging themſelues by the dead vnder their feet, they became more cruell, ſtill deuiſing one pernicious practice or other, and preſently executing whatſoeuer they deuiſed without any commiſeration, omitting no way to murther, and leauing no tyranny vnattempted: ſo that Iohn abuſed the holy things of the temple to make engines of warre. For before time when the Prieſts and people had determined to vnderprop the temple and build it twenty cubits higher, King Agrippa with great coſt and charges brought them very goodly timber ſufficient for their purpoſe from moun Libanus. And this C worke being preuented by wars, Iohn took them, and ſeeing them fit for his purpoſe, he erected a tower to fight againſt thoſe that aſſaulted him from off the temple; which hee built along the wall ouer againſt the chapter houſe, that ſtandeth on the Weſt ſide of the temple: for he could build it in no other place, by reaſon that all other places were filled with ſtaires. And hauing thus impiouſly prouided engines, he hoped hereby to deſtroy his enemies. But God ſhewed his labour to be in vaine, and before he could preuaile againſt them, he brought the Romans againſt the Citie.

Lamentation and mourning in Ieruſalem.

The cruelty of the ſeditious in Ieruſalem.

Iohn made vſe of the wood that was kept for holy vſes to make engines of.

For after that Titus had now gathered together part of his army, and by writing appointed the reſt to meet him at Ieruſalem, hee departed from Cæſarea, hauing three legions that lately vnder the conduct of his father Veſpaſian had waſted all Iudæa, and the twelfth legion that ſome- D time vnder Ceſtius were ouercome, and put to flight by the Iewes: who though they were otherwiſe valiant enough, yet they deſired to fight againſt the Iewes to reuenge themſelues for that diſgrace. Titus commanded the fift legion to meet him at Ieruſalem, and goe by Emmaus, and that the tenth legion ſhould march by Iericho: the reſt he took with himſelf accompanied with the Kings forces that came to help him, hauing now more help then before, and many alſo out of Syria. Titus alſo brought men with him to ſupply the number that was wanting, being ſent by Veſpaſian with Mutianus into Italy: for hee brought 2000. choſen men from the legions at Alexandria, and 3000. followed him from Euphrates, together with Tiberius Alexander his chiefeſt friend, and one next him in moſt authority, who before was gouernour of Egypt, and as then E thought a fit man worthy to be gouernour of the army; for that he was the firſt that did entertaine the Emperour being new elected, who faithfully ioyned with Veſpaſian, though yet hee knew not what ſucceſſe he ſhould haue: and hee was preſent with him in all his affaires as his chiefeſt counſeller, renowmed both for his wiſdome and experience.

The order of Titus army.

CHAP. II.

How Titus went to Ieruſalem to ſee their ſtrength, and how hee was in great danger.

F Titus being now to go into the country of the enemy, cauſed all thoſe that came to helpe him to march in the foremoſt place: after whom followed they that were to mend the waies, and to pitch the tents: and after them they which carried the baggage of the rulers and gouernours of his army, and with them the armed ſouldiers. Next after theſe came Titus himſelfe accompanied with choſen men, and with him many that bare his colours: next, the horſmen going immediately before the engines. And the Prefects and Tribunes with certaine choſen men, & their companies followed. After them the Eagle with many other enſignes: and the trumpets went before them. And after them followed the army marching ſix in a rank: then the multitude of ſeruants that followed euery legion did driue their baggage before them: laſtly came the hirelings and those that were appointed to guard them. Marching in such comely and warlike maner, as the Romans are wont, he came by Samaria into Gophna, which place was already conquered by his father, & then also was vnder the custody of the Roman garrisons. And staying there one night, he departed from thence the next day: and after a daies iourney he pitched his tents in a place which in the Iewes language is called Acãthonaulona, that is, the valley of thorns, neere vnto a village named Gabath Saul, which signifieth the valley of Saul, which is almost 30. furlongs from Ierusalem. From thence accompanied with 600. chosen horsemen, he went to Ierusalem, to view how strong it was, and of what courage the Iewes were, to see if peraduenture at sight of him they would yeeld without any further war, for feare. For Titus vnderstood (& it was true) that the people desired peace, but they were oppressed by the seditious, and so durst not attempt any thing, being not able to encounter or resist the rebels. Titus riding along the high way that went straight to the wals, saw no man all the way: but turning aside towards the tower Psephinos with his horsmen, an infinite number presently issued out by the towers of women, at a gate opposite to Helens toombe; and brake his ranke of horsmen into two parts, and opposed themselues, hindring those horsmen that were yet in the high way, to come and ioine with the rest that had crost the way, and so did single out Titus accompanied only with a few men. So hee could go no further for the ditch of the towne wall on one side, and for the garden pales on the other side: and there was no hope for him to returne vnto his souldiers, the enemies being between him and home. And many of his souldiers not knowing their Generall to be in any danger, but supposing him to haue been amongst them still, fled away. Titus seeing that he had onely his owne valour to trust vnto, turned his horse against his enemies, and with a loud voyce exhorted his followers to do the like, and so hee brake violently into the midst of them, hasting to get vnto his company. It was euident at that time that God giueth the victory, and hath a particular care of Kings and Princes and Emperors. For notwithstanding that an infinit number of darts and arrowes were shot at Titus, and he had no armour at all (for as we haue already said, he came to espy & not to fight) yet had he not one wound, but all past him; as though purposely euery one had striuen to haue mist him. But Titus with his sword made way, and cut many vpon the face that opposed themselues against him, and so they falling downe he with his horse past ouer them. The Iewes seeing Titus his valour, cried and exhorted one another to set vpon him; but whithersoeuer he turned, the Iews fled, and would not abide by it: likewise those souldiers that were in the like danger with him, came of either side him & behinde him. For no man had any hope to saue his life, but onely by making themselues way with Titus before they were so enclosed & oppressed. So, of two of the most valiant amongst them one was slaine, and his horse likewise: the other was slaine, and his horse taken by the Iewes. And Titus with the rest of his followers came safe into the camp. And the Iewes getting the first victory, rashly took courage, & that encouragement being of moment, made them very confident a long time after.

CHAP. III.

How the Iewes did issue out vpon the Romans pitching their tents.

SO soone as the legion that was to passe by Ammaus, was ioyned to the rest of the armie that night, Cæsar presently the next morning remooued, and came to Scopos, where hee might perfectly view the Citie and the temple on the North part, where the ground adioyning vnto the Citie is very low, and is properly called Scopos, being distant seuen furlongs from the Citie: and there Titus commanded two legions to encamp themselues, and the fift legion to retire three furlongs off, to the intent that the souldiers who were wearied with trauailing all night, might entrench themselues without fear or danger. No sooner had they begun their worke, but presently the tenth legion came, who were to passe by Iericho, which Vespasian had already subdued, and had placed there a garrison. This legion was commanded to encampe six furlongs from Ierusalem, neer mount Oliuet, which is opposite to the East part of the Citie, and is enclosed with a deep valley called Cedron. This great and huge army so suddenly arriuing, presently staied the warres within the Citie: and these three sects of seditious people beholding with admiration the Romans campe, became friends, and made agreement amongst themselues. They beganne also to question one with another what fury caused them to suffer themselues to be enclosed with three wals, to their preiudice and losse of their liues; and seeing such preparation of wars towards, that they should be as it were beholders of that which was done

Thus they being aſſembled together, exhorted one another: and preſently arming themſelues, they iſſued out of the citie, and aſſaulted the tenth legion, and with a huge cry ſet vpon the Romans that were entrenching themſelues in the valley. The Romans being euery one appointed to do ſome buſineſs for the furtherance of that work, and for that cauſe the moſt of them hauing laid down their weapons (for they thought the Iews durſt not haue made any excurſions, and although they would, that yet they were hindred being at variance among themſelues) they were troubled aboue meaſure, and preſently leauing the work, ſome fled; many arming themſelues to The Citizens aſſaile the Romans.

B fight, were ſlain before they were prepared to reſiſt. The multitude of the Iews was daily increaſed, becauſe that at the firſt they got the vpper hand, & notwithſtanding their number was ſmal, yet did they think themſelues many: and ſo did the Romans think them to be, becauſe of their good fortune. The Romans who were alwaies wont to obſerue military diſcipline and order, at that time by their ſudden aſſaulting, were ſo troubled, that they obſerued no order, and ſo fled: yet whenſoeuer they turned againe vpon them that followed them, they eaſily wounded the Iewes; partly becauſe that they were ſo earneſt, that they did not greatly ſeeke to defend themſelues, and alſo they did eaſily ſtay the Iewes from purſuing them. Yet the number of them that purſued them ſtil increaſing, they were alſo more troubled, & ſo at laſt forced to forſake the field, and leaue their tents: and the whole legion had bin in greater danger, had not Titus hauing pre- The Iewes driue the Romans from their campe.

C ſent newes hereof ſpeedily came & ſuccoured them, and vpbraiding their cowardlineſs recalled them from flight; who with them, and the choſen men hee brought, encountring the Iewes on one ſide, he ſlew many of them, and wounded diuers, and put the reſt to flight, & forced them into the valley. The Iewes being now in the lower ground, and hauing endured much at the Romans hands, ſince fortune frowned vpon them, turned again, & hauing the valley between them, they fought with the Romans. And thus the fight continued till the midſt of the day.

A little after midday Titus guarding the reſt with thoſe that he brought to ſuccour them, and placing others, to preuent the excurſions of the Iewes, hee commaunded the reſt to entrench themſelues in the top of the mountaine. The Iewes thought the Romanes had fled, and their ſentinell vpon their wals making a ſigne vnto them by ſhaking his garment vp and down, a great The fight of the Iewes with the Romans.

D multitude of them ran ſo violently vpon the Romans, as though they had been ſauage beaſts, ſo that none of their enemies were able to withſtand them; but as though they had beene ſtricken with ſome engine, ſo all of them were diuerſly ſcattered and forced to flie into the mountaine. But Titus in the midſt of the ſide of the mountaine remained alone, hauing but a few with him; notwithſtanding his friends, who for the loue they bare to their Emperour, ſtayed with him, and abode the danger, did earneſtly perſwade him to flie from the Iewes, who deſperately ranne vpon their owne deaths, and not to endanger himſelfe for them, who ought rather to abide it then he: And that he ſhold think vpon his own eſtate, who was not a ſoldier, but general of them all, and Lord of the whole world, and that he ſhould not abide when all others fled ſo faſt, and in The Romans are diſperſed by the Iewes, and driuen to the mountain.

E ſuch danger. But he made as though he heard them not, and oppoſed himſelfe againſt them that offered to aſſault him, ſtriking them vpon the faces, and killing them that made reſiſtance, and hee purſued them downe the hill, and ſo forced them to retire. The Iewes amazed at his valour, did not yet flie into the citie, but auoided him on both ſides, and fled into the valley: then againe purſuing them that fled from them, yet Titus croſſing them as they went hindered their purſuit. In the meane time thoſe that were encamping themſelues aboue, ſeeing them beneath put to flight, were diſcomfited, and all fled, thinking that they were not able to reſiſt the Iewes, and imagining that Titus was likewiſe fled: for had they thought that he had ſtaied by it, they neuer would haue forſaken their quarters; yet being now terrified they knew not wherefore, ſome fled one way, and ſome another without any order, till ſome ſeeing the Emperour in the midſt of Titus valour againſt the Iewes.

F the battell, and fearing the miſchance that might betide him, they with loud cries ſignified it vnto the whole legion. Then the Romans turning again for ſhame, and accuſing themſelues guilty of a great offence in forſaking their Emperour amidſt ſuch danger, came with all the violence they could vſe againſt the Iewes, and driuing them down the mountaine, forced them to retire; yet the Iewes fought flying, and ſeeing the Romans to haue the vpper hand of them, becauſe they were vpon higher ground, they departed into the valley. Titus aſſaulted them that were oppoſite againſt him, and ſo commanded the reſt to go and finiſh their trenches. And hee with thoſe that before were with him to defend the workmen, did now alſo keep the Iewes from mo- Feare & trouble among the Romans. The Iewes fight in their retreat, & are driuen vnto the valley.

lesting them. So if I may speake without flatterie or enuy, Cæsar himselfe did twice preserue the whole legion from destruction, and gaue the souldiers opportunity to entrench themselues. G

CHAP. IIII.

Of the fight within the Citie vpon the feast of vnleauened bread.

DVring the intermission of the forraine wars, they fel to their former sedition again, which caused ciuill wars among them. And against the feast of vnleauened bread, which is the 14. day of Aprill (for vpon this day the Iewes say that they were deliuered out of the bondage of Egypt) Eleazar & his companions opened the gates, to the intent that all that would might come in to adore & do their deuotion. But Iohn vsed this festiuall day as a means to effect his deceit; and caused many of his company that were vnknown, to enter in among the people with weapons vnder their garments, giuing them charge when they were within, to get possession of the temple: and so soon as they were within, they cast off their garments, & shewed thē-selues to be in armour. Presently a great tumult arose within the temple: for all the people that were not of the sedition thought themselues betraied: and the Zelous thought this treason only practiced to preiudice them: and so leauing the gate which before they kept, and leaping down from the towers, they neuer offering to fight, fled into the vaults about the temple. And the people flocking about the altar, & others who were driuen into the temple, were killed with clubs and swords, and so troden vpon. And many were slain vpon priuate hatred, vnder pretence to be partakers with the enemies. And whosoeuer before time had offended any of those traitors, he was put to death, as though he had beene one of the Zelous. But they who had cruelly raged against the innocent, let the wicked haue leasure to escape out of those caues, whereby they had no harme: and hauing gotten the inner part of the temple, and all belonging therunto, they did now more confidently then before fight against Simon: and thus the sedition that was before diuided into three parts, was now brought only into two. Titus being desirous to bring his army neerer the citie, sent a certain number of horsmen & foot, which he thought sufficient to hinder all excursions of the Iewes from Scopos, and another company he sent to plaine all the grounds betwixt him and Ierusalem: who cutting down all hedges & pales, and fences, & wood (though they were fruit trees) filled the vallies and made it all plain ground: and hewing down all stones that standing vp made the ground vnequall, they plained all that ground from Scopos euen vnto Herods monument, which adioyned to the lake of Serpents called sometime Bethora:

Iohn entreth and seiseth the inward thmple and al the furniture thereof, putteth the Zelous to flight, and raiseth a mighty sedition.

CHAP. V.

Of the deceit the Iewes vsed against the Roman souldiers.

ABout this time the Iewes deuised this stratagem against the Romans. The most courageous among the seditious people went out vnto the places called the womens towers, & counterfeited thēselues to be driuen thither by them within the citie that desired peace; and for that they feared the Romans, they were come thither to hide themselues one behind another: others standing on the wals, and counterfeiting themselues to be the citizens, with loud cries desired peace, and a league of friendship; promising to set the citie gates open, and inuiting the Romans to enter: and crying thus they also cast stones against their countrimen before spoken of, as though they did driue them from the gates; and they made as though they would by force break through the people, and come to the gates, partly by force, partly by entreating the people to permit them. And making many offers to go vnto the Romans, they turned again like men troubled in minde, and studying what to doe. The Roman souldiers did not perceiue their subtle meaning; who seeing the seditious ready to fal into their hands, that so they might punish them, and seeing the people (as they thought) ready to open the gates vnto them, would in post haste haue gone vnto the citie. But Titus suspected some deceit coloured with this kind inuiting him to enter, because he did not see any reason for it. For the day before hauing by Ioseph offered them a peace, hee vnderstood that their minds were farre from any peaceable cogitations: wherefore he now commanded the souldiers to keep their quarters and not to remooue; yet some of them, appointed to worke in the trenches, taking their weapons ran vnto the gates, and the Iewes who seemed to bee driuen out of the citie first fled; at last when they came vnto the gates

A gates of the towers, they incloſed the Romans round about, and aſſaulted them vpō their backs: and they that were vpon the wals did caſt all kinde of darts and ſtones vpon them: ſo that they ſlew many, and wounded very many; for it was not eaſie to eſcape from the wals, others being behind them, and offering them violence. Moreouer, they were aſhamed that their captains had ſo offended, and in fear for their offence cōmitted, both which cauſed them ſtil to perſeuer in it. And after a long conflict receiuing many wounds, and giuing as many, at laſt they put them to flight that encloſed them, and ſo the Iewes departed, and followed them to Herods monument, purſuing them with darts. And then the Iewes returned reioycing in their good fortune; and deriding the Romans for beeing ſo deceiued, lifted vp their ſhields and bucklers, ſhouting and reioycing.

The victory of the Iewes.

B The Roman ſouldiers were receiued of their Captaines with threatnings, and of Cæſar with this ſpeech: The Iewes led onely with deſperation do all things with aduice and counſel, deuiſing deceits; and fortune fauoureth their practices becauſe they are ordered, and truſty to one another. And now the Romans, whom for their obedience and diſcipline fortune was wont to fauour, do contrariwiſe offend herein, and for their raſh and vnaduiſed fighting are ouercome: & which is worſt of all, in Cæſars preſence offring to fight without their Captains. Truly the military law & diſcipline will be grieu'd hereat, and my father very ſorrowfull to heare of this. For he who from his infancy vnto old age, hath been trained vp in armes, yet did he neuer offend in this ſort; and what ſhall wee ſay to our law that puniſheth the leaſt offences againſt them committed with death, when our whole army doth diſobey their Emperors command? But (quoth C he) they who ſo arrogantly haue diſobeied our cōmand, ſhall preſently vnderſtand, that among the Romans, victory againſt the Generals command is an infamy. Titus, hauing thus ſpoken in anger to the Captaines, euidently declared to them what and how hee purpoſed to puniſh them. And they preſently deſpaired, as though by and by they were iuſtly condemned to dy. But all the other legions flocking about Titus, beſought him to pardon their fellow ſouldiers, and to remit the offence of the raſhnes of ſome few, for the obedience ſake of all the reſt: affirming that their future valor ſhould be a ſufficient recompence for this their offence. Cæſar was now pacified, partly thinking what was moſt profitable, partly for the intreaty of the reſt: for he purpos'd to puniſh one man only, and to rebuke the reſt, and ſignifie to them his diſpleaſure, and ſo he was reconciled to his ſouldiers, ſtraightly charging them to be wiſer hereafter: and after, he deuiſed D now to be reuenged on the Iewes for this deceit. When all the ground between the wals of Ieruſalem and his army was in 4. daies made plaine, Titus being deſirous ſafely to conduct the baggage and the reſt of the mulittude in ſafety, he placed the ſtrongeſt of all his ſouldiers euery one in his rank ſeuen by ſeuen, and cauſed them to march from the North part of the City vnto the Weſt, all along without the City wals, placing the footmen in the forefront, and in the laſt place the horſemen three in a rank, and between them both the Archers. So the Iewes not able now to make any excurſions, Titus ſouldiers being thus diſpoſed of, the baggage of the three legions and the multitude paſſed along without any danger. And Titus himſelfe being now within two furlongs of the City wals, pitched his tent againſt that corner of the wall that is called Pſephinos, where the compaſſe of the wall from the North bends into the Weſt: the other part of the ar- E my entrenched themſelues againſt that part of the wall that is cald Hippicos, diſtant in like maner two furlongs from the City. CHAP. VI.

The deſcription of Ieruſalem.

F THE City was compaſſed with a threefould wall on euery ſide, ſaue onely on that part where it was incloſed with vallies inacceſſible: for on that ſide it had only one wal. It was built vpon two little hils, one of them beeing oppoſite vnto another, and ſeparated one from another with a vally, which was wonderfully repleniſhed with houſes. One of theſe hils whereon ſtandeth the vpper part of the city, is farre higher and ſteeper then the other, inſomuch that becauſe of the ſtrēgth of it, King Dauid in times paſt called it a Caſtle. (This Dauid was the father of king Salomon, who firſt builded the Temple in that place) but wee at this day cal it the high market place. The other hil cald Acra, is the place wher the lower part of the city ſtands. Oppoſite againſt this hill, there was alſo another lower then this Acra was, which was firſt diuided from it with a large vally, but afterward at ſuch time as the Aſmoneans raigned raigned they did fill vp this vallie,to the intent they might ioyne the City vnto the Temple,and G cut downe the top of Acra,and ſo made it lower,that it might not hide the temple. The valley, by which we haue ſaid the two higher hils are ſeparated one from another,is called Tyropœon, and reacheth vnto Siloa (which is a fountaine abounding with ſweet water.) Without the city were two hils compaſſed with deep vallies:and being encloſed with high rockes, they were on euery ſide inacceſſible. The moſt ancient of the three wals, by reaſon of the vallie about it, and the hill whereupon it ſtood,could not eaſily be taken : and beſide the opportunity of the place, it was very ſtrongly built,at the coſt and charges of Dauid,Salomon and other kings. This wall, beginning at the tower called Hippicos,reacheth to that called Xyſtus,and afterward being ioi-ned vnto the Palace,it endeth in the Weſt porch of the temple : on the other ſide towards the Weſt it begins at the ſame tower; and paſſing by the place that is called Betiſo, it deſcends vnto H

the gate of the Eſſeans, and ſo into the South, and from thence againe it bendeth into the Eaſt, where alſo is Salomons pond, and reacheth vnto the place called Ophlas, where it is ioined vnto the Eaſt porch of the temple. The ſecond wall beginneth at the gate that is called Genath,which is a gate of the former wall, and it onely compaſſeth the North part of the city, and reacheth to Antonia, a Caſtle ſo called. The third wall beginneth at the tower Hippicos, from whence it goeth into the North part, and from thence it commeth vnto the tower Pſephina, ouer againſt the Sepulchre of Helena that was Queene of Adiabena, and mother of king Izates: and paſſing along by the kings caues, it turneth towards the tower neere the monument of Fullo, and in the vallie called Cedron it ioyneth with the old wall. Agrippa compaſſed that part of the Citie that he built with this wal,it being before all open without defence. For the city grew ſo populous, I that by little and little they were forced to inhabite ſome part without the wals : and this wall reacheth a great way, being ioined vnto the hill next the city on the North ſide of the Temple.
There was alſo a fourth hill inhabited, named Bezetha, ſituate againſt Antonia, but ſeparated from it with very deep ditches, which were made of purpoſe, leſt that the foundation of Antonia being ioined vnto it, it might be eaſier to come vnto, and ſeeme lower : for the deepenes of the ditch maketh the tower ſeeme much higher then otherwiſe it would. This place beeing added vnto the City, is called in that countrey language Bezetha, which ſignifieth the new City.
And the Inhabitants deſiring that part to be fortified, Agrippa, father to this Agrippa that finiſht the wal,did begin that wall afore mentioned : and fearing leſt Claudius Cæſar,hearing how ſumptuous a wall he built,ſhould miſtruſt that he purpoſed to reuolt, he onely laid the foundation of K it, and ſo left it vnfiniſhed.

The ſecond wall.

The third wal.

Bezetha the fourth hil.

Agrippas coſt in building the wall.

For the city could neuer haue been taken by force, if he had finiſht that wall as he began it, it being built with ſtones 20.cubits long,and 10.cubits broad,which could neither eaſily bee vndermined,nor battered with engines : and this wall was built ten cubits high, and no doubt had been raiſed higher,had not his liberality who began this building been hindered. Yet againe by the Iewes induſtry the ſame wall was raiſed 20.cubits high,the battlements hereof were two cubits high,and the tower 3.cubits,and in all it was 24.cubits high,as before. Vpon the wall were three towers 20.cubits broad,and 20.cubits high,built foure-ſquare very ſtrongly,and was builded of as firme a foundation as the wal it ſelfe,which for the building and faire ſtone was not inferiour to the temple aboue. Within this ſtrong tower,which reached twenty cubits high,were L roomes for men to dwell in,and ciſternes to receiue raine-water,and large turning ſtaires to goe into euery place there : and this third wall had fourſcore and ten of theſe towers, and between euery tower were two hundred cubites ſpace. The middle wall had fourteene towers, and the old wall had threeſcore,and the compaſſe of the whole city was three and thirty furlongs. And although the third wall was admirable , yet the tower of Pſephina,which was built vpon a corner of the wall, betweene the North and the Weſt part of the city, had a certaine excellencie of more wonder, againſt which part Titus had encamped himſelfe : for it was ſeuenty cubits high, ſo that from thence vpon a cleere Sunſhine day, one might diſcouer Arabia, and ſee the vtter-moſt parts of all the dominions of the Hebrewes vnto the ſea,and it had eight corners. Iuſt op-poſite to this was the tower Hippicos,and neere vnto it were other two,that king Herod builded M vpon the ould wall,which in bigneſſe,beauty and ſtrength,did ſurpaſſe all others in the whole world.

The third wall had 90 towers.

Pſephina was 70 cubites hie.

For king Herod, beſides his naturall liberality and deſire to adorne this City, did alſo for his owne pleaſure ſo beautifie this building, that it might excell all other , and dedica ed them to three moſt renownd perſonages, whoſe names they alſo did bear,to wit,to his brother,his friend and to his wife,ſhe being(as is aforeſaid)put to death for iealouſie; the other two being ſlain in

Herod called three towers by the names of three his moſt deereſt friends.

A warres after they had fought valiantly. The tower Hippicos cald by the name of his friend had foure corners, and euery one of them were fiue and twenty cubites broad, and as many in length, and thirty cubites in height, beeing in no place hollow: and aboue the high places and stone-worke there was a well to receiue raine-water, twenty cubites deepe: and aloft of it were houses with double roofes twenty fiue cubites high, and diuided into many roomes: and aboue them were batlements two cubits high, and turrets three cubites high: so that the whole height was accounted to be fourscore and fiue cubits. The second tower that by his brothers name he called Phasaelus, was in breadth and length forty cubits, and so many cubites high, in figure of a square pillar, all which height was solid, and not hollow within: and aboue this a porch tenne cubites high, decked with turrets and pinnacles. Ouer the midst of this porch he built another
B tower distinguished into goodly roomes & sumptuous bathes, that it should not want any thing necessary for a prince: on the toppe it was beautified with turrets and pinnacles; so that all his height was almost fourscore and ten cubits: And it resembled the tower Pharus at Alexandria, wherein continuall light is kept to guide the seamen that sail thither, sauing that it had a greater compasse then it. And in this house now at this time did Simon lodge, who tyrannized ouer the people. The third tower was, according to the Queenes name, called Mariamme, the wife of Herod, twenty cubites high, all solid, and other twenty cubites broad, hauing more magnificent and beautifull houses and lodgings then the rest. For the king so thought it meet, that the tower called by his wiues name, should be more beautifull then they who only bare the names of other men, like as they were stronger then this that bare the name of a woman. This tower was in all
C 55. cubits high.

The yeare of the world, 4034. after Christs birth, 72.

Hippicos 85. cubits high.

Phasaelus 90. cubits high.

Mariamme a goodly tower 55. cubits high

Notwithstanding these three towers were of such height, yet by reason of their situation they seemed far higher: for the ould wall whereupon they were built was placed vpon high ground, and the toppe of the hill whereupon they stood was aboue thirty cubites high, whereby their height was much increased. The greatnesse also was admirable; for it was not ordinary stone which men might beare, but all white marble, whereof euery stone was twenty cubits long, and ten cubites broad, and fiue cubites thicke: and they were so coupled one to another, that euery stone by it selfe seemed a tower; and so cunningly conioyned by workemens hands, that euery tower seemed one stone. And these were placed on the North side of the City; and adioining to them within the City, was situated the kings palace, surpassing all that can bee spoken of it:
D which for greatnes and excellent worke may be compared to all that were in the world. It was compassed about with a wall thirty cubits high, and adorned with goodly towers round about, euery one of like distance from other; beautified with dwelling houses and lodgings for a hundreth of the Nobility. The variety of the marble it was built withall, was admirable, all sorts being there vsed that were neuer so rare to be found: and the tops of these houses for the length of the beames and the beauty thereof passed all credit; and the multitude of roomes and diuersity of buildings, all filled and adorned with housholde stuffe and furniture. And in euery roome there were many vessels of gold and siluer, and many porches round about, one answerable vnto another, and pillars in euery one. And there were many pleasant walkes repleniſhed with diuers
E trees, and many walking places or allies, all beset with conduits that spouted vp water on high, and cisternes full of brazen images, from which ran out water: and about the water many doue-houses full of tame pigeons. But it is impossible sufficiently to declare the riches and beauty of the kings palace; and a griefe to thinke what goodly things, and how rich the theeues did there set on fire: for these things were not burnt by the Romans, but by the seditious theeues (as is before said) at the beginning of this rebellion, who consumed all with fire, euen from the Castle Antonia from whence the fire came, and destroied the kings palace, and the couers and tops of the three towers. The temple was, as is before said, built vpon a hard mountaine, and at the first the Plaine vpon the toppe thereof was scarcely bigge enough to contain it and the temple yard, the hill beeing very steep. But when king Salomon, who also built the temple, had compassed
F the East part thereof with a wall, he also placed a porch vpon the rampire, and so for many ages
M after, it lay vnfenst on other parts: wherfore the people euery day bringing earth thither, at last made it plaine and large enough: and breaking down the North wal, they took in all that space which the temple hath continually occupied euen vntill now: and the hill being now enclosed with a threefold wall, it was a worke passing all expectation in building. To the effecting whereof many ages were spent, and all the holy treasure offred to God, euen from all parts of the world, was employed therein, as well in the buildings of the higher as of the lower part of the temple, the foundations whereof were laid three hundreth cubites deep, and in many places more: yet could could not all the height of the foundations be seen, being now buried in vallies that were filled vp to make them equall with the straight streets of the City. The stones of this building were of forty cubits: for the abundance of treasure and liberality of the people did effect that which was scarcely possible: and that which all men thought could neuer haue come to passe, in time and by industry came to perfection. G

The porches were built of white marble stone sustaind by pillars.

The building was answerable vnto these foundations. For all the porches were double, and euery one was supported by pillars, each of them being fiue and twenty cubits high, and all of one piece and of white marble: the top wherof was all of Cedar, whose naturall beauty for the good conioyning of this wood & polishing thereof, did astonish all that beheld it, being adorned neither with painting nor carued workes. These porches were thirty cubites broad: and the compasse of them altogether, with the fort of Antonia, was 6. furlongs. All the ground whereon stood no building was curiously wrought & paued with al sorts of stones. The way to the secõd temple was all enclosed with stones of lattice work, which were three cubits high, & most beautifully wrought along: in which place also were placed certain pillars equally distant one from another, to shew the law of purification; some being written vpon in Latine letters, other some in Greek, forbidding all strangers to enter into the holy place: for the second temple is called the holy place. To go vnto the second from the first, one must passe vp fourteene staires, and it was foursquare aloft, and enclosed with a wal by it selfe; whose outside being forty cubits high, was all couered with staires to ascend vp into it; and within, it was fiue and twenty cubits high: for all the part of the inner side was vnseen, because it was built on the descent of a hil. After the fourteene staires there was a Plaine made leuell with the wall of three hundreth cubites: from thence passed on fiue other staires which lead vnto the gates, whereof on the North side and the South there were eight, foure on each side, and two on the East. For it was necessary that there should be a peculiar place for womẽ to exercise their deuotion in, which also was inclosed with a wal. And so it was necessary there should be two doors: and against the first gate there was opposite vnto it one gate on the North side, & another on the South, both separated from the rest, wherby one entred the place allotted for women; for it was not lawfull for any to passe by any other gate vnto the women, neither could they go beyond their own door, because of the wall: for that place was common both to the women of that nation, and also to all strange women that came for religion sake. There was no gate on the West part, but a wall that reached all along in that place. Between the gates were porches opposite one against another, reaching from the wall vnto the treasure house, supported with great and goodly pillars, being as plain and fully as bigge as they belowe. The gates were couered with gold and siluer, as also the posts and foreparts thereof were, one onely excepted that was couered with Corinthian brasse, far surpassing in beauty the other that were couered with siluer and gold. In euery gate there were two doores, each one thirty cubites high, and fifteene cubites broad: and after the entrance where they were made larger, euery one had on each side seats thirty cubites long, and large like a tower, and forty cubites high, each one supported with two pillars twelue cubites thick. And all other gates were of like greatnes; but that which was couerd with Corinthian brasse, which was the entrance into the place allotted for the women, & opened into the East gate of the temple, doubtlesse was bigger then the rest: for it was fifty cubites high (the gates whereof were forty cubits) and was more richly adorned then the rest: for the couer of gold & siluer was thicker then it was in the rest, which Alexander Tiberius his father had melted, to couer all the nine gates. And there were fifteene staires, that went from the wall that separated the women, vnto the great gate of the temple: for these staires were shorter by fiue degrees, then those that went to other gates. The temple it selfe was situated in the midst of all, to wit, the holy Sanctuarie, and had twelue staires to goe vnto it. The forepart whereof was in height and breadth a hundreth cubits: and behinde, it was forty cubits outright: and before, it was as it were two shoulders on each side rising vp in height twenty cubits. The first gate hereof was seuenty cubits high, and twenty fiue wide, and had no doore: for it signified that heauen was spred all ouer & might be seen in euery place: and all the foreparts were gilded with gold, and all the first building did appeare and might be seene without, and all that was within and about the gate glistered with gold. The inner part thereof was diuided into two rooms, whereof onely the first roome might bee seene, which was in height fourescore and ten cubites, and in length forty, and in breadth twenty. The inner gate was (as is already said) all gilded with gold, and all the wall about it, and aboue it: it had a golden vine, whereon were hanging clusters of grapes all of gold, euery cluster beeing as long as a man is high. And because the height was seeled aboue, the inner

A temple did ſeeme to be lower then it was without, and it had golden gates 55. cubites high, and 16. cubits broad. The yeare of the world, 4034. after Chriſts birth, 72.

It had hangings alſo of the ſame length, which was a Babylonian vail, all wrought with violet and purple ſilk and ſcarlet, admirable to behold: the permixtion of which colours had a myſtical meaning, bearing as it were the ſignification of the whole world. For the ſcarlet doth ſeem to expreſſe the fire, the ſilk ſignifieth the earth, the violet ſheweth the aire, and the purple declares the ſea, partly in their colors reſembling them, partly alſo as hauing their beginning from them: for the purple is ingendred in the ſea, and the ſilk is produced by the earth. In this tapeſtry work was curiouſly wrought and deciphered all the ſpeculations of the heauens, onely the celeſtiall ſignes excepted. Being entred within, you com into a lower place of the tẽple, which was three- The Babylonian vaile of admirable workmanſhip. The ſignification of the vail

Againe, this place was diuided into two, whereof the firſt part contained forty cubits, hauing in it three moſt admirable things, and famous throughout the world, to wit, a candleſtick, a table, and the altar of incenſe: vpon the candleſticke ſeuen lampes were placed, which ſignified the ſeuen planets (for ſo many did there come all out of one ſtemme of the candleſticke) vpon the table were ſtanding twelue loaues of bread, ſignifying the twelue celeſtiall ſignes, and reuolution of the yeare. By the altar of incenſe, out of which proceeded thirteen odours, coming partly from the ſea which is vnhabitable, and partly from the earth which is inhabited, is ſignified that all things are in the hands of God, and ſubiect to yield him obedience. The inner part of the temple contained 20. cubites, which alſo was ſeparated from the other part by a vail, & nothing was within it: and this place was the ho- Three admirable works: The candleſtick, the table and cenſer.

On each ſide of the lower temple, there were many lodgings and doores to paſſe into, euery one of them hauing three roofes one aboue another: and there was a gate which led vnto both ſides of the temple, and vnto theſe roomes: but the higher part of the temple had not the like roomes on each ſide, and therefore it was made ſo much narrower then the other, yet was it higher then it by 40. cubits, neither was it ſo gorgeous as the lower. For the whole height was 100. cubites, and the ground thereof ſixty. The vttermoſt part was ſo curious and richly wrought, that it was vnpoſſible for any one to imagine any workmanſhip that it wanted: for it was all couerd with a maſſiue plate of pure gold, which ſhined far brighter then the morning ſunne, ſo that it dazled the eies The outward court of the temple couered with many plates of gold.

The top hereof was al ſet ful of rods of gold, very ſharp at the vpper end like pikes, leſt the birds ſhould come and ſit thereon, and ſo defile it: many ſtones wherewithall it was built, were fiue and forty cubites large, fiue cubits in length, and ſix cubites broad. Before the temple there ſtood an Altar fifteene cubites high, being forty cubits broad, and as many long, and foure ſquare, hauing corners made like hornes. The way to this Altar was on the South ſide, where it by little and little mounted from belowe euen vnto the Altar. This Altar was builded without yron, and neuer iron did touch it. The Temple and the Altar were encloſed with ſtone-worke, beautifull to behold, which was a cubit high ſeparating the people from the prieſts. Thoſe that were troubled with a fluxe of their ſeed, and lepers were expulſed out of the city; and women

Likewiſe men that were not purified were not permitted to come within the inner temple; and thoſe that were, might not come among the prieſts: thoſe alſo that deſcended from the line of the prieſts, and for blindnes did not adminiſter their function, were notwithſtanding admitted into the place appointed for the reſt of the prieſts that were ſound, and had a ſhare as they had; yet did they goe attired as laymen, for onely hee that did ſacrifice might weare prieſtly attire.

The prieſts that came vnto the altar and temple had no infirmitie, and they were clothed in a fine linnen garment, and abſtained from wine, and liued in abſtinence for reuerence of religion, leſt they ſhould ſinne whilſt they offred ſacrifices. in was engrauen sacred letters, to wit, the 4. vowels. He did not alwaies vse this garment, but an H other most commonly not so gorgeous: this he vsed when he entred into the Sanctuary, which he did onely once euery yeere alone, none else going with him, vpon which day all the nation was wont to fast. But wee will hereafter speak more at large of the city and temple, the lawes and customes, the ordinances & obseruations; for these things cannot be briefly declared. The
The descriptiõ of Antonia. castle Antonia was situate in a corner of the two porches of the first temple, which looked vnto the West and the North: and it was built vpon a rock of stone 50. cubits high, which on eue-ry side was inaccessible: this first was built by king Herod, to shew the greatnes and magnificence of his minde. For first of all the rocke at the foot thereof was all couered with thin and slender stones like slates, which did both adorne it, and would also easily slide downe if any one walked vpon them. Before the battlements of the fort there was a wall 3. cubits high, within which the I castle Antonia was built 40. cubits high, being within all furnished and contriued like the palace of a king, hauing all kinde of houses of office, and other necessary roomes. For there were porches, baths and large hals to place tents in: so that for all conuenient rooms and places it seemd highest one might haue a perfect view of the whole temple. Where it ioined to the porches of the temple, there was on either side of it a paire of staires for the souldiers to come downe out of it into the temple. For alwaies the Roman souldiers lodged there, and guarded the temple in armour vpon festiuall daies, lest the people should attempt any rebellion or sedition. For the K temple was as a castle to keep the town in awe, and the castle Antonia to ouerthrow the temple:

there also were placed the souldiers: likewise in Herods palace, which serued for a castle ouer the higher part of the city. The hill Bezetha was diuided from the city, as is before mentioned:
which being the highest of all, was ioined to part of the new city, which did obscure the view of the temple on the North side. And thus I haue here spoken sufficiently of the city & the wall in this place, because we meane hereafter to describe them more at large.

CHAP. VII.

How the Iewes refused to yeeld, and how they assaulted the Romans. L

15000. follow Simõ. THe most warlike of all the people ioined with Simon, being in number ten thousand, beside the Idumæans: and those ten thousand had 50. captaines of their own fellowes, yet all subiect vnto Simon. The Idumæans that tooke his part were fiue thousand, and had ten captaines, the chiefe of whom were Iacob, the son of Sosas, and Simon, the sonne of Cathla.
And Iohn, who kept the temple, had sixe thousand armed men, ouer whom were twentie captaines: and then there came vnto him two thousand of the Zelous, and foure hundreth, who before had followed Eleazar and Simon, the sonne of Iairus. So these warring one against another, the people was their booty, and the multitude that were not seditious as they were, was Simons camp against Iohn. their prey. Simon kept the higher part of the City, and the greater wall euen vnto Cedron, and all that part of the ould wall which is betweene Siloa and the palace of Monobazus, who M was king of Adiabena, that lieth beyond the riuer Euphrates: hee also kept all the hill Acra (which is the lower part of the city) vnto Helenas palace, who was Monobazus his mother.
But Iohn kept all the temple & the space about it, Ophla, and the vallie Cedron: and that which was between these two places which Simon and Iohn kept, was all consumed with fire, and made a place to fight in. For although the Romans tents were pitched neer vnto the wals of the citie, yet did not this sedition cease; but hauing recouered some security a while at the Romans first coming,

A comming presently they returned vnto their former wont. And diuiding themselues againe, euerie man fought for his owne part, doing all that the Romanes could wish to be done. For the Romanes did them no more harme then they did themselues: for after them the Citie suffered no newe calamitie, but indured farre more miserie before it was taken & destroyed by the Romans, then it did at that time. For the Romans in destroying it did rather end their misery, then bring them into it. For the seditious did take the citie, and the Romanes did ouercome and take the seditious, which was farre stronger then the walles: so that one may ascribe all their miseries to their owne nation, and equitie and iustice vnto the Romans, as euery one shall cleerely see by that which ensued.

The yeare of the world, 4034. after Christs birth, 72.

The seditious tooke the city & the Romans ouercame and tooke the seditious.

The citie being in the estate beforesaid, Titus with chosen horsemen went vp and down with-
B out it, to espy where he might most easily assault the wals. And being in doubt a long time what to doe, for that where the vallie was, footemen could not possibly get vp to it: and where it was walled, they seemed to be impossible to be battered downe with engines: At last he determined to assault it on that part, where was the monument of Iohn the high priest: for onely in this place the first wall was lower then in other places, and it was not compast here with the second wall, for this place was not fortified, because that those parts of the new citie were not much inhabited. So that from this place the wall might easily be assaulted: wherby Titus was perswaded that the higher citie, and the Temple, and Antonia, might easily be taken. As he was thus viewing the place, one of his friends called Nicanor, came vnto him: who was shot in the left shoulder with an arrow, because hee desired to come neere Ioseph, who went thither of purpose to perswade the
C Iewes which were vpon the wall to yeelde: for Nicanor was very eloquent. Cæsar perceiuing their minds, & that they would not abstaine from him, who perswaded them to that which was most expedient for them, was now moued, and began earnestly to besiege them: and so he permitted his souldiers to waste all the suburbes, and to gather all the rubbish, stones, wood, & other matter together, and made therewith a mount. And diuiding his army into three parts, hee disposed of euery one what he should do, & in the midst of all vpon the mounts he placed archers, and before them engines for shot, wherewithall he hindered the incursions of his enemies, least they should annoy the worke, & also did beate those off from the wall, who made any resistance
D from thence. And presently all trees being cut downe, the suburbes appeared naked. Whilst the Romans, hauing gathered the wood together, were busied in their worke, the Iewes were not idle: and then the people, who were troubled with murders & robberies, did hope to haue an end of their miserie, the seditious people being busied against their enemies: & they now hoped that if the Romans did ouercome, they might be reuenged vpon them. Iohn still kept where hee was, fearing Simon; yet were his followers very earnest to assault the Romans. But Simon beeing next vnto the siege, did not rest, but placed all along that part of the wall, men with darts, which before were taken from Sestius Gouernour of the Romans, and found in the Castle of Antonia. But the darts did the Iewes small pleasure, by reason that few of them knew how to vse them: onelie some who were taught by certaine that fled from the Romanes, could vse them a little. Yet did they assault the Roman souldiers that were building the mounts, vvith arrowes and stones; and also made incursions vpon them by companies, and fought with them. But the Romane worke-
E mē were defended by hurdles that were of purpose set before them: & euery legion had strange and admirable engines against the excursions of their enemies, & especially the engines that the tenth legion had to cast darts, and others that cast stones; which did not onely repulse them, by whom they were assaulted, but also those that stood vpon the wall: for euery stone was a talent vveight, and vvere shot more then a furlong, and slew not only those that they did first strike, but also many that were striken with the rebound. But the Iews alwaies espied the stones before they came (for they were white) and so auoided them: and they were not onely descried by the noyse they made in flying, but they might easily bee perceiued: and by this meanes the watchmen in the towers gaue warning alwaies when these engines vvere shotte off, & vvhen the stones came, crying in their countrie language, The stone commeth: so the Iewes vpon the vvalles knowing F vvhat they meant, auoided the stones, and so receiued no harme. Then the Romans deuised to blacke the stones with inke, and so they could not bee seene as they flew, but at one stroke slew many. But the Iews were not herewith so terrified, that they permitted the Romanes peaceably to build the mount, but night and day they hindered them vvith stratagemes and valour. Now when the Romanes had finished their vvorke, the Carpenters measured the space betweene the mounts and the walles with a plummet fastned vnto a line, which they cast from one place vnto another: for they could not measure it otherwise, because of the darts cast from the walles; and finding that they had Rammes long enough, they set them vp, and Titus commaunded the wall to be battered in three places, to the end that the batterie might not bee hindred. The noyse that these rams did make, was heard round about the citie; and the citizens cried mainely out, & the seditious persons were also sore afraid. And seeing themselues all in like danger, they now determined to ioine all together in resisting the Romans: and the seditious cried one vnto another, saying, that they rather assisted the enemies, then resisted them: & therfore exhorted one another at least for that time to become friends, if not for euer, onely to resist the Romanes. And Simon sent a crier vnto the temple, licensing al such as would to come vnto the wals: which also Iohn did permit, notwithstanding he mistrusted Simon: so they forgetting their old quarrel, ioined all together, and resisted the Romans, and guarding the walles round they cast much fire vpon the engines of the Romans, and against those that did rule them; & threw darts against them without intermission; and the boldest amongst them in great companies leapt down, and destroyed that wherewith the engines were couered, and assaulted those that stood to defend them; and so did the Romans much harme, by reason of their desperate boldnes, more then by their skill.

Titus comandeth the wall to be battered in three places

The seditious forgetting their hatred and discords ioine in one.

Titus was still at hand to succour them that stood in neede: & placing horsemen & Archers about the engines, he repulsed the Iewes who came to cast fire, and represſed them that cast darts, and shot arrowes from the towers, & so gaue the rams time & opportunity to beat the wals. Yet for all this the wall was not shaken with rams, saue onely that the ram of the fift legion did shake the corner of a tower; but yet the wall stoode firme, and was not harmed by the shaking of the tower: for it was far higher then the wall, and so could not draw downe any part of the wall as it fell. So soone as they had a while ceased from excursions, they perceiued that all the Romanes were busied in one labour or other, and so dispersed all ouer the camp, thinking that the Iews for feare durst come no more. The Iewes al secretly issued out of the gate by the tower Hippicos, & cast fire vpon the works, & courageously made incursion vpon the Romans euen vnto the rampire of their campe. The Romans seeing what daunger might ensue, presently assembled themselues, both they that were neere, & those that were far off. The discipline of the Romans ouercame the furie of the Iewes: and putting those to flight that first met them, they assaulted those that opposed themselues against them afterward. So there began a grieuous battell about the engines; the Iewes striuing to fire them, and the Romans fighting to hinder them: and a doubtfull cry was raised on both parts, & many in the forefront were slaine on both sides. But the Iews audacitie got them the vpper hand; & their fire did something touch the engines: and all had been cõsumed quite with fire, had not the chosen souldiers that came frõ Alexandria hindred it, who for the opinion that they had of themselues did fight stoutly: for they were accounted to haue beene the most valiant of all in this battell; till such time as the Emperour with certaine selected horsemen came and set violently vpon the enemies: and he himself slew twelue men that did resist him; for whose deaths the rest fearing fled, and were forced to retire themselues into the Citie, and so saued the engines from being fired. It chanced that one of the Iewes was in this fight taken aliue, and Titus commanded that hee should be crucified before the wall, that perhaps the rest being herewithall terrified might yeelde. After Cæsar was retired, Iohn the Captaine of the Idumæans talking vpon the wall with one of his friends, being striken in the breast with an arrow by an Arabian soldier, presently died: which caused great lamentation among the Iewes, and sorrow amongst the seditious, for he was valiant of his hands, and very wise and of good aduice.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the fall of the tower: and how the two walles were taken.

THe night following, there was a great tumult amongst the Romans. For Titus the Emperour had commanded to be builded three towers, fiftie cubits high a peece, each one vpon a seuerall mount, that from thence hee might the more easily beate the enemies from off the wals: but one of these towers in the middest of the night fell downe wihtout any assault. And making a great noyse with the fall, feare fell vpon the whole army; who suspecting that it came to passe by some stratagem wrought by the Iewes, euery one ranne and armed himselfe, and so there was a great tumult in the armie: and for that no man could tel what the matter was, a long time, they stoode as it were all amazed, euery one asking his fellow what had happened. And seeing no enemies come, they beganne to feare some treason amongst themselues; and so were in a great feare they knew not wherefore, til such time as Titus vnderstanding the

A the matter, cauſed the truth thereof to be preſently proclaimed throughout the campe; and ſo the tumult (although vvith much adoe) vvas appeaſed. The yeare of the world, 4034. after Chriſts birth, 72.

The Iewes valiantly bearing and induring all other dangers, were ſore troubled by reaſon of theſe towers vvhich Titus had erected; for they were ſlaine and wounded from thence with ſinal engine ſhot, darts and arrowes; neither could they build themſelues any ſo high, nor was there any hope to deſtroy them: for neither could they be throwne downe for their vvaight, nor fired becauſe they were couered vvith yron: and ſo they flying out of the reach of the ſhot, did not ſeeke to hinder the ram frō battering their wals; which neuer ceaſing, at laſt preuailed ſomwhat. So the great ramme, which the Iewes called Nicon, becauſe it ouercame all, at laſt battered the wal; and the Iews being weary with fighting, for that they had watched all the night before, for B ſloth, or elſe becauſe they perſwaded themſelues that the wall was ſuperfluous, they hauing two more beſide it, they all forſooke their quarters, and retired themſelues vnto the ſecond vvall; and the Romans entred the firſt, that the ram called Nicon had battered. Then the Romans that had paſſed and entred the firſt wall, went and opened the gates and let in the whole army. Hauing thus gotten the wall the ſeuenth day of May, they deſtroied the greateſt part thereof; and alſo the North ſide of the citie which before Ceſtius had waſted.

Titus remooued his campe from thence, and vvent vnto the place called the Aſſyrians campe, and ſeiſed vpon all betweene that and Cedron; and beeing without the ſhotte of an arrow from the ſecond wall, he began againe to aſſault it. Then the Iewes diuiding the wall betwixt them to defend each others part, they reſiſted moſt valiantly. And Iohn and his partakers defended all C Antonia, and the North part of the Temple from Alexanders toombe: and Simon defended all from Iohns toombe vnto the gate by the tower Hippicos. And many times iſſuing out at the gates they fought hand to hand with the enemy, being alwaies repulſed by the diſcipline of the Romanes, only for want of knowledge in warlike affaires; and ſtill in all fights vpon the wal they got the beſt: for the Romans were aſſiſted by fortune and knowledge, and the Iews with deſperate boldnes which came of feare; for they are of ſtout courage in aduerſitie. Moreouer, the Iewes vvere mooued to fight in hope that way to ſaue their owne liues: and the Romanes to get a ſpeedy conqueſt. Neither partie vvas vvearie, neither did they euer ceaſe from aſſaulting one another: all the day long the Iewes in whole companies made excurſions againſt the Romanes, and they omitted no kinde of fight, beginning at ſunne riſe, and continuing all night long, farre D more terrible to them both then in all the day before: the Iewes feared leaſt that the Romans ſhould get the wall; & the Romans likewiſe miſdreaded that the Iews ſhould inuade their camp. Thus ſtill all night long beeing armed, early in the morning they vvere prepared again to fight. The Iewes did one ſtriue with another who ſhould vndergoe the moſt danger, and ſo deſeruehis captaines fauour. Simons followers did greatly reuerence & feare him, inſomuch as if hee ſhould haue commanded any of them to haue killed himſelfe, hee vvould preſently haue done it. The Romanes vvere encouraged to fight, by their wont and cuſtome in getting the victorie, and that they were not vvont to bee ouercome: againe, their frequent and daily vvarres & continuall exerciſes, and large dominions gaue the like courage, and eſpecially Titus their Generall ſtil preſent in all their affaires greatly ſtirred them forwarde: for euerie one thought it a hainous crime to E be a coward in the preſence of ſuch a captaine as Cæſar vvas. Cæſar himſelfe behoulding and looking on, vvho alſo vvas a vvitneſſe of their deedes that behaued themſelues valiantly, would reward euery man for his valour: beſide that, it was aduantage to be eaſily knowne vnto the prince for a valiant man: ſo that many of them ſhewed that their alacritie vvas farre greater then their ſtrength. At this time Longinus one of the horſemen comming out of the Roman armie, preaſed into the midſt of the Iews forces, & caſting them downe that ſtood in his way, by this violence he ſlew two of the ſtrongeſt of the enemies amongſt them, ſtriking one of them ouer the face, & ſlaying the other with his owne dart he tooke from him: vvho for this deed was greatly honoured, hauing broken thorow a ſtrong army of the Iewes, that were placed before the wals, and caſt darts at him on either ſide. Many of the Romanes by this his example were entiſed to F doe the like. The Iewes now regarded not what they ſuffered, but onely deuiſed which way to harme their enemy; nothing eſteeming death, ſo that they might kill ſome one of the Romanes. But Titus had as much care to preſerue his ſouldiers, as he had to get the victory; affirming theſe raſh aſſaults to proceed of deſperation: and that onely was to be accounted for vertue, when one did warilie not indaunger himſelfe to atchieue any worthy action, and willed them rather to ſhew themſelues men where there was no danger.

CHAP. IX.

How Castor the Iew derided the Romans.

WHen Titus commanded the ramme to be set vp against the tower on the North part of the citie, wherein a craftie and politike Iew accompanied with ten men had hid himselfe, all the rest being fled: this Iew was named Castor. These men hauing lien still a while there in their armour, at last being afraid and the tower beginning to shake, they start vp: and Castor stretching foorth his hand, did as it were humbly craue fauour at Cæsars hands, and with a lamentable voice besought him to spare him. Titus seeing the mans simplicity, as he thought, and perswading himselfe that the Iews did now repent them of their enterprise, he caused the ram to cease from battery, and the archers to hold their hands; and withall permitted Castor to speake his pleasure. Castor said, that he desired to come & make a league of peace. And Titus answered, that he would grant it, if so be all the rest would doe so likewise; & that he would presently confirme a league of peace betweene him and the city. Fiue of Castors fellowes seemed to bee willing, and to request the like; but the other fiue counterfaited to withstand them, crying out aloud, that they would neuer bee slaues vnto the Romans, seeing they might die in libertie. Whilest Castor and his fellowes were debating the matter, the batterie ceased. In the meane time Castor priuily sent worde vnto Simon, willing him whilest the batterie ceased to deliberate what was expedient to be done in this necessitie: for he a while would deceiue the Roman Emperour, and hold him in suspence. And in the meane time hee seemed to exhort his companions that denied to embrace the kind offer of Titus: & they as it were angry hereat, drew their swods and strooke vpon their corslets; and they so striken seemed to fall down, as though they had bin slaine. Titus & his souldiers were amazed at this their obstinacie; for beeing on the lower ground they could not well perceiue what was done: and so they wondred at their desperation, & also pitied their calamity. At this time one strooke Castor in the buttock with a dart, & Castor pulling it out of his flesh, shewed it vnto the Emperour; & complained of it, as being iniured. Titus presently with sharp words corrected him that shot it, and forthwith would haue sent Ioseph to promise Castor pardon and peace. But Ioseph denied to goe, affirming that Castor only dissembled, and so hindred his friends that would haue gone. At last one Aeneas, who had fled vnto the Romans, offered himselfe to go. Castor inuited him, as though hee would giue him some thing in token of his true meaning. Then Aeneas opened the skirt of his garment, thinking Castor would haue cast him downe something of worth: and when he came vnderneath the tower, Castor tooke a great stone and threw it downe vpon him; yet hurt him not, because hee was aware of it, & auoided the stone; but it wounded another souldier standing by. Then Cæsar considering this deceit, began to thinke that pietie & mercie in warres was hurtfull, & that cruelty was not so easily deceiued; and so being very angry at this deceit, hee caused the wall to bee beaten with the ramme more then before. Castor and his fellowes perceiuing the tower to shake, they set it on fire, and so passed through the flame, and conueied themselues into a mine of the tower; so that again the Romans admired their courage, thinking that they had burned themselues.

Mercy in wars hurtfull.

Titus assaulting the wall on this part, took it fiue daies after that he had taken the first; and causing the Iewes to fly frō thence, he accompanied with a thousand chosen men about him, entred in where the woolmen, & copperſmiths, & marchant-tailors dwelt, which place was the new citie, hauing only narrow & straight waies to go vnto the wall. And had he presently beaten down a great part of the wall, or according to the lawes of armes destroied what hee had gotten, hee had obtained the victory without any losse on his side. Yet now hoping the Iewes would yeeld, seeing that if he pleased he might take them by force, he gaue the more ample & easie passage to retire: for he did not thinke that they whose good he sought, would haue bin traitors vnto him.

Titus taketh the second wall.

CHAP. X.

How the Romanes did twice take the second wall.

WHen Titus was entred the citie, hee suffred none of them that were taken, to be slaine, nor the houses to bee burned, but permitted the seditious (if they were so minded) to fight, and that without the preiudice of the people: & also promised the people to restore vnto them all their goods. For many besought him to spare the citie for them; and the temple for the

A the citie. The people were glad hereof: and many of the warlike Iewes thought the humanity of Titus to proceed from cowardize; and iudged that Titus, for that he despaired to winne the rest of the citie, did now cowardlike propound these conditions. They likewise threatned all the people, that whosoeuer should speake one worde concerning peace and yeelding vnto the Romans, should presently die: & some of them did resist the Romans from out of their houses, and others in the narrow waies: and others going out at the higher gates, began a battell, wherewith the watchmen being troubled, fled from the wall, and forsaking the towers, they retired themselues into their campe. The Roman souldiers within the city cryed out, because they were enclosed with enemies, the gates being shut, & assaulted without by those who apprehended their cõpanions to be in great danger. The number of the Iewes encreasing, and preuailing, for that they
B knew the waies and turnings of the streets, many of the Romans were slaine, and violently born downe, when they offered to resist in that necessitie; for a multitude togither could not flie, by reason of the narrownes of the streets, that went vnto the wall; and all that entered into the city had been slaine, had not Titus succoured them. For placing at the beginning of euery streete archers, and himselfe being where most need was, he so did driue away the Iewes with darts and arrowes: and with him Domitius Sabinus, who in that fight was proued a stout warriour; who so long continued beating the Iewes with arrowes, till all the souldiers were escaped away.

They interpret warlike Titus humanitie for cowardize.

The Romans are driue out by the Iewes.

Thus the Romans hauing got the second wall were beaten from it againe: And the citizens fit for war were hereat encouraged, & were drunken with this good fortune, thinking that now the Romans durst no more offer to come into the citie, and that they could not be ouercom if they
C did arme themselues to fight. For God, because of their iniquity had darkned their vnderstanding, so that they neuer considered that the Romane forces were far greater then they that were ouercome, nor the famine that presently ensued; for as yet they liued vpon the destruction of the people, and dranke the bloud of the citie: but the good did euen now suffer famine, and many of them had alreadie perished for want of foode: yet the seditious did reioice at the death of the citizens, as though thereby they were eased of a great burthen, only desiring their liues that bare rebellious minds, & would ioyne with them against the Romans, reioicing at the death of the rest, as freed frõ a heauy clogge: & this was the affection they bare vnto their Citizens. And so they armed themselues, and resisted the Romans, who now againe did attempt to enter the breach: and they threw down stones and part of the wall vpon them as they came vp, and so
D draue them backe againe, and valiantly resisted them for three daies. But the fourth day they were not able to withstand Titus his assault, but were forced to retire, as before: and hee hauing gotten the wall, destroied all the North part thereof, and placed a garrison in the towers and fortresses of the South part.

CHAP. XI.

Of the mounts raised to batter the third wall: and a long Oration of Iosephs to perswade the people to yeelde: and of the famine in the Citie.

Titus now determined to batter the third wall, and he thought to continue that siege but a short time: and that it was conuenient to giue the seditious some time to bethink themselues, to see if that either by the taking of the second wall, or terrified with famine, they would repent. For now there was no mo preies for them left in the city, & he lay before the wals thereof, euen as he desired. And the time being come, that euery souldier should receiue victuals and prouision for himselfe, Titus caused them to bee led euery one in order into a place, where the Iewes in the city might perfectly behold them, & caused his captaines to distribute money to euery one: and the souldiers (as their custome is) all armed, and drawing their swords out of F their sheathes, marched along, the horsemen leading their horses gallantly adorned, and a great part of the suburbes glistered with gold & siluer. This spectacle was gratefull to their own souldiers, and terrible to the Iewes: for all the old walles, and the North part of the citie, and many houses were filled with the multitude of them, who came to view this sight: & there was no part of the city that was not filled with people to see & behould it. And feare came vpõ the very boldest amongst all the Iewes, seeing both the Romans armour & their order: and perhaps that shew would haue caused the seditious people to haue relented, had they not despaired to haue found mercy and pardon at the Romans hands for their offences committed; and so they thought it better to bee preſently ſlaine in warres, then to be put to death ſhamefully, if they deſiſted from fight. Deſtiny alſo hindred this, whereby it was decreed that the innocent ſhould periſh with the wicked, and the citie with the ſeditious, and for foure daies ſpace they diſtributing neceſſaries vnto the ſouldiers; and on the fift day Titus perceiuing that for ought he could do, the Iewes were ſtill obſtinate, he diuided his armie into two parts, and about Iohns tomb hee began to raiſe mounts, and againſt Antonia, hoping that waies to take the higher part of the citie, and by Antonia to ſeiſe the temple; which except hee could effect, hee could not ſafely take the citie: and againſt either of theſe places hee raiſed two mounts, euery legion making one. The Iewes and Simons followers did hinder the work that was begunne before Iohns tomb, and Iohn likewiſe with a great number of the Zelous hindred them that made the mounts ouer againſt Antonia: who not onely did fight with the aduantage of the higher ground, but alſo had now learned the vſe of engines: for continuall vſe by little and little made them skilful, and they had 300. engines called Baliſtaes: and 40. engines to caſt ſtones, wherewith they greatly annoied the Romans, and hindred them from their work.

Deſtinie had decreed that the innocent ſhould periſh with the nocent, and the citie with the ſeditious.

The Romans in their labour are hindred by the Iewes.

Titus, foreknowing that fortune would fauour him, and that the city was like to periſh, haſted to take it, neuer ceaſing to perſwade the Iewes to yield: & with his deeds he ioined counſel. For he knew that many times words preuaile more then violence of armes, & exhorted them to ſaue themſelues, & yield the city vnto him: & told them of Ioſeph, how that he ſhould make a ſpeech vnto them in their owne language, for he hoped that they would heare their owne countriman. Then Ioſeph, going about the City without the danger of ſhot, cried vnto them to ſpare themſelues, the City, the Temple, the people, and not become more hard-hearted againſt them then ſtrangers were. For the Romans did reuerence the holy places, notwithſtanding they had no ſociety or portion in them; and how euen till this day they had abſtained from violating them: and they who were nouriſht with them, and might onely ſaue them, did wilfully cauſe their deſtruction: and bad them conſider that their ſtrongeſt wals were battered down; and onely now the weaker remaining vnbattered, he willed them to conſider, how they were not able to withſtand the Romans forces. And that it was no newes to the Iewes, nor ſtrange, to be ſubiect vnto the Romans. For although it be a good and commendable thing, to fight for liberty, yet that was to be done in the beginning: for hee that was once ſubiect, and would rebell, hauing a long time liued vnder the obedience of the Romans, ſeemd rather to be deſirous of a ſhamefull death then a louer of liberty. Moreouer, that they ſhould diſdaine to be ſubiect vnto baſe people, and not vnto them whom the whole world obeyed. For (ſaid he) what place haue not the Romanes that may be inhabited? Nay themſelues might perceiue how fortune did ſtill fauour them: And that God who guided the Empire to be placed in all parts, was now in Italy. Alſo that euen by the law of nature, aſwell by the example of beaſtes as of men, wee are taught to giue place vnto them that are ſtronger then our ſelues, and be contented that they ſhould get the victory that are valianteſt in armes. And this (quoth he) was the cauſe that your anceſtors who were far more ſtrong and politike then you, and had better meanes to reſiſt; yet did they ſubmit themſelues vnto the Romans: which if God had not beene pleaſed withall, hee would neuer haue permitted them to haue done. And how could they hope to reſiſt, ſeeing the citie was as it were already taken? And that the citizens ſuppoſing their walles were whole, yet were they all deſtroied. For the Romans well knew what famine was amongſt them, and how it did euery day waſte the people, and would alſo in ſhort time deſtroy the warriours amongſt them. For ſuppoſe that the Romans would ceaſe, and not beſiege the citie, nor offer with drawne ſwords to aſſault it: yet is there a ciuill warre within the Citie, which the Iewes cannot ouercome or auert, it euery daie increaſing: except they would alſo fight againſt hunger, and they alone ouercome aduerſe fortune. Further, he added, that it was beſt, before intolerable calamities befell them, to chaunge their opinion, and whileſt they haue time to be counſelled by good aduice. And that the Romans would not puniſh them for that which was alreadie paſt, except they perſiſted obſtinate euen vn to the ende. For they are (quoth he) kind, courteous, and gentle to their ſubiects, and doe prefer their commoditie before reuenge. And they thought it aduantage to haue the citie, & the country inhabited; therefore the Emperours would make a league of peace with them: but if he tooke the citie by force, he would not ſpare one, eſpecially ſeeing that they were willed by him to ſaue themſelues, and yet in their greateſt neceſſitie refuſed to obey him. Likewiſe he tould them that the third wall would alſo be taken very ſhortly, as well they might perceiue by the two walles: and ſuppoſe that the city was inexpugnable, yet the famine would cauſe it to be yeelded into the Romans hands in deſpite of them.

Ioſephs Oration to the Iews

Fortune and God for the Romans.

Famine in the Citie.

As

A As Ioseph did thus aduise them, many standing vpon the wals did raile against him, many vp- braided him,& others shot at him. Ioseph seeing he could not avert them frō their imminent ca- lamites,recounted vnto them al their owne Histories making for his purpose. Owretches(quoth he)and vngrateful to them that help you: you fight against the Romans, and bear armes against them,as though this way you had conquered some others that came, as they now doe, against you. When doth God the maker of all things denie help vnto vs if wee bee oppressed? Will ye not remember your selues? For what cause did you enterprise these warres,& how great a friend and assister of yours doe you daily offend? Do ye not remember the miraculous works of your ancestors, and this holy place; & how in times past it was by the enemies destroied? But I quake and tremble to recount the works of God to such vnworthy hearers: yet harken, that you may B know that you do not only resist the Romans,but also God himselfe. Nechus at that time king of Egypt,who also was called Pharao,came,& with an infinite army tooke away Queene Sara, the mother of our nation. And what did our first father Abraham in this case? Did he with weapons and armes reuenge this iniurie? hauing vnder his command three hundreth and 18 captaines, & vnder them an infinite multitude? Or did he rather desist from warre, perceiuing God not to ac- company him? wherefore lifting vp pure and vndefiled hands towards this holy place, which now you haue defiled and prophaned,he chose God an inuincible helper to aide him. And was not the Queene the second night after sent homeagaine vnto him vntouched? And the Egyptian adoring this holy place, which ye haue polluted with murders of your own nation,& trembling at the visions he saw in the night time fled,rewarding the Hebrewes with gold and siluer,whom C he perceiued to be so beloued of God. Shall I recount vnto you the going of our ancestors into Egypt? who hauing for foure hundreth yeeres been slaues vnto the Egyptian tyrants & kings,& able to haue reuenged themselues by force of armes, yet did they rather expect and stay Gods leasure. Who knoweth not,that then Egypt in reuenge of the Hebrewes,was filled with al kinds of serpents,and infected with all diseases,and the earth became so barren,that Nilus wexed dry, and the tenne plagues followed one another without ceasing; wherby our ancestors were safely deliuered without any bloudshed: for God conducted them, as willing to reserue them for his Priests.

When the Assyrians had taken away from vs the holy Arke, did not Palestina and Dagon re- pent that fact? did not all the nation of them that tooke it, weepe & lament therefore? For their D priuie parts being putrefied, their bowels and the meat they did eat ran out there; and so with vncleane hands they were forced to bring it back againe, with cymbals and trumpets: therby to make satisfaction for their offence. It was God that did this for our aunce stors, because that they laying their armes aside,wholly resigned themselues to his pleasure. Was Senacherib king of As- syria, comming with all his power out of Asia, and incamping himselfe before this citie, ouer- come by humane force? Did not our ancestors leauing armes,flie to prayers, and by an Angell God in one night destroyed an infinite army? And the next day the Assyrian rising,found a hū- dreth fourscore & fiue thousand of his men dead; and so fledde with the rest from the Hebrews being vnarmed,& not pursuing him? You knowe also, that in the captiuitie of Babylon, where the people liued the space of 70 yeers,they got not their libertie till such time as God put in Cy- E rus hart, to suffer them to goe into their owne countrey. Who still assisting them, they againe as the Priests in old time were wont,did serue and reuerence their helper. In briefe, our ancestors did neuer atchieue any great matter by force of armes, neither did they leaue any thing vndon, wherein they expected Gods helpe,but still remaining quiet at home, they ouercame their ene- mies through his prouidence: & whenthey did fight after their own wils,they alwaies failed of their expectation. For when Zedechias our king, contrary to the admonition of the prophet Iere- nie, did go forth,and fight with the king of Babylon then besieging the city,both hee and all his were taken,& this city destroied. Yet consider how far your captains are inferior vnto that king, and your selues vnto the people of those times. For Ieremy crying vp & downe the citie, and say- ing that God was offended at their iniquitie,& that except they did yeeld the same, it should be F taken by force; yet did not the king nor any of the people lay hands vpon him. And you (that I may omit your iniquity done within the city, which though I would I could not sufficiently dis- cipher)do attept to kil me,& vse railing speeches against me, who once gaue you wholsom cou- sell for your good; only for that I put you in mind of your sins,you not enduring to hear of that which you daily commit. This same betided also when Antiochus surnamed Epiphanes besieged the Citie,GOD beeing highly displeased at our ancestors, who going out in armes against him were all slaine,the towne spoiled,and this holy place for three yeeres and sixe moneths made de- solate, solate. What should I shew vnto you any more examples? Who first incited the Romans themselues against the Iewes? Was it not the impietie of our owne countrimen that did it? Whence began our bondage at that time? Did it not proceed from the sedition of our ancestors, when the furie of Aristobulus and Hircanus brought Pompey into our citie: and so God subdued them vnto the Romans, being now vnworthy of liberty? And at length hauing for three months space endured a siege, being not so great offenders as you are, and better able to abide the siege then you, yet did they yeeld themselues. Are we ignorant of the end of Antigonus, the sonne of Aristobulus, who inuading the kingdome, brought our nation againe into subiection; God so laying this bondage vpon them, for that he was moued at the iniquitie of our nation? And Herod the sonne of Antipater, brought Sosius and the Romane armie, and besieged the citie round six moneths space: & at last, for the greatnesse of their iniquitie was taken and punished for their offences, & the citie sacked by the enemies. So you euidently see that our nation did neuer preuaile by force of armes. And assure your selues that the Citie will be taken by this siege. It is meet therfore that you who keep this holy place, wholly commit your selues to Gods will & pleasure, & then feare not the forces of the enemies, when by reason of your pietie, you are assured of Gods helpe and succour. But what one parcell of Gods law haue you obserued? Nay, what mischiefe haue you left vndone, that he detesteth not? How farre greater is your impietie then theirs, that did suddainely perish for their sinnes? For you making small account of secret sinnes, to wit, stealing, deceit, and adulteries, do violently take away mens goods by open force, and murder whom yee please; and haue deuised new waies to sinne. Moreouer, you haue made the holy Temple a place of all these your impieties; and the seate that the Romans did adore, is by our owne nation polluted: much derogating from the honour of our religion by your impious facts. Last of all, you hope of his help whom you haue so hainously offended. Truely you are very iust people & obedient, and with pure hands you aske help of God. Did our king thus pray vnto God, when he obtained that in one night so many of the Assyrians should be destroied? Or doe the Romans cõmit such impietie as the Assyrians did, that you may hope of the like reuenge against them? for he hauing receiued a peece of money to saue the citie, did, not regarding his oath, seek to destroy the same. The Romans doe onely reqneſt the tribute that our auncestors were wont to pay vnto them: which if they haue, they will neuer destroy the citie, nor touch our holy things. They will also permit you to enioy freely your families and possessions, and suffer our lawes to remaine inuiolate. It is altogether madnesse for you to hope that God will so punish iust men, as he did sinners and impious persons, who knoweth to punish at his pleasure. To be short, hee destroied the Assyrians the first night, that they encamped before the citie. And if he purposed also to deliuer you, and punish the Romans, he would then haue done it, when Pompey and Sosius came against the citie, or when Vespasian wasted Galilee, or lastly now, when Titus came to assault it. But neither Pompey nor Sosius suffered any harme, yet both of them tooke the citie. Vespasian so gained by warring against vs, that he hath hereby got the whole Empire. And the fountaines which before gaue you no water, yeeld it to Titus in great aboundance. You know that before his comming, the fountains without the citie and Siloa were so dried vp, that water was sold by measure: yet now they flow so plentifully, that they do not only serue all the army, & their cattell also, but besides that, do water all the gardens about. What this wonder foretelleth, you haue already experience, when the king of Babylon came with his army and destroied the city: who tooke it & fired it & the temple, notwithstanding that (as I am perswaded) the Iewes of that time were nothing so wicked as you are. Wherfore I thinke that God hath forsaken this holy place, & is now gone to them that do besiege you. Wil not a good man flie a wicked house, and hate the impious that dwel therein? And do you then thinke that God wil abide your impiety, who beholdeth al secrets, & knoweth all things that are hid? But what is secret amongst you? Or what do you seeke to hide? Nay, what do you that your enemies doe not know? All your iniquities are disclosed to all men: & you euery day striue one with another who shall bee most impious. And you doe as greatly labour to shew your selues vicious, as others do to shew themselues vertuous. Yet for all this, there is time to amend, and Gods wrath will be appeased, if ye acknowledge your sins, & be penitent for your offences. Cease frõ armes, be ashamed of your countrey now ruined through your owne meanes. Turne your eyes & behould the beautie of the place, whose ruine you seek. How braue a City, how gorgeous a Temple, how rich with the gifts of all nations? Who would fire these? Who would desire the ruine of these? Or what is there in the world that better deserueth to be preserued then these? O hard harted people, and more blockish then stones. If you doe not pittie these, yet let your families moue you; euery one of you look vpon your children, wiues, Ioſeph crying thus vnto them with teares trickling downe his cheeks, the ſeditious were nothing moued, but told him that it was not ſafety for them to yeeld. But the people were perſwaded to flie: and ſome ſelling their poſſeſſions & that they had for ſmall prices, they did ſwallow downe the gold, for feare the theeues ſhould take it from them. And ſo when they had eſcaped vnto the Romans, they emptying their bellies found it againe, & ſo had money to buy them neB ceſſaries. Titus alſo permitted many to go away whither ſoeuer they pleaſed: which thing cauſed diuers to flie, ſeeing that therby they were deliuered out of their calamitie, which in the cittie they aboade, and were not forced to ſerue the Romans. But Iohn & Simon were as diligent to ſtop the waies, leaſt the Citizens ſhould eſcape, as they did hinder the Romans from entring into the Citie: ſo that whoſoeuer did but giue any ſuſpicion of flight, hee was preſently by them put to death. The richer ſort, whether they ſtaied or fled, were ſlaine for their wealth and poſſeſſions. The famine of the citie, and the deſperation of the thieues both increaſed alike, euery day more & more; ſo that now there was no more corne found. Wherfore the ſeditious perſons brake into the houſes, and ſearched euery corner for to find corne; and if after their ſearch they found any, then they did beat the owners for denying it at the firſt: & if they found none, they tortured the C houſholders, as hauing more cunningly hidden it. And whoſoeuer was yet ſtrong of body, and well liking, him they preſently kild; for hereby they deemed him to haue ſtore of food, or elſe he ſhould not haue bin in ſo good plight of body as he was. And they that were pined with famine were by theſe barbarous ſeditious people ſlaine, who eſteemed it no offence to kill them, who wold ſhortly after die though they were left aliue. Many both rich & poore ſecretly exchanged all that they had for one buſhell of corne, and preſently ſhutting themſelues in the ſecret'ſt roome of their houſe, ſome of them did eate the corne as it was, vnground: others made bread thereof as neceſſitie and feare required. No man in the whole citie ſate down to eate his meat on D a table, but greedily taking it not boiled from the fire, they euen raw as it was did eate it.

Ioſephs loue and conſtancie towards his countrey.

The people flie with their money.

A wonderfull famine in the citie.

The argumẽt of ſtore of meate.

Moſt miſerable was this manner of liuing, and a ſpectacle which none without teares was able to behold; for the ſtrongeſt ſtill got the moſt, & the weakeſt bewailed their miſery: for now famine was the greateſt calamitie they endured. And nothing doth arme men more then ſhame: for during this famine, no reuerence was had towards any man: for wiues tooke the meate euen out of their husbands mouthes, and children from their parents, and mothers euen from their infants, which was the moſt lamentable thing of all. No body had now any compaſſion, neither did they ſpare their deereſt infants, but ſuffered them to periſh euen in their armes, taking from them the very drops of life. Yet could they not eat thus in ſuch ſecrecy, but preſently ſome came to take away from them that whereon they fed. For if in any place they ſaw any doore ſhut, preſently heereupon they coniectured that they in the houſe were eating meat, and forth-with breaking downe the doores, they came in; and taking them by the throat, they tooke the meat alreaE die chewed, and ready to be ſwallowed downe. The old men were driuen away, and not permitted to keep and defend their food from beeing taken from them: the women were drawne vp & downe by the haire of the head, for that they hid between their hands ſome part of their meate, and would not forgoe it. No pitie was now remaining, neither to ould age nor infancie, but they tooke young babes eating, their mouth full of meate, & not permitting it to be taken out of their mouthes, and threw them againſt the ground. Now if any one had preuented theſe thieues, and eaten their meate before they could come at them, then they were more cruell; and the other ſo much more tyrannouſly handled, as hauing committed ſome greater offence againſt them. They alſo deuiſed moſt barbarous and cruell torments to extort foode from others: for they thruſt ſticks or ſuch like into the cauitie of mens yards, and ſharpe thornie rods into their fundaF ments: and it is abhominable to heare what the people endured to make them confeſſe one loafe of bread, or one handfull of corne which they had hidden.

A miſerable kind of liuing, and a ſpectacle of great compaſsion.

The ſouldiers enter the houſes, and take the meat vnchewed out of the Citizens mouthes.

Theſe miſcreants did not yet for all this feele either hunger or thirſt: for then theſe their impieties had been more tolerable; but they did it onelie to exerciſe their crueltie, preparing ſix daies food for themſelues aforehand. Wherfore meeting ſuch as had eſcaped the Roman watch in the night, and gone into the fields to gather weeds or herbs, when they againe came into the Citie; and thought they had now eſcaped the danger of their enemies; they there tooke from them the herbs they had gotten with hazard of their liues, denying to giue them any ſmall part of that for G which they had vndergone ſuch danger: & they required them for Gods ſake to do it; yea they thought it a benefit, if beeing thus robbed and ſpoiled, they did not alſo periſh by the ſwords of theſe miſcreants. Theſe calamities the baſer ſort of people endured at the hands of the common ſouldiers: but the nobles & chiefe men of the citie were led vnto the tyrants, and accuſed before them of betraying the citie vnto the Romans; and ſo by ſome forged treaſon or other put to death. And many times their ſuborned accuſers vvould teſtifie againſt them, that they purpoſed to flie vnto the Romans. And thoſe that Simon robbed, he ſent vnto Iohn; and thoſe that Iohn ſpoiled, he ſent vnto Simon: & ſo they did as it were one drink vnto another the bloud of the people, and diuide their dead carcaſes between them; inſomuch that they diſagreed onely for their de-ſire of rule and domination: but both conſpired to doe miſchiefe and commit iniquitie. For he H that did not giue to the other part of that which by crueltie he had extorted from the miſerable citizens, was accounted impious: and hee that receiued not part, did now grieue as ſuſtaining loſſe, in not hauing a ſhare in crueltie and impietie.

The honorable & rich are drawn before the tyrants.

The diſſenſion between Iohn and Simon was for rule, their concord was in wickedneſſe.

I am not able to recount all their iniquities: but briefely, I thinke that neuer any citie endured the like, nor neuer any people ſince the memory of men were ſo cruell and barbarous: and finally, to the intent that their impietie vnto ſtrangers might ſeeme the leſſe, they ſpake euill of the nation of the Hebrewes, and curſed them, & openly confeſſed themſelues to be ſlaues, people of diuers countries, vnited together in wickedneſſe, baſtards and abortiues of their nation. They ouerthrew the citie, and forced the Romans (though againſt their wils) to accept of this ſorow-full and heauie victory; and almoſt drew the fire into the Temple, as though it ſtaied from it too I long. Neither did they vveepe or lament when they ſaw the higher part of the citie on fire; but many amongſt the Romans did vvith ſorrow behould that ſight: which we will ſpeake of heereafter, vvhere vve vvill deſcribe the euent of that buſineſſe.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Iewes that were crucified, and the Rampiers burnt.

THe mounts and rampiers that Titus built did greatly aduantage him: and although his ſouldiers endured ſome loſſe by the Iewes who vvere vpon the wall, yet he ſent part of his horſemen, & commanded them to lay vvait for the Iewes that came out of the ci- K tie into the vallies to fetch food: and amongſt them vvere alſo ſome fighting men. For now that which they could rob & take frō the citizens was not ſufficient for al of them: yet the greater part of them vvere poore people, vvho durſt not flie vnto the Romans for feare that ſome harme ſhould thereupon betide their deereſt friends, not induring to leaue them behind to bee murthered by the theeues. Famine did now embolden them to goe forth of the citie; and now it onely remained for them to goe forth priuily, & be taken by the enemies. And being taken, ne-ceſſitie forced them to fight for feare of torments; for they now thought it too late to requeſt mercie: after the fight they were beaten & tortured all waies poſſible, and then crucified before the citie wals. Titus deemed this calamitie moſt miſerable: for euery day 500 Iews & ſometime more were taken; and yet did he not thinke it expedient to diſmiſſe ſo great a multitude, nor to L keep them who would be as a guard of guards. But the principall point for which hee did not hinder this, was, that by this ſpectacle he might terrifie the Iewes and make them fear to ſuffer the like, except they did quickly render themſelues and the citie vnto him. Wherefore the ſouldiers for a hatred which they conceiued againſt our nation, crucified al they tooke, one after one faſhion, and another after another in deriſion. And the multitude of the captiues was now ſo great, that there remained no more ſpace to ſet croſſes in, nor any more croſſes to crucifie bodies vpon. But the ſeditious Iewes within the citie were ſo far from relenting by this maſſacre, that rather their harts were heereby more hardned; ſo that heerewith they terrified the reſt of the multitude: for they caried the kinred of them that had fled vnto the Romans to the wals, & bad M them behold how thoſe were vſed that fled vnto the Romans: the ſame ſight they alſo ſhewed vnto them that deſired peace; affirming that they whom the Romans had ſo vſed, were thoſe that fled vnto them for ſuccour, & not captiues by them taken. This terrified many who deſired to flie vnto the Romans, from effecting their deſire; till ſuch time as the truth herof was known.
Yet ſome preſently went boldly vnto the Romans, as it were intending to ſuffer death and torment at their hands, accounting that death comming vnto them by their enemies hands, was far more tolerable then the famine they endured.

The poore peoples miſerie.

Titus crucifieth many Iews before the walles.

The Iewes caried the kinred of thoſe that were fled out of the citie to the Romans, and ſhewed them the tortures they ſuffered.

A Heereupon Titus cut off many of the captiues hands, and ſo ſent them into the citie vnto Simon and Iohn, that their calamitie might teſtifie them to bee captiues, and not ſuch as had fledde and yielded vnto the Romans, willing to admoniſh them at leaſt now to yield, and not compell him to deſtroy the citie: telling that in ſo doing, euen now at the laſt they ſhould ſaue their owne liues, countrey, and temple, which had not the like in all the world: and hee continually went about the rampiers haſtening the workmen in their buſineſs, as though he preſently meant to effect that in deeds which in words he had ſpoken. The Iewes that ſtood vpō the wals, curſed both him and his father, reuiling them, and affirming that they contemned death; and that they did chuſe rather to die then to become bondſlaues: & that whil'ſt life laſted, they would as much as lay in them harme the Romans, neither hauing care of themſelues nor of their countrey; which
B Cæſar ſent them word were both preſently to periſh. Moreouer, they ſaid, that the whole world was a temple dedicated to God, farre more excellent then that of theirs, which notwithſtanding ſhould be conſerued by him that dwelt in it; whoſe helpe they alſo enioying, would deride al his threatnings, which could not come to paſſe, God being the end of all. And thus opprobriouſlie they exclaimed againſt the Romans.

The yeare of the world, 40 after Chriſts birth, 72.

The Iewes both curſe Cæſar & his father.

At this time arriued alſo Antiochus Epiphanes, and with him many armed men; and beſide them, guarded with a company called the Macedonians, who were all of like age, and little older then young men, in their youth all trained vp in armes, and armed after the Macedonian manner, whereof alſo they tooke their name: yet for the moſt part not able to anſwere the expectation that men had of the Macedonians. For the king of Comagene was the moſt fortunate & hap-
C pie of all kings, that were ſubiect vnto the Romane Empire, till ſuch time as he felt the frown of Fortune: who in his aged yeres ſhewed that none ought to be accounted happy afore his death: he yet flouriſhing, his ſonne (ſaid he) maruailed that the Romans did delay ſo long to aſſault the citie, and enter the battered walles (for this young man was a fine warriour, and of exceeding ſtrength, to the which he truſted too much, ſo that he did many things raſhly. Titus heereat ſmiled, & anſwered, that that was a labour not onely for the Romans, but for all in common. After he had ſaid thus, preſently this young man Antiochus, as he was accompanied with his Macedo- The inſolence of Antiochus and the ſouldiers.
nians, aſſaulted the wall, and himſelfe with his ſtrength and dexteritie auoided the darts of the Iewes, and caſt his darts at them: but all his young men (onely a few excepted) were there ſlain: for aſhamed of their boaſting ſpeeches, they continued longer in fight then it was expedient for D them: at laſt, many beeing wounded retired themſelues, now perceiuing that the Macedonians to win a victorie had need of Alexanders fortune. The Romans the 12 day of May beganne to build their rampiers: & labouring ful ſeauenteen whole daies, with much adoe they ended them The Romans in 17 dayes build foure huge bulwarks.
the nine and twentith day of the ſaid moneth. For they builded foure moſt huge rampiers, one of them ouer againſt Antonia, which was builded by the fift legion oppoſite to the midſt of the Struthian waters: another was builded by the twefth legion, 20 cubits diſtant from the other. But the tenth legion, which was of more account then the two former, erected a mount oppoſite to the pond called Amygdalon on the North ſide: and the fifteenth legion made the fourth, thirtie cubits diſtant from the other, ouer againſt the monument of the high prieſt Iohn.

The mounts beeing thus finiſhed, Iohn vndermined that which was ouer againſt Antonia, and E vnderpropped it with poſts of wood, and filling the mine with wood, bitumen and pitch, hee fired it: ſo the poſts that held it vp beeing burnt, the mine fell, and the mount alſo with a hideous noiſe fell into it: and firſt of all there aroſe a great ſmoake and duſt, for the mines did couer the flame; at laſt the fire hauing cōſumed the matter that couered it, the flame cleerly appeared. The Romans at this ſuddaine and vnexpected exploit were amazed, being grieued at it: ſo that thereby thoſe who before made account of the victorie, as though it had bin theirs already, began to deſpaire. Two daies after, Simon and his aſſociates did ſette vpon the other rampiers: for thereon were planted rams, whewith the Romanes began to beat the wals. Amongſt the reſt, a certaine Three valiant Iewes.
man named Tephæus of Garſus a citie of Galilee, and Megaſſarus, one of Queene Mariammes ſeruants, and with them one of Adiabena the ſonne of Nabateus, who for his fortune was named F Agiras, which ſignifieth lame: theſe three taking fire brands ran vnto the engines, and there was none found in all the Roman armie more valiant then theſe men, nor more terrible: for they ran amidſt the throng of their enemies ſo boldly, as though they had gone amongſt their friends, and The Romans inuironed with fire, loſe the mounts they had built.
neuer made any ſtay, but breaking through the midſt of their enemies, they fired their engines: and notwithſtanding that on euery ſide they were aſſaulted with darts and arrowes; yet did they not giue backe, nor ſeeke to auoide the danger, till ſuch time as the fire had taken hold of the engines. The flame mounting on high, the Romans now came running out of their campe to succour their fellowes: and the Iewes vpon the vvall vvith darts and arrowes hindered them, G fighting with them that sought to quench the flame, nothing sparing their own bodies. The Romans beganne to draw away the Rammes, their shelters beeing fired. And the Iewes amidst the flames sought to keep them there: yet for all this the Romans saued their Rammes. From thence the fire caught hould of the rampiers, & those that would haue preuented it vvere burned: & the fire so increased, that it could not be extinguished; so the Romans now enuironed with a flame, and despairing to rescue their vvorks, retired themselues into their campe, and left them on fire. But the Iewes vvere so much the more earnest, their number still increasing by new supply comming out of the citie: and so encouraged by this their victory, they rashly aduentured vnto the

A most bitter law among the Romans against those that forsooke their places.

Romans campe, & assaulted the guard there. Which guard, was a company placed round about before the campe in armour; and there vvas a law made, that vvhosoeuer of them forsooke his H place, he should lose his life: so that they esteeming rather to die a glorious death, then ignominiously to suffer a penall punishment, resisted very valiantly: so that many that had fled, retired themselues back againe to fight, both for shame that they had forsaken their place, & for fear of punishment therefore; and placing engines vpon the rampire of their campe, they hindred the Iewes from issuing out of the citie any more: for they came out vnarmed, hauing nothing to defend their bodies withall. For the Iewes fought with whomsoeuer they met, and rashly running amongst their enemies pikes, they strooke them with their fists. For the Iewes preuailed more by their hardinesse, then by their deeds: and the Romans fledde more for the Iewes boldnesse, then for any harme they sustained by them.

Titus accuseth his souldiers of negligence.

Then Titus came from Antonia, where he had been to view a place to build an other rampier, I and he greatly blamed the souldiers, who hauing gotten their enemies wals, did now suffer themselues to be in danger in their own wals; & now forced to abide that, which earst the Iewes did suffer, being now as it were broken out of prison: & so he with certaine chosen men assaulted the enemies on one side; and they, though striken vpon the faces, yet did they not giue backe, but stoutly resisted him: and so ioyning the battaile, the dust was so thicke, that none could see one another, nor any heare what was said for the cries and noise, so that now no man could discerne his friends from his foes. The Iewes persisted stil in the battaile, not for that they trusted to their force, or thereby preuailed, but because they were desperate. The Romanes on the other part tooke courage, and fought stoutly for shame, and for that Cæsar himselfe was in danger amongst them. So that I think, that had not the Iewes retired themselues into the citie, the furie of the K

Romans had then consumed the whole multitude. The Romans vvere now sorrowfull for the losse of their rampiers, vvho in one houre had lost that, which vvith such labour and so long time they had been making: and many of their engines beeing now displaced, they despaired to take the citie.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the vvall vvhich the Romane armie built about Ierusalem in three daies space.

Titus consulteth with his captaines.

Titus now deliberated with his captaines what was to be done; and they that were most L forward amongst them, thought it best with al the whole army to assault the wals: for that as yet the Iewes had onely fought with one part of the army, but they vvere not able to withstand the force of the vvhole army, but would be all consumed vvith darts and arrowes. The wiser sort again perswaded Titus to build rampiers: but others counselled the contrarie, to hold themselues quiet there, & onely to keep all places about, that no foode should be conueied into the citie, and so famish the citie, and neuer fight with the enemy. For that the Iewes beeing now desperate, & desiring to be slaine, vvould not be ouercome by force; or if not, to sley others vvhich vvas vvorst of all. But Titus thought it a shame to lie there idle with so huge an armie, and do nothing; yet he deemed it superfluous to fight with them, who would willingly fight to be slaine: and he could not make any mounts because he vvanted matter, and it vvas most M difficult of all to guard euery place about the citie, that none could go forth, for that it could not be beleagerd round on euery side, by reason of the difficult places, & huge compasse therof, fearing also the dangers that so might ensue, the Iewes issuing out of the citie. For the Iewes seeing their opē waies all guarded by the Romans, they wold deuise some secret waies, both vrged ther vnto by necessity, & also because they knew all places thereabout very wel. And if so be that the Iews shold secretly effect any thing to preiudice them, that then their siege was like to continue

A so much the longer: so that he feared that the continuance of time would diminish the glorie of his victorie. For though all these waies might be taken, yet he preferred haste before glory: and if so be he would vse celeritie & safetie that then it was needfull for him to compasse the whole citie round about with a wall: for so all waies and passages might be hindred: and so the Iewes seeing now no hope of safety, should either be compelled to yeeld the citie, or else be consumed with famine, otherwise he could not be in safety and at quiet; and that so he might erect mounts, hauing that wall to defend them. And if any one thinke that worke difficult, and not to bee atchieued, let him consider that it did not become the Romanes to make a base or slender peece of worke: and that no man in the world could without labour effect any great matter, but God onely. Hauing with these speeches encouraged his captaines, he caused them to lead the souldiers, &

B disposе them all in these businesses. The soldiers had as it were some diuine force & courage fallen vpon them: for the captains parting the circuit amongst them, not onely they, but the souldiers also did striue who should first effect their part. And euery souldier laboured to please his Decurio, the Decurio to content the Centurion, & the Centurion the Colonell, the Colonell to please the Captaine, and the Captaine to please Cæsar, who euery day went round about and beheld the worke: and so beginning at the place called the Assyrians campe, where he was encamped, hee drew a wall all about, euen vnto the new citie, and from thence by Cedron and mount Oliuet, and so turned toward the South, and inclosed the mountaine to the rocke called Peristereonos, and the hill next adioining thereunto which hangeth ouer Siloa: and from thence bending his worke into the West, hee brought it downe all along the vally of the fountaine: from

C thence ascending to the monument of Ananus the high Priest where Pompey pitched his tents, and so brought it about by the North side of the citie: and comming along vnto the village called Erebinthonicus, he compassed the monument of Herod towards the East, and so ioyned the wall vnto his camp where he began. This wall was nine and thirty furlongs about. Without this wall he builded also thirteen forts, euery one ten furlongs in compasse. And all this whole work was finished in three daies space, which desired moneths to haue been builded in: so that the celerity in the building thereof doth make it scarcely credible. The citie being thus encompassed with a wall, and guards placed in euery fort, Titus himselfe did still goe round about the first watch, to see all things in good order: the second watch hee allotted vnto Alexander, and the third vnto the captaines of the legions, and the watchmen appointed euery one in his turne to

D sleep in: and so all night long some of them went about the Castle.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the famine in Ierusalem: and of the building of the second rampire by the Romans.

THe restraint of liberty to passe in and out of the citie tooke from the Iewes all hope of safety, and the famine now increasing, consumed whole households and families; and the houses were full of dead women and infants; and the streetes filled with the dead bodies of old men: And the yong men swollen like dead mens shadowes, walked in the

E market place, and fell down dead where it happened. And now the multitude of dead bodies was so great, that they that were aliue could not bury them, nor cared they for burying them, being now vncertaine what should betide themselues. And many endeuouring to bury others, fell downe themselues dead vpon them as they were burying them. And many being yet aliue, went vnto their graues & there died. Yet for all this calamity was there no weeping nor lamentation, for famine ouercame all affections. And they who were yet liuing, without teares beheld those, who being dead, were now at rest before them. There was no noyse heard within the citie, and the still night found all full of dead bodies: and which was most miserable of all, the theeues at night came and took away that which couered the dead bodies nakednesse, and went laughing away, and in their bodies they proued their swords, and vpon pleasure only thrust many through yet breathing. Yet if any had desired them to kill him, or to lend him a sword to kill

F himselfe, that so he might escape the famine, they denied him. And euery one that died, as he was dying, fixed his eyes vpon the temple, and beheld it now with griefe, leauing the seditious behind them. The seditious now not able to endure the stink of the dead bodies that lay corrupted about the ground, first commanded that all such should bee buried at the charges of the citie: at last finding not place wherein to bury them all, they threw them ouer the walles into the ditch. When Titus, going about the wals, beheld all the ditch filled with dead mens bodies, hee lamented; and lifting vp his hands to heauen, he called God to witnes, that it was not his doing. G

Such was the estate of the citie. Now the Romans, when none of the seditious durst make any more excursions, passed their time in ioy and mirth: for they neither suffered famin nor sorrow, hauing abundance of corne, and all other necessaries out of Syria, and the prouinces adioyning: and many standing before the wals, and shewing their abundance of victuals vnto the Iewes, did so much more encrease their famine. Yet were not the seditious people moued at these calamities: wherefore Titus pitying the reliques of the nation, and minding at least to saue them that were left aliue, hasted to take the citie, and so he began anew to build mounts, though he scarcely found matter to do it withall. For all the wood neere vnto the citie was consumed in the first workes, so that now the souldiers were forced to fetch more wood 90. furlongs off; and only against Antonia, were erected in foure places foure mounts greater then the former. Cæsar went H about & hastned the workmen, and now shewed the thieues that they were fallen into his hands. Yet for all this they would not repent: and now as it were depriued of their wits and bodies, they vsed both as though borrowed, and not their owne. For neither did any affection mooue their minds, nor any griefe their bodies: for they rent and tore the dead bodies like dogs, and filled the prisons with weake and languishing people.

CHAP. XV.

Of the massacre of the Iewes, both within and without the Citie.

I

AT last, Simon hauing tormented Matthias, put him to death, notwithstanding that by his meanes he had obtained the citie. This Matthias was sonne vnto Boethus a Priest, whom the people for his fidelity towards them greatly esteemed of: who seeing the outrage of the Zelous towardes the people, Iohn being now ioyned with them, perswaded the people to call in Simon to helpe them, conditioning nothing with him before, for that they misdoubted no euill. And when he was come into the citie, hee held him for his enemy as well as the rest: notwithstanding, that by his only aduice he was receiued into the city, as though Matthias had only done that of simplicity. Wherefore calling him before the people, hee accused him that hee did fauour the Romans, and so condemned him to die, not suffering him to cleare himselfe; and put to death likewise his three sonnes with him, for the fourth was K before this time fled vnto Titus. Matthias requested Simon that hee might bee put to death before his sonnes: but Simon, in regard that by his meanes hee had gotten the Citie, caused him to be executed last of all. And so he was killed vpon the murdered bodies of his sonnes, in a place where the Romans might behold him: for so Simon commanded Ananus his executioner who was the son of Bamadus. This man was the most cruell of all Simons followers: who euen when he was to kill Matthias, derided him, asking what they could now help him, to whom he sought to flie, and permitted not their bodies to be buried. After them Ananias a Priest the sonne of Masbalus a noble man, and chiefe Secretary to the councell, a valiant strong man and borne at Emaus, and with him fifteen of the chiefest men in the citie were put to death. They tooke also Iosephs father and kept him in prison, and with the publike voyce of a crier proclaimed, that no L man should talke with him nor visit him, pretending feare of treason: and whosoeuer bewailed his estate, were put to death without any triall. It hapned, a certaine man called Iudas the son of Iudas, who was one of Simons captaines seeing this (who also kept a tower that Simon committed vnto his charge, perhaps moued with compassion towards them that perished without desert, yet rather fearing his owne life) assembled together ten of his most trusty cõpanions, & said;
" How long shall we endure these calamities? Or what hope haue we of life in being trusty to a

The ten men to whom in this manner hee brake his mind, agreed hereunto, and so he in the morning sent the rest of his souldiers vnder his rule into diuers places, that they might not perceiue his intent, and hee at the third houre of the day standing vpon the tower, called the Romans. But some of the Romans proudly contemned their offer, and others scarcely beleeued them, and the rest made no speed to come. In the meane time

A time while Titus with certaine armed men came vnto the wall, Simon had notice of their intent; and ſo ſpeedily got the tower, and ſlew them that were within, in the ſight of the Romans, & caſt down their bodies ouer the wall. And Ioſeph going about the wall, and comming thither (for he neuer ceaſed from requeſting the Iewes to remember their eſtate) he was ſtrooke vpon the head with a ſtone, and ſo amazed with the blow fell downe: who being fallen downe, preſently the Iewes made excurſions out of the citie, & had carried him away into the citie, had not Titus ſent men to defend him: and whileſt they fought; Ioſeph was carried away, ſcarcely knowing what was done. The ſeditious with lowd cries reioiced, as hauing ſlain him whoſe death they chiefly deſired; and ſo they reported within the citie. Hereupon the people were moſt ſorrowfull, verily beleeuing him to be ſlaine, by whom they had confidence to fly vnto the Romans.

B When Ioſephs mother who was in priſon heard this, ſhe ſaid vnto thoſe of Iotapata that were her keepers, that ſhe verily beleeued it, for that he was neuer taken aliue by the Romans: yet ſecretly vnto her maidens ſhe wept, and ſaid, that this benefit ſhe receiued by hauing borne a ſon, that ſhe could not bury him by whom ſhe hoped to haue bin buried herſelf. But this falſe report did not long grieue her, nor comfort the theeues: for Ioſeph was quickly healed of his wound, and recouered; and ſhewing himſelfe he cried vnto them, that ere long they ſhould finde that he would be reuenged on them for his wound; yet he ceaſed not to exhort the people to obey the Romans, and yeeld: but the ſeditious ſeeing him aliue were aſtoniſhed, and the people conceiued good hope. Many (preſent neceſſity vrging them) leapt off the wals and fled vnto the Romans; diuers, with ſtones going forth vnder pretence to fight with the Romans, yeelded themſelues,

Yet they who thus eſcaped fel into another grieuous misfortune: for one of the Iews that were fled vnto the Romans was found amongſt the Syrians, gathering gold out of his owne dung which he had ſwallowed, as is before ſaid; for that the ſeditious did ſearch all, and take that they could find from them: and there was very great ſtore of gold in the citie, and that now was ſold for twelue Atticks which before was worth twenty fiue. Wherefore he called together the leaders of the ſoldiers that came to help him, and the Roman captaines (for ſome of the Romans alſo did commit this fault) and ſaid vnto them in anger, that if any of his ſouldiers did commit any ſuch acts for

CHAP. XVI.

Of the sacrilege committed about the Temple, and the dead bodies cast out of the Citie: and of the famine.

John falleth to sacrilege, & taketh away many presents out of the temple.

WHen Iohn could rob no more, nor get any spoile from the citizens, whom he had robbed of all they had, he presently fell to sacrilege, and tooke many gifts that were bestowed vpon the temple, and carried away sacred vessels for diuine seruice, as cups, plates, tables, and the cruets of gold that Augustus & his wife sent. So that now a Iew robbed and spoiled the temple of all gifts wherewith the Roman Emperours and other nations had honored it: affirming vnto his associates, that without feare they might vse the holy things of the temple, seeing they fought for God and the temple, and therfore it was lawfull for them to be fed by the riches of the temple. Moreouer, that it was lawfull for them to spend the holy wine and oile which the Priests reserued for diuine sacrifice: which he distributed in the temple amongst the multitude, and they without feare were anointed therewith, and dranke thereof. I will not cease to speake that which griefe compelleth me. I verily thinke that had the Romans forborne to haue come against these seditious, that either the earth would haue swallowed the citie vp, or some deluge haue drowned it, or else the thunder & lightning which consumed Sodome would haue light vpon it: for the people of the citie were farre more impious then the Sodomites. In briefe, by their desperation and obstinacy the whole nation was extinguished. What need I recount euery particular misery? Mannæus the son of Lazarus flying to Titus out of the gate that was committed vnto his custody, and yeelding himselfe vnto him, recounted vnto Titus that from the time that the Romans army was placed neer the citie, from the 14. day of Aprill, vntill the first of Iuly, were carried out of that gate he kept, a hundreth, fifteene thousand and fourescore dead bodies; yet was not he the keeper of the gate; but being appointed to pay for the burying of the dead at the charges of the citie, was forced to number the dead bodies. For others were buried by their parents, and this was their buriall, to cast them out of the citie, and there let them lie. And certaine noblemen flying vnto Titus after him, reported that there were dead in the citie 600000. poore folkes which were cast out of the gates, and the others that died were innumerable: and that when so many died that they were not able to bury them, that then they gathered their bodies together in the greatest houses adioyning, and there shut them vp. And that a bushell of corne was sold for a talent, which is six hundreth crownes: and that after the citie was compassed with a wall that now they could not goe out to gather any more hearbs, many were driuen to that necessity, that they raked sinkes and priuies to finde old dung of Oxen to eate; and so the dung that was loathsome to behold, was their meat. The Romans hearing this, were mooued to compassion; yet the seditious within the citie who beheld this miserable sight were nothing mooued, nor repented not, but suffered them to be brought to that calamity: for their hearts were so blinded by the prouidence of God, that they could not see what hanged ouer their heads, and ouer the citie.

CHAP. I.

Of the breach made in the vvals: and how the mounts vvere burned: and how Sabinus assaulted the vvall.

F THE misery of Ierusalem euery day encreased, the seditious being by reason of their misery more and more incited against the people: for now the famine was not only amongst the people, but amongst them also. And it was a miserable sight to see the multitude of dead bodies heaped together in the citie, from which came a pestilent & infectious smell, so that it hindred the soldiers from making excursions. For they were forced to tread vpon dead bodies, as though they were to march along a field couered with dead carcasses. Hauing now embrued their hands in the blood of their countrimen, they prepared to resist & fight with their their enemies, and (as it seemeth to me) hereby vpbraiding God in that he so deferred to punish them. For the greatest part of them did now fight more earnestly then before, not for hope of safety, but as despairing of all. The Romans though much troubled to get wood to build withall; yet did they in one and twenty daies finish their mounts, hauing cut down all the woods neer the citie by 90. furlongs. It was miserable to behold that countrey and place, before all beset with trees and fertill plants, now to lie plaine like a desart, all cut down: neither was there any stranger that before time had seen Iudæa, and the beautifull suburbs of Ierusalem, who now beholding it could abstaine from teares, or not lament the woefull change so farre different from the former. For now this war extinguished vtterly all signes of beauty: neither could one comming suddenly now know the place which he well knew before.

The Iewes vpbraided God in that he so long delaied to punish thē. Iudæa desert and desolate.

When the mounts were ended, both the Romans and the Iews greatly feared: the Iewes for that except they were destroyed, their citie would be presently taken: the Romans, for that if these were ouerthrowne, they knew not how to erect more, wanting matter: and now their bodies were wearied with labour, and their mindes with many griefes and molestations. But the Romans were more grieued at the calamity of the citie, then the citizens within: for the Iewes notwithstanding these miseries did neuertheless stoutly defend their wals: but the courages of the Romans failed, when they saw that the Iewes policy made their mounts vnprofitable, that the strength of the wals resisted their engines, that the Iewes boldnes ouercame their strength in fight; and especially seeing that the Iews hauing endured such calamity, famine, & misery, were still more courageous then before: so that they deemed their strength not to be ouercome; and that their minds were inuincible, who were hardned and encouraged by misery. For who were able to abide their forces in prosperity, who by aduersity were incited to vertue? Wherfore the Romans made a stronger watch about their mounts. But Iohns followers who were in the Castle Antonia, fearing what might ensue if the wall were batterd, preuented it in what they could, before the Rams were set vp: and taking firebrands in their hands they assaulted the mount; but deceiued with a vain hope they retired themselues. For first of all they seemed to disagree among themselues; so that they came from their wals one after another, and some space between euery one; so that they came softly & fearfully; and briefly, not after the maner of the Iewes: for they wanted courage, rashnes, and flocking together at once, which is proper vnto all that nation, and so came more soberly, and with lesse courage then they were wont. They did also find the Romans more courageous then of late, who so defended their mouts with their bodies & weapons, that it was not possible to come and fire them; and euery one was fully determined not to shrink out of his place till he was slaine. For besides that if so be that work were destroyed, they had no hope left to build more; they all accounted it a shame that their vertue should be ouercome by subtilty, or their weapons by rashnes and temerity, or their skill by a multitude; or the Romans by the Iewes. Also they had engines to cast darts at them as they came downe their wals. And when any one of the Iewes that was slaine fell downe, hee hindred them that followed, and the danger of him that went before terrified them that came after. They also that rashly aduentured within the shot of a dart, either were terrified with the discipline, and multitude of their enemies, or else wounded with their darts: and so they all retyred, one accusing another of cowardlinesse, and atchieued nothing.

The Iewes & Romans are equally afraid.

The Romans most of all fear the desperatnesse of the Iewes.

The Iews with firebrands set vpon the engines: but losing their hope returne back againe.

The valour & violence of the Iewes decreaseth.

The Iewes retire, arguing one another of cowardize.

The first day of Iuly the citie was assaulted: and the Iewes being now retyred, the Romans set vp their Rammes, notwithstanding that they were assaulted from Antonia with stones, fire and sword, and whatsoeuer their enemies in that extremity could finde. For though the Iewes had great confidence in their wals, as that they could not be battered; yet did they not permit the Romans to place their Rams against them. And the Romans being perswaded that the Iewes so laboured, because they knew their wals to be weak, and least Antonia by the breach of the wall should be hurt, did striue to place them against the wals. But the wall would not yeeld vnto the Ram: yet did the Romans safely & without danger (notwithstanding that many darts were cast at them from off the wals) persist to beat the wal with their Rams: who being below and seeing the stones broken with the force of their engins, they shielded thēselues with their bucklers: and so some with their hands pulled the stones out of the wall; some digged vnder the foundation therof: and when foure stones with much labour were broken & shaken, the night hindred both parties from doing any more at that time, and in it the wall now shaken with the Ramme (in the place which Iohn had vndermined to destroy the mounts, the mine settling) fell down. So, that fel out otherwise then either part expected: For the Iewes who indeed had cause to be sorrowfull for the mine of the wall, and for that they did not preuent that mischance, were ioyfull and coura-

The assault of the citie the first day of Iuly.

The Romans vndermine the wall.

A courageous, as though Antonia did yet remain firme and ſtrong: And the Romans reioicing for this vnexpected fall, were againe diſmaied, ſeeing the other wall that Iohn had built within, yet they iudged it eaſier to be taken then the former; but no man durſt aſcend it, for that he who firſt aſſaulted it, was certain to dy. Titus, thinking that by hope and perſwaſion his ſouldiers might be encouraged, and knowing many times promiſes and exhortations make men forget danger, and ſometime to contemne death it ſelfe, he called together the moſt valiant of all his ſouldiers, and ſpake thus vnto them as followeth; Fellow ſouldiers, it is manifeſt cowardlineſſe to exhort men to enterpriſe a thing without danger, both in them that are exhorted, and in him that exhorts: for exhortations are onely to be vſed in doubtfull affaires, wherein it is praiſe worthy for euery man to aduenture himſelfe. So that I confeſſe it is hard for you to aſcend the wal: yet wil I ſhew you that it is a glorious death to dy in ſuch a fight, and eſpecially it becometh them that are deſirous to win honour; and that they that firſt aduenture valiantly to do it, ſhall not go away vnrewarded. And firſt let this moue you which terrifieth others, to wit, the patient minde of the Iewes, and their conſtancy in aduerſity. For it is a ſhame for the Roman ſouldiers, who in time of peace practice themſelues in warlike feats, and are accuſtomed in war to get the victory, now to be ouercom by the Iewes; and that in the end of the victory, we hauing alſo God to help vs: for all our harmes proceed from the Iewes deſperation; and their deſtruction and calamity by Gods fauor and your valour is euery day increaſed. For what elſe is betokened by their ſedition amongſt themſelues, their famine, the fall of their wals without our engines to batter them, and the ſiege it ſelfe, then the wrath of God towards them, and his fauour toward vs? Wherefore it is vnſeemly for you either to giue place to your inferiors, or to betray Gods fauour and furtherance. Is it not a ſhame that the Iewes, who, were they conquered, ſuſtained no great reproach, as beeing accuſtomed to ſerue and obey others, ſhould ſo valiantly contemne death, leſt they ſhould hereafter ſuffer or endure the like; and many times boldly to aduenture and make excurſions euen amongſt the midſt of vs, not for hope they haue to ouercome vs, but onely to ſhew their valour: and wee, who haue conquered almoſt the earth and ſea, to whom it is an infamy not to be victorious, to lie idle, neuer making valiant aſſault vpon our enemies, but beeing thus armed, to expect till fortune and famine deliuer them into our hands? Eſpecially ſeeing that by vndergoing a little danger, all will be ours. If we get into Antonia, we haue taken the City. For ſuppoſe that we were then to fight againſt them that are within the city (which I do not think) we hauing gotten the higher part of the city, being aboue our enemies head, are then aſſured of a perfect victory ouer them. I omit now their commendations who haue beene ſlaine in wars, and their immortalitie whom Martiall fury hath depriued of this life: and thoſe that do not ſo think, I pray that they may die of ſome euill death in peace, whoſe ſoules are condemned to be enterred with their bodies. For what valiant man knoweth not that the ſoule of him that dies in war, is preſently receiued into the moſt pure airie element, & frō thence caried & placed among the ſtars of heauen, and the good and valiant ghoſts doe alwaies aſſiſt his poſterity? And that all that in peace do dy of ſome diſeaſe and ſickneſs, their ſoules are kept in the bowels of the earth in darkneſs: notwithſtanding that they be moſt iuſt and pure, and preſently they are forgotten, and their life and memory together with them extinguiſhed. Seeing therefore that we are all certain to dy, & that to dy by the ſword is a more eaſie death then to dy by any diſeaſe, why ſhould we depriue our ſelues of this opportunity, ſeeing that at laſt we muſt neceſſarily forgo our liues as due debt vnto the deſtinies? And this I haue ſpoken as though it were vnpoſſible to eſcape with life, you doing your endeuors; yet they that beare the mindes of men can finde meanes to ſaue themſelues euen in the greateſt dangers. For firſt of al, that part of the wal that is fallen may eaſily be entred, and the wall new built is not hard to be thrown down: and many of you together enterpriſing this work, may one exhort and helpe another, and your audacity and courage wil quickly daunt the enemies harts, and perhaps may get vs the victory if we get this one place without bloudſhed. For they will not reſiſt vs if we offer to aſcend the wall: and let vs but effect any one exploit either ſecretly or openly, and the Iewes will neuer more endure vs, though we be but few in number. And I would be aſhamed if I did not ſo reward him that doth firſt begin, as to make all that are in our army to enuy his happineſſe: and from henceforth I decree, that whoſoeuer eſcapeth, ſhall be Gouernour ouer them that are now his equals; and whoſo is ſlain in this quarrell, I will do him great honour.

Titus hauing thus ſpoken, the reſt of the multitude feared the greatnes of the danger: but one of them that warred in the companies, named Sabinus, a Syrian borne, a man of excellent ſtrength and courage; yet of ſo ſmall ſtature, that if one had ſeen him, they would haue deemed him him vnfit to haue been a ſouldier: for he was of very ſmal ſtature and of black colour, but he had a mind far bigger then his body, and ſtrength ſcarce able to be contained in ſo little room. This Sabinus riſing vp, ſaid; I offer my ſelfe vnto thee, O Ceſar, firſt of all to aſcend the wall, and that with a willing mind, requeſting that my fortune may aſſiſt my ſtrength and mind: yet if fortune ſhall hinder my enterpriſe, know that I dy not againſt my expectation, but that I will gladly giue my life for thee. When he had ſo ſaid, he took his ſhield in his left hand, and holding it aboue his head, with his drawne ſword in his right hand, about the ſixt houre of the day he went vnto the wall: and eleuen men followed him, who only enuied his vertue. But Sabinus with a diuine feruour of ſpirit went before them all; notwithſtanding that on euery ſide the Iewes vpon the wal caſt an infinit number of darts at him, and rowled down vpon him huge ſtones, which did ſtrike downe ſome of the eleauen that followed him. But Sabinus, meeting the darts and peſtering arrowes, yet did not remit his force, till ſuch time as he had gotten to the top of the wall, and put the enemies to flight: who, terrified with his ſtrength and courage, and indeed thinking that more had come vp after him, fled. Wherein, who may not iuſtly blame Fortune, and accuſe her; as enuying at vertuous acts? For this man failed not of his purpoſe, yet was hee ſtricken with a ſtone, and throwne downe flat vpon his face moſt violently with a great noiſe: ſo that now the Iewes ſeeing him alone, and lying on the ground, returned againe, and ſhot at him on euery ſide: and he kneeling vpon his knees, and couering himſelf with his ſhield, did firſt of all reuenge himſelfe vpon his enemies, and wounded many that came neere him, till with wounding them hee was ſo weary, that he could ſtrike no longer; and ſo at laſt was ſlain with arrows: a man who for his valour deſerued better fortune, and died as valiantly as his enterpriſe was courageous. Thoſe that were left of his company, hauing almoſt gotten to the toppe of the wall, were ſlaine with ſtones, and the reſt being wounded were carried into the camp. CHAP. II.

How the Romans aſſaulted Antonia, and how they were driuen back from thence by the Iewes.

TWo daies after, twenty of the watchmen which guarded the mounts, two horſemen, and one trumpeter, gatherd themſelues together: and about the ninth houre of the night, they came by the ruines into Antonia without any reſiſtance: and finding the firſt watchmen aſleepe, they ſlew them, and got the wall, and commanded the trumpetter to ſound; by which ſound the reſt of the watchmen were awaked, and fled for feare, before they ſaw what company of the Romans were gotten vpon the wall: and the ſound of the trumpet perſwaded them, that a great multitude of enemies were come vp the wall. Ceſar, hearing the ſound of the trumpet, preſently armed his ſouldiers; and accompanied with his chiefe Captaines, and a company of choſen men, he aſcended the wall. The Iewes fledde into the inner Temple, and the Romans alſo brake in amongſt them by the mine that Iohn had made to deſtroy the mounts of the Romans. And the followers both of Iohn and Simon, did courageouſly driue them back: for they thought it the vtter ruine of all, that the Romans were now gotten into the holy place, which indeed was the beginning of their victory. So they began a ſore fight, euen in the very entrance, the Romans ſtriuing to get the inner Temple, and the Iewes endeuouring to beat them back towards Antonia. And now arrowes, darts, and ſpeares, nothing auailed either part, but they both fought it out at handie blowes with ſwords: & in that conflict no man could diſcerne on which ſide any one fought; for the ſouldiers on both parts were mingled together, & for the ſtraightnes of the place, could not keep their roomes: for there was ſuch a noiſe that no man could heare one another, and many were ſlaine on both parts: & the dead bodies of thoſe that were ſlain and their weapons falling with them, did hurt many that trode vpon them; and whoſoeuer had the worſt, preſently cried out pittifully, and the victors ſhouted for ioy: neither was there any place to flie or follow; the fight was ſuch, that now one had the better, and now the other. Moreouer, they that ſtood in the forefront of the battell, were either of neceſſity to kill or be killed: for there was no void ſpace left between the two armies. At laſt the Iews courage ouercame the Romans skill, and they were all beaten back (hauing fought from the ninth houre of the night vnto the ſeauenth houre of the day.) The Iewes were encouraged to fight for feare they ſhould be ouercome. And that parcell of the Romane army (for as yet the legions were not come) thought it ſufficient at that time to haue gotten the Caſtle of Antonia.

CHAP. III.

Of the exceeding valour of Iulian the Roman ſouldier.

The yeare of the world, 4034. after Chriſts birth, 72.

Iulians famous fortitude.

THere was one Iulian, a Centurion, borne in Bithynia, of good parentage, who (as my ſelfe well knew) was moſt valiant of all, both in ſtrength of body and skill, and courageous mind. This Iulian, ſeeing now the Romans to haue the worſt (ſtanding by Titus in Antonia) he preſently leapt down, and all alone purſued the Iewes who had the victory, into the inner temple. And the whole multitude fled, deeming him by his force and courage, not to haue been a man. But he amongſt the midſt of them, ſlew whomſoeuer he light on, one of them for haſte caſting down another. So that this his deed ſeemd admirable to Cæſar, and terrible to his enemies. Yet did that deſtiny befall him which no man can eſcape; for hauing his ſhooes full of ſharp nailes, as other ſouldiers haue, running vpon the pauement, hee ſlipt and fell downe, his armor in the fal making a great noiſe: wherat his enemies, who before fled, now turned againe vpon him. Then the Romans in Antonia fearing his life, cried out: but the Iewes many at once ſtrooke him with ſwords and ſpeares. And hee defended many blowes with his ſhield, and many times attempting to riſe, they ſtrook him down againe: yet as he lay he wounded many; neither was he quickly ſlaine, becauſe all parts of his body, which beeing wounded might cauſe preſent death, were armed, and ſhrunk in his neck a long time til the reſt of his body being cut off, and no man helping him, his ſtrength failed. Cæſar was very ſorrowful to ſee a man of ſo great force and fortitude ſlaine in the ſight of ſuch a multitude: and that the place wherein he was, hindred him from helping Iulian; and others that might haue helped him, durſt not for feare. At laſt, when Iulian had a long time ſtriuen with death, and wounded many of them that ſlew him, he was with much ado killed, leauing behinde him a renowmed memory, not onely amongſt the Romans and Cæſar, but alſo amongſt his enemies. Then the Iewes took his dead body, and beat back the Romans and ſhut them in Antonia. In this battell one Alexas and Gyphthæus, two of Iohns company, fought valiantly, and of Simons company Malachias and Iudas, the ſon of Merlon, and Iames the ſon of Soſa, captain of the Idumæans; and two brethren of the Zelous, the ſons of Iairus, Simon and Iudas.

CHAP. IIII.

Ioſephs ſpeech, perſwading the Iewes to yeeld their City: and how many of them fled vnto the Romans.

AFter that Titus had commanded his ſouldiers to pull down the foundations of Antonia, and make an eaſie entrance for the whole army: he called Ioſeph vnto him (for he vnderſtood, that day beeing the ſeauenteenth of Iuly, that the Iewes were wont to celebrate a certaine feaſt to God, which they called Entelechiſmus, and that it was not ſolemnized for want of men; ſo that the people greatly mourned therefore) and againe commanded him to tel Iohn that whereof before hee had ſent him word, to wit, that if he deſired to fight, he ſhould haue liberty to come, with what multitude he pleaſed; ſo that the city and the temple might not both periſh with him, willing him now to deſiſt from prophaning the holy place, and from ſinning againſt God: ſending him alſo word, that if he ſo pleaſed, he would grant him leaue to celebrate the feſtiuity which had been now long time omitted, and that by what company he pleaſed. Ioſeph to the intent that not onely Iohn might heare this offer of Titus, but alſo the reſt of the people, he ſtood in an eminent place, from whence he might be heard, and in the Hebrew tongue he recounted vnto the Iewes Cæſars pleaſure, earneſtly requeſting them to ſpare their country, and forbid the fire now ready to take hold of their temple, and to offer the accuſtomed ſacrifices vnto God. When he had thus ſaid, the people were very ſorrowfull, and euery one held his peace, not knowing what to ſay. But the tyrant Iohn hauing vſed many railing ſpeeches againſt Ioſeph, at laſt he anſwered, that he need not fear the deſtruction of the temple and city, ſeeing that it belonged to God.

Titus willeth Iohn to come out to fight, leſt with him the city and temple ſhould periſh alſo.

Iohn raileth againſt Ioſeph.

Then Ioſeph with a loud voice cried out, True it is, you haue kept it pure, and vnprophaned for God, and the holy things you haue kept inuiolate, neither haſt thou committed any iniquity againſt him, from whom thou expecteſt help, but haſt offred ſolemne ſacrifice vnto him. If any man ſhould take from thee thy daily food, no doubt thou wouldſt account him thy enimy: canſt thou then hope that God, whō thou haſt depriued of daily ſacrifice, wil aſſiſt thee in theſe wars?

Dost thou impute these offences to the Romans? why? they euen now do defend our religion, and command sacrifice to bee offred, which thou hast forbidden. Who doth not bewaile this vnexpected change,and lament our city? Strangers and enemies correct thy impiety,and thou a Iew born,and brought vp in our lawe,art more cruell then they. But consider Iohn,it is no shame to repent thy wickednes in extreamity: and at the last cast, if thou be desirous to saue thy countrey,thou hast a good example of Iechonias,sometime king of the Iewes; who,when the Babylonians warred against him,of his owne accord went out of the city before it was taken, and willingly endured captiuity with all his family and kinred onely, lest hee should betray these holy places to his enemies,and behold the temple fired.And for this act of his, he is of sacred memory among the Iewes,and hath thereby gained immortall credit amongst all his posterity. This is a good example,O Iohn,although danger be at hand: and I wil promise thee also pardon,from the Romans,onely remember that I thy countriman admonish thee, and promise this vnto the Iewes: behold who is the author and counseller hereof. God forbid that euen I should so liue a captiue,that I should not liue according to the lawes of our country.Yet thou art againe incensed against me, and exclaimest on me, and cursest me. But true it is, I deserue worse then this; who seek to perswade contrary vnto the determination of Gods prouidence, and striue to saue them whom his sentence hath condemned.Who is ignorant of the writings of the ancient prophets & their prophecies,now hanging ouer this wretched city? For then it is foretold by them to be destroied, when we murther our owne nation: andnow not onely the citie, but also the temple is full of your dead bodies.Certainly it is God,God it is that,together with the Romans, bringeth in fire to purge this city filled with iniquity.

Iechonias sustained a voluntary banishment in Babylon.

The City by the ordinance of fate and Gods will was to bee ouerthrowne.

Iosephs speeches interrupted with sighs.

Ioseph thus crying with teares and lamentations, hee could speake no more for sobbing: And the Romans,compassionating his sorrow and affliction, were astonished. But Iohn and his confederates were so much the more incited against the Romans,and sought to take Ioseph; yet his speech did moue many of the nobles; and diuers, fearing the seditious watchmen,remained stil where they were, making full account both of their owne destruction, and the subuersion of the City. Yet some there were, who, finding opportunity, fled vnto the Romans: amongst whom were two priests,Ioseph and Iesus,and three sons of Ismael the priest,who was beheaded at Cyren,and foure sonnes of Matthias the priest,and one of the other Matthias, who escaped vnto the Romans before his father was put to death by Simon Giora, with his three sons,as is before said: and many other nobles reuolted with the priests,whom the Emperor receiu'd very curteously, and sent them into Gophna; knowing that it was a griefe for them to conuerse amongst people of diuers manners from them, and willed them to remaine there, and promised euery one of them great possessions after the warres were ended. So they ioyfully departed vnto the place appointed. But the seditious, for that they were not seene, reported vnto the people, that they who had fled vnto the Romans were slaine, meaning heereby to terrifie the rest from fleeing to them: and thus their deuice awhile preuailed, as their former did; and they that faine would, durst not now flee for feare. But afterward when Titus recalled them from Gophna, and commanded them to go about the wals with Ioseph,and shew themselues vnto the people;then many of the Iewes fled vnto the Romans. And after they had gathered themselues together, standing all before the Romans, they besought the seditious with teares, first to receiue the Romans into the Citie, and saue their countrey: or if it pleased them not, at least to depart out of the temple,and deliuer it vp vnto them.For the Romans durst not,except necessity vrged them thereto, fire the holy temple. But their malice against the Romans encreasing, and rayling against them that had fled vnto them,they planted all their engines to cast stones,darts and arrows vpon their holy porches. So that all the void space about the temple was filled with dead bodies like a sepulchre,and the temple it selfe resembled a castle,& they now with their weapons hauing their hands imbrued with the bloud of their countrimen,presumed to enter into the sanctuary where none ought to come: and they became so iniurious against their owne lawes, that looke what indignation the Iews ought to haue conceiued against the Romans if they had so profaned the holy places,the same they caused the Romans to haue against them,for doing the like.For there was not one amongst the Roman souldiers, that did not with reuerence behold the temple, and adore it,and that did not hartily wish that the thieues would repent themselues before it was too late. Moreouer, Titus pitying the seditious, once againe spake vnto Iohn and his adherents, saying: O ye impious people, haue you not inuironed the temple about with a cloister? haue not you your selues in Greeke and our language engrauen in tables, forbidden all men to enter into those limits? did not we licence you to kil any man that should pass them, notwithstanding that he

A he were a Roman? Why then, ye wicked wretches, do you tread vpon dead mens bodies within your temple? Or wherefore haue you polluted the temple with the bloud of ſtrangers, and of your countrimen? I cal my country gods to witnes, and him who ſomtime dwelt in this place, if euer there were any (for now I am perſwaded there is none) I call alſo my army to witnes, and proteſt to the Iewes that are with mee, and to your ſelues, that I will not compell you to violate theſe ſacred things: but that if your army will depart from this place, that then no Roman ſhall come into theſe holy places, nor commit any thing in contumely of them, but I will preſerue the temple for you againſt your wils.

Titus in deſpite of the Iewes ſtriues to ſaue the temple.

CHAP. V.

B How the battell was renewed, the Rampiers being againe builded, and of the excurſions of the Iewes.

IOſeph hauing deliuered theſe words of Titus to the Iewes, the ſeditious thinking that they proceeded not of good will but of feare, began to be more proud heereat. Then Titus, ſeeing they neither pitied themſelues nor the temple, determined again to fight, though very loth ſo to do; yet could he not bring al his army againſt them, the room was ſo little. Wherfore out of euery hundred he made choice of thirty of the ſtrongeſt among them, and ouer euery thouſand he appointed a Colonell, and made Cerealis their Captaine or Generall, commanding him at the ninth houre of the night to aſſault the watchmen of the enemy. Alſo he himſelf would haue gone downe with them armed; but his friends, and the captaines about him, fore-

Titus choſe 30 out of euery hundred, moſt ſtrong & able men, and bids them charge the beſieged.

C ſeeing the great danger he might fall into, would not permit him: affirming, that he might doe more good ſitting in Antonia, and encouraging the ſouldiers that fought, then if hee ſhould goe and indanger himſelfe: for euery man, being in the view of the Emperor, would fight more courageouſly. Titus was herewith perſwaded, telling the ſouldiers that the onely cauſe he went not with them was this, that he ſtaied behinde to view and iudge euery ones valour and vertue, and to the intent that none behauing himſelf valiantly ſhould go away vnrewarded, nor any coward eſcape vnpuniſhed, but that he himſelfe would be a beholder of euery mans vertue, and a witnes thereof, who was their Lord either to reward or puniſh.

Then he went vnto a watch-tower in Antonia, from whence he beheld what was done. But Titus beholds from a window in Antonia what his ſouldiers perform.

D they whom Titus ſent did not finde the watchmen aſleepe, as they hoped, but with a cry aſſaulted the Romans that came againſt them: and at this noiſe they awaked their fellows, who came in whole companies to aſſiſt them, and made excurſions vpon their enemies. So the Romans ſuſtained the violence of their firſt companies: but the ſecond that came fell vpon their owne fellowes, & vſed them like their enemies: for no man could know one anothers voice for the noiſe there, neither could one ſee another by reaſon it was night: and moreouer, ſome were blinded with fury, ſome with anger, ſome with feare: wherefore euery one ſtrooke him that mette him without any reſpect. And the Romans receiued ſmall domage thereby, becauſe that they were defended with their ſhields, and remembred one anothers watchword. But the Iews fel on euery ſide, ſhewing themſelues raſh as well in excurſions as in their retiring; ſo that many times one of them tooke the other to be his enemy, euery one falling vpon him that retired, as though he

E had beena Roman, aſſaulting them in the dark. Briefly, more were wounded by their fellowes then by their enemies, til day breaking euery one knew his companion; & each one keeping his rank, did then betake themſelues to their darts & arrowes. Neither part gaue back, nor was wearied with labor: but many Romans together & apart, did in the view of the Emperor ſhew their courage, euery man accounting that day the beginning of his preferment, if he behaued himſelf valiantly. The Iewes fought ſtoutly, both for that they feared their owne imminent danger, if they were ouercome, and the deſtruction of the temple: and Iohn ſtanding by, encouraged them to fight, ſome with blowes, other ſome with threatnings. They fought moſt commonly with handy blowes; yet fortune often changed; for neither part had either fame to flee, or any ſpace to follow them that fledde. The Romans in Antonia eryed vnto their fellowes that fought the

Many Romans there fought courageouſly, and amongſt the Iewes theſe that follow: Iudas, the ſonne of Merton; Simon, the ſonne of Ioſias; and Iacob, and Simon Idumæus; this, the ſon of Cathla, but Iames was the ſon of Soſa: and all theſe were of Simons company, and of Iohns followers Gyphaus and Alexas; and of the Zelous, Simon the son of Iairus. But the 7. day, the rest of the Romans pulling down the foundations of Antonia, made a large entrance for the rest of the army. And the legions coming vnto the wall, presently began to raise mounts, one against the corner of the inner temple, which was situate north & east: & another against the gallery on the north side betwixt the 2. porches: & the other two, one against the porch of the west side of the outward temple; the other against the north porch. So with much toile and labour they finisht this work, fetching wood to build it withall 100. furlongs off. And many times they were endomaged by trechery, not being wary by reason of their victory: and the Iewes despairing of themselues euery houre, more and more were encouraged. For many of the horsmen going either to get wood or hay, while they were about it, they took the bridles from off their horse, and permitted them to feed til they had ended their business; and presently the Iewes issuing out in troups vpon them, took them away.

Four mounts raised neere to the temple.

The Iews surprise the Romans horses.

Titus seeing that this fell out, deemed (as indeed it was) that his mens horses were stolen rather by their negligence then their enemies valor: wherfore he thought by the seuere punishment of one, to make others look better to their horses. And so he put to death one of the souldiers that had lost his horse: by whose punishment the rest of the souldiers being terrified, kept their horses better. For after that, when they went about any businesse, they neuer left their horses in the pastures, but kept alwaies with them. Thus the Romans assaulted the temple, and builded there mounts. The day following, certain of the seditious, who now could get no more booties in the city, and now also beganne to taste of hunger, assaulted the Romans that were placed towards mount Oliuet about the eleuenth houre of the day: for they hoped to take them vnawares, as being now at dinner. But the Romans perceiuing their intent, came out of their places, and resisted them who attempted violently to break in vpon them ouer the wal: so that there was a hot fight, and many worthy deeds were done on either party, the Romans hauing both strength & knowledge in warlike affaires; the Iewes led with a desperate fury: and shame forced the Romans to fight, and need compelled the Iewes: for the Romans accounted it a shame not to ouercom the Iewes, who were as it were fallen into their hands; and the Iews thought it the only way to saue their owne liues, to break downe the wall by force. And one of the horsmen, called Pedanius, the Iewes being put to flight & driuen into the vally, pursued them with his horse as fast as he could gallop, and ouertook a yong man, one of his enemies, being heauy of body, armed all ouer; and taking him about the ankle, he carried him violently away: thereby shewing the strength of his arme and of the rest of his body, and his skilfull chiualry; and so brought the captiue vnto Cæsar as a present. Titus admiring Pedanius his strength, and punishing the captiue for hauing attempted to assault the wall, he now hasted to assaile the temple, and commanded the workmen quickly to dispatch the mounts. In the meane time the Iewes beeing ill handled in the former wars, and war still increasing to the ouerthrow of the temple, they did, as the custome is in a putrefied body, preuent the plague frō going any further, by cutting off the corrupted members. For that part of the porch that reached from the North vnto the East, ioined vnto Antonia: which they firing, separated it twenty cubits from it, hauing now with their own hands begunne to cast fire into the holy place. Two daies after, which was the 24. day of the aforesaid month, the Romans set the porch on fire, and the fire hauing gone foureteene cubits, the Iewes pulled down the top thereof, and not desisting from their accustomed works, they pulled downe all adioyning vnto Antonia; when it was easie for them, and that they ought to haue hindered the fire. The porch being on fire, they permitted so much to be burned as they thought good for their purpose. The fight about the temple neuer ceased, many excursions were made one against each other.

About this time, a certaine Iew of lowe stature, and to see to a contemptible person, euerie way an abiect, both by reason of his base parentage and otherwise, named Ionathan, going to the monument of Iohn the Priest, dared the strongest amongst the Romans to come and fight a single combate with him. The Romans that beheld him disdained him: yet some amongst them (as it is commonly seene) were afraid of him: others wisely deemed, that they ought not to fight with one that was desirous to die: for they that were desperate, neither fought aduisedly, nor had the feare of God before their eyes: and so that it was not a signe of valor, but of ouermuch hardinesse, to fight with such a one, whom though they ouercam, yet they could win no credit, but with infamy hazard themselues to be vanquished. So a long time none of the Romans came against him, and he vpbraided them of cowardlinesse. At last, an arrogant and proud fellow, one of the Roman horsmen, named Pudens, disdaining his insolency, and perhaps also for

A that hee was of little ſtature, came againſt him; and fighting with him, fortune frowned vpon him, ſo that he was laught to ſcorne by his fellow: for he falling downe, Ionathan ſlew him; and ſetting his foot vpon the dead body, with his left hand he flouriſhed his ſhield, and with his right his bloody ſword: and ſtriking his weapons one againſt another, hee inſulted ouer the Roman army, and ouer the dead bodie, vpbraiding the Romans, ſo long till Priſcus a Centurion, as hee was thus vaunting, ſhot him through with an arrow, and ſo he fell downe dead vpon the bodie of his enemie: at which deed, both the Romans and the Iewes raiſed a confuſed cry or noyſe. So Ionathan here ſhewed how quickly reuenge purſued the felicity of warlike victory, falling out contrary to all reaſon.

CHAP. VI.

How the Romans through the deceit of the Iewes were conſumed with fire, and of one Artorius.

THe ſeditious that kept the temple, did now euery day openly in fight reſiſt the Romans that kept the mounts, and the 27. day they deuiſed this ſtratagem; They filled the void part of the Eaſt porch of the temple with dry wood and brimſtone, and bitumen, and then fled out of it as not able longer to reſiſt. Wherefore many of the Romans raſhly purſued the Iewes that fled, and with ladders got into the galleries. But the wiſer ſort conſide-
C ring that the Iewes had no iuſt occaſion to fly, kept their place. The porch being now ful of Romans that were got vp into it, the Iewes gaue fire to the wood and brimſtone, and vpon a ſudden all the porch was compaſſed with the flame: ſo that the Romans who were out of danger were hereat amazed, and thoſe that were amidſt the flames became deſperate; and inuironed with the flames ſome ſought to run back into the towne, otherſome vnto the enemies; others kild themſelues, ſo preuenting the fury of the fire; and preſently the flame ouertooke thoſe that ſought to flie. Cæſar, though offended at the ſouldiers for hauing aſcended into the porch vnbidden, yet ſeeing them die ſo wofully in the flames, he compaſſionated them. And although that the fire could not be quenched, yet the poore ſouldiers dying amongſt the flames were hereat comforted, in that they perceiued him to be ſorrowfull for them, for whom they had loſt their liues.
D For they beheld him crying to their fellowes to help to extinguiſh the fire, and hee himſelfe laboured what he could to do it; ſo that euery one eſteemed his ſorrow and lamentation for them as much as a ſumptuous funerall: but ſome eſcaped the fire and got into the largeſt part of the porch; yet inuironed round about with Iewes, hauing long reſiſted, though with many wounds, yet in the end they were all ſlaine.

The Iewes fil the void part of the Eaſt porch with dry wood, ſulphure and bitumen.

The Romans calamity in the fire.

Cæſar hath compaſsion of the Romans that were in the fire.

At laſt a young man named Longus, was an honour to all this miſery: and notwithſtanding that euery one that there periſhed deſerued particularly to be remembred, yet he ſhewed himſelf the moſt valiant of them all. The Iewes were deſirous to kill this man for that he was ſtrong, & willed him to come downe vnto them, ſwearing vnto him to ſpare him. But his brother Cornelius, who ſtood on the other ſide, entreated him not to diſcredite his owne honour and the Romans;
E whom he obeyed: and he lifting vp his ſword on hie, that either part might ſeee, ſlew himſelfe. Yet one Artorius from amidſt the fire eſcaped by this deuice: hee called vnto him one Lucius his fellow ſoldier & chamber fellow; I wil (quoth he) make thee heire of all my inheritance if thou wilt catch me in thy armes. Lucius willingly endeuouring to do it, Artorius caſt himſelfe downe vpon him, and ſo eſcaped with his life, but Lucius vpon whom he fel was bruſed againſt the pauement, and ſo died. This calamity awhile did greatly grieue the Romans, yet it made them more wary afterward, and acquainted them with the Iewes ſubtilties, whereof before being ignorant, they ſuſtained great domage; ſo the porch was burnt vnto the tower which Iohn built, during his wars againſt Simon: and the Iewes, after the Romans that were aſcended into it were conſumed, pulled down the reſt. The next day the Romans fired the North porch, euen vnto the foreſaid

CHAP. VII.

Of the famine amongst the Iewes.

The inteſtine warres of the Iewes that were welnie famiſhed with hunger.

SVch were the affaires about the temple, but an infinite multitude periſhed within the citie through famine, ſo that they could not be numbred: for in euery place where any ſhew or ſigne of food was, preſently aroſe a battell, and the deareſt friends of all now fought one with another, to tak the food from other poor ſoules, neither did they beleeue them that were now a dying for famine, but the theeues ſearched them, whom they ſaw yeelding vp the ghoſt, thinking that they dying for famine, had hid about them ſome food: but they were H deceiued of their hope, being like mad dogges, greedy of meat, and fell againſt the doores like drunken men, ſearching the ſelfe ſame houſes twice or thrice together in deſperation, and for very penury they ate whatſoeuer they light vpon, gathering ſuch things to eat, as the moſt filthy liuing creatures in the world would haue loathed. In brief, they did eate their girdles & ſhooes, and the skins that couered their ſhields, ſo that a little of old hay was ſolde for foure Attiques. But what need is it to ſhew the ſharpnes of this famine by things that want life? I wil recount an act neuer heard of, neither among the Greeks, nor any other barbarous people, horrible to be rehearſed, and incredible: ſo that I would willingly omit this calamity, leaſt poſterity ſhould think I lie, had not I many witneſſes hereof, and perhaps ſhould incurre reprehenſion, not fully recounting all accidents of them that are dead. I

CHAP. VIII.

Of a woman that for famine killed her ſonne, and dreſſed him for meate.

ACertaine woman named Mary, dwelling beyond Iordan, the daughter of Eleazar of the towne of Vitezokia, which ſignifieth the houſe of Hyſope, deſcended of noble and rich parentage, flying with the reſt vnto Ieruſalem, was there with them beſieged, her other goods the tyrants had taken from her, which ſhe had brought from beyond the riuer into the citie: and whatſoeuer being hid, eſcaped their hands, the theeues daily came into her houſe and K tooke it away: whereat the woman greatly moued, curſed them, and with hard ſpeeches animated them the more againſt her, yet no man either for anger, or compaſſion would kill her, but ſuffred her to liue to get them meat: but now could ſhe get no more, and famine inuaded her, with rage and anger more then danger. Wherefore by rage and neceſſity ſhee was compelled to doe that which nature abhorred, and taking her ſon vnto whom ſhe then gaue ſucke, O miſerable childe (quoth ſhe) in warre, famine, and ſedition, for which of theſe ſhall I keep thee? If thou continue among the Romans, thou ſhalt be made a ſlaue, yet famine will preuent bondage, or elſe ſeditiō worſe then them both. Be therfore meat for me, a terrour vnto the ſeditious, a tragical ſtory to be ſpoken of by poſterity, and that which is only yet vnheard of among the calamities of the Iewes. Hauing thus ſpoken ſhe ſlew her ſonne, and did ſeeth the one halfe of him, and ate it, the L reſt ſhe reſerued couered. Preſently came the ſeditious, ſmelling the ſent of that execrable meat, threatning preſently to kill her, except ſhe forthwith brought ſome of that vnto them which ſhe had prepared. Then ſhe anſwered that ſhee had reſerued a good portion thereof for them, and preſently vncouered that part of her ſon which ſhee had left vneaten, at which ſight they trembled, and a horror fell vpon them. But the woman ſaid, This is truely my ſon, and my doing, eat you of it, for I my ſelf haue eaten therof. Be not more effeminate then a woman, nor more mercifull then a mother. If religion make you refuſe this my ſacrifice, I haue already eaten of it and will eat the reſt. Then the ſeditious departed hereat, onely trembling; and ſcarcely permitting this meat to the mother. Preſently the report of this hainous crime was bruted al about the city, and euery man hauing before his eyes this execrable fact, trembled as though himſelf had done M it. And now all that were vexed with this famine, haſtned their own deaths, and he was accounted happy that died before he felt this famine. This vnnaturall fact was ſoon after recounted vnto the Romans, and ſome of them would not beleeue it, others pitied them within the citie, and many hereat encreaſed their hatred towards that nation.

CHAP. IX.

How the wall was taken, and the temple burnt.

THe eight day of Auguſt, two of the Roman legions hauing finiſhed their mounts, they began to place their Rammes againſt the Eaſt galleries without the temple, hauing ſixe daies together without intermiſſion already beaten the wall with their ſtrongeſt Rams, and nothing preuailed, the ſtones being ſo ſtrong, that the Rams could not moue them: others of the Romans laboured to dig vp the foundations of the porch, that was on the North ſide; and
C after much toyle, they only could pull away the outward ſtones, and the inner ſtones did ſtil ſupport the porch. At laſt the Romans ſeeing themſelues not preuaile by their iauelines and other inſtrumens, they ſet ladders to aſcend into the galleries. The Iewes did not greatly labor to hinder them from getting vp: but when they were within the galleries, then they came and fought with them, and caſt ſome of them down headlong, forcing them to retire; others they ſlew that ſtood in it; and others that were vpon the ladders going down before they could defend themſelues with their ſhields, were with ſwords ſtricken down, and they alſo thruſt down ſome ladders full of armed men. So that there was a great maſſacre of the Romanes, ſome fighting for their enſignes, which the Iewes had taken from them, eſteeming the loſſe thereof a great ſhame vnto them. At laſt the Iewes got their ancients, and ſlew them, that came vp to reſcue them; and D the reſt terrified with their deaths that were ſlaine went down again, and no one of the Romans died, who before he was ſlain did not ſome valiant act; and thoſe ſeditious people that in the former battels did ſhew themſelues valiant, did now alſo fight valiantly, & beſide them Eleazar ſon vnto the tyrant the brother of Simon. Then Titus perceiuing that hee ſpared the temple of the Iewes to his loſſe, and to the death of his ſouldiers, hee commanded fire to be put to the temple gates: preſently Ananus of Emmaus the moſt cruel of all Simons followers, and Archelaus the ſon of Magadatus, fled vnto Titus; who, for their cruelties cõmitted, determined to put them to death: yet they hoped for pardon, for that they had now forſaken the Iewes when they had gotten the better hand. But Titus affirmed they came not of good will, but for neceſſity, and that they did not deſerue to liue forſaking their countrie now ſet on fire for their offences: yet his promiſe
E bridled his wrath, and he diſmiſſed them, but they were not ſo much eſteemed as the reſt. The Roman ſouldiers did now put fire vnto the temple doores: and the ſiluer plate wherewith they were couered being molten, the flame quickly fired the wood, and encreaſing tookhold preſently on the next porch. The Iewes ſeeing themſelues inuironed with flames, were now altogether diſcouraged, and their ſtrength failed them, and being amazed no man ſought to extinguiſh the flame, and ſo they ſtood ſtill beholding the fire, yet not lamenting that which was ſet on fire, more then deſiring to ſaue the reſt: and ſo that day and all the next night the fire encreaſed, for the porches were burnt by little and little, and not all at once.

The Iewes ouercome the Romans and ſeize their enſignes.

Titus promiſe reſtraineth his wrath.

None of the Iewes goeth about to extinguiſh the fire.

The next day Titus cauſed part of his army to quench the fire: and calling vnto him his captaines, and ſix that were the chiefeſt amongſt them, to wit, Tiberius Alexander Generall of the F whole army, Sextus Cerealis commander of the fift legion, Largius Lepidus of the tenth, Titus Frigius of the fifteenth, with whom was alſo Aeternius Fronto commander of the two legions that came from Alexandria, and Marcus Antonius Iulianus Gouernour of Iudæa, and with them the colonels and captaines, he deliberated with them what was to be done concerning the temple. Some counſelled to vſe the cuſtome of warres, for that the Iewes would neuer liue peaceably their temple ſtanding; all their nation whereſoeuer liuing, aſſembling themſelues thither at certaine times. Others perſwaded Titus that if ſo be the Iewes yeelded their temple, and fought not for it, then to ſaue it: but if they fought for it, to burne it: for now it ſeemed a caſtle and not a temple: and if any man were offended hereat, it ſhould not be imputed to the Romans or to their generall, but to the Iews who conſtrained them to do it; and he offended not, they forcing him to fire it. But Titus affirmed that although the Iews fought for their temple being men without conſcience, yet it ſhould not be deſtroied: for he would not ſo be reuenged of their iniquities: neither would he euer fire ſo goodly a building, for ſo it would redound to the loſſe of the Romans, as alſo it would be a credit vnto them, if it were left remaining. And now Alexander, Fronto, and Cerealis, perceiuing Cæſars mind were of his opinion, and ſo he diſmiſſed the conuocation, and commanded the ſouldiers and captaines to reſt, that they might bee more able to fight when need required: and preſently hee appointed certaine choſen men to make the waies euen, and eaſie for the army to paſſe by the ruines, commanding them to quench the fire; and that day the Iewes being fearefull and wearie did make no reſiſtance. The day following taking heart and aſſembled together, they aſſaulted the watchmen that kept without the temple, the ſecond houre of the day. The Romanes valiantly reſiſted their firſt aſſault, ſo defending themſelues with their ſhields as though they had a wall before them; yet ſure it was that they would not long abide, for that they were fewer in number then their enemies, and not ſo deſperate as they were. Then Cæſar before his men retyred (beholding the fight from Antonia) with certaine choſen horſemen came to ſuccor them: whoſe force the Iewes not ſuſtaining, but the firſt of them being ſlaine, the reſt fled: and the Romans departing, they returned, and fought againſt them; and when the Romans returned againe, preſently they fled, till about the fift houre of the day the Iewes were forced to betake themſelues into the temple, and there they were ſhut vp. Then Titus returned into Antonia, purpoſing the next day to aſſault them with all his army, and win the temple. But the ſentence of God had already determined, that it ſhould be conſumed with fire: and now the fatall day was come after many yeares, which was the tenth of Auguſt: vpon which day alſo the King of Babylon did once before fire it, yet was it now firſt ſet a fire by our owne countrimen, who were indeed the cauſe thereof. For the ſeditious being quiet till Titus was departed, then againe they aſſaulted the Romans, and ſo fought with the guard that were without the temple, labouring to extinguiſh the flame; who putting the Iewes to flight, came vnto the temple.

Titus counſel as concerning the temple.

Titus with his choſen horſemen cometh to reſcue the Romans.

The temple was burnt by the Romans the tenth of the moneth of Auguſt, on which day before time it was burned by the king of Babylon.

CHAP. X.

How the Temple was burnt againſt the will of Titus.

THen a certaine ſouldier, who expected no command, nor feared to do ſo execrable a fact, moued with ſome diuine fury, and lifted vp by his fellow, took in his hand a flaming firebrand, and caſt it into the golden gate which entred into the roomes on the North part of the temple, and the flame preſently aroſe: which cauſed a great cry amongſt the Iewes, expreſſing their calamity, and euery one haſted to extinguiſh the fire; now neither accounting of their liues nor forces, hauing loſt that for which they ſo fought. Newes hereof was preſently brought vnto Titus by one who came from the fight, who then was reſting in his tabernacle, and he preſently aroſe and ran vnto the temple to hinder the fire, and all the captaines after him; whereat the ſouldiers being terrified followed, and there aroſe a great cry and tumult in that army being vnordered. Cæſar both with voyce and hand made a ſigne vnto the ſouldiers, that were fighting, to quench the fire. But they did not heare him, there was ſo great a noyſe, neither did they perceiue the ſigne he had made vnto them with his hand, becauſe that ſome were diſtracted with fight, others with anger: and the ſouldiers iſſued in, not reſtrained either by commands or threatnings, but euery one went whither fury carried him: and thronging together at the entrance, many preſſed one another to death; and many being amongſt the fiery ruines of the galleries periſhed as miſerably as thoſe that were ouercome. When they came vnto the temple euery one counterfeited himſelfe not to heare Cæſars command, and ſo exhorted his fellowes that were before him to fire the temple. The ſeditious now had no hope to withſtand them, but either fled or were ſlaine; and many vnarmed and vnable people, whereſoeuer they were found, were ſlaine: ſo that about the altar was an innumerable company of dead bodies heaped together, & their blood flowed down the temple ſtaires; and their bodies that there were

Great ſlaughter in the temple.

A were ſlaine rouled down, Cæſar ſeeing he could not reſtraine the fury of the madbrain ſoldiers, and that the fire encreaſed, entred into the temple with his nobles, and beheld all the holy things there, and whatſoeuer elſe was there, farre ſurpaſſing all report which ſtrangers had giuen of it, and equall to that report which the Iewes made of it. And the flame not hauing yet pearced into the inner part of the temple, nor yet conſumed the houſes and roomes about it, he deemed that as yet it might be preſerued: wherfore himſelfe came & entreated the ſoldiers to extinguiſh the fire: commanding Liberalis the Centurion of his guard to beat thoſe with a trunchion that would not be obedient, and driue them away. But their fury and the rage of warre, and the hatred they bare againſt the Iewes, ouercame in them all Cæſars commands, and feare of them that forbade them. Many were incited ſo to doe hoping of ſome booty, thinking that all the temple
B within was full of money, becauſe they ſaw the gates of gold. Morouer, a certaine ſouldier, when Cæſar ſought to quench the flame, fired the poaſtes aboue the doores: and preſently the flame appearing within, Cæſar and the Captaines departed, and ſo euery one ſtood looking vpon it, and no man ſought to extinguiſh it. Thus the temple was burnt againſt Titus his will. And although euery man will iudge it a lamentable caſe, in ſuch a building ſurpaſſing all that euer was ſeene or heard of, both in greatneſſe, workmanſhip, coſtlineſſe and plenty of all things; in this yet we may comfort our ſelues, in that the deſtinies had ſo determined. For neither liuing creatures, nor places, nor buildings can auoid their deſtiny. One may alſo admire the exact and iuſt reuolution of time: for it was now deſtroyed in the ſame moneth, and on the ſame day that the Babylonians firſt deſtroyed it: and frō that time that Salomon began the firſt temple vnto the
C deſtruction of the ſecond temple, which hapned the ſecond yeare of Veſpaſians raigne, were a thouſand, a hundreth and thirty yeares, ſeuen moneths, and fifteene daies: and from the building of the latter temple which Aggæus built in the ſecond yeare of the raigne of King Cyrus, vnto the deſtruction thereof now in Veſpaſians raigne, were ſix hundreth thirty nine yeares and fiue and forty daies.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Prieſts: the treaſure houſe: and the porch.

D WHen the temple was thus conſumed with fire, whatſoeuer the ſouldiers found therein they carryed away, and put all to the ſword that were in it, which was an infinite number: neither did they ſhew any pitie to olde age, or infants: but olde, young, Prieſts and common people, all were ſlaine without reſpect, and all ſorts of people taſted the calamity of warre, whether they reſiſted, or intreated mercy. And now the flame encreaſed, which grieued euen them that were yeelding vp the ghoſt: and by reaſon of the height of the hill, and the building together, one would haue thought the whole Citie had beene on fire. Then a moſt lamentable cry was raiſed betweene the Romane legions, and the ſeditious now inuironed with fire and ſword, and of the people that were taken in the higher part of the Citie, and had fled vnto the Romanes, lamenting their calamity; and they of the Citie anſwe-
E red the teares and cries of them in the hill, and many whoſe eyes death by famine had already cloſed, tooke ſtrength awhile to bewaile the Temple, which they now opening their eyes beheld on fire. The country beyond Iordan, and the mountaines about did eccho with their laments: and yet the calamity ſurpaſſed that tumult. For one would haue iudged the hill whereon the temple was ſituate, to haue beene burnt vp by the rootes, it was ſo full of fire: Yet the multitude of blood there ſhed ſurpaſſed the fire. Many that were ſlaine were couered with them that ſlew them, and all the ground was ouerſpread with dead bodies, ſo that the ſouldiers ranne vpon the dead bodies to purſue them that fledde. At laſt the theeues hauing driuen the Romanes without the temple, they ranne into the citie; and the reſt of the people that were left, fled into the outward porch. And many of the Prieſts firſt vſed ſpits, and then their ſeats
F made of lead, in ſteed of darts againſt the Romans; at laſt nothing at all preuailing, and the fire falling vpon them, they went vnto a wall eight cubits broad, and there ſtaied. Yet two of the nobles, when they might either haue fled vnto the Romans, and there haue been ſaued, or elſe haue endured like fortune with the reſt, they notwithſtanding caſt themſelues into the fire, and ſo were burnt with the temple: one of them was named Meierus the ſon of Belga, the other Joſeph the ſonne of Daleus.

The Romans thought it in vaine to ſpare the buildings about the temple, ſeeing the temple G was already conſumed, and ſo ſet fire on them all, the porches, galleries and gates; two onely excepted, one on the Eaſt ſide, and the other on the South ſide, both which afterward they raſed vnto the ground: they burnt alſo certaine cheſts called Gazophylacia, or mony boxes, wherin was great ſtore of coine, and rich garments, and other precious things, and indeed all the Iewes treaſure, for the richeſt of the Citie had brought all their wealth thither. There came into the porch that was left ſtanding, many men, women and children, to the number of ſixe thouſand.

Six thouſand in the porch conſumed by fire.

And before Cæſar and the captaines did determine any thing what ſhould bee done with them, the furious ſouldiers fired the porch wherein they were, and ſo they all periſhed in the flames; ſaue a few, that leaping downe to auoid the fire, were ſlaine in the fall, ſo that no one eſcaped of all that multitude. A certain falſe Prophet was cauſe of all their deaths, who the ſame day preа- H ched in the Citie, and commanded them to goe into the temple, and behold ſignes of their deliuerance: for many falſe Prophets were then ſuborned by the tyrants, to perſwade them to expect Gods help, thereby to hinder them from flying to the Romans, and to cauſe the ſouldiers to fight more valiantly to defend their citie. Men eaſily beleeue and are credulous in aduerſity, ſo that if any deceitfull perſon promiſe deliuerance out of calamity, he that ſuffereth miſerie is full of hope thereof.

CHAP. XII.

Of the ſtrange ſignes and tokens that appeared before the deſtruction of Ieruſalem. I

The blindnes of the people.

THeſe miſerable people were thus eaſily perſwaded by impoſtors who did belie God, yet would they not beleeue, nor giue any eare or regard vnto certain tokens, & ſignes of the ruine of their city: but as it were blinded, neither hauing eyes nor ſoules, they counterfeited themſelues not to ſee what God foreſhewed them. One while there was a comet in form of a fiery ſword, which for a year together did hang ouer the citie: another time before the firſt reuolt and warre, the people being gathered together to the feaſt of vnleauened bread (which was the eight day of April) the ninth houre of the night, there was ſo much light about the altar and temple, as though it had bin bright day, which remained halfe an houre: this the ignorant K people interpreted as a good ſigne; but they that were skilfull in holy Scripture, did preſently iudge, what would enſue before it came to paſſe. The ſame feſtiuity a cow led to be ſacrificed at the altar brought forth a lambe in the midſt of the temple: and the inner gate of the temple on Eaſt ſide being of maſſiue braſſe, which at night time had alwaies at leaſt 20. men to ſhut it, and was bound with locks of iron, and was barred with barres, the ends whereof went into morteis holes in the ſtones on either ſide the doore (the foreſaid ſtones being on each ſide, one whole ſtone) was ſeen at the firſt houre of the night to open of his own accord: which being preſently related vnto the Magiſtrate by the keepers of the temple, hee himſelfe came thither and could ſcarcely ſhut it, & this alſo to the ignorant ſeemed a good ſigne, affirming that God opened vnto them the gate of his bleſſings: but the wiſer ſort iudged that the defence of the temple would L decay of his own accord, & that the opening of the gate foretold, that it ſhould be giuen to the enemies, affirming one vnto another that this ſigne ſignified deſolation. A little while after the feaſt daies, on the 21. day of May there was ſeene a viſion beyond all beliefe, and perhaps that which I am to recount might ſeeme a fable, if ſome were not now aliue that beheld it, and that calamity worthy to be ſo foretold enſued: for before the ſunne ſet, were ſeen in the ayre iron chariots all ouer the countrie, and an army in battell aray paſſing along in the clowds, and begirting the citie. And vpon the feaſt day called Pentecoſt, at night the Prieſts going into the inner temple to offer their wonted ſacrifice, at firſt felt the place to moue and tremble, and afterward they heard a voyce which ſaid, Let vs depart hence. And that which was moſt wonderfull of all, one Ieſus the ſonne of Ananus a country man of the common people, foure yeares be- M fore the warres began, when the Citie flouriſhed in peace and riches, comming to the celebration of the feaſt to Ieruſalem, which we call the feaſt of Tabernacles, ſuddenly began to cry out thus; A voice from the Eaſt: A voice from the Weſt: A voice from the foure winds: A voice againſt Ieruſalem and the temple: A voice againſt men and women newly married: A voyce againſt all this people: and thus crying night and day, hee went about all the ſtreets of the Citie.

A Some of the nobility diſdaining misfortune, took him and ſcourged him with many ſtripes: but he, neither ſecretly ſpeaking for himſelfe, nor to thoſe that did beat him, perſeuered crying as before. The Magiſtrates then thinking (as indeed it was) that the man ſpake this through ſome diuine motion, led him vnto the Generall of the Romans, where being beaten til his bones appeared, he neuer intreated nor wept, but as wel as he could, framing a weeping voice, he cried, Wo, wo vnto Ieruſalem. Albinus (being then Iudge) asked him what he was, or of whence, or wherefore he ſaid ſo, but he made him no anſwer. Yet hee ceaſed not to bewaile the miſery of Ieruſalem, vntill Albinus, thinking him to be out of his wits, ſuffred him to depart. This man euen vntill the time of warre neuer went to any citizen, nor was ſeene ſpeak to any one: but ſtill as it were ſtudying of ſome ſpeech, he cried, Wo, wo vnto Ieruſalem. Neither did hee euer curſe any one, B though euery day one or other did beat him; nor thank any one that offred him meat. All that he ſpake vnto any man was this heauy prophecy. Hee went crying as is aforeſaid, chiefly vpon holy-daies, ſo doing continually for the ſpace of ſeauen yeares and fiue moneths, his voice neuer wexing hoarſe nor weary, till in the time of the ſiege, beholding what he foretold them, hee ceaſed, and then once again vpon the wals going about the city, with a loud voice he cried, Wo, wo to the City, Temple and people: and laſtly he ſaid, Wo alſo to my ſelf. Which words were no ſooner vttered, but a ſtone ſhot out of an engine ſmote him, and ſo hee yeelded vp the ghoſt, lamenting them all.

If any one do diligently conſider all theſe, he ſhall finde that God hath a care of mankind, and doth euery way foreſhew betime, what is moſt expedient for them, and they through their own C madnes, to haue voluntarily periſhed in their wickednes. For the Iewes, when the Caſtle Antonia was taken, made the Temple foure-ſquare: notwithſtanding that it was written in the holy Scripture, that the City and Temple ſhould be taken, when the Temple was made foureſquare. But that which chiefely incited them to war, was the doubtfull prophecy likewiſe found in the holy Scriptures: That at the ſame time, one in their dominions ſhould be Monarch of the whole world; and many wiſemen were deceiued in this interpretation, making account that he ſhould be one of their owne nation, yet indeed thereby was foretold Veſpaſians Empire. But men cannot preuent deſtiny, though they foreſee it. Thus the Iewes interpreted ſome of the ſignes as they pleaſed, and at others they laughed, till by the ruine of their country, and their own woful ouerthrowe, their iniquity appeared.

The Iewes interpreting the ſignes to their owne good liking, are their Countries ruine and the cauſe of their own calamity.

CHAP. XIII.

How Titus was made Emperour: and of the death of the Prieſts.

AFter the ſeditious were fled into the City, all the Temple and places thereabout beeing ſet on fire, the Romans placed their Enſignes in the Temple ouer againſt the Eaſt gate: and there celebrating ſacrifice, with great cries declared Titus Emperour, and the Romans got ſuch preyes and booties, that they ſold gold in Syria for halfe the valew. And among thoſe Prieſts that kept on the wall, a child being thirſty, deſired peace of the Roman watchmen, E ſaying, that he was thirſty. So they, pitying both his yeeres and his need, gaue him their hands that he ſhould haue no harme, and then he came downe and drunk, and filled a bottle which he brought with him: and when he had done, he ranne vp againe to his fellowes, and none of the watchmen were able to ouertake him, and they vpbraided him with falſhood. But he anſwered, that he had done nothing, but that which he and they intended: for they did not giue him their hands to ſecure him to remaine with them, but onely to come downe and take water, which he had done. The Roman watchmen greatly admired the ſubtilty of him that was but a childe. The fift day, the Prieſts being almoſt famiſhed came downe, and the watchmen caried them to Titus, whom they beſought to grant them their liues. But he anſwerd them, that the time of pardon was paſt, ſeeing that was deſtroied, for the which he might haue pardoned them, and that it F was meet that the prieſts ſhould periſh with the Temple: and ſo he commanded them to be put to death. Then the tyrants with their followers being on euery ſide beſet with wars, and hauing no way to flee, they being thus beleaguerd round, requeſted to parley with Titus; who for his naturall meekneſſe, his friends alſo perſwading him thereto, thought at leaſt to ſaue the Citie (iudging indeed that now the ſeditious had altered their minds) and ſo he ſtood in the weſt part of the inner Temple: for there was a gate built aboue a gallery, and a bridge that ioyned the Temple and Citie together, which was then between Titus and the tyrants. Many ſouldiers on both parts flocked about their rulers; the Iewes about Simon and Iohn, hoping for pardon: the Romans about Titus, deſirous what he would ſay vnto them: and Titus by an Edict commaunding the ſouldiers to be quiet, and to ſhoot no arrowes, ſpake vnto them firſt by an Interpreter, thereby ſhewing that he had the vpper hand, and ſaid, O ye men of Ieruſalem, are yee not now glutted with the calamities of your country? Neither calling to mind our power, nor your own infirmity, but with a raſh fury haue deſtroied your people, city and temple: your ſelues alſo hauing iuſtly deſerued to periſh, who, ſince Pompey firſt conquered you, haue neuer ceaſed to be ſeditious, and at laſt haue openly born armes againſt the Romans. Did you truſt vnto your multitude? You haue ſeene that a ſmall parcell of the Romans army hath ſufficiently reſiſted you. Or did you expect forraine aid? What nation is not vnder our dominion? and who would rather make choice of the Iewes then of the Romans? Did you truſt in your ſtrength of body? why, you knowe the Germans ſerue vs. Or in the ſtrength of your wals? what wall, or what greater hinderance then the Ocean, wherewith the Britaines inuironed, haue yeelded vnto the Roman forces? Or to your courage, & politike counſell of your captains? You haue alreadie heard that the Carthaginians haue beene by vs ſurpriſed. It was therefore the Romans humanitie that incited you againſt themſelues, who firſt of all permitted you to poſſeſſe your country, and gaue you Kings of your owne nation: and after all this, we kept your lawes inuiolate, and ſuffred you to liue as your ſelues deſired, not onely in your own country, but alſo amongſt other nations; and which is the greateſt of all our benefits beſtowed vpon you, we permitted you to gather tribute and gifts to the maintenance of your temple and ſacrifices to GOD; of all which we neither forbad any to be brought vnto you, neither hindered any that would offer vnto your Temple, but ſuffred you our enemies to be made richer then our ſelues, ſo that you haue vſed our owne money againſt vs. Wherfore, hauing receiued ſo many benefits at our hands, you haue now diſgorged your ſelues vpon vs, and like ſpightfull ſerpents, ſpet your poiſon vpon them that made much of you. Let vs omit that by Nero his negligence you became forgetfull of your duty, and like ſome member in the body broken or ſhrunk, you beeing ſtill tumultuous, at laſt were taken in a greater offence, and were incouraged with immoderate deſires to hope for vnlawful liberty. My father came into your country, not to puniſh you for your miſdemeanor toward Ceſtius, but by good counſell and warning to reprehend and quiet you. And whereas if he had come to deſtroy your nation, hee ought firſt to haue cut downe the very root, and to haue come vnto this city and deſtroied it, with the inhabitants: he rather choſe firſt to waſte Galilea, and the places adioining, that in the meane time you might repent you, and conſider of your eſtate. But this his mercy towards you was held for cowardlineſſe and infirmity in him, and by our long ſuffering, you were emboulded againſt vs: and when Nero was dead, you did as treacherous ſubiects are wont to do, taking occaſion by our ciuill diſſenſion, to reuolt from vs: and whil'ſt my father and I were gone into Egypt, you prepared your ſelues to war againſt vs; neither were you aſhamed to trouble them that were deſigned Princes, whom notwithſtanding you had found moſt gentle captaines vnto you. At laſt, when the Empire fell vnto vs, and all things being now quieted, all nations with gifts & preſents came to congratulate vs: behold again, the Iews ſhewed themſelues our enemies, and you ſent an Embaſſadour beyond Euphrates, onely to nouriſh your rebellion, walling and fortifying your towns anew; and contending like ſeditious and tyrants one with another, ſet abroach ciuill wars: all which none but impious people would haue committed. Wherfore being commanded by my father, who was now vrged thereunto, I came againſt this city with a heauy charge; yet did I reioyce when I heard that the people deſired peace. Before I warred againſt you I exhorted you to peace: after war was begun, I deſiſted awhile from vſing ſeuerity: I ſpared all them that of their owne accord fled vnto mee, and kept my promiſe vnto them, pitying thoſe that were captiues. I with ſtrokes reſtrained them that haſted the war againſt you againſt my wil; and euen forced ſo to do, I ſet the Romans againſt your wals, and alwaies reſtrained my ſouldiers ſo much deſirous of your bloud. As often as I ouercame you, ſo often did I exhort you to peace, as though I had been vanquiſhed. Againe; when I approached vnto the Temple, I (willingly omitting the law of arms) requeſted you to ſpare both it and the holy things, offering you leaue to depart, and promiſing you ſafety, or licencing you to fight another time in another place, if ſo you thought good. All theſe my offers you refuſed, and with your owne hands fired your temple. And now you wicked wretches vrge me to a parlee. What thing can you now preſerue ſo excellent, as that which is already periſhed? What pardon can you

A you expect, ſeeing your temple is deſtroied? nay, euen now you ſtand armed, not ſo much as counterfeiting ſubmiſſion in the laſt caſt. O wretches, with what hope? Is not your people dead, is not your temple deſtroied, and your city now in my hands, yea, your liues alſo? But do you think death the renowne of fortitude? I will not ſtriue with your obſtinacy: yet if you wil caſt downe your weapons, and yeeld your bodies, I will ſpare your liues: And like as in a priuate houſe I wil ſhew my ſelfe vnto you a gentle maſter; and after I haue puniſhed that which otherwiſe is incurable, I will reſerue the reſt for my ſelfe.

Titus grants the Iewes life, on condition they ſhould lay aſide their weapons, and ſubmit themſelues.

To this they anſwered, that they could not receiue pardon at his hands, hauing vowed the contrary: wherfore they requeſted licence to depart with their wiues & children by the camp, which he had enuironed with a wall, and ſo to goe into the wildernes, and leaue the City to the
B Romans. Titus was hereat greatly enraged, that they being in a manner captiues, ſhould impoſe vpon him conditions, as though they were victors; and commanded a crier to tell them, that henceforth they ſhould not flee vnto him, nor hope that he would pardon them: for hee would ſpare nothing, willing them with all their forces to fight and ſaue themſelues as they could, for he would now in all things vſe the law of armes: and ſo he permitted the ſouldiers to ſacke the City and ſet it on fire. And that day they did nothing: but the next day following, they fired the councell-houſe, the palace Acra, and Ophla, and the fire came vnto Queene Helens palace, which was ſituate in the midſt of Acra: alſo the houſes and ſtreets of the city ful of dead bodies were ſet on fire. The ſame day, the ſons and brethren of king Izates, and with them many nobles of the people, aſſembled together, beſought Cæſar to pardon them: and he, though incenſed a-
C gainſt them all, yet not changing his maner, receiued them to mercy, and put them all in priſon, and afterward carried them bound to Rome for hoſtages, that were the kings ſons and kinſmen.

Of the prey of the ſeditious, and the burning of the inner part of the Citie.

THe ſeditious went vnto the kings palace, where many had left all their wealth, becauſe it was a ſtrong place: and driuing the Romans from thence, they ſlew all the people there
D aſſembled, amounting to the number of 8000, and 400, and carried away all the mony, and they tooke there two Roman ſouldiers aliue, one a horſman, and another a footman; and they ſlue the footman, & drew him all along the city, as it were in the body of that one, reuenging themſelues vpon all the Romans. But the horſeman affirmed that he had ſomething to ſay vnto them, which would greatly profit them, and ſaue their liues: who was caried to Simon; and not hauing there any thing to ſay, Simon deliuered him to one of his captaines called Ardala to bee ſlaine, and hee brought him where the Romans might behould him with his hands bound behinde him, and a veile before his eies, meaning there to behead him: but he, whil'ſt the Iew drew out his ſword, E fled to the Romans. And Titus would not put him to death, becauſe he had eſcaped from the enemies: yet deeming him vnworthy to be a Roman ſouldier, who ſuffred himſelfe to bee taken aliue, he tooke from him his armes, and diſcharged him from bearing them any more, which to a wiſe man was worſe then death. The next day, the Romans putting the ſeditious to flight that were in the lower city, they fired all vnto Siloa, reioycing that the town was deſtroied: yet they got no booties, becauſe the ſeditious had already robbed and ſpoiled all, and carried it into the higher city. For they nothing repented them of their wickednes, but were as arrogant as though they had beene in proſperity: ſo that they with ioy beheld the city on fire, affirming that they deſired death; for that the people beeing ſlaine, the temple deſtroied, and the city on fire, they ſhould leaue nothing to their enemies. Yet Ioſeph in that extreamity laboured to ſaue the relicks of the city, much inueighing againſt their cruelty, and earneſtly exhorting them to ſaue themſelues: yet he nothing profited in all this, but was derided for his labor: for neither would they
F yeeld to the Romans for their oaths ſake, neither were they able to fight with the Romans, beeing now as it were beſieged round by them; yet their accuſtomed murders did encourage them to ſtand out.

Thus diſperſed all ouer the City, they lurked in the ruines, lying in wait for thoſe that ſought to flee vnto the Romans, and many of them were taken, and all of them were ſlaine; for famine had ſo weakned them, that they could not flee, and they caſt their dead bodies to dogs. And any death death were easie in respect of famine. So that many fled vnto the Romans, hauing no promise, no nor hope to be pardoned by them, and vpon purpose fel into the hands of the seditious, who neuer ceased from murther: and now there was no place in the whole city void, but was fild with dead bodies, who either perished by famine or sedition. But the tyrants and factious thieues put their last refuge in the vaults, where they hoped whatsoeuer hapned to saue themselues, hoping that there they could not be found, and so after the city was destroied, to escape, which was onely their vain fantasie. For they could neither be hid from God nor the Romans: yet at that time they trusted in those caues, from whence they fired the city more then the Romans, and cruelly murderd them that, hauing escaped the flames, came & fled into secret places, and spoiled them: also if they in any place found any meat, though all bloudy, yet they took it, and did eat it, and now one of them began to fight with another about the spoile they got. And I verely perswade my selfe, that had they not beene preuented by the destruction of the city, their cruelty would haue been such, that they would haue eaten the bodies of dead men.

The tyrants vttermost hope was in their vaults.

How the higher part of the Citie vvas assaulted: and how some of the Iewes fled vnto Titus.

Caesar, perceiuing that the higher part of the City would not bee won without mounts, being situate in a soile, round about the which were high and deep places, on the twentith day of August he set all his souldiers on worke, and the carrying of wood for that purpose was very painful: all trees within 100. furlongs off the city were already cut down, and vsed in the former work, as is before said. So the four legions raised a mount on the west side of the city, and all the rest made a mount against the porch, bridge and tower, which Simon during his wars with Iohn had built. About this time, the captaines of the Idumæans assembling together, deliberated to yeeld themselues, and sent fiue of their company to Titus, beseeching him to confirme a peace vnto them: and he hoping that the tyrant would yeeld after them, who were the greatest part of his army, with much ado granted them life, & so sent them to their fellows: but Simon had notice of their departure, and presently slew those fiue that were sent vnto Titus, and taking the captains (the noblest of whom was Iames, the son of Sosa) hee put them in prison, and also kept and guarded the Idumæans, who now hauing no gouernours knew not what to do, yet the guard could not hinder them from fleeing: for although many of them were kild, yet diuers fled and escaped, and were all receiued by the Romans; Titus curtesie being such, as that he remembred not his former edict to the contrary, and now the souldiers hoping for gain, and hauing already gotten sufficient, abstained from murthers: for leauing only the common people, they sold the rest with their wiues and children for a small price, many beeing exposed to sale, and few coming to buy them: so that he hauing made an edict that none should flee vnto him alone, intending thereby to bring their families with them, yet hee now receiued them also, appointing some to enquire who had deserued punishment, and to inflict it on them. And an infinite number was sold, and more then 40000. of the people were saued, whom the Emperor dismissed, and permitted to go whither they pleased. The same time a certaine Priest, the sonne of Thebathus, named Iesus, was promised pardon on condition he should deliuer certain holy things giuen to the temple: and so he came and brought out of a wall two candlesticks, like to them that were in the temple, tables, goblets, cups, all made of solid and massiue gold: also, the veil and the ornaments of the priests, and the precious stones about them, and many vessels made for sacrifice. Moreouer, the keeper of the holy treasure, called Phineas, brought forth the garments, and all things that did belong to the priests, and much purple and scarlet, which were laid vp in store to make tapestry or hangings, among which also was some Cinamon, Cassia, and many other odoriferous things, whereof were compounded sweet odors to be offred to God. He also deliuered him much wealth of other mens, and much sacred treasure: for the which, notwithstanding he was taken by force, yet he was pardoned, as they were that fled vnto Caesar.

The yeare of the world, 4034. after Christs birth, 72.

How the reſt of the Citie was taken.

THe ſeauenth day of September, the mounts being finiſhed, which was the eighteenth day after they were begun, ſome of the Romans placed their rams and engins to batter them; and ſom of the ſeditious, who now deſpaired to keep the city, left the wals, and fled into Acra, others hid themſelues in certain vaults, and many hindred the Romans, and reſiſted them for placing their rams againſt the wals, who were ouercome by them, B being both more in number then they were, and alſo ſtronger and more valiant. The Iewes being now all diſcouraged and ſorrowfull, ſo ſoone as any part of the wall was broken downe, or ſhaken with the force of the rammes, ſtraightwaies fled, and now the tyrants were ſurpriſed with a greater feare then needed. For euen before ſuch time as the enemies had entred the wall, they ſtood in doubt whether they might flee or no: and they who a little before were proud & arrogant malefactors, did now tremble and quake, ſo that it was pitiful to ſee ſuch a change in them, though they were wicked perſons. And they endeuoured to aſſaile the wall that Titus had built to compaſſe the whole city withal: but ſeeing themſelues forſaken of all thoſe that were wont to bee truſty vnto them, euery one fledde whither neceſſity did driue him. Preſently newes were brought them that all the weſt wall of the city was beaten downe, others affirmed that the RoC mans had entred, and that they had ſeen the enemies in the towers, feare dazeling their eies: and proſtrate on the ground, they bewailed their misfortune; and as though they had beene lame, they ſtood ſtill, and ſought not to flee. From whence one may chiefly perceiue Gods iuſtice toward the impious, and the Romans fortune: for the tyrants depriued themſelues of their ſtrong holds, and voluntarily departed out of their towers, wherein they could neuer haue been taken but by famine: and the Romans, hauing ſo much labored at the lower wals, did now by fortune take theſe, which their engines could neuer haue ſhaken, for there were 3. inexpugnable towers that could not be battered with the engines, whereof before we haue made mention. So the tyrants hauing forſaken theſe, or rather being by Gods will driuen from hence, preſently they fled vnto the valley Siloa; after the feare was paſt they againe took heart, and went vnto the wall that D was in that place: yet not vſing ſuch courage and violence as their need required, they were beaten by the watchmen that guarded it, their ſtrength now failing & wearied with labor, feare, famine and calamity. And ſome were driuen one way, and ſome another, and ſo were forced to hide themſelues in vaults and ſinks. The Romans hauing obtained the wall, placed their colours in the towers, and clapping their hands, and ſinging for ioy, they cried, Victory, finding the end of the warre nothing ſo terrible as the beginning. Yet did they not beleeue that was the end, becauſe they gotte the wall without any bloudſhed, but admired, ſeeing no man did offer to reſiſt them. And now iſſuing into euery ſtreet, they ſlue whomſoeuer they found, without any reſpect, and fired houſes, and all the people that had fled into them, and deſtroyed many whereas they entred for to get a prey, and they found whole families dead, and houſes ful of dead bodies, conE ſumed by famine. Thus terrified with that heauy ſight, they departed out, not taking any thing away, yet for all that they pitied not them that were left aliue, but ſlew whomſoeuer they met, wherby they filled the narrow ſtreets ſo full of dead bodies by them ſlaine, that none could paſſe that way for them: all the whole city flowed with bloud, ſo that many things ſet on fire, were quenched with the bloud of them that were ſlaine. At euening they ceaſed from killing, but all the night long the fire increaſed: and ſo in the morning, which was the eight day of September, all was now on fire, the city in the time of the ſiege hauing endured more miſery and calamity, then euer it receiued ioy and happineſſe from the time of the firſt foundation, notwithſtanding that they were ſo great that all cities might iuſtly enuy it, and it no wiſe deſerued ſo to be oppreſſed with ſuch miſery, ſaue onely for that it foſtered and bred ſuch impious perſons as wrought F the ouerthrowe thereof.

Titus, entring into the city, amongſt the reſt admired the ſtrong houlds thereof, and the rocky towers which the tyrants like madde men depriued themſelues of: and ſeeing the height, firmneſſe, bignes, and the ioining of the ſtones together, and their breadth & height, he ſaid: Surely, God hath aſſiſted vs in the fight, and he it was that did withdraw the Iews from theſe fortreſſes. For what could mens hands and engins preuaile againſt them? And hauing ſpoke much to this effect, effect, comming with his friends, he set them at liberty whom the tyrants had left bound in the Castles: and when he destroied the rest of the city & wals, he left those towers standing as a monument of his good fortune and victory, by the which he had gained them, though vnexpugnable. The souldiers now being weary with killing the miserable Iewes, and yet a great multitude remaining aliue, Cæsar commanded, that onely the armed Iewes and they that resisted should be slaine, and the rest left aliue. But the souldiers also killed old folkes and weak persons, and taking all able men & lusty, they caried them into the temple, and shut them there in the place appointed for the women. Cæsar left one Fronto, a libertine and his friend, to keep them, giuing him also charge to make inquiry, who had deserued punishment; who slew all the thieues and seditious, one of them bewraying another, and reserued certaine chosen young men of large stature and beautifull withall for the triumph: and all the rest that were aboue 17. yeares old hee sent bound into Egypt, to be emploied in certaine works there, as digging, deluing and manuring the fields, and to be vsed in other publike businesse. Titus also sent many of them vnto diuers prouinces to be slaine in the Theaters with beasts or swords: and they that were vnder 17. yeeres of age were sold. And during the time that Fronto kept them, 10000. died for hunger; partly, for that their Keepers hating them, would not giue them any meat; partly, for that some refused meat when it was offred them. For there was now scarcity of corne by reason of the great multitude of the people.

Of the number of the captiues, and them that were slaine.

The number of the captiues & such as died during the siege of the city.

THe number of all the captiues that were taken during the whole time of warre, was 97000: and the number of all that died & were slain during the siege, was 1100000, the most of them being Iewes by nation, but not inhabitants of that place. For beeing assembled together from all parts to the feast of vnleauened bread, presently and on a sudden they were enuironed with war, and first of all a plague fell among them by reason of the straightnes of the place, and immediately after, famine, worse then it. And that the City was capable of so many men it is euident, for that Cestius before numbred them; who, desirous to signifie the flourishing estate and strength of Ierusalem vnto Nero, who contemned our nation, requested the high priests, that if possibly they could they should number all the people in their city: and that vpon the feast of Easter, when they killed offrings from the ninth houre of the day vntill the eleuenth (and to eat a lamb not fewer then ten persons were assembled, for it is not lawfull to feast alone, yea, many times 20. are in a company) they numbred 256000, and 500. oblations or lambs to be kild; so that if wee reckon to euery lambe ten men, the number amounts to 2700000. men, all purified whole and sound: for it was not lawfull for any that were lepers, or had a fluxe of seed, nor women that had the monthly tearmes, to eat of that sacrifice, nor for any stranger, except he came thither for religion sake. And this multitude was assembled together from other places, and was there by the prouidence of God shut vp as it were in a prison. And the city being filled with men of war was besieged, that the number of them that were slaine passed all that euer perished, either by any plague sent from God, or by the means of men; who were partly openly slaine, partly taken by the Romans: who searching the vaults, and opening the sepulchres, spared none they mette withall. There also were found more then 2000, whereof some slew themselues with their owne hands, other-some kild by others, the rest perished by famine. The stink of dead bodies was so great, that many minding to go and search the foresaid places, and being entred into them, were forced to retire: yet others for lucre sake treading on the dead carcasses, searched the dead bodies, if they could find any thing: for much riches were hid in the vaults, and couetousnesse omitted no way to gaine. Moreouer, many were taken out from thence, whom the tyrants had bound, who euen in their extreamity ceased not to tyrannize: yet God plagued them both according to their deserts: for Iohn being now almost famished with his brethren in a vault, besought the Romans to saue his life. And Simon, hauing long striuen with necessity, as we shall hereafter make mention of, at last yeelded himselfe, who was kept for the triumph; and Iohn was condemned to perpetuall prison. Then they destroyed the wals, and fired the outward parts of the City.

A briefe historie of the Citie of Ierusalem.

THus was Ierusalem taken the second yeere of Vespasians raigne, on the eight day of September, and hauing beene alreadie fiue times before surprised, it was finally againe destroyed. First Asochæus king of Aegypt, and after him Antiochus, then Pompey, and after them Herod with Sosius tooke the Citie and yet destroyed it not. But before them the King of Babylon destroyed it, when hee had inioyed the same, a thousand three hundreth and threescore yeeres, eight moneths and sixe daies after it was first built: but hee that first built it was one of the Princes of the Cananeans, in his owne language called the iust king. For he indeed was so, & therfore was the first Priest that sacrificed vnto God, and dedicating a Temple, called the Citie Solyma: but Dauid the king of the Iewes hauing driuen out the Cananeans, gaue it vnto his people to bee inhabited, and after foure hundreth threescore foure yeeres and three moneths, it was destroyed by the Babylonians: & from king Dauid who was the first Iew that raigned there, vntill the time that Titus destroyed it, were a thousand one hundred seuentie & nine yeeres, and from the time that it was first erected vntil it was by him destroyed, were two thousand one hundred and seuentie seuen yeeres: yet neither the antiquitie nor riches, nor the fame thereof now spread all ouer the world, nor the glorie of religion did any thing profit or hinder it, from being destroyed. Such was the end of the besieging of Ierusalem. When there was none left to kill, nor any thing remaining for the souldiers to get, & that now there was nothing, against which the soldiers could shew their outrage (for they would haue spared nothing that they could haue spoyled) Cæsar cõmaunded them to destroy the City & Temple, onely yet leauing standing certaine towers, that were more beautifull and stronger then the rest, to wit, Phasaelus, Hippicos, and Mariamme, and the wall that was on the West side; meaning there to keepe a garrison, and that they should be monuments of the Romans vertue, who had surprised a City so well fortified as it appeared by them. All the rest of the Citie they so plained, that they who had not seene it before, would not beleeue that it had been euer inhabited. This was the end of their madnes, who were alwaies giuen vnto sedition in Ierusalem, a most worthie Citie and famous amongst all nations.

Howw the souldiers vvere rewvarded.

CAesar determined to leaue the tenth legion for a garrison in Ierusalem, with some troupes of horsemen and other companies of footmen: and all wars being now ended, he purposed to thanke the whole armie for their valiant acts, & reward the most courageous for their deserts. And placing a great tribunall in the middest before the campe, standing in it with the chiefe peeres about him, from whence the whole armie might heare him, hee gaue them heartie thankes for that of their good will towards him, they had patiently abode with him during those wars, praysing them for their loyaltie during al the foresaid time, and that in many skirmiges they had shewed themselues valiant, & by their valour had enlarged the dominions of their countrie: likewise they had now giuen al natiõs to vnderstand, that neither the multitude of enemies, nor strong holds, nor greatnesse of Cities, nor rashnes, nor barbarous crueltie of their aduersaries could euer resist the forces of the Romanes, nor escape their hands; notwithstanding that in manie things fortune fauoured them: adding that it was a credite for them to haue ended those wars that had continued a long time; which was all that they hoped for at their comming; and which was most glorie of all vnto them, that those Captaines whom they had elected to be the Romane Emperours, were well liked and imbraced of all men, all standing to their appointment; & acknowledging themselues beholding to them that elected them. Moreouer that hee admired them and loued them all, for that euerie one shewed himselfe valiant and courageous: affirming that he would now recompence those with honours, and due desert, who had behaued themselues most valiantly, and most hasarded themselues, and effected worthie deeds, and whosoeuer was forwarder then the rest should haue reward according to his desert. And that he would be more diligent in honouring them that had bin his companions in that warre, then in punishing their offences; then presently he willed them to whome it appertained, to nominate them who had valiantly behaued themselues in those wars, and had performed any worthie exployt: which being done, he called euerie one by his name, & prayſed them, as greatly reioycing at the valour of his Countrimen, crowning them with crownes of gold, and put chaines of gould about their neckes, and gaue them large ſpeares of gold, and enſignes made of ſiluer, he alſo preferred euerie one of them, & gaue them of the ſpoyl, precious garments, with gold & ſiluer verie plentiouſly: & thus hauing rewarded euery one according to his merite; and praiſing God with all his armie, he deſcended with great applauſe out of the tribunall, and went and offered ſacrifices for the victorie, and hauing gathered a great multitude of Oxen about the Altar to ſacrifice them, hee offered them all, and therewith feaſted his armie, and himſelfe three dayes, with all his nobilitie, diſmiſſing all the ſouldiers to depart whither they would, or thought good, appointing the tenth legion to keepe Ieruſalem, and did not ſend it backe vnto Euphrates, where before it was. He baniſhed alſo the twelfth legion out of all Syria, remembring that vnder Ceſtius his gouernment they fled from the Iewes, being before at Raphanæas, which he ſent vnto Malto that is ſituate by Euphrates in the confines of Armenia & Cappadocia, and the other two he kept with himſelfe, as ſufficient to guard him into Aegypt, which were the fift & fifteenth legions. And comming to Cæſarea by the Sea coaſt, he there laid vp all his ſpoyles, and cauſed the captiues to be kept, becauſe that the winter ſeaſon permitted him not to ſaile into Italy.

Of Veſpaſians voyage by Sea, and how Simon was taken: and of the ſpectacles, and ſhewes made vpon his birth day.

Veſpaſian ſailing & iourny.

WHileſt Titus was buſied in the ſiege of Ieruſalem, Veſpaſian in a Marchants ſhip ſayled to Rhodes: & from thence departing in a Gally, hauing viſited all Cities by the which he paſſed, being ioyfully receiued of them al, he went from Ionia into Greece, from thence vnto Corcyra, and then vnto Iapygia, and afterwards by land. Thus Titus being returned from Cæſarea on the Sea coaſt, he came vnto Cæſarea Philippi, and there he made a long abode, proclaiming all ſorts of paſtime: wherein many captiues periſhed, ſom being caſt vnto wild beaſts, others forced in great companies to fight one againſt another; being in this place, he vnderſtood that Simon the ſonne of Giora was taken. This Simon at ſuch time as Ieruſalem was beſieged, was in the higher part of the Citie, when the Roman armie had entered the wals, and began to waſte it: and with his moſt truſtie fellowes, and certaine Maſons, hauing prouided them all neceſſary tooles, and victualls that might haue ſufficed them all for many dayes, hee accompanied with them, and went into a ſecret caue, vnto the end thereof, and there hee cauſed them to digge further, hoping ſo to get out at ſome place where he might ſafely eſcape away. Yet this his hope had not ſo good ſucceſſe as he expected: for they had but digged a little way, ere victuals failed them: notwithſtanding, that they had made very great ſpare thereof. Then Simon thinking to feare the Romans, clothed himſelfe in white, and a purple cloake buttoned about him, and ſo came out of the earth in that place where the temple had been builded before time. And they that did firſt ſee him, were aſtoniſhed awhile, and ſtirred not, but let him alone: yet at laſt they came vnto him, and demanded what he was; but Simon would not tell them, willing them to cal their captaine vnto him, and preſently ſome of the ſouldiers ran to call him, and ſo he came: at that time Terentius Rufus was captaine of the ſouldiers. Terentius hauing learned the truth of all, kept him bound, and related vnto Cæſar the maner of his taking, & thus Simon was by the power of God deliuered into his enemies hands, who hated him aboue meaſure, & ſo was iuſtly hereby puniſhed, for hauing ſo cruelly tyrannized ouer his owne countrimen, not taken by their force, but yeelding himſelfe vnto them, hauing cruelly butchered many, vnder pretence of falſe criminations: to wit, for hauing reuolted vnto the Romaus.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the calamitie of the Iewes at Antiochia.

AT the ſame time the reſt of the Iews were in great miſerie, & the Citie of Antiochia was incited againſt them, both for certaine criminall cauſes laid now vnto their charge, as alſo for certaine offences before committed, which neceſſarily I muſt recount, before I ſpeake any thing of the reſt. The nation of the Iewes is mixed almoſt amongſt all nations of the world, and eſpecially amongſt the Syrians, by reaſon of their vicinitie, and many of them were at

C Antiochia becauſe it was a great Citie, and the kings that ſucceeded Antiochus, permitted them freely to inhabite there, and to enioy all liberties of the Citie. For Antiochus ſurnamed Epiphanes, deſtroyed Ieruſalem, and ſacked the temple: but the kings ſucceſſors reſtored all the braſſe that was taken from the temple vnto the Iewes, offering it vnto their Synagogue in Antiochia, and permitted them to haue the ſame liberties in the Citie, that the Greekes enioyed, and the other kings alſo of latter times vſed them after the like ſort: ſo that their number greatly encreaſed, and they enlarged their temple and enriched it, with ſundrie offerings, oftentimes winning many Pagans to be of their religion, and ſo as it were made them alſo a part of their nation. Now about the time that the warres began, and Veſpaſian was newly arriued, the Iewes began to bee generally hated of all men: then one of them named Antiochus, reuerend for parentage, whoſe

The people hearing this, could not repreſſe their rage, but preſently cauſed them that were offered vnto them to be burnt in the Theater, and made great ſpeede to ſet vpon all the Iewes, hoping that by ſpeedy diſpatch they might preſerue their countrey, which otherwiſe was like to periſh. And then Antiochus

to enrage them the more, did now offer to ſacrifice according to the cuſtom of the Pagans, thereby as it were aſſuring the Antiochians, that he hated the Iewes and their cuſtomes, willing them alſo to compell all the reſt of the Iewes to doe the like, for whoſoeuer refuſed ſo to do were trai-

Then Antiochus receiuing a charge of ſouldiers from the captaine of the Romans, became moſt cruell againſt his countrimen, and would not permit them to keepe holy the ſeuenth day; but in it to do all labour and buſineſſe, that they were accuſtomed to do vpon any other day, & ſo vrged them hereto, that within ſhort time the ſeuenth day was not onely violated amongſt them of Antiochia, but alſo in other places and Cities round about. that the foureſquare market was fired, and the publike places, where all wrtings and regiſters

Of this fact Antiochus accuſed the Iewes, thereby ſufficiently inciting the Antiochians againſt them, although that they had not before borne them any malice, and making them ſo eaſily beleeue his calumniations, who now gaue full credit vnto his accuſations, by reaſon of that which was paſt: ſo that now they almoſt perſwaded themſelues, that they did ſee the Iews put fire vnto them, and ſo in a great rage all of them ſet vpon them that were accuſed. that he requested them to permit him to informe Cæsar of all that vvas past. For Vespasian had alreadie sent Cæsennius Portus to be gouernour of Syria, but he was not as yet arriued there. Then Collega making diligent enquirie of the matter, found out the truth, and not one of the Iewes accused by Antiochus was guiltie: for certaine impious people had done all this mischiefe, being indebted; thinking that if they had burnt the market place, and the publike vvritings, that then their debts could not be required at their hands. How Vespasian at his returne was receiued by the Romans. H

AFter that Titus had receiued letters from his father, that he was arriued in Italie, and al Cities wherein hee as yet came, welcommed him verie ioyfully, and that especially Rome had entertained him with great pompe and triumph, hee was now eased of the care hee had before, and verie ioyfull for his fathers welfare, and good fortune. For all the people of Italy did reuerence Vespasian, though absent, as though he had been present with them, desiring to see his expected arriuall, whose comming they so hartily wished for. For the Senate, remembring what calamities had befallen the Citie in the change of Princes, desired to receiue their Emperour dignified with the honour of olde age, & martiall renowne, whose presence onely vvould be to his subiects profit and safetie. And the vulgar sort also troubled before with ciuill wars, long expected his arriuall, assuring themselues thereby to haue an end of their calamity, and to recouer againe their wonted affluence. Especially he was expected by the souldiers, who knowing his skill in martiall affaires by that which himselfe had alreadie done, and finding their other captaines, vnder whom they warred, ignorant and vnskilfull, they wished for his comming, thereby to be deliuered from the disgrace, wherein they liued, desiring to receiue him by whome they might both be honoured, and preserued from danger. The nobilitie seeing him so beloued of all men, could no longer waite his comming, but went and met him, hee being farre from the Citie, and accompanied him; and no man staied his comming, but in whole multitudes they went to meete him, they were so desirous to see him: so that more went to meete him then staied at home. When newes was brought that hee approched neere vnto the Citie, and how friendly and curteously he had entertained all men, the people with their wiues & children staied in the way hee came, to salute and see him: and whersoeuer he came, with ioyfull applauses & acclamations they cried, calling him their conseruer and benefactor, and he who onely was worthy to be the Romane Emperour, and the whole Citie was as it had been a temple all hung with garlands, and full of sweet odors and perfumes: and the multitude of people being such that hee could scarcely get into the palace, he offered sacrifices vnto his houshold gods for his safe returne, and all the people were feasted by their tribes, kinred and neighbours, sacrificing vnto God, and requesting that Vespasian might long continue their Emperour, and his sonne after him, and that the Empire might neuer depart from his linage. The Citie of Rome hauing thus receiued Vespasian, it presently was blessed with all happinesse and felicitie. L

BEfore such time as Vespasian was gone to Alexandria, or that Titus besieged the Citie of Ierusalem, a great part of Germanie was reuolted, with whom the Frenchmen that bordred vpon them renouncing their allegeance they were in great hope to free themselues from the yoke and gouernment of the Romans. The first motiues that caused the Germans to reuolt, and to warre against the Romans, was their temeritie and rash natures prone to fight, hauing but a verie little hope of successe, then the hatred of their nobles, who knew that none could by force bring them into subiection but only the Romans, and chiefly thereunto encouraged by the opportunity they had. For they seeing the Empire greatly afflicted with ciuill wars, by reason of the often changing of Emperors, and knowing that all the world vnder their dominion was M

A now in ſuſpence, they thought that by reaſon of their troubles & ciuil wars fit opportunitie was offered them, and they were hereunto perſwaded by one Caſſius and Ciuilis two of the moſt potent amongſt them, who long before deſired alteration; and now finding opportunitie, ſhewed what minds they bare: who now taking courage, made triall what the common people thought of this point, and the greateſt part of them manifeſtly condeſcended hereunto, and perhaps the reſt were not vnwilling. At this time, as it were by Gods prouidence, Veſpaſian ſent letters vnto Petilius Cerealis (who before time had beene gouernour of Germanie) and declared him Conſull, commaunding him to goe into Britaine and take the rule of the countrey. Hee foorthwith obeyed Veſpaſians command: and hearing that the Germans had reuolted, hee came againſt them, they hauing now leuied an armie, and gaue them a great ouerthrow, killing many of them,
B and forced them to their due obedience vnto the Romans. Notwithſtanding, if he had not come thither, not long after they had aſſuredly been puniſhed for their offence. For ſo ſoone as newes of their rebellion was brought to Rome, Cæſar Domitianus hearing of it (not as one of his yeers would haue done, being verie young) vndertooke that expedition to go and conquer them: but hauing his fathers courage, and being more skilfull then his age required, hee preſently went againſt them: who terrified with the report of his comming, yeelded vnto him, thereby gaining this, that without bloudſhed they were brought vnder ſubiection as before. Now all things in Gallia being well diſpoſed of, ſo that it was not eaſie for them although they would, to rebell any more, Domitian returned againe to Rome, being a credite vnto his age and countrey.

Of the Riuer Sabbaticus, and the famous triumph of Veſpaſian and Titus.

Titus the Emperour hauing ſome while remained at Berytus (as is before ſaid) and being returned from thence, hee ſhewed many ſpectacles in all the cities of Syria, wherein he came, reſeruing for that purpoſe the Iews, that were captiues, to let al men vnderſtand of E their ouerthrow: in his iourney, he beheld a riuer worth the recitall, which rũneth in the midſt betweene Arcas and Raphaneas, two Citties of the kingdome of Agrippa, which hath a miraculous nature: for when it floweth, it is verie full of water, and runneth with a ſwift ſtream; yet hauing flowed ſixe daies, it is on the ſeuenth day ſo drie, that you may ſee the bottome, and ſo continueth his courſe, which for this cauſe the Iews called Sabbaticus, taking the name therof from the Iewes Sabbath, which is the ſeuenth day. When the Antiochians vnderſtood that Titus was comming to their citie, they could not containe themſelues within their wals for ioy, but all went out to meete him; and not onely men, but alſo women and children, expecting his comming thirtie ſtounds off: & when he approched neer vnto them, they holding vp their hands to him ſaluted him, with great ioy; & hauing receiued many courteſies from him, they returned F with him, and amongſt other acclamations, they often beſought him to baniſh the Iewes out of their citie. But Titus returned no aunſwere, making as though he heard not what they requeſted. Yet the Iewes doubtfull what he would doe, & what his intent was, were all in exceeding great feare. For Titus did not tarrie at Antiochia, but paſſed frõ thence to Zeugema towards Euphrates, where Vologeſus the king of Parthians meſſenger came vnto him, bringing him a golden crowne for his conqueſt of the Iewes: which he receiuing, feaſted the kings Embaſſadours, and not haue deemed them, to haue beene made onely for the pompe of that day, but to haue bin ſo M plentifull, as if they had flowed all about the citie: ſome caried fine tapeſtrie made of all ſorts of purple, otherſome caried others diligently wrought with pictures and Babylonian worke, and there were ſo many gemmes and precious ſtones, ſome ſet in crownes of goulde, ſome in other workes, that it appeared, that without reaſon we iudged them to be rare & ſcarce. Moreouer, the pictures of their Gods were carried with them, which were admirable both for greatneſſe and worke-

A workemanſhip, and all of pretious matter. And diuers ſorts of liuing creatures were there to bee ſeene, all adorned with ſome attire, agreeing and alluding vnto their nature. There was alſo an infinite multitude of men, in purple garments ouer-wrought with golde, which carried all theſe things, and they who were ſeparated from the reſt to bee ſeene, were attired in ſuch garments, that as many as beheld them admired. The captiues went not without their gorgeous attires, but the varietie and beautie of the garments hid all the deformitie of their bodies, which happened through their bad vſage. The Pageants that were born in that triumph, were of an admirable bigneſſe, ſo that the people that behelde them wondred how it was poſſible that men ſhould carrie them: for many were builded with three or foure lofts one aboue another, ſurpaſſing all that can be imagined of them for worke and coſt, for many of them were hanged about
B with Tapeſtrie of gold; and all things annexed vnto them, wheron they were carried, were made of wrought gould or Iuorie. Therin was curiouſly repreſented the manner of warre, & all ſtratagemes, and manners of fighting, that could be deuiſed; ſome in one part of the Pageant, ſome in another. There might one haue beheld a moſt fertile and fortunate land deſtroyed, and all the armie of enemies to be ſlaine, and ſome flying, others taken priſoners, and ſtrong and huge wals battered downe with Rammes, and Caſtles & ſtrong holds deſtroyed, and the wals of populous Cities to be ruined, and the armie entring the wals, all places filled with maſſacred men, and how thoſe that were not able to fight, yeelding themſelues, asked mercie, the temples ſet on fire, & after all elſe was waſted, the houſes thrown downe vpon the owners heads, and a riuer repreſenting ſorrowe, not flowing as it was wont, into tilled places, and to ſerue the vſe of man, nor for cat-
C tell to drinke, but into a Countrie which was in euerie part burning, and enuironed with flames, all which the Iewes in their warres endured. Theſe things were ſo artificially repreſented vnto their viewes that had not ſeene them, as though they were now a doing: Before euerie Pageant went the Captain of the City, repreſenting the manner how it was taken. After all theſe followed many ſhips, and in euerie place were carried the ſpoiles taken in warre: amongſt all which, thoſe that were taken in the Temple of Ieruſalē, were moſt excellent, for there was a golden table weighing many talents, and likewiſe a golden Candleſticke, the vſe whereof was now not ſuch as we were wont to put it vnto, for in the middeſt of the ſtem thereof was fixed a baſe, and out of it proceeded many ſmal branches, framed like a three forked ſpear, euery one being at the top made like a Lampe, which were ſeauen in number, ſhewing the honour of the ſeauenth day,
D which is called the Sabbath amongſt the Iews. After all this, was carried the Iewes law, vvhich vvas the laſt of all the ſpoyles. Then followed many carrying the image of Victorie, all made of gold & Iuorie. Afterwards, came Veſpaſian, and after him Titus, and with him Domitian, gallantly adorned and mounted vpon an excellent horſe, and ſo they went all to the Temple of Iupiter Capitolinus, and there was the end of all this pompe, where they made ſome abode.

For it was an auncient cuſtome of their Countrie, to repoſe themſelues there till ſome came and brought newes vnto them, of the death of him, who was Generall of their enemies. This as then was Simon Giora, who was alſo carried in the triumph, and hauing a rope faſtned about his necke, was drawne all along the market place, vvhere they that drew him did kill him. For it is the cuſtome of the Romans, there to put malefactors to death that are condemned. After word
E vvas brought that hee vvas dead, all the people made ioyfull exclamations, and ſo they began to ſacrifice: which done according to the cuſtom, they returned into the palace, and they feaſted ſome, other ſome had prepared banquets for themſelues at their owne houſes. For this day was ſacred amongſt the Romanes, in ioy of the victorie ouer their enemies, and an ende of ciuill calamitie, and the beginning of good fortune, and hope, which they had in their newe princes. When the triumphs were ended, and all the Romane Empire quieted, Veſpaſian built a Temple and dedicated it vnto Peace, which he did in ſo ſhort a ſpace as it was admirable: and hauing beſtowed great coſt vpon it, hee alſo beautified it with diuers pictures and carued workes. And hee placed in that Temple all things that men of former ages had come to ſee, from the vttermoſt
F parts of the earth. And he placed there all the golden veſſels, & other neceſſaries that the Iewes vſed in their Temple, doing them great reuerence. But their law and the Tapeſtrie or purple veiles of the Sanctuarie hee commanded to be kept in the palace.

How Herodium and Macherus were taken by Bassus.

Caesar sent Lucius Basilius into Iudæa to bee Lieutenant there, who receiuing an armie of Cerealis Vetilianus, hee tooke the Castle and garrison of Herodium, being yeelded vnto him. After this, gathering together all his armie, who were dispersed in diuers places of the Countrey, he with the tenth legion purposed to warre against Macherus; for he thought it necessarie to destroy that castle, least that for the strength it might moue many to rebell: for by reason of the situation of the place, they that were in it, had certaine hope of their safetie, and those H that sought to assault it, were in great danger. For it was built vpon a rocke that was exceeding high, which made it almost inexpugnable; and nature had so deuised, that it is hard to come vnto it, who hath enuironed it round about with vallies, so deepe, that the bottome thereof cannot bee descried, neither could one passe ouer them, nor fill them vp: for that which is on the West part is threescore stounds large, and endeth at the lake Asphaltites, & on this side Macherus hath a verie high prospect, and it is inuironed on the North and South with vallies of the like measure that the former is, whereby it is impossible to winne the Castle: but that vallie which is on the East side, is at least a hundreth cubits deepe, & it endeth vpon a mountaine neere vnto Macherus. King Alexander seeing the nature of the place did their build a Castle, which afterward Gabinius in the warre against Aristobulus destroyed. But Herod when he was King, iudged this place I worthie to be fortified, as a principall defence against the neighboring Arabians. For it was aptly situate vpon a mountaine, where one might behould their borders: wherefore making a large wall, he builded a Citie there in the place that men doe enter vnto the Castle: he also compassed the verie top thereof with another wall, & in the corners he placed towers that were threescore cubites high, and in the verie middest of all he built a palace, for largenesse and beautie admirable, and made many Cesterns to receiue water in conuenient places, which serued the people aboundantly, as it were striuing with nature, that the places which he had made inexpugnable, he by Art might make places more strong then that was. He also laid vp there in store, arrowes and engines, and made all prouision wherewith the Inhabitants might bee able to hold out a great siege.

Rue, of admirable greatnes

In the Kings palace, there grew the herb called Rue, which was verie admirable for the greatnesse, for there was no figge tree taller or broader then it: and it was reported that it had continued euer since Herods time, and had endured longer, had not the Iewes, Inhabitants of the place cut it downe. In the vallie that lieth on the North side of the Citie, there is a place called Baaras, where also groweth a roote of the same name, the colour wherof resembleth the flame, and it shineth at night like the Sunne beames, and is not easie to bee pulled vp, till that one cast vpō it the vrine of a woman or her flowers: which done, whosoeuer toucheth it is sure to die, except hee carrie the roote hanging on his hand. It is also gathered another way without danger, after this manner. They digge all round about it, so that they leaue a verie little of the root coue-as though he would goe away, he easily pulleth vp the roote, and the dogge presently dieth, as it L were in his stead that seeketh to get it, so that afterward none that handleth it or taketh it, needs to stand in any feare therof. This herb notwithstanding al this danger is diligently sought out for the vertue it hath. For it driueth away diuels (which are the spirits of wicked men) out of mens bodies, if it be but applied vnto them, wheras otherwise if they had no helpe, these diuels possessing their bodies would kill them. Out of that place also doe spring certaine hot waters, verie different in taste one from another; for some are bitter, some sweete, there are also sources of cold waters, one neere vnto another in a Plaine: but which is most admirable, there is a caue hard by, not verie deepe, enuironed with an eminent rocke aboue, frō the which there cōmeth as it were two dugges or paps, hard by one another, and out of the one of them there floweth verie colde M water, out of the other verie hot; which mingled together make a pleasant bath, & serue to cure many diseases, and especially helpeth all paines of the sinnewes. In the same place also are mines of Sulphure and Alume.

Bassus hauing viewed this place on euerie side, resolued to besiege it, and endeuoured to fill vp the valley that was on the East side, and so make a way vnto it: which he began to doe, hastening

A ſtening to raiſe a verie high mount, and ſo make it eaſie to bee taken. Thoſe that were inhabitants, conſtrained Iewes that were ſtrangers, to go into the lower citie, iudging them an vnprofitable multitude, and ſo cauſed them to endure the firſt brunt of the enemies, and they themſelues kept the Caſtle, both for that it was ſtrong, and alſo to preſerue themſelues, hoping that by yeelding the place vnto the Romans, they might obtaine pardon of them; yet firſt they purpoſed to make triall if they could auoide the ſiege: and therefore verie courageouſly, euerie day they made excurſions, and fought with them they found, and many were ſlaine on both parts. Fortune and opportunitie ſometime cauſed one to bee victors, ſometime another: for the Iewes got the beſt when they could aſſault the Romans at vnawares, and the Romans ouercame, when they were aware of the Iewes comming and armed themſelues. But the ſiege was not ended by
B theſe skirmiſhes: yet a chaunce befell, that forced the Iewes to yeelde their Caſtle. Amongſt them that were beſieged was one Eleazar a young man, and verie hardy and bold in any enterpriſe, who oftentimes made excurſions and ſought to hinder the Romans worke, who alwaies in euerie fight did greatly endomage the Romanes, and by his valour and aduenturous courage, hee gaue them that were his fellowes opportunitie to aſſault the Romans, and to flie againe and retire in ſafetie, himſelfe being alwaies the laſt that ſo retired. It happened one day that the fight being ended, and both parts parted, hee as it were contemning all men, and thinking that none of his enemies durſt vndertake to combate with him, ſtaied without the gate ſpeaking to them that were vpon the wall, and giuing great attention vnto them. Then one Rufus an Aegyptian one of the Roman army, eſpying this opportunity ranne vpon him ſo ſuddenly
C that he at vnawares tooke him all armed as he was, & they vpon the wals ſtood amazed, whileſt Rufus led him vnto the Romans campe. Then the Generall of the Romans cauſed him to be led into a place, where they in the Citie might ſee him, & there to haue all his cloaths taken off him, and whipped; and the misfortune of this young man did greatly diſcourage the Iewes, & all the citie was reſolued into teares for the calamitie of that one man. Baſſus ſeeing this, hee deuiſed this counſell againſt them; for hee ſought to mooue them ſo to compaſſion, that for to ſaue him they ſhould yeeld their caſtle: which fell out as he deſired. For he preſently commanded a croſſe to be erected, as though he would preſently haue crucified Eleazar: which ſight greatly mooued them in the Caſtle to ſorrow: ſo that now with lowd cries they lamented, ſaying that this calamitie was inſupportable. Then Eleazar beſought them not to deſpiſe him, vvho was now to die D a moſt miſerable death: & moreouer to prouide for their owne ſafetie in yeelding the caſtle vnto the Romans vertue and fortunate ſucceſſe.

Then they mooued with his words, & many alſo within the Citie intreating for him (for he came of a great parentage and had many kinsfolks) though contrarie to their natures, compaſſion took place in them: and ſo ſending ſome of their companie ſpeedily, they deſired to parley, affirming they would yeeld their caſtle vpon condition that they might ſafely depart away, and Eleazar might bee likewiſe reſtored vnto them. Which offer of theirs the Romans accepted; and the Iewes in the lower part of the citie hauing intelligence of this couenant, reſolued themſelues to flie away in the night: but ſo ſoone as they had opened their gates, thoſe that had agreed with Baſſus gaue him intelligence thereof; either enuying that their countrimen ſhould eſcape,
E or els fearing that Baſſus would puniſh them for their flight: yet for all this the moſt valiant of them that fled, eſcaped, who were gone before the reſt, and the reſt were ſlaine to the number of a thouſand and ſeauen hundreth men, for the women and children vvere made bondſlaues. And Baſſus thinking it meete to keepe his promiſe vnto them of the caſtle, permitted them ſafely to depart, and reſtored Eleazar vnto them.

neceſſity they were conſtrained to fight, hoping by a courageous fight to finde opportunitie to flie: wherefore they all together with a crie violently aſſaulted them by whome they were inuironed, and they did valiantly withſtand them, and by their valour, and the Iewes deſperation the fight endured a long time: yet the euent of the war was not like vnto the reſt of the fight, for onely twelue Romans were ſlaine and verie fewe wounded, and all the Iewes were ſlaine in that fight, being in number three thouſand; and their captaine Iudas the ſonne of Iairus (of whome we haue already made mention, who during the ſiege of Ieruſalem was commaunder of a company there) hid himſelfe in a certaine caue, and ſecretly eſcaped from thence. At that time Cæſar writ vnto Liberius Maximus his Gouernour, and vnto Baſſus, to ſell Iudæa: for he did not build in all the countrey any Citie but appropriated it vnto himſelfe, leauing there onely eight hundreth ſouldiers, & giuing them a place to dwell in called Emaus, thirtie ſtounds diſtant from Ieruſalem, and he impoſed a tribute vpon all Iewes whereſoeuer they liued, commaunding euerie one of them euerie yeere to bring two drachmes into the Capitol, according as in former times they were woont to pay vnto the Temple of Ieruſalem: and this was the eſtate of the Iewes at that time. Of the death of King Antiochus: and how the Alanes inuaded Armenia.

I

IN the fourth yeere of Veſpaſians raigne, it happened that Antiochus king of the Comagenes with all his family fell into great miſerie vpon this occaſion. Ceſennius Petus gouernour of Syria (either for enuie, or for that indeed it was ſo, for it is not well knowne) ſent letters vnto Cæſar declaring vnto him that Antiochus was determined to reuolte from the Romans, together with his ſonne Epiphanes, and had made a league with the king of the Parthians, and that therefore it was neceſſarie to preuent them in time, leaſt that if they firſt began to reuolt openly, they might trouble all the Romane Empire with warres. Cæſar did not neglect theſe newes, for that the neereneſſe of both the kings countries one to another, ſeemed to require that they ſhould be quickely preuented: for Samoſata the greateſt Citie of Comagena is ſituate vpon Euphrates, which might both eaſily receiue the Parthians, & be a ſtrong hold for them, and alſo there they might eaſily paſſe ouer the riuer. Wherfore Veſpaſian beleeuing it permitted him to doe what he thought expedient: and he foorthwith, Antiochus thinking nothing, ſuddenly entred into Comagene, with the ſixt legion, and certaine other companies of footmen and troupes of horſemen, accompanied with Ariſtobulus king of Chalcidis, and Sohemus king of Emeſa, who came to aſſiſt him. So they entred the countrie without any fight, for none of the inhabitants offered to reſiſt. Antiochus daunted with theſe vnexpected newes, did not ſo much as thinke of any warre againſt the Romans, wherefore hee determined to leaue the whole kingdome in that eſtate that then it was in, and with his wife and children depart from thence, hoping hereby to cleare himſelfe vnto the Romans, from that which they ſuſpected of him: and going almoſt a hundreth and thirtie ſtounds from the Citie into a field, there he placed a tabernacle. And Petus ſent men vnto Samoſata to take it, and left them to keepe the Citie, and hee with the reſt of the ſouldiers purpoſed to go againſt Antiochus. But for all this the king though by neceſſitie vrged thereto, yet would he not fight againſt the Romans, but bewailing his misfortune endured patiently all whatſoeuer: but his ſonnes being luſtie ſtrong young men, & skilfull in martiall affaires, could not eaſily abſtaine from fight in that their diſtreſſe. Wherefore Epiphanes and Callinicus his two ſonnes had recourſe vnto their forces, and in a great fight that dured a whole day they ſhewed their valour, and departed receiuing no loſſe. But Antiochus after this fight would not any longer abide in his countrey, but taking his wife and daughters he fled into Cilicia, and thereby diſcouraged his ſouldiers, who deſpairing to keep the kingdome for him, reuolted vnto the Romans. But Epiphanes and the reſt were forced to ſeeke to ſaue themſelues, before ſuch time as they were left deſtitute, & ſo accompained with ten horſemen, they paſſed the riuer Euphrates: and thus being out of daunger they came to Vologeſus, of whom they were receiued, not as fugitiues, but with great honour, & according to their degree, as though they yet poſſeſſed their auncient dignitie. And Petus comming to Tarſus of Cilicia, he ſent a Centurion to carrie Antiochus bound vnto Rome. But Veſpaſian permitted not a king to K L M

Hauing therfore licence to rob and ſpoyle, for that no man reſiſted them, they came into Armenia, & waſted all the countrey thera- C bout: and Tyridates was then king of that country, who with an army comming to fight againſt them, was almoſt by them taken aliue in the battaile; for one caſt a halter about him, and began to draw him amongſt the enemies: and ſo had done, but that hee with his ſword did quickly cut the rope and fled: and they being more enraged, by reaſon he fought againſt them, waſted all the countrey, & carying with them a huge multitude of men & cattell out of both countries, they returned into their owne.

How Maſſada a moſt ſtrong Caſtle was taken.

BAſſus dying in Iudæa, Flauius Silua ſucceeded in his place, and now perceiuing that all the countrie elſe was conquered ſaue one only caſtle, he with al the forces he could make went againſt it. This caſtle is called Maſſada. The captaine of the Sicarians named Eleazar, who firſt inuaded it, was a verie ſtrong & valiant man, borne of the tribe of Iuda, who perſwaded a great many Iewes as is before ſaid, not to enroule theſelues when Cyrenæus was Cenſor and ſent to tax Iudæa. For at that time the Sicarians had conſpired againſt them that obeyed the Romans, and in all things vſed them like enemies, taking & driuing away their goods, and firing their houſes, affirming that they did not any thing differ from ſtraungers, who betrayed the libertie of their countrey rather then they would fight for it, & that they had rather haue them war E on the Romans ſide. But that was onely an excuſe to hide their auarice & iniurious dealing, as the proofe made manifeſt, for they themſelues reuolted & bare armes againſt the Romans, and their enterpriſes againſt the Romans were worſe then the reſt; and when their firſt forged pretence was known & confuted, they did rage more then before againſt thoſe that vpbraided them with it. For that time amongſt the Iewes abounded with all maner of iniquitie, ſo that none was left vndone: yea though one indeuored to inuent ſome new villanies, yet could he deuiſe none that was not then practiſed: all laboured with this maladie, both in particular and in common, and euerie one did ſtriue with other, to ſurpaſſe his fellow in impietie againſt God, and iniuſtice towards his neighbour. The mightie vexed the weaker ſort, and the meaner ſort deſtroyed the po- F tentates, and tooke their riches away from them; they gaped after rule and dominion, theſe after miſchiefe. The yeare of the world, 4038. after Chriſts birth, 76.

The Sicarians were the firſt that were ſo cruell and iniurious againſt their neighbours: for not prouoked thereunto, neither by deede nor word, they ſlew & iniured all men without cauſe, but Iohn ſhewed them to be verie moderate. For he did not onely ſlay all that counſelled that which was good and profitable, as his greateſt enemies, and eſpecially dealing thus with the citizens, but alſo many waies iniured his countrey, like one who had impiouſly alſo contemned God himſelfe. selfe. For hee did eate forbidden meates, and violated his countries temperance: so that it was no G wonder to see him obserue no iustice nor fidelity towards men, who had now infringed the laws of God. Againe, what villanie did Simon Giora leaue vndone, or what iniurie did he abstain from to offer vnto their bodies, who had chosen him for their ruler? What did kinred and friendship then preuaile any man? saue onely this, that it made them bee more cruelly vsed, and euerie day to be more tyrannously butchered, then otherwise. For they thought it a hainous offence to abuse strangers, and a glorie to exercise cruelty vpon their most familiar friends. The Idumæans accounting the greatest impietie to bee goodnes. But their end was as they deserued, & God punished their desert with his iust vengeance. For euen vnto the later ende of their liues, they endured all the miseries that is possible for mans nature to abide, being killed with diuers sorts of torments. Perhaps one will say that their punishment was not so great as they deserued: but what punishment could bee deuised sufficient for their deserts? But I cannot now stand to lament those who perished by these mens crueltie: wherefore I will returne to that where Siluathe captaine of the Romans besiegeth Massada. The Roman captaine came against Eleazar, and them that kept Massada with him, who were I Sicarians, and he brought an armie with him, and presently subdued all the confines and borders round about, and he placed in euerie fit place garisons, and enuirond the Castle with a wall, least anie of them that were besieged should escape, and that they that besieged them might there keepe a continuall guard. Moreouer, he placed his campe in a fit place for the siege, euen there where the rock, that the castle was built vpon, ioyned vnto the other mountain, which was an vnfit place to get necessaries in. For not onely victuals were fetcht farre off by great labour of the Iewes who were commaunded to doe it, but also water for the whole armie somwhere else, for there was no fountaine neere that place. This done Silua attempted the siege, wherein it

The situation of Massada. was requisite for him to vse both art and labour, by reason of the strength of the castle, which is thus situate. It is enuironed round with a huge stone verie high on euerie side, and the valley vn- K derneath is so deepe, that one cannot see the bottome, all rockie, and inaccessible to all liuing creatures, saue onely that in two places there is a difficult passage vnto it, one of them is from the lake Asphaltites towards the East, and the easiest of the two is the West side: the first is called a
The iourney by the rock called the Snake. Snake; taking his name of the straitnesse and crooked turnings, for the rocke that is eminent seemeth as it were broken in sunder, and by little and little often returneth againe vnto it selfe, & it is by little & little extended in length, so that he that goeth that way, can make no haste, but must step with one foot first vpon them, and the other vpon another, & must stand vpon one foot whilest he remoueth the other, and he that falleth is sure to be slaine in the fall: for there is such a hollow place on either side between the rocks, that it is able to terrifie the boldest man aliue.
When thou hast gone thirtie stoundes by this way, then thou commest to the top of the hill, L which is not steepe at the top, but hath a Plaine about it, and Ionathas the high priest was the first that built a Castle in this place, & called it Massada: & Herod after him bestowed great labour & cost in building that place, for hee enuironed it all with a wall, seuen stounds circuit, all of white stone, twelue cubits high, and eight cubits broad, and placed vpon it seauen and twentie towers wall within: for the king appointed the top of the hill for tillage because it was a more fertile & fatter soyle then any ground else, so that if at any time they within the castle wanted prouisi-on from other places, yet they might not be famished, hauing this to finde them. He also builwall, whose prospect was toward the North, and enuironed the same with a most strong wall, M and in the corners therof he built foure most firme towers three score cubits high, verie sumptuous within, hauing diuers roomes and galleries & bathes, supported in euerie place with pillars, euerie one of which was one onely stone, the wals thereof were of solid stone of diuers colours:

and to euerie house, and in the top of the hill, and round about the palace, he hewed certaine cisterns out of the rocke for to beare water; so that by this meanes water was as plentifull, as though they had fountaines within the castle. There was a way vnto the castle vnder the ground

and

A from the kings palace, which they that were without could not perceiue, the way aboue ground was inacceſſible, for as we haue already ſaid, the way on the Eaſt ſide no man could paſſe, and as for that on the Weſt ſide, it was ſtopt vp with a tower built in the ſtreict thereof, diſtant 1000. cubits from the Caſtle, by which it was impoſſible to paſſe, & it was not eaſie to get it by force, and the more leaſurely they went, the neerer they were to danger. And thus was this fortreſſe ſtrengthned both by art and nature.

The yeare of the world, 4038. after Chriſts birth, 76.

A tower to the Weſtſide.

The prouiſion within the Caſtle was admirable both for the magnificence thereof, and alſo for the long time it had continued, for there was corne ſufficient for many yeeres, and Wine and Oyle and diuers other prouiſion and heapes of dates. All which Eleazar found ready there, hauing deceitfully obtained the Caſtle with his Sicarians, which prouiſion was all as ſound and
B as freſh, as though it had newly beene layd vp in ſtore: notwithſtanding, that from the time it remained there, vnto the time that the Romanes tooke it, were a hundreth yeares, and the Romans found the reliques of the fruit incorrupted: and one may iuſtly thinke that the cauſe hereof is the ayre about the Caſtle, which by reaſon of the height of the place is moſt pure, and free from all earthly corruption. There was alſo found all maner of Armor in great quantitie, which Herod made, and would haue armed ten thouſand men, alſo vnwrought iron, braſſe, and lead, ſo that one may iudge that prouiſion to haue beene reſerued for ſome great cauſe. It is reported that Herod prepared that Caſtle for his refuge, when hee doubted two great dangers, firſt that the people of the Iewes would depoſe him; and make them Kings whoſe anceſtors had before raigned.

Great ſtore of prouiſion in the Caſtle.

Fruit for a hundreth yeares kept vncorrupt.

C The other which was more dangerous then the firſt, was, for that he feared Cleopatra Queene of Egypt, who not concealing her intent, did often requeſt Antonius that Herod might bee ſlaine, and that ſhee might haue the kingdome of the Iewes giuen vnto her. And it was a great maruaile that Antonius doting ſo vpon her, did not fulfill her requeſt. Herod for theſe occaſions hauing builded Maſſada, left it vnfurniſhed as the laſt bulwarke for the Romans to make warre againſt the Iewes. For the Generall of the Romanes, hauing now compaſſed all the place without it with a wall, (as is before ſaid) to the end that none might eſcape, hee did very wiſely, and ſo began to aſſault the Caſtle, finding one onely place that would beare a mount. For behind the tower that on the Weſt ſide ſtopped vp the paſſage into the Caſtle and palace, there was a great rocke very large and long, yet not ſo high as Maſſada by three hundreth cubits. The rocke was
D called Leuce, which ſignifieth white. When Silua had gotten this rocke, and aſcended it, hee commanded his ſouldiers to build a mount thereupon; and they chearefully labouring, raiſed a ſudden mount two hundreth cubits high: by reaſon of the height it ſeemed not firme nor ſufficient enough to beare the engines, but vpon it was built a Tribunall with great ſtones fifty cubits high, and as many cubits broad, and the engines were ſuch as firſt Veſpaſian, and after him Titus deuiſed to batter wals with, and ſo they made a tower threeſcore cubits high all plated about with iron.

Herod ſuſpecting a double perill, builded this place for a refuge.

There was but one place about Maſſada to raiſe a mount to batter on.

Now the Romans with many ſhot did driue the Iewes from off the Caſtle wals, not ſuffering them to lift vp their heads. And Silua hauing builded a mighty Ramme, cauſed the wall to be continually beaten therewith, but it could ſcarcely enter vpon it: and the Sicarians quick-
E ly preuented that, building another wall within, which could not bee broken with the Ramme being yet ſoft, and ſo would breake the force thereof, for they did ſawe timber in peeces, and as it were made two railes, and then filled the ſpace between the two railes with earth, and with other plancks they kept the earth from falling downe, ſo that they made a worke like the wall of a houſe, and for that it yeelded vnto the blowes of the Ramme (being ſoft earth) the Ramme could not preuaile againſt it, but rather made it more ſtrong then before by ramming the morter together.

The citie battered with a large Ramme, and by Siluas appointment.

Silua perceiuing this, iudged that hee might ſooner deſtroy the wall with fire then with his engine: and ſo he commanded the ſouldiers to caſt vpon it many burning firebrands, and the
F fire did quickly take hold of the wall, becauſe it was for the moſt part built with wood, and eaſily alſo pearced through it, by reaſon it was not cleane wrought together, and there was a great flame.

Firebrands darted againſt the wals.

At the very beginning of the fire, the North wind did greatly annoy the Romans, for the fire blowing furiouſly from aboue againſt them that were Romans, it did driue it extreamely vpon them, ſo that they were in great deſpaire; fearing their engines would be burnt, and preſently the the wind changing and blowing from the South, as it were by Gods prouidence) it turned the G fire againe vpon the wall, and now all of it euen vnto the foundation thereof, was there most cruelly on fire. And the Romans hauing Gods assistance, returned againe vnto their camp ioy-fully, purposing the nex morning betimes to assaile their enemies, and that night to place stronger watches, least any of the enemies should escape. But Eleazar thought not to flie, neither would he permit any one of his company so to doe. And seeing now the wall was fiered, and not knowing any way else to help himselfe, considering likewise what the Romans would doe vnto their wiues and children if they should take them, he deliberated of all their deaths, which he in that extreamity iudged to be the best way they could take. And so he assembled the most valiant of all his company, and exhorted euery one of them thereunto after this manner.

Eleazars oration to his companions.

I verily thinke that God hath giuen vs this benefite, that we may die well and in our owne liberty, which he denyed to others who were ouercome contrary to their expectation. We are certain to be conquered as soone as it is day light: but to die valiantly with our dearest friends, is a glorious resolution vnto valiant men, and of this our enemies cannot debarre vs, who doe labour to take vs aliue, and carry vs away captiues, and we are not able to vanquish them in fight.
For truely at the first (when wee who coueted liberty, suffered all miserie at the hands of our I owne countrimen, and worse at the hands of our enemies) we should haue considered that God who was sometime fauourable vnto the nation of the Iewes, had now condemned them vnto perdition: for had hee yet beene fauourable vnto vs, or had hee beene but lightly offended at vs, hee would not haue permitted so many men to haue perished, and haue deliuered his holy Citie into the hands of the enemies to be consumed with fire. And we only amongst all our nation, hoped to liue in liberty, as though we had no waies offended the diuine Maiesty, nor been guiltie of any offence, who indeed taught others iniquity. So you see how wee are checked for longing after vaine hope, being brought into greater extreamity then wee expected. Neither hath our Castle by nature inexpugnable, any thing profited vs to our preseruation, but wee hauing store of victuals and armour, and all other necessaries, haue lost all hope of safety, God K himselfe openly taking it from vs. For the fire that once was carried against our enemies, did not of it selfe returne against vs and vnto the wall wee built. But it was the punishment of our offences, who furiously raged against our owne nation. For the which I request you, let vs not bee punished by the Romanes; whose forces are inuincible, but by our selues let vs satis-fie the ire of God, and so it will be more tolerable for vs; euen by that meanes our wiues shall die vndefiled, and our children shall not taste of seruile captiuitie. After whose deaths, we will yet let vs first fire our castle, and burn our treasure: for it wil be no smal griefe vnto the Romans, if they neither get our bodies aliue, nor can finde any one iot of our riches for recompence of their labour. Let vs onely leaue our victuals as sufficient testimony, that famine did not at any L time cause vs to be conquered, but that we as at the first we resolued, preferred also death before bondage.

Eleazar hauing thus spoken, they that were present did not all accord vnto him, for some ioy-fully hasted to execute his aduice, thinking it so glorious a death. But they who mooued with compassion towards their wiues and families, were something effeminate, or else abhorred to kil themselues, one looking vpon another with teares, did shew his minde to disagree from that which Eleazar perswaded. Which when Eleazar perceiued, and that his counsell through feare was defeated, fearing also that they who courageously had accorded thereunto, should be withdrawn by the teares of others, he did not so end his exhortation, but standing vp, and with a vehement spirit, he began to speake vnto them of the immortality of the soule, and fixing his eyes M vpon them that wept, he vsed a vehement exclamation, saying.

Eleazars oration as touching the immortality of the soule.

How much am I deceiued, who thought that valiant men fighting for their liberty, would rather choose to die then to liue, but yee doe shew your selues nothing to excell any ordinarie men, who feare to die, notwithstanding that thereby you may escape great miserie, and

A calamity, when in this point you ought not to haue expected any admonition thereunto, nor to haue made any delay to doe it. The ancient customes which haue endured euer since men had reason, the diuine doctrine of our nation, which hath continually been confirmed by the deeds of our predecessors, doe instruct vs, that it is misery to liue, and not to die. For death freeth our soules from prison vnto their most pure and proper place, where neuer after they shall bee touched with calamitie. Which whilest they are bound in a mortall bodie, and doe participate of his miseries, may probably be affirmed to be dead. For it is an vnseemely coniunction for that which is diuine, to bee coupled and connexed vnto that which is mortall. True it is, that our soules can doe much being ioyned to our bodies, for they vse the bodies as their instruments, secretly producing in them motion, and many other actions passing the nature of mortall things. »

A soule tied in a mortall bodie.

The power of the soule.

B But when the soule is loosed from that heauy burthen which doth weigh it downe euen vnto the earth, which hangeth vpon it, and hath receiued his proper habitation, then it enioieth free and perfect felicity, and remaineth inuisible to our mortall eies as God himself is, neither is it visible in our bodies. For it commeth secretly into them, and so departeth from them againe, that no man can perceiue it, hauing onely a nature incorrupt, and causing a change in our bodies. For whatsoeuer the soule toucheth, that presently liueth and flourisheth; and what it forsaketh, that incontinently withereth and dieth: so much doth it participate of immortalitie. The sleepe may bee an euident argument vnto you of this which I speake, where the soule not distracted taketh a most pleasant and sweete repose; and communicating with God, it is with him present in euery place by reason of affinity, and foretelleth many future euents. Wherefore

Sleep the argument of the immortality of the soule.

C should we then feare death, who loue the rest that we haue in sleep? were not he a mad man that for a short life would hinder himselfe of eternall life? It were necessarie that we who are instructed in the law of our nation, should giue example to others to despise and contemne death. But if we seeke confirmation hereof from strangers, let vs see the example amongst the wiser sort of the Indians: for they being iust men do tolerate this life as a necessary office of nature for a certaine time, though against their wils; yet do they hasten to vnloose the soule bound in this mortall body, though not vrged thereunto by any calamity or necessitie, but onely for desire of immortality, telling others that they will depart out of this life; neither doth any one seeke to hinder them, but all men esteeming them most fortunate, send by them commendations and other messages vnto their friends departed: so firm is their belief that the soules of them that are dead

D haue communion and conuersation together: And so they hauing all instruction what to say to the soules departed, doe with great applause leap into the fire, that thereby their soules may be purified from their bodies. And their friends go more ioifully with them when they go to their deaths, then any doth that bringeth his friend on the way when he is to goe a great iourney; and they bewaile themselues, not those who are dead and haue attained immortality. Shall not wee then be ashamed not to beleeue so firmely as the Indians doe? despising through our own sloath our country lawes which are to be emulated of all men? Nay, supposing that by our law we had bin instructed contrariwise, to wit, that to liue in this life is blisse, and to die is calamity: yet notwithstanding this present necessitie, this present time had been a sufficient motiue to cause vs to embrace death rather then life, seeing that by Gods appointment, and of necessity we must now

An exhortation to cõtemn death drawne from the time and place.

E die. In times past it appeareth God so prouided, that he shortned their daies of our owne nation that would not vse their life as they ought to haue done. I dare not ascribe it vnto the Romanes, nor report of our selues that their wars consumed vs all. For this did not happen through their forces, but a more potent cause hereof there was which made them conquerors. Which of the Romans slew the Iewes that inhabited at Cæsarea? whom the inhabitants therof vpon the Sabbath day, they being assembled in one place together with their wiues and children, did massacre, notwithstanding that they had no intent to reuolt from them, nor neuer lifted vp their hands in their owne defence, nothing fearing the Romans, who only accounted them of our nation their enemies that reuolted from them. But some may obiect, the Iewes at Cæsarea, and the inhabitants thereof were alwaies at variance, and that now they reuenged their old quarrell

F hauing gotten opportunity. What then shall wee say of the Scythopolitans? who bare armes with the Græcians against vs, and denied to assist their owne kinred against the Romans. What profit did they receiue by this their good will and fidelity? for they were altogether with their whole families cruelly slaine, and this was the reward they had for their labour, for hauing withstood vs to haue done the like vnto them; it were too long to recount all things seuerally to this effect. For as ye know there is no citie in all Syria that hath not massacred the Iewes there inhabiting, biting, being more our enemies then the Romanes were, where they of Damascus although they could not deuise any probable cause for it, yet did they massacre all the Iewes liuing among them, who amounted to the number of eighteen thousand, beside their wiues and families. And as we haue heard it reported, the number of the Iewes slaine by the Egyptians, were aboue three score thousand: It may be that finding no aduersity in a strange countrie, they were put to death by their enemies: but they that in their owne countrey fought against the Romans, wanted nothing that might haue caused a perfect hope of a full victory ouer the Romanes, they had weapons, armour, wals, and strong holds inexpugnable; their valorous courage in fighting for liberty shunned no danger, and encouraged men to reuolt: which all, hauing awhile serued their turnes, at last was a cause of their greater misery. For all were taken and subdued by the enemies, as though they had been built and made to make their enemies victory more famous, and not to doe them seruice. And we may iustly deem them happy who were slaine in the warre, for they died in liberty. Yet who doth not pitie the multitude of them that fell into the Romans hands; or who would not hasten to die, rather then endure the like miserie that they suffered? Some of them being tortured, and some with fire and stripes perished; and others halfe eaten of wilde beasts, were reserued aliue for their second food: and they are most miserable of all that are yet aliue, who often wish for death and cannot finde it. Where is now that gorgeous Citie? where is it that was once the mother Citie of all the nation of the Iewes? so strengthned with such strong wals, so fortified with towers and castles to defend the wals, scarcely able to contain the prouision made for warre, hauing in it so huge a multitude of men to fight for it; what is it now become, wherein God himselfe was thought to dwell? It is now razed down euen vnto the very foundations; and no other memory or reliques therof is left standing; their camp is destroied, onely a few old men and vnhappy suruiue, who sate amongst the ashes of the temple, and a few women whom the enemies reserued to satisfie their filthy lust. And will any amongst vs, considering all these things, desire to behold the light of the sunne, although hee could liue without molestation? Who is such an enemy to his natiue soyle? who is so effeminate or desirous of his life, that doth not grieue to haue liued till this time? Would God we had all been in our graues before we had seene that sacred Citie fired by a hostile hand, before wee beheld the holy Temple destroyed by impiety: and seeing that the hope we had to be reuenged vpon our enemies is now vanished away, and that we are left alone in misery & necessity, let vs hasten to die well, and take compassion vpon our selues, our wiues, & children, and that whilest we haue time, to compassionate our selues. For both we are borne to die, and all that are begotten by vs, and the strongest men liuing cannot auoid it: but iniury, and bondage, and to see our wiues and children abused before our faces, is no necessity proceeding from mans nature, but they onely are forced to endure it, who when they might haue died without it, did refuse for fear. We first of all trusting to our strength, rebelled against the Romans; now lastly they exhorting vs to obedience, we denyed: which of them then will not be enraged against vs, if they can take vs aliue? Most miserable shall those young men be, whose strength will endure many torments, and those old men will mooue compassion whose aged yeares cannot suffer tortures; one shall see his wife carried away from him, and another his sonne hauing his hands bound behind him, cry out vnto his father for helpe: who now whilest they are free from the thraldome of their enemies, may gloriously assist vs with their swords. Let vs with our wiues and children die freemen, let vs altogether depart out of this life. This our religion cõmandeth, this our wiues & children perswadeth; God himselfe hath driuen vs vnto this necessity for this purpose. The Romans would haue it otherwise, who feare least any of vs should perish, and not fall into their hands aliue. Let vs therefore hasten, that in steed of their expected hope, whereby they verily perswaded themselues to take vs aliue, we may contrary to their expectation daunt them with a sudden admiration of our glorious deaths.

Eleazar tells the Iewes of the Romans tyranny.

It is a happinesse among the Iewes to die free.

Whilest Eleazar was yet speaking, and desirous still to continue his exhortation, they all interrupted him: euery one now in a fury bent to follow his aduice, made haste to effect it; and as though they had beene vrged by some spirit thereunto, euery one laboured to preuent one another in the execution thereof, iudging him to shew most valour and fortitude, that first dispatched himselfe. They were also desirous to kill their wiues and children with themselues. And which is most strange, their mindes were nothing altered when they came to effect this bloody worke; but with the same resolution they had, when they heard Eleazars speech, euery one retained his good affection towards his friends: yet permitting reason to take no place,

and

A and perſwading themſelues that thus they had well prouided for their children, they all at once embraced their wiues and children for their laſt farewell, and tooke their leaues of them, kiſſing them with teares, and then at once ſlew them, as though it had been done by the hands of other men, and not their owne, comforting themſelues being forced ſo to doe, in that hereby they ſhould eſcape the tyranny and cruelty of their enemies. Finally, no man was ſo cowardly, who durſt not preſume to this action; ſo euery one of them killed his deareſt friends. O miſerable people! whom neceſſity forced to ſlay their wiues and children, accounting the action therof to be the very leaſt of all their miſeries. Wherefore now not enduring the griefe that enſued vpon this fact, and thinking that in liuing any while after them, they ſhould iniure them whom they had ſlain, they with all ſpeed poſſible gathered all their riches togither & ſet them on fire: which

THe Caſtle being thus taken, the Generall of the Romans leauing a garriſon there, went vnto Cæſarea, for there was no one enemy left in all that countrey, but now all Iudæa was deſtroied through continuance of long wars, and many of that nation though far diſtant from it, taſted of thoſe troubles: for it ſo fell out that afterward many Iewes periſhed in Egypt at Alexandria: for thoſe Sicarians who had eſcaped thither, were not content to be ſafe and free from danger, but there alſo they attempted alteration, and to defend their liberty againſt the Romans, eſteeming themſelues nothing inferiour vnto them, and that onely God was their Lord. into the like misery, who were not partakers of their wickednes. Wherefore they admonished G the multitude to beware least they drew themselues into the same danger, wherein they were, and to make satisfaction vnto the Romans for themselues by deliuering such people vnto them. The Iewes were perswaded by these speeches: and foreseeing the danger that might ensue, they furiously assaulted the Sicarians, and tooke of them 600: and shortly after those who there escaping, fled into Egypt and Thebes, were taken and brought backe againe; whose hard hearted obstinacy was so great, that none can without admiration, heare of. For notwithstanding that all torments and tortures that could be deuised were inflicted vpon them, onely to force them to confesse that Cæsar was their Lord, yet no one of them would say so, nor make any shew therof, but all persеuered in their former opinion, as though the bodie tormented had been dead, and not aliue. Moreouer, their children were most to be admired, for not one of them could be con- H strained to call Cæsar Lord. So much did their boldnesse ouercome the torments inflicted vpon their bodies.

How the temple of Onias at Alexandria was shut vp.

AT that time Lupus was gouernor of Alexandria, who with all speed by letters gaue Cæsar notice of these troubles. And Cæsar, seeing that is was necessary to beware of the Iewes, who were naturally enclined to sedition and vnquietnes, fearing also that I they would once again gather themselues together, and cause some to ioine with them, he commanded Lupus to destroy the temple, which Onias erected in Egypt, which was builded and named vpon this occasion. Onias the son of Simon one of the high Priests, being driuen out of Ierusalem, Antiochus King of Syria then warring against the Iewes, he came vnto Alexandria, and was courteously entertained by Ptolomæus who was then also enemy vnto Antiochus, affirming that he would annex vnto his countrey the people of the Iewes, if he would agree to that which he required. The King according to all that could be granted, hee requested him to permit him to build a temple in some place of his countrey, and that hee might worship God therin according to the custom of their country: for so the Iewes would hate Antiochus the more, who had destroyed their temple at Ierusalem, and be friendly vnto him, and many of them did K flie vnto him for religion sake. Ptolomæus agreed so to doe, and gaue him a peece of ground for that purpose, a hundreth and fourescore stounds from Memphis, in that place which was called the way to Heliopolis: where Onias building a castle, made also a temple vnlike to that of Ierusalem; but he erected a tower like that of Ierusalem, with stones, that was threescore cubits long, and he built an altar after the fashion of that of his countrey, and adorned it with all manner of gifts (saue onely a candlestick) which had in steed thereof a lampe to giue light, which hee caused to be hung before the altar in a golden chaine, and he inuironed all the temple with a wall made of bricke, and the gates he made of stone, and the King granted vnto it great reuenues of money and ground, to the intent that the Priests might haue aboundance of all things which they required. But Onias did not this with a good conscience, but for that he was at variance with the Iewes of Ierusalem, for that they forced him to flie: and he perswaded himselfe that by the building of this temple, he might withdraw all men from Ierusalem thither; and of this, there was a prophecie 970. years before, and Esaias foretold that a certaine Iew should build a temple in Egypt. And thus that temple was built, and Lupus hauing receiued the Emperors letters went vnto the temple, and taking away certaine gifts from it, he shut it vp: And after him Paulinus who succeeded in his steed, left not one gift there (for hee threatned the Priests if they did not bring forth all) and permitted not any that came thither for to sacrifice, to come neere it; but shutting vp the gate thereof, he left no signe of diuine seruice there, and from the time it was built till the time it was shut vp, were 333. yeares. The yeare of the world, 4038. after Christs Nativity, 76.

Of the Massacre of the Iewes at Cyrene.

THe bouldnes of the Sicarians, like some infectious disease, infected also the townes about Cyrene. For one Iohn, a weauer, and a wicked man hauing escaped, perswaded many simple people to follow him, and led them into the wildernes, promising to shew them signes and visions, and thus he deceiued the simplest sort of the Iewes: but the noblest of them of Cyrene vnderstanding his deceit, gaue Catullus notice of his preparation and departure, who was then
B Gouernor of Lybia; who sending horsemen and footmen, did easily surprise them beeing vnarmed, and the most part of them were slaine, yet some were taken aliue, and brought to Catullus. But their leader Ionathas at that time escaped: yet beeing diligently laid and sought for ouer all those Countries, he was at last taken, and beeing brought vnto Catullus, hee sought to delay his owne punishment, in offering an occasion of iniquity vnto Catullus. For hee accused the richest among the Iewes, to haue been his aduisers to do this matter. Catullus was glad of those allegations, and exaggerated his accusations very much with tragicall tearmes, so that hee seemed to haue made an end of the wars against the Iewes, and which was worst of all, to bee content to credit whatsoeuer was maliciously spoken: he himselfe instructed the Sicarians to frame scandalous accusations; and commanding them to nominate one Alexander a Iew, whom hee had
C long hated, and his wife Berenice, hee put them first of all to death, and after them all that were well monied, who amounted to the number of 3000, and this he thought hee did without controule, because he confiscated their possessions vnto Cæsar. And lest any Iew liuing in any other place should complaine of his iniustice, he extended his malicious lies against others further off, and perswaded Ionathas and certaine others that were taken with him, to accuse the most trustie and faithfull Iewes at Rome and Alexandria: one of them who were thus falsly accused, was named Ioseph, who writ this history. But this deuice of Catullus had not such successe as he hoped: for he came to Rome, and brought Ionathas and the rest bound with him, thinking that no more inquiry would be made of the false accusations inuented by himselfe.

A part of Ionathans companions were taken & slain, the rest kept captiue aliue, and brought to Catullus.

But Vespasian, suspecting the matter, made diligent inquiry to knowe the truth: and finding
D these crimes iniuriously imposed vpon those men, at Titus intreaty, he acquited them, and punished Ionathas according to his desert; who being first whipped, was afterward burned aliue. And Catullus at that time, by reason of the mildnes of the Emperour, had nothing said vnto him: but not long after he fell into a grieuous disease, and was cruelly tormented, not onely in body, but also in mind. For he was greatly terrified, and still imagined to see the ghosts of them whom hee had so vniustly slain, ready to kil him; so that he cried out, and not able to contain himself, leapt out of his bed, as though he had been tortured with torments and fire. And this disease daily increasing on, his guts and bowels rotting and issuing out of him, at last he died in this manner, leauing behind him an euident argument, that the diuine iustice doth punish impious malefactors.

Ionathas, being first beaten, is burnt aliue.

And this is the end of the History, which we promised to be set down with all fidelity, for them
E that are desirous to know the euent of the warres betweene the Iewes and the Romans. And as for our stile, we leaue it to the iudgement of the Reader: but touching the verity of the history, it is such, as no man need to doubt of; for I do affirme that to be the onely scope, which I aimed at in this whole work.

G

THE FIRST BOOK OF H FLAVIVS IOSEPHVS THE SON OF MATTHIAS, WRITTEN AGAINST APION, AS TOVCHING THE ANTIQVITIE OF THE IEWES.

I Suppose (O thou worthiest amongst worthy men, Epaphraditus) that I haue sufficiently testified vnto them, who shall read those bookes I which I haue written, as touching the authentique history of the Iewes, that our nation is most ancient, and that they haue had their originall from themselues, and haue from the first beginning inhabited that Countrey, whereof they are now possessed at this present. To which effect I haue gathered out of our sacred writings, and publisht in the Greek tongue, a History containing the occurrences of 5000. yeares. And for that I see there are diuers, who (being too much addicted and seduced by the scandalous blasphemies and reports which some of those who are lewdly affected towards vs, haue published against vs) haue misconceited and misbeleeued that which I haue written of K out antiquity, and labour to approue our nation to be moderne, because none of the most ancient and most renown'd Historiographers among the Grecians haue thought our ancestors worthy to be enrowled in their writings: I haue for these causes held it a part of my duty to write some short treatise hereupon; both to reproue the euill intent and affected lying of those our calumners, as also to correct their ignorance, by teaching those who are desirous to knowe the truth, what the originall of our nation is. For proofe whereof, I will produce no other testimony then those, who from antiquity haue been iudged worthy of credit among the Greekes; laying open before their eies, that they, who haue slanderously and falsly written against vs, are conuicted by their owne mouthes: I will also enforce my selfe to expresse the causes, why very few Grecians haue made mentiō of vs in their histories: and moreouer, I wil make it known to those L who are ignorant (either in effect or in pretence) who they haue been that omitted not our History. First of all therefore, I do not a little maruel at those, who (in respect of antiquity) suppose that the truth ought onely to be gathered from the Greeks: and that they iustly may claime the honour and knowledge of faithfull writing, whereas they neither vouchsafe either vs, or any others, the credit or truth in that we set downe, although I am able to proue, that all things haue fallen out quite contrary. For which cause it behoueth vs not to look to mens various opinions, but to examin that which is right, and gather the same by the effects. For whatsoeuer is set down by the Greeks is new, and of late memory, and hath been brought to execution, in a manner but yesterday: I meane the foundations of Cities, the inuentions of Arts, and the descriptions of Lawes, and the latest practice among them hath been, and is, the diligent trauell in History. M

But amongst the Egyptians, Chaldees and Phœnicians (for I presume not to compare my countrimen with them) as they themselues confesse, the memory of their writings is most ancient and infallible. For all these nations dwell in such countries as are not subiect to the corruption of aire; and haue carefully prouided, that none of those things that haue bin done by them should

All things among the Greeks are moderne, but such things as were done among the Egyptiās, Chaldees & Phœnicians, are of happy memory and venerable antiquity.

A ſhould ſleep in obſcurity, but ſhould be kept in memory in the publike writings of the learnedſt men: whereas innumerable corruptions haue crept in among the Greeks, by which the memory of things forepaſſed, is defaced. But they alwaies who haue eſtabliſhed new eſtates, haue each of them ſuppoſed in their owne behalfe, that whoſoeuer was of theirs, hee was the firſt of the world. Yet notwithſtanding they haue had the knowledge of the nature of letters very late, and haue attained the ſame with very great difficulty. For they that ſpeake of the moſt ancient vſe of the ſame, do boaſt & glorifie themſelues, that they haue receiued the knowledge therof from the Phœnicians, and Cadmus. Yet notwithſtanding, there is not any one of them that can ſhew any record of that time, either in their temple, or in their publike regiſters: whereas, after, there aroſe a great doubt and queſtion, whether thoſe letters were in vſe during their time, who ſince B haue for the ſpace of many yeares continued the ſiege before Troy. And in ſooth, their opinion who affirme that they were ignorant of the vſe of thoſe letters, which are at this preſent allowed and accuſtomed among vs, is not to be refuſed. For it is moſt manifeſt, that there is not any writing extant among the Greekes that is more ancient then Homers poeſie, which as it is moſt manifeſt, hath been in allowance and continuance ſince the time of the ſiege of Troy: and yet it is reported, that he left no part of that his poeſie in writing, which was compoſed of diuers ſongs, and onely ſung by roat; by which meanes it came to paſſe, that there are ſo many contradictions in the ſame. And as touching thoſe who haue vndertaken to write hiſtories among them, I mean Cadmus the Mileſian, and Acuſilaus the Argiue, and after him if there were any others, they were not aliue, but very little time before the paſſage of the Perſians into Greece. Furthermore, they C who among the Greeks were the firſt that introduced Philoſophy, and the knowledge of celeſtiall and diuine things, that is to ſay, Pherecydes the Syrian, Pythagoras and Thales, theſe all of them confeſſe with one accord, that being inſtructed by the Egyptians and Chaldees, they haue publiſhed ſome few writings, which are ſuppoſed to be the moſt ancient among the Greeks, and it is hardly beleeued alſo that they were written by them. What reaſon therefore haue the Greeks to be ſo proud, as if there were none but themſelues onely who knew the affaires of antiquitie, and could exactly expreſſe their truth and verity? Or who cannot eaſily coniecture by their owne Writers themſelues, that their writings were onely vpon hearſay and ſuppoſition, and that their ſtile was onely tied to their vaine coniectures? Hence cometh it to paſſe, that in their books they cauill and reproue one another, and make no conſcience to maintaine and write con- D tradictions in one and the ſame thing.

But it may be ſaid, that I taske my ſelfe to a fruitleſſe labour, if I ſhould goe about to informe thoſe who are better experienced then my ſelfe, in how many points Hellanicus differeth from Acuſilaus as touching the Genealogy: in how many places Acuſilaus hath corrected Herodotus; or how Ephorus hath approued that Hellanicus was a lier in the greater part of that which hee reciteth. Ephorus hath beene reproued by Timæus; and in generall, all they haue taxed Herodotus. Neither hath Timæus vouchſafed to accord with Antiochus, or Philiſtus, or Callias, in the Hiſtories of Sicily. Neither haue they who haue written the hiſtories of Athens, or thoſe who haue entreated of the Argoliques, followed others. What need I reckon vp thoſe who in particular haue entreated of cities, or of ſuccinct and ſhort matters? whereas in the deſcription of the Per- E ſian warre, and thoſe exploits that were performed therein, thoſe of greateſt authority are moſt at oddes. Thucydides is accuſed by ſome for a lier in diuers places, notwithſtanding that hee ſeemeth to haue deſcrib'd the hiſtory of his time moſt exactly. But the cauſes of this diſcord are diuers, and it may be that they who ſhall narrowly pry into them, ſhall finde more. For mine owne part, thoſe two which I ſhall here ſet downe, in my opinion are of greateſt waight. The firſt, and in my iudgement the chiefeſt, is, that amongſt the Greekes, from the beginning they haue not beene induſtrious to keepe publique regiſters of ſuch matters as happened in any time or place: which hath made them erre, and giuen thoſe a priuiledge to lie, who afterwards would look to write any thing of ſuch matters as were acted long ſince. Neither are the other Greeks onely to bee touched with this negligence for not making account of ſuch regiſters, but amongſt the A- F thenians alſo (who are reputed to bee glorious for the antiquity of their countrey, and who are exerciſed in ſciences) there is no mention of them. For it is ſaid, that the moſt ancient and publike writings which they haue, are thoſe capitall lawes which were ſet down by their lawmaker Draco, who liued but a little time before Piſiſtratus tyranny. What need wee ſpeake of the Arcades, who vaunt themſelues of their antiquities? For they haue learned the vſe of letters with very great difficulty, and ſom time after this: whereas therefore there was not any writing publiſhed

A ſecond cauſe is, for that they, who addicted themſelues to compoſe Hiſtories, did not buſie themſelues about the inquiſition of the truth (notwithſtanding that each of them did ordinarily promiſe no leſſe) but they laboured to expreſſe how eloquent they were, and fixed their whole ſtudy thereon, as the onely meanes whereby they hoped to obtaine reputation aboue the reſt. Some of them therefore addicted their ſtiles to fables, otherſome by flattering praiſes thought to corie fauour with kings and cities. The reſt inforced their ſtudies to accuſations, by obtrecting the worke of the writer thereof, vnder truſt to get the more credite thereby. In effect they haue followed that courſe in compoſing their Hiſtory, that was euery

whereas all men accord both in word and writing in ſetting downe the ſame thing:) and they who haue written diuerſly, made men beleeue that they were the trueſt amongſt all the reſt. We ought therefore to grant the ſuperiority to the Grecians in all that which concerneth eloquence, and the ornament of language, but not in that which appertaineth to antiquity or truth of Hiſtory, and eſpecially when the queſtion is, what each man writ as touching his owne nation.

Seeing therefore that both the Egyptians and Babylonians long time ſince vſed all diligence in writing, inſomuch as their prieſts were hereunto enioined, who did moſt curiouſly intreat of all ſuch points: the ſame alſo did the Chaldees amongſt the Babylonians, and the Phœnicians alſo (inhabiting amongſt the Greeks) vſed lawes (both concerning priuate and publike affairs) I which, becauſe all men confeſſe it, I will omit to ſpeake of. I let paſſe alſo to recount what care our nation had of this point (no doubt greater then thoſe nations aboue mentioned had) charging our high prieſts and prophets to execute this office, which cuſtome hath been obſerued euen vntill this our age: yea (and if I may preſume ſo far) will be obſerued in all ſucceeding ages, as by the ſcope of my ſpeech enſuing I will endeuour to make manifeſt. For our nation did not onely depute this office to the moſt iuſt men amongſt them in the beginning, and vnto ſuch as were alwaies ready to appeaſe the heauy diſpleaſure and wrath of God kindled againſt them; but they alſo prouided to preſerue the line and deſcent of prieſts from al impurity, and from being intermingled with others. For no man amongſt vs can be a prieſt, who is not borne of a wo-
A cuſtome which the prieſts obſerued. man deſcended from the prieſts line; neither in this caſe is any reſpect made either of riches or K honors: but the party who claimeth the dignity of prieſthood, muſt by many witneſſes proue his Genealogy, and that he is deſcended from prieſts. This cuſtome is not onely of force in Iewry, our owne country, but whereſoeuer elſe any of our nation inhabit, as in Egypt and Babylon, and in any other place, where continually the prieſts in their marriages haue this reſpect, not to marry with any woman that is not of their owne line, and they ſend vnto Ieruſalem the name & pedigree of the woman whō they haue maried, and all teſtimony hereof which they can deduce from her anceſtors. Now if wars moleſt our nation (as often they haue) in the time of Antiochus, ſurnamed Epiphanes, of Pompey the great, Quintilius Varo, and eſpecially in this our age, then thoſe prieſts who ſuruiue make new Genealogies, and pedigrees out of our holy writ for the foreſaid women, that are not deuoured by the fury of war. For they come vnto theſe women not fearing L

So that in the writings of ſuch men all things muſt of neceſſity be true, and as they ought to be, for that neither all men are permitted to write, nor yet any diſſonance and diſagreement is found in their writings. For ſuch things as paſt in ancient times quite beyond the memory of men, were only written by our prophets, who had the knowledge thereof by inſpiration from God himſelfe: but other things of later time are onely recorded by thoſe who liued in the age wherin the things they writ of were done. Fiue of theſe books were written by Moſes, comprehending Genealogies, and the beginning of mankind, and ſuch notable euents as hapned euen from the beginning of the world vntill his death; which is little leſſe then three thouſand yeeres. After the death of Moſes vntill the time

A wherein Artaxerxes liued, who was king of the Persians, and son to Xerxes, the Prophets of our nation euery one writ the history of his time wherin he liued, so that of these mens writings we haue thirteene books: the foure other bookes, which make vp the number already mentioned, are knowne to containe holy Hymnes dedicated vnto God, and wholesome precepts for mans life and conuersation. All things, which from Artaxerxes vntill our time haue hapned, are also set downe in writing: yet the bookes wherein they are registred, do not deserue so much credit as the former of ancient times, for that there was no certaine succession of Prophets in this age. Moreouer, it is euident, that to the former works we giue as great credit, as to the things we our selues write; & notwithstanding they haue bin so long written, yet in all that time no man durst presume either to alter or to blot out any thing therein contained. For all Iewes euen from their
B cradle do beleeue these books to bee sacred, holy, and diuine, and therefore doe giue all credit possible vnto them, and so would willingly suffer death, rather then to doe the contrary. Many captiues also of our nation haue already bin cruelly tormented, and diuers waies put to death in open theaters, only for that they would not cõmit any thing either in word or deed against their lawes, nor violate the writings of their forefathers. Now who amongst the Greeks did euer sustaine the like? nay, they are so far frõ doing it, that none can be found among them who would suffer any losse in his goods or fortunes, therby to preserue all the writings of their nation from perdition: and the reason hereof is, that euery one esteemeth the verity of their Histories to depend vpon the will of the Writer. And this they do also of their most ancient Historiographers, and not without cause: for they euery day see men of their owne times, writing Histories of
C matters long past before in former ages, wherein neither themselues were present, neither yet vouchsafe they to credit the writings of such as were then eye-witnesses thereof: yea some among them haue diuulged Histories of such things as of late befell our nation, when themselues neuer haue been in the place where such matters past as they did write of were, nor haue liued in any neighbour place, where they might haue probable report how matters past, but only making a few centones or broken newes, they most impudently arrogate to their patcht stuffe the name of a History.

The Iewes & Grecians are compared together.

Some others haue written of the wars of the Iewes.

I my selfe haue composed a most true History of those warres, and of euery particular thing there done, as well I might, hauing beene present in all those affaires. For I was captaine of the Galileans amongst our nation, so long as any resistance could be made against the Romans: and D then it so fell out, that I was taken by the Romans, and beeing prisoner vnto Titus and Vespasian, they caused me to be an eye-witnes of all things that past. First in bonds & fetters, and afterward freed from them, I was brought from Alexandria with Titus, when he went to the siege of Ierusalem. So that nothing could then passe whereof I had not notice. For beholding the Roman army, I committed to writing all things with all possible diligence. My selfe also did only manage all matters disclosed vnto the Romans by such as yielded themselues, for that I only did perfectly vnderstand them. Lastly, being at Rome, and hauing now leasure, all busines being past, I vsed the help of some (for the purity of the Greek tongue) and so I published a history of all that had hapned in the foresaid wars: which history of mine is so true, that I feare not to call Vespasian and Titus, Emperours in those wars, to witnesse for them. I first gaue a copy of that booke to them, E afterwards to many noble Romans, who also were present in those warres, I sold also many of them to our owne nation, to such as vnderstood the Greek language, amongst whom were Iulius, Archelaus, Herod the honest, and the most worthy king Agrippa, who all doe testifie, that my history containeth nothing but truth: Who would not haue beene silent, if in any thing eyther for ignorance or flattery I had changed or omitted any particular. Yet notwithstanding all this, some ill disposed persons endeuour to disredit my history, as though they were disputing pro and contra amongst children in schooles, being sometimes on a sudden to forge a feigned accusation, and otherwise to faine a slanderous and sudden detraction, neuer considering that hee who promiseth other men a true relation of matters past, must either be priuy vnto them by his owne knowledge, as hauing beene present in the affaires, or else haue that which hee speaketh
F from other mens mouthes by report of them who knowe them: both which I haue done. For I gathered my other books of Antiquity out of holy Scripture, beeing my selfe a Priest, and skilfull in our law, and the history of our wars I haue written, my selfe being an agent in many matters therein contained, and an eye-witnes of the rest; so that nothing was said or done whereof I had not notice. How then can any man excuse them from impudency and malice, who labour against mee to proue my relation false? They perhaps alledge, that they haue read the commentarie mentarie containing the Emperours acts, yet for all this they were not preſent in any action, repugnant to that, which my hiſtory recounteth. G

Thus haue I (as I thought it neceſſary) made a digreſſion to ſhew how they are able to performe their word, who diſcrediting my hiſtory, promiſe to ſet downe truth in writing. I haue alſo ſufficiently (as I think) demonſtrated, that the regiſtring of things is more ancient amongſt other nations, then amongſt the Greeks. I will now firſt of all diſpute againſt thoſe, who with all might and maine labour to prooue our nation of no antiquitie, for that (as they ſay) no Greeke Writer maketh any mention of it. This done, I will bring foorth proofe and teſtimony of the antiquity hereof out of other Writers, and ſo I will ſhew that their tongues are no ſlander, who ſeek to diſcredit our nation. Firſt therefore our nation neither inhabiteth a country bordering vpon the ſea, neither are we delighted in merchandiſe, nor for this cauſe wearied with pilgrimages from place to place. H

But our cities are ſituate far from the ſea in a moſt fertil ſoile, which we till with all induſtry, and our whole endeuours are how to get food for our children, and to keep our countrey lawes, and how to leaue vnto our poſterity the knowledge of piety, which worke we think all our age ought to be imploied in. Beſide all this before mentioned, we haue a forme of liuing, different from all other nations: al which concurring together, we had no need to traffick with the Greeks, as the Egyptians and the Phœnicians doe, who giue themſelues to bargaining and merchandiſe onely for the couetouſnes of mony. Neither were our anceſtors delighted in thefts and robberies, nor did our fathers make warre vpon any nation for deſire of larger poſſeſſions, notwithſtanding our country was furniſhed with many thouſands of ſtrong warlike men. Wherefore the Phœnicians ſailing vnto the Greeks to trafficke with them they were thus I made knowne vnto them, and by them the Egyptians, and all other nations, who ſailing vpon the ſeas, brought merchandiſe into Greece. The Medes alſo and Perſians were known vnto them, after ſuch time as they openly raigned ouer Aſia, and the Perſians warred euen to the other oppoſite continent.

Moreouer, the Greeks knew the Thracians, becauſe they were their neighbours, and the Scythians by ſayling to Pontus, and finally all that were diſpoſed to write, knew all the nations bordering either vpon the Eaſterne and Weſterne ſeas; but ſuch as dwelt farre from the ſea and ſea-coaſt, were long time vnknown, as alſo appears in Europe: for neither Thucidides nor Herodotus, nor any other of that time, maketh any mention of Rome, notwithſtanding that ſo long ſince it was ſo mighty, and made ſo great wars: yet at laſt, with much ado the Greeks heard of it. Yea, K their moſt curious Writers, and namely Ephorus, were ſo ignorant of the Frenchmen and Spaniards, that they thought the Spaniards to bee a people onely denominated of one city, wherein they inhabited, whereas the whole world now knoweth them to inhabite a vaſt countrey, and a great part of the weſtern world. Likewiſe, the ſaid Greek Writers relate the maners of the foreſaid people to be ſuch, as neither are, nor were euer vſed among them. And the onely cauſe why they were ignorant of the truth, was the diſtance of the place, and theſe Writers would ſeem to tell ſomething which others of former time had not ſpoken of. No maruel therfore though our nation was vnknowne, and none of them in their writings made any mention of vs, beeing both ſo far from the ſea, and liuing after a different manner.

Put caſe therefore that I denied the Greeks to bee of any antiquity, and to proue my aſſertion L ſhould conclude their nation to be moderne, for that our hiſtories made no mention of them, would they not laugh at this reaſon, and vſe the teſtimonie of their neighbour nations to proue their antiquity? I therfore wil do the like, & vſe the teſtimony of the Egyptians & Phœnicians, whoſe records the Greekes cannot deny. For all Egyptians in generall are our enemies, and among the Phœnicians they eſpecially of Tyre, Which I cannot iuſtly ſay of the Chaldees, who haue been Princes ouer our nation, and becauſe of their affinity and alliance with our countrimen, haue in their Chronicles made mention of the Iewes. Yet when I haue prooued what I now auerre, and refelled the ſlanderous reports againſt vs, I will then alſo ſhew who amongſt the Greeks ſpeake of vs, that ſo the Greeks may alſo bee depriued of this ſhift and refuge, to excuſe their malicious lies falſely forged againſt our nation. And firſt of all I will begin with the wri- M tings of the Egyptians, who, as they well knowe, do nothing at all fauour vs. Wherefore Manethon, an Egyptian borne, skilfull in the Greeke tongue, as by his works appeares (for hee writ in Greeke) compiling a hiſtory of the cuſtomes and religion of his forefathers, collected (as himſelfe reporteth) out of the Egyptians holy writings, often reprehendeth Herodotus, who being indeed ignorant, did much helpe the Egyptians. This Manethon, in his ſecond booke of the Manethon an Egyptian writer.

A Egyptian customes saith thus: (I will set downe his owne wordes, because I vse them for a witnesse.) Wee had a King (quoth hee) named Timæus, in whose raigne God being angry with vs, contrarie to all expectation, an obscure people taking courage, came from the East, and pitching their tents in our countrey conquered it by force, no man resisting them; and committing our Princes to bonds, did finally burne our cities, and destroy the temples of our Gods; and behaued themselues most cruelly against the inhabitants, killing many of them, and making slaues of the rest with their wiues and children: finally, they chose a King amongst themselues, who should be then of our countrey, his name was Saltis, who comming to Memphis, made both the higher and lower Prouince tributaries, leauing garrisons in strong holds, and fortifying those places in the East: Likewise, forseeing that the Assyrians were more mighty then hee, & would B inuade his countrey, he found out in this Prouince a citie called Saite fit for his purpose, being situate on the East side of the riuer Bubastis, which by an ancient diuine was called Auaris, hee builded vp this citie and compassed it with most huge walls, and placed in it two hundred thousand armed men to keep it. This Saltis came in haruest time, to the intent that hee might both pay his souldiers, and be a terrour vnto other people, and after he had raigned nineteen yeares he died. Saltis subdued the Egyptians.

After him succeeded another King called Baon, who raigned foure and forty yeares, next to him Aphinæs, who raigned thirty sixe yeares and seauen moneths, then Aphosis, who raigned threescore and one yeares, and then Iandas who raigned fifty yeares and one moneth, after them all raigned Assis, nine and forty yeares and two moneths, and these six were the first Kings a- C mongst them, euer destroying and warring vpon the Egyptians, and labouring to extinguish their race. This nation was called Hicsos, which signifieth kings shepheards: for Hic in the sacred tongue, signifieth a King, and Sos a shepheard or shepheards, according to the common speech, and Hicsos is a compound word. Some say these people were Arabians: but in other copies I find that Hicsos, is not interpreted kings shepheards, but shepheards that were captiues: for Hic and Hac, also when it is pronounced, doth in the Egyptian tongue signifie a captiue, and this latter exposition seemeth to me to be the truest, for it is more agreeable with the History. Wherefore Manathon reporteth these foresaid kings and shepheards to haue ruled Egypt fiue hundreth and eleuen yeares: and after these, the king of Thebes, and the king of the residue of Egypt, vniting their forces together, inuaded the said shepheards, and held on great and long wars against them, D and that the said shepheards were ouercome by the king Alisfragumthosis, also that then they lost all Egypt which he had in their power, and that they were shut vp in a place called Auaris containing ten thousand acres of ground, which as Manathon reporteth these shepheards enuironed round about with a huge wall, to the end that all their whole prouision might be fortified, and all the preys which they got, defended. Moreouer, that Themosis son of the said Alisfragumthosis endeuoured by force to subdue them, & for this cause besieged them with foure hundreth and 80000. armed men: and at last despairing to take them by siege, he couenanted with them that they should safely depart out of Egypt whither they would; and that they vpon these conditions together with all their families and goods and cattell departed out of Egypt into the wildernes, and so into Syria, being in number two hundreth & forty thousand, and that fearing E the puissance of the Assyrians who at that time raigned in Asia, they builded a citie in the countrey now called Iudæa, which they made so large that it might receiue them all, and this citie they called Ierusalem. Further, the saide Manathon in another booke of the Egyptian affaires saith, that in the holy writings he findeth the foresaid shepheards called captiues, wherein hee saith most true. For our ancestors were wont to feed cattel, and so leading a pastorall life, were called shepheards, neither are they vniustly called captiues: for our forefather Ioseph told the king of Egypt that hee was a captiue, and long time after hee called his brethren into Egypt by the kings command; but we will hereafter examine this point more straightly: I will now cite the testimony of the Egyptians concerning this point, and also relate the wordes of Manathon touching the time when this befell, who saith as followeth. Kings shepheards.

F After that the nation of shepheards were departed out of Egypt vnto Ierusalem, king Themosis who draue them out of the land, raigned twenty fiue yeares and foure moneths, and then died: and his sonne Chebron succeeded him, who raigned thirteen yeares, and after him Amenophis twenty yeares and seuen moneths, next, his sister Amesses one and twentie yeares and nine moneths, then raigned Mephios twelue yeares and nine moneths, and Mephamuthosis twentie fiue yeares and ten moneths, Thimosis nine yeares and eight moneths, Amenophis thirtie yeares and ten moneths, Orus thirtie ſixe yeares and fiue moneths, after him his daughter Achemcheres, twelue yeares and one moneth, and the brother of Rathotis nine yeares, Achencheres twelue yeares and fiue moneths, another Achencheres twelue yeares and three moneths, Armais foure yeares and one moneth, Armeſis one yeare and foure moneths, Armeſeſmiamus threeſcore and ſixe yeares and two moneths, Amenophis nineteene yeares and ſixe moneths. Moreouer, that Sethoſis hauing made readie a huge armie both of foote and horſe, and alſo a Nauy at Sea, left the gouernement of Egypt vnto his brother Armais, and permitted vnto him all other kingly authoritie, onely forbidding him to weare a Diademe, and to oppreſſe the Queen, mother to his children: commanding him alſo to abſtaine from the reſt of the kings concubines. And Sethoſis himſelfe went to Cyprus and Phœnicia, againſt the Aſſyrians and Medes, and ſubdued them all, partly by the ſword, partly by the feare of his power and greatnes: and being proud of all this his fortunate ſucceſſe, he bent himſelfe againſt the Eaſterne countrey, and deſtroyed with fire and ſword the cities of that place, with whole Prouinces: and ſpending much time in theſe warres, his brother Armais whom hee left in Egypt, did without feare commit all that hee forbade him to do: for he oppreſſed the Queen violently, and daily lay with the reſt of the kings concubines, and being thereto counſelled by his friends, he put a crowne vpon his head and rebelled againſt his brother. Alſo that he who was then chiefe of the Egyptians holy cuſtomes, ſent letters vnto Sethoſis containing all that had hapned, and how Armais had rebelled againſt him; who returning to Peluſ, came and enioyed againe his owne kingdome which by his name was cald Egypt: for Manethon writeth that this Sethoſis was named Egyptus, and his brother Armais Danaus.

Sethoſis king of Egypt, made his brother Armais gouernour of his countrie.

Whereupon Egypt tooke his name.

Thus farre Manethon: out of whom it is euident by computation of the foreſaid times, that our nation was deliuered out of Egypt, three hundreth ninty and three yeares before Danaus, and inhabited this countrie of Iudæa ſo long, before Danaus came vnto Argos: notwithſtanding the inhabitants of Argos boaſt their Citie is moſt ancient. Wherefore Manethon recounteth two things for vs out of the Egyptian letters: firſt, that wee came from another place to them, afterwards went out of their country again, and that ſo long agoe, as it was almoſt a thouſand yeares before the Troyan warres. Touching thoſe things which Manethon profeſſeth himſelfe, not to haue gathered out of the writings of the Egyptians, who did write out of certaine tales and reports, I will hereafter ſhew, how they are alledged without any reaſon for them. For I wil once againe leaue theſe, and go to the teſtimony of the Phœnicians, which they writ concerning our nation. The Tyrians therefore haue Chronicles of very great antiquitie, which they haue kept with all diligence, concerning that which hath bin done among them, and indeed they are worthie of memorie. Amongſt theſe Records it is written, that king Salomon built a Temple at Ieruſalem, a hundreth forty three yeares and eight moneths before the Tyrians erected Carthage. So they haue regiſtred the building of our Temple, for Hiramus king of the Tyrians, was our king Salomons friend; obliged vnto him for his fathers ſake, who for this cauſe alſo of his owne liberality, gaue Salomon a hundreth and twenty talents of gold towards the building of the Temple, and cut downe the moſt goodly wood called Libanus, which hee beſtowed vpon him, to make the roofe of the Temple withall: for which bounty, Salomon gaue him againe many liberall gifts, and among the reſt a countrie of Galilee named Zabulon: but Salomons wiſedome was the chiefe cauſe of this kings friendſhip towards him. For they ſent Problemes one to the other to bee anſwered, and Salomon in his anſwers appeared moſt witty, as alſo hee did in many things elſe; and euen vntill this day, many of the Epiſtles ſent one vnto another, are kept among the Tyrians. And that I doe not feare the authoritie amongſt the Tyrians, I will prooue by the teſtimonie of Dius, a man who by common conſent hath faithfully written the Phœnician Hiſtorie, wherein he writeth as followeth.

Manethon ſheweth the Iewes coming into Egypt & their departure.

Problemes of Hiramus and Salomon.

After the death of Abibalus, Hiramus his ſon raigned in his ſtead, who encreaſed the number of his Eaſterne Cities, and inlarged Ieruſalem, hee alſo ioyned the Temple of Iupiter Olympius, ſituate in an Iland, vnto it, filling vp the water with earth, and adorned it with golden gifts. After this aſcending into Libanus, he cut down the wood to build temples, and that the king of Ieruſalem named Salomon, ſent vnto him certaine riddles to be expounded, and hee againe the like vnto him, couenanting together, that he who could not tell the meaning of one anothers riddles, ſhould pay vnto the other a ſumme of mony, and that Hiramus confeſſing he could not expound, Salomons riddles, did pay vnto him much money: Laſtly, that one Abdemonus a Tyrian did expound the ſaid riddles, and writ more vnto Salomon, which if Salomon could not interpret hee

A ſhould pay vnto Hircanus a ſumme of money, and this teſtimonie Dius beareth vs concerning the foreſaid matter. But I will now recount the words of Menander an Epheſian, who hath regiſtred the acts of all kings both at home and abroad, endeuouring to make a true Hiſtorie out of the writings of euery countrie. This man writing of the Tyrian kings, and comming to Hiramus, he ſaith thus of him. Abibalus dying, there ſucceeded in the kingdome his ſon Hiramus, who liued 34. yeares: and this king with a rampire conioyned Eurichorus, & erected there a pillar of gold in Iupiters temple, and went into the woods, and cut downe the Cedars of Libanus to make couerings for the temples; of which, pulling downe the olde, hee erected new, and dedicated the temple of Hercules and Aſtartus: but that to Hercules in the moneth of Peritius, and then the other to Aſtartus, when he with an army went againſt the Tyrians, who did not pay him tribute, whom
B when he had ſubdued, he returned againe.

The Genealogie of king Hiramus.

At this time alſo liued Abdemonus a ſeruant vnto the king, who was wont to expound the parables, which king Salomon of Ieruſalem ſent vnto king Hiramus: now how long it was from this kings time till the building of Carthage, we may thus calculate. After the death of Hiramus, his ſon Beleaſtartus, ſucceeded him, who liued forty and three yeares, and raigned ſeuen: after him his ſonne Abdaſtartus, who liued twentie yeares, and raigned nine; but this king was treacherouſly ſlaine by the foure ſonnes of his nurſe, the eldeſt of whom raigned twelue yeares. Next whom, Aſtartus the ſonne of Feleaſtartus, who liued fifty and foure yeares, and raigned twelue: after him ruled his brother Aſtarimus, who liued fifty and foure yeares, and ſate it the kingdome nine, then hee was ſlaine of his brother Phelletes, who raigned eight monethes, and li-
C ued fiftie yeares, and was ſlaine by a Prieſt of Aſtarta named Ithobalus, who liued threeſcore and eight, and raigned thirtie two yeares: him ſucceeded his ſonne Badezorus, who liued fortie fiue yeares, and raigned ſixe yeares, to him ſucceeded his ſonne Mettinus, who liued thirtie two years, and raigned nine. After him Pigmalion who liued fiftie ſixe yeares, and raigned fortie; in the ſeauenth yeare of whoſe raigne, his ſiſter Dido builded a Citie in Africa, and named it Carthage: ſo that from the time of king Hiramus vnto the building of Carthage, is by this computation a hundreth fiftie fiue yeares, and two monethes: and for as much as the temple of Ieruſalem was built in the twelfth year of Hiramus his raigne, the computation of the time ſince that yeare vntill the building of Carthage is 143. yeares, and eight moneths. What need we alledge more, ſeeing this teſtimonie of the Phœnicians? The truth is now ſufficiently made manifeſt:
D for our anceſtors muſt needs haue come into this countrey we inhabite, before ſuch time as they built a temple in it, as I haue alſo made manifeſt in my Books of Antiquitie, collected out of our holy Scripture.

Carthage built in Africk by Dido Pigmalions ſiſter.

I wil now ſpeak of that which the Chaldees writ of vs in their Hiſtories; which do much agree in all other matters with thoſe of our nation. And firſt let Beroſus be my witnes, who was a Chaldean born, yet a man famous & knowne vnto all that loue learning, for he in the Grecian tongue did write Aſtronomie, and the Chaldees Philoſophie. Beroſus imitating the moſt ancient Hiſtories writeth of the Deluge, and how mankind was therein extinguiſhed, and he in all things imitateth Moſes. He alſo ſpeaketh of the Arke wherein our forefather was preſerued, and affirmeth that it was carried into the tops of the mountaines in Armenia: after this hee proſecuteth the E Genealogie of all that raigned from Noe, vntill Nabulaſſarus king of the Babylonians & Chaldeans. He likewiſe ſetteth down how long euery one raigned, and in proſecuting the deeds of this king he recounteth how he ſent his ſonne Nabuchodonoſor into Egypt, and to our countrie with great power, who finding them rebels, ſubdued them and burnt the temple at Ieruſalem, and ſo departed, carrying with him all our nation into Babylon: whereupon our Citie was deſolate ſeuentie years vntill the raigne of Cyrus king of the Perſians. Moreouer he affirmeth that the Babylonian kept Egypt, Syria, Phœnicia, and Arabia, exacting more of his ſubiects then euer any king of Babylon or Chaldea had done before his time. And the words of Beroſus muſt needs be to this effect: Nabulaſſarus his father hearing that his ſubſtitute in Egypt, Cœloſyria, and Phœnicia had rebelled, hee himſelfe not being able to take ſuch paines, committed theſe af-
F faires vnto his ſonne Nabuchodonoſor, and gaue vnto him a part of his army, for that he was in the flower of his age, and ſent him againſt him: and Nabuchodonoſor fighting with the ſaid Champion, ouerthrew him, and ſubdued the countrey which of olde belonged vnto them, and at the ſame time his father Nabulaſſarus fell ſicke in Babylon, and died, hauing raigned twenty nine yeares. But Nabuchodonoſor long after vnderſtanding his fathers death, hee diſpoſed of Egypt and other Prouinces as hee thought good, and taking the captiues of Iudæa, Phœnicia, and the Syrians that liued in Egypt, hee committed them to certaine of his friends, to bee brought with other carriage and his army to Babylon; and ſo he himſelfe accompanied with a very few took his iourney to Babylon through the deſart: and finding that the Chaldees ruled all, and that their nobilitie reſerued the kingdome for him, he was made king, and commanded houſes to be built for the captiues that were comming, in the moſt conuenient places of Babylon, and hee of the ſpoile beautified the temple of Belus & other places moſt richly, and built a new citie without the wall of the olde: and prouiding leaſt hereafter the enemies might turne the riuer and ſo haue acceſſe vnto the Citie, he inuironed the inner Citie with three ſeuerall wals, and the outmoſt Citie likewiſe. The wals whereof were made of brick, but the wals of the inner Citie were of bricke and bytumen: this done, he builded moſt ſumptuous gates which might haue become temples: and moreouer neere vnto his fathers palace he builded another farre greater, and more coſtly then it was, the pompe whereof it were hard and perhaps tedious to expreſſe. Yet this we will rehearſe worth the noting, that this ſo ambitious and aboue all credit gorgeous palace was builded in fifteen daies: in it hee erected rockes of ſtone like mountaines, beſet with all ſorts of trees; he alſo made a famous garden, all ſupported with pillers, for that his wife being brought vp in the countrey of the Medes, deſired to haue a proſpect into the fields and mountaines.

Nabuchadonoſor builded a palace.

This hee relateth of the forementioned king, and many things more in his booke of the affaires of the Chaldees, wherein he reproueth the Greeke writers, who falſely affirme that Semiramis the Aſſyrian Queene built Babylon, and that they falſely report thoſe wonderful works about Babylon, to haue been by her made and finiſhed. Wee muſt needs thinke that the Chaldean Hiſtory is true, ſeeing it agreeth with that of the Phœnicians, which Beroſus writ of the king of Babylon who ſubueruered both Phœnicia and all Syria: with them alſo accordeth Philoſtratus in his hiſtory of the ſiege of Tyria, and Magaſtenes alſo in his fourth book of the affaires of India; where he laboured to prooue, that the ſaid king excelled Hercules in ſtrength and valour, affirming that he ſubdued the greateſt part of Africk, and Spaine, and that the temple of Ieruſalem was burnt by the Babylonians, and again reedified by Cyrus; and we may proue it out of Beroſus, who in his third book ſaith as followeth. Nabuchodonoſor hauing begun the third wall, fell ſicke and died, when he had raigned forty three yeares, and his ſonne Euelmeradochus ſucceeded him, who for his iniquity and luſtfull liuing, was treacherouſly ſlaine by his ſiſters husband named Nirigliſſoroor, after he had raigned two yeares. Hee being dead, the traitor Nirigliſſoroor vſurped the kingdome, and raigned foure yeares, whoſe ſonne then a childe was made king; called by name Laboroſardochus, and he raigned nine moneths; who for that hee ſeemed to be of very corrupt manners, was ſlaine by his owne friends: after whoſe death they who ſlew him conſulting together, did make one Nabonidus a Babylonian, king. At this time the wals of bricke and bytumen about the riuer of Babylon were built. In the eight yeare of this kings raigne, Cyrus comming with an army out of Perſia, conquered all Aſia, and came with his forces againſt Babylon: but the king of Babylon hauing notice of his comming, leuied an army meeting him in the way, and ioyned battell with him; but being ouercome in the fight, he accompanied with a very few of his men, was forced to flie into Borſippa. Cyrus now beſieged Babylon, and purpoſed to deſtroy the outward wals thereof: but by reaſon that it was too ſtrong and too hard to win, he returned to Borſippa to beſiege Nabonidus the king of Babylon who was fled thither. But Nabonidus not abiding the euent of warre, yeelded himſelfe vnto Cyrus, who dealt mercifully with him and gaue him a territory in Carmania, but expelled him out of Babylon: ſo Nabonidus led the reſt of his life in that Prouince. This Hiſtory agreeth with ours; for in our writings we find that Nabuchodonoſor in the eighteenth yeare of his raigne did deſtroy our Temple, and that it ſo remained threeſcore and ten yeares: Alſo that in the ſecond yeare of king Cyrus, the foundations thereof were laid againe, and that it was finiſhed and reedified in the ſecond yeare of king Darius his raigne. This done, I will alſo relate the Hiſtories of the Phœnicians, that we may abound with proofe of that we ſay, for they make a computation of the yeares after this manner: In the raigne of king Ithobalus, Nabuchadonoſor beſieged Tyre thirteen yeares, after whom Baal raigned ten yeares, next him iudges were appointed, to wit, them that follow; Ecnibalus the ſonne of Balachus iudged two moneths, Chelbis the ſonne of Abdæus ten moneths, Abbarus the high Prieſt three moneths, Myttomus and Geraſtus ſonnes of Abdilimos iudged ſix yeares, after whom Balatorus raigned one yeare, and after his death the Tyrians called Merbalus from Babylon, and made him king, and he raigned foure yeares: and he then dying, they ſent alſo to Babylon for his brother

A ther Iromus, who raigned twenty yeares, in whose raigne Cyrus obtained the Persian Empire, so that this whole time is fifty foure yeares and three moneths: for Nabuchodonosor began to besiege Tyre in the seuenth yeare of his raigne, and in the fourteenth yeare of king Iromus his raigne Cyrus was made Emperour of Persia. Nabuchodonosor besieged Tyre.

Wherfore both the Chaldees & Tyrian Historiographers agree with vs concerning our temple. So that the antiquitie of our nation aboue mentioned is now made manifest, and without all controuersie. And that which is already alledged to this end, may be sufficient for them, who are not vpon purpose cotradictious. It is therefore requisite (to satisfie them who giue no credit to the writings of other nations, and contend that the Grecian Histories onely are to bee beleeued) to bring many testimonies from the Greeks themselues, who haue as oportunitie serB ued, made mention of our nation and knowne it. Pythonis a Samian borne, both of great antiquitie, and excelling all other Philosophers in holines towards the gods, is not only conuinced to haue knowne the customes of our nation, but he did also as it plainely appeareth imitate them in many things. His writings are in no place extant, but diuers haue recorded many notable things of him, and especially Hermippus a man most diligent in searching of Histories. This Hermippus recounteth in his first booke of Pythagoras, that the said Philosopher (hauing one of his familiar friends named Calliphon dead, who was a Crotonian borne) reported this mans soule to be perpetually with him, and that the said soule commanded him not to passe the place where his asse fell, and that hee should abstaine from vncleane water, and that hee should with all diligence eschue blasphemie: and then it followeth, this he did and said, imitating the opinions of C the Iewes and Grecians, and applying them to himselfe. For it is certainly reported, that this man gathered much of his philosophie out of the Iewes lawes. Our nation in times past was well knowne to diuers cities, so that many of them doe now obserue our customes, and others esteeme them worth the imitation, as Theophrastus doth witnesse in his booke entituled De legibus: for he saith that the Tyrian lawes forbid to sweare by any strange Sacrament, and amongst these strange and forraine Sacraments, he reckoneth the oath called Corban, which oath is vsed onely amongst the Iewes, and in our language signifieth the gift of God. Herodotus of Halicarnassa knew our nation also, and in a manner maketh mention of it: for speaking of the Colchians, hee saith thus in his second booke. The Colchians, Egyptians, and Æthiopians onely amongst all other nations did vse circumcision in the beginning: for the Phœnicians and Syrians D liuing in Palestina do confesse themselues to haue learned this custome from the Egyptians, and the Syrians liuing neere vnto Thermodoontes, and the riuer Parthenius and their neighbours the Macronians, are reported lately to haue learned it of the Colchians: and these are they only, that vse cicumcision, and they doe like vnto the Egyptians, but I am not able to say, whether the Egyptians or Æthiopians learned it of the other. Herodotus therefore affirmeth the Syrians in Palestina to vse circumcision, and it is manifest that of all that inhabite Palæstina, the Iewes onely vse it, which hee knowing writeth so of them. Chærilus also an auncient Poet maketh mention of our nation, and affirmeth that our countrimen warred vnder Xerxes against the Greekes, and numbring them of the countries that followed him, hee lastly spake thus of our nation. The Chaldies and Tyrians agree with the Iewes history. Hermippus writings and testimony of Pythagoras. Theophrastus. Corban the gift of God. Herodotus the Halicarnasian touching the Iews circumcision. Chærilus an ancient Poet, his testimony of the Iewes.

E A people strange followed this royall throng.
Their language was th' vnknowne Phœnician tongue:
In th' hils of Solymus their dwelling was,
Neere to a lake for greatnesse which did passe:
Their heads were shau'd, and for the heads attire,
They ware an horse-skin dryed at the fire.

It is euident as I thinke that he speaketh of the Iewes: for the mountaines of Solymus are in our country, and that lake also called Asphaltites, which is the greatest and vastest of all lakes that are in Syria, and thus Chærilus maketh mention of vs. And that the Iewes were not knowne only of the Greekes, but also admired of them, it is easie to prooue not out of the obscurest writers, F but by the testimonie of their wisest Philosophers: For Clearchus disciple vnto Aristotle, and the best amongst all the Peripatetickes in his first booke De somno, saith, that his master Aristotle spake thus of a certaine Iew, and reporting Aristotles words, hee saith thus: It were too tedious to recount all things else which hee alledgeth, but I will set downe that only that may cause the man to be admired. Hyperochides answered that they were all very desirous to heare it: then quoth Clearchus according to Aristotles precepts in his Rhetoricke I will first recount of what Asphaltites the lake. The testimony of Clearchus disciple of Aristotle touching the Iewes.

nation the man was, leaſt I ſeem to oppoſe my ſelfe to him, that ſet downe the foreſaid precept. G
Do ſo quoth Hyperochides if ſo you pleaſe. Then he ſaid, this man before mentioned was by nation a Iew (born in Cœloſyria) one of the ſect of the Indian Philoſophers, and they are called (as I heare reported) among the Indians Calani, and among the Syrians, Iewes, taking their name from the place where they inhabit, called Iury; the name of their citie is hard to pronounce, for they call it Ieruſalem. This man entertained many ſtrangers, & he came from out of the higher countrie down vnto the ſea coaſt, and he was very eloquent & of great courage. We at that time liued in Aſia, when this diuine man came vnto the place where we were, and began to conferre with vs, and with other Philoſophers, making triall of their knowledge: and for that many learned men were aſſembled about him, he at laſt for this cauſe more willingly imparted ſome of his knowledge vnto them. Thus farre Ariſtotle in Clearchus: recounting moreouer at large the admi- H
rable abſtinence of the foreſaid Iew from meat, and his chaſtitie: all which they that are deſirous to know may read in Clearchus, for I am loath to write any thing ſuperfluous. So now it is euident how Clearchus by the way of a digreſſion ſpeaking of another matter maketh mention of Hecatæus Abderita brought vp with king Alexander.
vs. But Hecataus Abderita a Philoſopher, and one brought vp with King Alexander, and dwelling with Ptolomæus of Lagus, did not onely briefly make mention of vs, but alſo writ a whole booke of our nation the Iewes, out of which I will briefly note ſome few points that occurre, but firſt I will ſhew of what antiquitie he is. For he recordeth the time when Ptolomæus neere vnto Gaza fought with Demetrius, which hapned the eleuenth yeare after Alexanders death in the hundreth and ſeuenteenth Olympiade, as Caſtor writeth: who ſpeaking of this Olympiade ſaith, that in this time Ptolomæus Lagus ouercame Demetrius the ſonne of Antigonus at Gaza in fight: which I Demetrius was called Poliorcetes, and all men confeſſe that Alexander died in the hundreth and fourteenth Olympiade: ſo that it is euident that at that time wherein Alexander liued, our nation flouriſhed. And Hecataus ſaith that after that battell fought at Gaza, Ptolomæus was made Lord of the places bordering about Syria, and that many men hearing of the clemencie of Ptolomæus, followed him into Egypt, and conuerſed with him: amongſt the which one was called Ezechias the Iewes high Prieſt, a man about threeſcore and ſix yeares old, and of chiefeſt notice and dignitie of all his nation, and moſt prudent and eloquent, one alſo who in all affaires had more experience then any man elſe. He likewiſe reporteth that the number of the Iewes Prieſts who receiue their tenths, and rule all in generall, is a thouſand and fiue hundred or thereabout: and againe making mention of the ſame Ezechias, he ſaith, this man being in this reputation and K honour, and conuerſing with vs, by the help of ſome about him, declared all things wherein we and this nation differ, and ſhewed vnto vs the place of his dwelling, and the manner of his conuerſation, which he had in writing.

After this, Hecataus ſheweth what maner of people we are, and how religious in our lawes, and how that we rather will ſuſtaine all torments & death it ſelf then violate them in any thing, and that we account it a worthy thing ſo to doe: adding moreouer, that being much hated of our neighbours, and hauing ſuffered all contumelies both at the hands of the Perſian Kings and their officers, yet that we could not be forced to change our opinions, but that we are cõtinually exercíſed to giue a reaſon thereof. He alſo recordeth an example of our conſtant minds: for Alex- ander (quoth he) being at Babylon, and purpoſing to reedifie the Temple of Bell, he cõmanded L

all his ſouldiers to carry timber to the building hereof, and the Iewes onely diſobeyed his command, for the which they endured many ſtripes and torments, till ſuch time as the King freed them from it: and they (quoth he) returning to their owne countrey, deſtroyed all the temples and altars that they found there, and ſome of them were by the officers therefore puniſhed, other eſcaped fire; adding that we may iuſtly be admired for theſe things, and that our nation is exceeding populous, likewiſe that many of vs were carried captiues into Babylon, and there ſerued the Perſians. Moreouer, that many more were diſperſt into Egypt after Alexanders death, for a tumult begun in Syria: Hee alſo recordeth the greatnes of our countrey, and the fertilitie thereof; they inhabit (quoth he) a country that hath almoſt thirty hundreth thouſand acres of moſt fertill ground; for Iury is of this largeneſs, and that in time paſt we inhabited a large & very M great citie, which was very populous; he ſpeaketh alſo of the building of our temple in this manner. The Iewes haue many other townes and villages in euery prouince, but they haue one moſt

ſtrong citie, the compaſſe of whoſe walls is fifty ſtounds, and in it inhabit a hundred and fiftie thouſand men, and this citie they called Ieruſalem, in the midſt of it is a building of ſtone with foure porches a hundreth cubits about, it hath alſo double gates wherein is a foure ſquared

Therein is no image nor gift, no trees nor wood growing there, nor any thing of this ſort. Therein inhabit prieſts both night and day, celebrating certain purifications, and they drink no wine in the Temple. The Prieſts do dwel in the Temple and drink no wine

Moreouer, he ſhewed how our nation warred vnder Alexanders ſucceſſors, and hee reporteth that which he heard of a certaine Iew in the army, and I will ſet down the Authors owne words. As I went (ſaith he) to the red Sea, a certaine Iew, one of the horſemen that conducted vs, named Moſollamus, who was a courageous man, and one who excelled all archers elſe, both Greeks
B and other nations; This Iew (euery one haſting on forward of his iourney, and being willed by a Southſaier to ſtand) asked for what cauſe the multitude ſtaied and went not forward: preſently the Southſaier ſhewed him a bird which he diligently viewed, and tould the Iew, that if that bird did ſtand ſtill in the place, then it was expedient for them to ſtand, and if the bird did mount vp and flee, that then they ought to march on forward; but if it flew towards the place from whence they came, that then it was wiſdome to retire. The Iew heereat was ſilent, yet drawing his boaw, he ſhot an arrow and killed the bird; whereat the Southſayer and certaine other were offended, and curſed him. But he, taking the vnhappy bird in his hand, ſaid vnto them: Are yee „ ſo mad, as to think that this bird, not hauing the foreſight to preſerue her ſelfe from this death, is „ able to direct vs in the ſucceſſe of our iourney? Had this bird foreknowne future euents, ſhe „
C would haue eſchewed this place, for dread, that Moſollamus a Iew ſhould haue ſtrucken her with „ an arrow. But we will now leaue the teſtimony of Hecataus: for euery one that liſt may read his booke, and there vnderſtand this more at large. I will not omit the teſtimony of Agatarchides, a man of no euill in his owne opinion, yet indeed one who hath vſed detraction to our own nation. This man ſpeaking of Stratonice, how leauing her husband Demetrius, ſhee came into Syria, and how Seleucus would not marry her as ſhee hoped (who hauing an army at Babylon, warred againſt Antioch, and had taken the City) and that ſhe fled into Seleucia, whereas ſhe might haue made a ſpeedier eſcape by water, but that ſhe was forwarned in a ſleep ſo to doe, and that ſhee was there taken and died &c: Agatarchides, hauing vſed this preface, and inueighed againſt Stratonices ſuperſtition, vſeth an example of our nation on this manner; The people that are called Agatarchides his teſtimonie of the Iewes.
D Iewes inhabite a moſt ſtrong City, which they call Ieruſalem; theſe people are wont to reſt vpon the ſeauenth day, and doe neither beare armes, nor till their grounds, nor doe any other buſineſſe on that day, but their cuſtome is to remaine in their Temple, and there with ſtretched out armes continue in praier till night. And ſo vpon a time they perſeuering in that foolery, whil'ſt they ſhould haue defended their city, Ptolomæus Lagus entered it with many people and a great army: who greatly tyrannized ouer them; and ſo they found by experience, that the ſolemnity appointed by their law, was preiudicial vnto them: ſuch like Churches as this, did teach them & all nations elſe to flee vnto dreames, which their law teacheth; neuer conſidering that humane policy cannot preuaile againſt that which muſt neceſſarily happen. Agatarchides thought this which he reports of vs to be ridiculous: but they that waigh it with indifferency, ſhal perceiue, The Iewes Sabbath.
E that it is a great commendation to our nation, who rather ſuffer their countrey and our ſafety to be loſt and endamaged, then to violate the lawes of God.

I thinke, I am thus able to ſhew, that many Writers omitted to make mention of our nation, not for that they knew vs not, but for enuy. For Ierome, who writ a booke of ſucceſſion, in the ſame time that Hecatæus liued, who was a friend vnto King Antigonus, and being preſident of Syria, neuer mentioneth vs in all his Hiſtory; notwithſtanding, hee was brought vp almoſt in our country. But Hecatæus writ a book of vs; ſo different are the minds of men: for one of them thought our nation worthy to bee diligently recorded, the other through malice was hindered from ſpeaking the truth: yet the Hiſtories of the Chaldees, Egyptians and Phœnicians, may ſuffice to prooue our antiquity, together with the Grecke Writers: for beſides thoſe before men- Why certaine Writers omit to ſpeake of the Iewes.
F tioned, Theophraſtus alſo, Theodotus, Manaſeas, Ariphanes, Hermogenes, Euemeus, Conon, Zopyrion, and many others, no doubt (for I haue not peruſed all mens books) haue manifeſtly teſtified of vs. For many of the foreſaid men were blinded with errors, as not hauing read our holy ſcriptures, yet they all iointly teſtifie our antiquity, for which I now alleage them. Truly Demetrius Phalereus, Philon the elder, and Eupolemus, did not much erre from the truth, and therefore reaſon it is they ſhould bee borne withall: for they were not ſo skilfull as to ſearch our writings with ſo much curioſity. Beeing come thus farre, it reſteth that I now preſent one point more, G

The laſt part, againſt certaine detractions and ſlanders. where of I made mention in the beginning of this book: to wit, that I declare the detractions and ſlanderous reports of diuers, concerning our nation, to bee falſe and void of truth; and I will vſe the teſtimony of thoſe writers, who record, that the lying Hiſtoriographers, at ſuch time as they comitted to writing the foreſaid detractions, did alſo euen againſt themſelues regiſter ſuch like ſlanders as they did againſt vs. And I doubt not, but that all thoſe who are conuerſant in Hiſtories can teſtifie, that the like hath beene done by moſt writers for certaine priuate hatred, or ſuch like reſpects. For ſome of the Gentiles haue attempted to deface the honor and reputation of the moſt renowmed Cities, and to defame the manners of their inhabitants. Thus did Theopompus to Athens, and Polycrates to Lacedæmon; and the authour that writte Tripoliticum (for it was not Theopompus as ſome ſuppoſe) vſed the city of Thebes very hardly: and Timæus in his hiſtories of the foreſaid places, doth many times detract both them and others. And this they do, calumniating the moſt excellent that are, in ſomthing or other, ſome for enuy & malice, others, that their fond babbling may make them famous, and ſo indeed it doth among fooles, that are H
The cauſe of malice betweene the Egyptians and Iewes. knowne to haue no ſound iudgement, but wiſe men will condemne their malice. To be ſhort, this is the cauſe of ſo many ſlanderous reports forged againſt our nation: Some to gratifie the Egyptians haue attempted to depraue the truth, and ſo haue neither reported the verity concerning our anceſtours comming into Egypt, nor touching their departure from thence, and they haue had many cauſes of malice and enuy vrging them heereto. And chiefely for that our progenitors in their countrey wexed mighty, and ſo departing to their owne countrey, were made happy and fortunate. Secondly, the diuerſitie of our two religions made great diſcord and variance amongſt vs, our religion ſo farre excelling theirs in piety, as the diuine eſſence of GOD I
The Egyptian idolatry. excelleth vnreaſonable creatures: for they commonly worſhip ſuch brute beaſts for gods, and euery one worſhippeth diuers kindes: vaine and fooliſh men, who from the beginning haue bin accuſtomed to ſuch ſottiſh opinions, as would not permit them to imitate vs in our diuine religion, and conformable to reaſon: and yet ſeeing many fauour and follow our religion, they were heereby incited to ſuch hatred that to derogate from vs, they feared not to falſifie their own ancient records, not conſidering that in ſo doing, they were led through a blinde paſſion, to write againſt themſelues. Moreouer, I wil proue all I haue now ſpoken, to be true by one mans words, whom a litte before (beeing a famous Hiſtoriographer) wee haue produced as a witnes of our antiquity. K

Manethon an Egyptian Hiſtoriographer. Manethon therefore, who confeſſeth himſelfe to haue gathered the Egyptian Hiſtory out of their holy writings, hauing by way of a Preface recounted how our predeceſſors came into Egypt with many thouſands, and there conquered the inhabitants, he afterwards confeſſeth that loſing all their poſſeſſions in Egypt, they got that countrey which is now called Iewry, and in it builded a city named Ieruſalem, and a Temple; and thus farre hee imitateth ancient Writers. And then vſurping to himſelfe authority to lie, proteſting that hee will inſert into his Hiſtorie certaine reports diuulged amongſt the common people, he reports things of the Iewes altogether incredible, intending to mix with our nation the lepers of the Egyptians, and other ſicke people of other countries, who (as hee ſaith) being abhominable to the Egyptians, made an eſcape from thence; affirming alſo that they had a king named Amenophis, which is a fained name, L Manethons fabulous reports of the Egyptian lepers and therefore he durſt not preſume to ſpeak determinately of the time of his reigne: wheras he ſpeaketh exactly of the reigne of all other kings. Hereupon alſo he addes certain fables, forgetting himſelfe that he reported the ſhepheards departure out of Egypt to Ieruſalem, to haue bin almoſt fiue hundred and eighteen yeeres before his time: for king Themuſis reigned when they departed out of Egypt, from whom the time that other kings did reigne, vntil the two brethren, Sethos and Hermeus, accompliſheth the terme of three hundreth fourſcore and thirteene yeares. Hee alſo ſaieth, that the eldeſt of theſe two, Sethos, was called Egyptus, and the other Hermeus, was called Danaus, whom his brother Sethon expelled, and afterward raigned fifty nine yeares; and after him Rampſes, his eldeſt ſonne, raigned threeſcore and ſixe yeares. Hauing therefore confeſſed, our anceſtours to haue departed out of Egypt ſo many yeares before, now laſtly hee M addeth, that Amenophis was their king, who was a contemplator of the gods, as Orus their king before him was, and that one Amenophis a prieſt, the ſonne of Papius, did in all things moſt excellently accompliſh his deſire: which prieſt ſeemed to participate of ſome diuine nature, for he exceld in wiſdome, and could foretell things to come, and that he gaue the king his ſurname, that he might alſo ſee the gods, if ſo be he would endeuour to cleanſe the country from lepers,

and

A and other vncleane people. Whereat the king reioycing, gatherd together all the impotent people of his land, amounting to the number of 80000, and ſent them, and other Egyptians appointed to this work, into the Eaſt part of Nilus, there to hewe and ſquare ſtones. And that amongſt them there were alſo certaine learned prieſts infected with leproſie; alſo that this diuine prieſt, Amenophis, greatly feared, leſt the indignation of the gods would fall vpon the king and himſelfe (who had perſwaded and counſelled the king to do violence to the foreſaid lepers) likewiſe that he ſaid, that becauſe hee vſed the help of vncleane perſons, they ſhould obtaine dominion ouer Egypt for 13. yeares; yet durſt he not preſume to ſignifie this to the king, but hee kild himſelfe, leauing this written in a book, where men might finde it: and the king, hauing notice hereof, fell into great ſorrow and heauineſſe. This done, he ſpeaks as followeth: So the king, beeing requeB ſted for their quietnes and defence to aſſigne them a city to inhabite, appointed vnto them a deſolate place called Auaris, which had beene the ſhepheards city (this city the ancient Diuines call Triphonis) but they, hauing got the poſſeſſion of this place fit for rebellion, made choice of one of the prieſts of Heliopolis to be their captain, whoſe name was Oſarſiphus, and bound themſelues with an oath to obey him in all things: and he preſently made a law that they ſhould neither worſhip the gods of the Egyptians, nor that they ſhould abſtaine from thoſe beaſts which the Egyptians count holy, and that they ſhould marry with none but ſuch as they iudged to bee their friends. Oſarſiphus, captaine of Auaris.

Hauing ordained this and many things elſe contrary to the Egyptians religion, he cõmanded them with great labour to enuiron their city with a wall, and to make preparation to warre aC gainſt king Amenophis: and he himſelfe making choice of ſome prieſts, and a few other vncleane perſons, ſent to Ieruſalem to the ſhepheards which were driuen out of Egypt by king Themuſis, declaring vnto them their owne and their fellowes iniuries, and requeſted them to leuie an army to fight with them againſt Egypt, promiſing them free entrance into Auaris, the countrey where their forefathers inhabited, and that hee would furniſh them with all neceſſaries; telling them that they ſhould now fight in ſo happy a time, as that without all doubt they might conquer the country. The ſhepheards hereat reioycing, all of them armed themſelues, to the number of two hundreth thouſand, and leauing their city, they came to Auaris. But Amenophis, king of Egypt, hearing of their inuaſion, and remembring what Amenophis, the ſonne of the prieſt Papius, had left in writing, was in great fear; and preſently aſſembling together the people of Egypt, The war of the baniſhed againſt the Egyptians.

D & conſulting with the princes of his country, he ſent all holy beaſts, and al that the prieſts eſteemed, before him, giuing the prieſts eſpeciall charge to hide their idols: and he commended his ſonne Sethones (who alſo by his father Rampſes was called Rhameſſes) being but fiue yeares ould, vnto the cuſtody of a friend of his: and then accompanied with three hundred fighting men, he mette his enemies; but would not fight with them, fearing leſt hee ſhould fight againſt the pleaſure of the gods; and ſo he retired himſelfe to Memphis: and taking Apis & the reſt of the Egyptian gods, he, with all his troups of Egyptians, tooke ſhippe, and fledde into Ethiopia. For the king of Ethiopia vpon curteſie obeied him, and for this cauſe he entertained him and his followers, and prouided all neceſſaries for them, for that fatal thirteen yeares baniſhment, and this was done in Ethiopia. In the meane time, the inhabitants of Ieruſalem came down into the country The Egyptian king fled into Ethiopia, and was by the Ethiopian king curteouſly entertained.

E with the vncleane Egyptians, and did ſo tyrannize ouer the inhabitants, that all their beholders iudged their victory to be ful of cruelty: for not content to fire the cities & townes, and to commit all manner of ſacriledge, and to deſtroy the Idols of the gods, they did alſo moſt cruelly teare in peeces the ſacred Beaſts, and forced the Prieſts and Prophets to lay violent hands vpon them, and kill them: after which deed they draue them out of the country naked. It is therfore reported, that a Heliopolitan Prieſt, Oſarſiphus by name, made lawes for them, and ſtatutes to gouerne them. This Prieſt was called Oſarſiphus, taking his name from the god of Heliopolis, called Oſiris, who, being now thus conuerſant with this people, changed his name, and called himſelfe Moſes. Oſarſiphus was afterwards cald Moſes.

Thus the Egyptians report of the Iewes, and many things elſe, which for breuity ſake I omit.

F Manethon furthermore writeth, that afterward Amenophis the king came with a great power out of Ethiopia, and his ſon Rampſes with him accompanied with a great army; & that ioyning battell with the ſhepheards and polluted perſons, he gaue them an ouerthrow, and purſued them vnto the borders of Syria. And this is Manethons report: but for as much as hee writeth old wiues tales, dotages and lies, I will by manifeſt reaſon conuince him; firſt, diſtinguiſhing that wherof I am to ſpeak heereafter. Hee of his owne accord granteth and confeſſeth, that our anceſtors at Manethons lies are confuted.

first were not Egyptians, but ſtrangers that came thither from another place, and conquered the G Country, and again departed from thence. I wil now out of his owne writings endeuor to ſhew, that the weak people of Egypt were not mixed with vs, and that Moſes, who indeed was our conductor out of Egypt, and liued many ages before, was no leper. He therefore firſt of all ſetteth downe a ridiculous cauſe of this fore-mentioned faction, which was, that king Amenophis was deſirous to ſee the gods. Which gods trow yee? hee could already ſee the Oxe, the Goat, the Crocodile and the Munky, but the God of heauen how could he ſee? And why had Amenophis this deſire? Forſooth, becauſe a certain king one of his predeceſſors had ſeen them; he therfore knowing by him what things they were, and how he came to the ſight of them, needed no new deuice to accompliſh his deſire: but perhaps the foreſaid prophet was a man of great wiſdom, by whom the king had confidence to attain his deſire: but if ſo he had bin, how chanceth it that H hee was ſo vnwiſe he could not perceiue, that it was an impoſſible thing to ſatisfie the kings de-ſire? for that which he promiſed was not brought to paſſe. Or what reaſon moued him to think that the gods were inuiſible, becauſe of lepers and weake people? The gods are offended with mens impieties, not with the defects of their bodies. And how was it poſſible that at one inſtant ſo many thouſand lepers and infirme perſons ſhould be gathered together? or wherein did not the king obey the Prophet? He commanded that the lepers and infirme perſons ſhould bee exiled the country, and the king did not baniſh them the country, but ſent them to hewe ſtones, as though he had needed workmen, and not purpoſed to cleanſe the country from lepers. Laſtly, he ſaith, that the Prophet foreſeeing that Egypt was to ſuffer, and fearing the wrath of the gods, killed himſelfe, and left his minde in a booke written vnto the king. How chanced it then that I the Prophet did not at firſt foreſee his owne death, and ſo oppoſe himſelfe to the kings deſire to ſee the gods? or wherefore did hee feare ſuch calamities as were not to fall in his life? or what great miſery hanged ouer his head, which might worthily cauſe him to kill himſelfe to preuent it? But let vs heare that which followeth, more ſottiſh then all the reſt.

Manethons words repeated.

The king (quoth he) hearing this, and ſtricken with feare, did not for all this expell thoſe lepers he ought to haue exiled, but at their requeſt gaue them (as he ſaith) a City, wherein before time the Shepheards did inhabit, called Auaris; whereinto they being come, they made a prieſt of Heliopolis their Prince, who deuiſed lawes for them: commanding them neither to adore
the gods, nor to abſtaine from offering violence to ſuch beaſts as amongſt the Egyptians are ſa-cred, but that they ſhould kill and ſpoile all things, that they ſhould mary with none but ſuch as K were their confederates, that he bound the people with an oath to keep thoſe lawes, & that they fortified Auaris to fight againſt the king. Adding moreouer, that he ſent to Ieruſalem for help, promiſing to yeeld Auaris vnto them, being a place ſometime poſſeſſed by their anceſtours, and that they from that place leading their forces, might eaſily ſubdue all Egypt: he then ſaith, that the Egyptian king, Amenophis, came againſt them with 300000, and yet for that hee would not ſtriue againſt the decree of the gods, he fled into Ethiopia, and carried with him Apis and other holy beaſts, and that the inhabitants of Ieruſalem comming downe, inuaded the land, fired the townes and cities, ſlew their nobles, vſed all ſorts of cruelty poſſible, and that the Prieſts name, who made lawes and ſtatutes for them to liue vnder, was one of Heliopolis, Oſarſiphus by name;
deriuing the ſame from Oſiris, the god of Heliopolis: and that this man, changing his name, was L afterward called Moſes.

Moreouer, that Amenophis, hauing liued in baniſhment thirty yeares, came with a ſtrong power out of Ethiopia; and fighting with the ſhepheards and polluted, he ſlew many of them, and put the reſt to flight, purſuing them vnto the borders of Syria. Manethon remembreth not, that heere againe he telleth a very vnskilful tale: for although the lepers and impotent perſons were offended with the king, for appointing them to hewe ſtones; yet is it to be thought, that they re-ceiuing their owne deſire at the kings hands, to wit, a City to dwell in, that now they againe became the kings well-willers. Suppoſing alſo their hatred ſtil continued towards him, they rather ſhould haue attempted reuenge by treaſon againſt him, then towards all their nation, wherein they had many deere friends and alliance. And although they had purpoſed to war againſt theſe M men, yet would they not haue been ſo impious as to haue rebelled againſt the gods, and to haue violated the lawes wherein they were brought vp.

A confutation of Manethons words alleaged.

We haue therefore cauſe to thank Manethon, in that hee cleareth vs, and affirmeth his owne countrimen (yea a prieſt) to be authors of this impiety, & that by oath they bound themſelues ſo to doe. But is it not againſt all reaſon, that neither any of their countrimen nor kinſmen rebelled

led with them, but that the poore diſtreſſed people were glad to ſend to Ieruſalem for ſuccour? But what ſociety of friendſhip had they with the people of Ieruſalem, of whō they came to demand help? Why? they were more their enemies then the reſt of their countrimen, and were all of quite different manners from vs. They of Ieruſalem (as he ſaith) preſently did as they were willed to doe, in hope that, according as they were promiſed, they might ſubdue Egypt. Were they ignorant of that countrey out of which they had beene driuen by force? Had they liued in pouerty or miſery, perhaps they might haue been induced to haue done it: but ſeeing they inhabited a fortunate and rich city, and poſſeſſed a goodly fertile ſoile farre better then Egypt, what might moue them thereto? What reaſon had they, at the requeſt of their ancient enemies (and they alſo ſo diſeaſed, as they of Ieruſalem could not abide their owne friends among them that had the like diſeaſes) to thruſt themſelues into danger? they could not fore-know the kings intent to flee; for as Manethon himſelfe ſaith, he met them at Peluſia with 300000. men. And this they that went to war well knew. But what reaſon had they to coniecture that the kings minde would change, and he flee? Then he ſaith, the army of Ieruſalem getting the granaries of Egypt into their hands, did much harme: and this he vpbraideth them withall, as who ſhould ſay, they were not requeſted to come as enemies? or as though theſe matters bee to bee caſt in ſouldiers teeths, that are ſtrangers and ſent for from out of another country; when as the Egyptians themſelues before their comming had done the like, and bound themſelues with an oath to performe the ſame. But ſhort time after, Amenophis fought with his enemies, and got the victory of them, and put them to flight, and purſued them vnto the borders of Syria. As though that Egypt were a country ſo eaſily to be won by any man, that at any place or part thereof inuadeth it? and that the ſouldiers of Ieruſalem, hauing now by the lawes of armes poſſeſſed that, and knowing Amenophis to be yet aliue, would not haue fortified that part of the country, whereby hee might haue inuaded them, hauing all opportunity to doe it? or at leaſt they would haue gotten more helpe from one place or another. Amenophis, as he ſaith, purſued them euen vnto Syria, through the ſandy and dry places: as though it were eaſie for an army that had nothing elſe to do, but to march on forward, to paſſe leaſurely through them. To conclude therefore, our nation neither came of the Egyptians, as Manethon confeſſeth, neither was it mingled with the diſeaſed of that country: for it is probable, that many of thoſe ſick people periſhed in the ſtone workes, many in the great fight and battell, and the reſt of them in the flight. It now remaineth that I refute that which he ſpeaks of Moſes.

The Epilogue that the Iewes came not of the Egyptians.

The Egyptians do all agree that this man was a diuine perſon, and one to be admired, but they commit great impiety in labouring to chalenge him for their countriman, ſaying that hee was a Prieſt of Heliopolis, baniſhed with the reſt for leproſie. For he is recorded to haue liued fiue hundreth and eighteene yeeres before this time, and to haue guided our anceſtors out of Egypt, into that country wherein we now inhabite; and his owne words teſtifie his body to haue been cleane from that diſeaſe of leproſie: for hee commandeth all lepers to bee expelled out of the townes and villages, and to liue apart by themſelues, alſo to bee clothed in ſome torne garment, and that whoſoeuer toucheth them, or cometh vnder thē ſame roofe with them, is to be accounted an vncleane perſon. And if ſo bee a leper happen to bee cured of that diſeaſe, he appointed certaine purifications, cleanſings, and bathes of fortunate waters, and all his haire ſhould be ſhaued off; and that then after many and ſundry ſacrifices, he ſhould be admitted into the holy city. But contrariwiſe, had he been vrged with that misfortune and calamity himſelfe, hee would ſurely haue been more prouident, and more mercifull to ſuch as ſhould haue been afflicted with that diſeaſe.

An anſwer to Manethons ſlanders touching Moſes.

Moſes was not a leper.

Hee did not onely make theſe ſeuere lawes againſt lepers, but he alſo interdicted all that wanted any ioint or parcell of the body, from being prieſts, or exerciſing any office at the Altar: yea hee alſo appointed, that if any prieſt ſhould haue any of theſe defects betide him after he was a prieſt, that then he ſhould be depriued of the dignity. How can it then be probable, that to his owne preiudice and diſcredit he would haue enacted ſuch lawes? Alſo the changing of his name is incredible: for he was called (as he ſaith) Oſarſiph, which nothing agreeth with the tranſmutation of his name, but his true name betokeneth that Moſes was ſaued from the water. For, Moy in the Egyptian tongue ſignifieth Water. But I haue now ſufficiently, as I think, declar'd how Manethon, whil'ſt he followed the ancient writers, did not much erre, but when hee fell to old wiues tales, he then either abſurdly fained them of his own head, or elſe for hatred he bare to our nation, beliued them. I now think it not amiſſe to examine a little the words of Chæremon, who profeſſing

Moſes took his name of Moy, which in the Egyptian tongue ſignifieth water.

Against Chæremon the historiographer.

fessing himselfe to write the Egyptian history, maketh mention of the same king Amenophis his G sonne Rhamesses, as Manethon doth, and he reporteth that Isis appeared to Amenophis in his sleepe, checking him for that her temple was destroied, and that Phiritiphantes, a holy Scribe, told the king, that if he would expel all polluted and vnclean persons out of Egypt, that then hee should not be any more terrified with these night visions. Moreouer, that hereupon making search for all sick and diseased persons, he banisht them out of his land, to the number of 250000, and that their captaines were called Moses and Ioseph, holy Scribes, also that these Egyptian names were so, that Moses was named Tisithes; and Ioseph, Peteseph, aud that they came to Pelusium, where they found 380000. left there by Amenophis, whom he would not permit to come into Egypt, also that they all entring into a league together suddenly inuaded Egypt, and Amenophis not abiding the brunt fled into Ethiopia, leauing his wife great with childe, who hiding her selfe in H

caues and dens did bring forth a childe whom they cald Messenes, who afterward draue the Iews into Syria, being in number 200000. and this done he recalled his father Amenophis out of Ethiopia. And thus Chæremon saith.

But I imagine, that which I haue already said, to bee sufficient to declare the vanity of both these Writers. For if that which they report were true, it were vnpossible that they should so much differ: but they labor to deuise lies, and write not any thing agreeable to other mens writtings. For Manethon faineth, that the cause of the banishment of the lepers was the kings desire to see the gods. And Chæremon saith, that it was for that Isis after appeared vnto him in his sleepe.

Manethon also saith, that Amenophis gaue the king that counsell so to cleanse the countrey; and Chæremon saith, that hee that counselled the king was called Phiriphantes: the number also of le- I pers hath very good consonance I warrant you. Manethon saith, they were almost fourscore hun-dreth. Chæremon saith, two hundreth and fifty thousand. Moreouer, Manethon writeth how that these lepers were first sent to a place to hewe stones, and afterward came to Auaris to dwell, and that they hauing already begun wars in Egypt, that then they sent for help from Ierusalem. And Chæremon saith, that they hauing left Egypt, found at Pelusia two hundreth and fourescore thousand men, whom Amenophis had kept there; with whom they ioyning againe, returned and inuaded Egypt, and then Amenophis fled into Ethiopia: and which is worth the noting, hee setteth not downe what countrimen, or to what purpose this great army was, whether Egyptians or strangers, neither doth hee shew any reason why the king would not carry them into Egypt.
Moreouer, Chæremon faineth a dreame of the lepers and Isis, and reporteth that Ioseph together K with Moses was expelled, whereas Ioseph liued foure ages before Moses, euery age containing at least a hundreth and seuenty yeares. Rhamesses also, Amenophis son, according to Manethons history, being a young man fled into Ethiopia, and was banished with his father, and afterwards assisted him in the wars: whereas Chæremon reporteth that hee was borne in a caue after his fathers departure, and that hee getting the victory did driue the Iewes into Syria, who were in number two thousand. O felicity in lying! for he neither told what nation those three hundred and fourescore thousand were, nor yet how a hundreth and fourescore thousand of them perished, neither were they slaine in the fight, or fled vnto Rhamesses: and which is most to bee admired, one cannot gather out of his words whom hee calleth Iewes, or whether hee attribute this name vnto the 250000. lepers, or vnto the three hundreth and fourscore thousand which were L at Pelusium.

But it is folly to oppose my selfe against them who haue sufficiently contradicted themselues:
for had other men controlled their writings, they had been the more to be borne withall. I will Lysimachus is reproued for lying.

adde Lysimachus vnto the two former, who hath the same lie that they haue, yet farre more absurd a fiction then theirs. For he saith, that at such time as Bocchoris raigned in Egypt, the people of the Iews being scabbed and infected with leprosie, fled into the temples to beg maintenance, and that so many men were with this disease infected, that a dearth and scarcity did fall vpon E-

out of the temples into the desert, that then the famine would cease, and that he should drowne M these lepers, as if the sunne disdained that they should liue, and that then hee should purifie the temples, and so the earth would againe yeeld fruit: also that Bocchoris hauing this answere from the Oracle, hee called together the Priests and sacrificers, and hauing gathered lepers and vncleane people together, hee deliuered them tõ souldiers to bee conducted into the desert, and that then they should bee lapt in lead, and cast into the sea. Moreouer, they beeing

A drowned, other diſeaſed people there gathered together, & were carried into the wilderneſſe to be deſtroyed: and that they taking counſell one of another what to doe, the night following they made great fires and lights, wherwith they terrified & draue away the ſouldiers that kept them, and that they faſted the day following, requeſting God to bee mercifull vnto them, and that the next day, one Moſes counſelled them to goe all one way, as thicke together as they could, till ſuch time as they came to ſome place inhabited, and that he then commanded them neuer hereafter to bee friendly to any man, but alwayes rather to giue bad counſell then good, and to deſtroy all Temples, and Altars of the gods they came by: vnto which counſell they all agreeing, iournyed together through the wilderneſſe, and after much ſorow came to places inhabited; vſing men by whom they paſt iniuriouſly, firing Temples and robbing them: at laſt in this manner,

B they came vnto that place which they now call Iudæa; and there building a Citie, they began to dwell, and of this fact called the Citie Hieroſyla, and ſhortly after growing more potent, they for auoyding ſhame, chaunged the name thereof, and called it Ieruſalem, and themſelues the inhabitants of Ieruſalem.

When the Iewes got Iudæa and built Ieruſalem.

This fellow found not that king, whiche the two former ſpeak of, but hee ioyned a more new name, and leauing the dreame and the Prophet, hee goeth to Ammon, to know an anſwer of the old, touching the ſcabbed and lepers: for he ſaith, that a multitude was gathered together at the Temples: but he leaueth it vncertain, whether the Iewes onely were infected with this diſeaſe: for he ſaith the people of the Iews: which people, whether they were ſtrangers or ſuch as were borne in that Countrie, why doſt thou cal them Iews, when they were Ægyptians? If they were

Lyſinius his opinion confuted.

C ſtrangers, why doſt thou not tell of whence they were? Or how came it to paſſe that the king hauing drowned ſo many of them in the Sea, and left the reſt in the wilderneſſe, that ſtill ſo manie ſhould bee left? Or how did they paſſe the wilderneſſe, and get the Countrey we now inhabite, and buil a Citie and a Temple famous through all parts of the world? Thou ſhouldeſt not onely haue told the name of our law maker, but alſo what Countriman he was, & of what parents, and what moued him in his iournie to make ſuch lawes againſt the gods, and againſt men. For if they were Aegyptians, they would not ſo eaſily haue forgotten the religion wherin they were brought vp: or of what place elſe ſo euer they were, they had ſom laws or other, which they had been accuſtomed to keepe. If they had vowed to haue borne no good-will vnto them by whom they were driuen out of their Countrie, they had had ſome iuſt occaſion ſo to doe. But to vnder-

Who moſt impudently affirmeth, that their Citie tooke the name of Church ſpoyling, and afterward changed it. For what cauſe forſooth did they chainge the name thereof? marrie for that the former name was ignominious to their poſteritie. But the Gentleman vnderſtood not, that Ieruſalem ſignifieth otherwiſe in our language, then it doth in the Greeke. And therefore what ſhould I ſtand to inueigh againſt a lie ſo impudently told?

Nothing is to be ſaid againſt an impudent lie.

But my book hath now beene long enough, making a new beginning: and therefore I will endeuour to finiſh the reſidue of this worke.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE ANTIQVITY OF THE IEWES, WRITTEN BY FLAVIVS IOSEPHVS AGAINST APION OF ALEXANDRIA, AND DEDICATED TO EPAPHRODITVS.

THrice Honoured and beloued Epaphroditus, I haue in my former bookes so farre forth as I was warranted by truth, both protested and approued the Antiquitie of our nation, out of the writings of the Phœnicians, Chaldees and Egyptians: and for the further confirmation thereof, I haue produced the testimonie of diuers Greek Authors. Furthermore, I haue opposed my selfe against Manethon and Cheremon, and diuers others. At this time likewise I will vndertake to contradict all the rest of those writers, that haue published anie thing against vs; for in I respect of Apion, who pretendeth himselfe to be learned, I growe halfe suspicious, whether it bee a matter answerable to my discretion and iudgement, to vouchsafe him any replie at all. For as touching the one part of that which he hath written, it seemeth to bee one and the same, with that which the rest haue written: and as touching the other, it is very cold and barren. The greater part thereof is farsed with follies and detractions, and betrayeth his ignorance, approuing him to bee a man both loose in condition, and turbulent in his life. And for as much as diuers men are so disfurnished of iudgement, that they rather suffer themselues to bee wonne by these follies, then to bee wearied and wrought by that which is written with better consideration, vainely doating on detractions, and growing discontent to giue eare to other mens well deserued prayses; I haue thought it necessarie to examine such a mans labours, the rather, for K that he hath written against vs, as if he intended to accuse vs before a Tribunall, & conuict vs by a publike triall. For I see that it is an ordinarie course for the most part of men, to hug and take heartie pleasure, when as hee that beginneth to blame an other man, is himselfe conuicted and found guilty of those defaults, which he imputeth and obiecteth against another.

Apion wrote something verie coldly.

Truely it is no easie matter to lay open the ambiguous and doubtfull speeches which Apion vseth, neither to vnderstand perfectly what he intendeth to expresse. But like a man that is grieuously distracted and confused in his foolish lying, he groweth almost to that point, to recapitulate that, which hath bin heretofore set out, & searcht for, as touching the departure of our forefathers out of Aegypt: and afterwards he falleth to accuse the Iewes that inhabited Alexandria: and thirdly, he intermixeth his blameful blasphemies, against the ceremonies accustomed in our temple, and depraueth our lawes and ordinances likewise. Now, that our predecessors haue not L taken their originall out of Aegypt, neither haue beene driuen from thence for any infirmitie or deformitie of their bodies, or for any wound, vlcer, or pollution; I suppose that I haue not onely sufficiently approued the same, but also produced far more then was requisite. I will therefore briefly report and repeat that which Apion alleageth: For in the third booke of his Egyptian historie, he writ thus. Moses, as I haue heard it from most auncient Egyptians, was borne at Heliopolis, who being instructed in the fashions of his Countrie, conuerted such prayers which were wont to be said in open places and abroad, and caused them to be practised & accustomed, in priuate Cloysters such as were within the Citie, and ordained that in praying they should turne themselues towardes the rising Sunne. For such is the situation of the Citie Heliopolis, M and instead of Obeliſques or Pyramides, he erected certaine pillers, vnder which there were certain ingrauen Basons, on which the shadow happing to fall (the place wherein they stood being discouered and in open ayre) they obserued the same course that the Sunne doth in the firmament. See here what eloquence this learned man vsed.

Apion cõcerning Moses and the Iewes.

Now, this lie of his needeth no words to refute it, seeing it is clearely refelled by the effects. For when Moses first built that tabernacle in honour of God, hee had no such intent, nor fashi-

A nor fashioned any such forme, neither ordained his successors to do the like: and after this, when as Salomon builded the temple in Ierusalem, he neuer thought of any such curiosity as Apion forgeth. He saith that he hath been informed by those of antiquity, that Moses was a Heliopolitan, for you must vnderstand that Apion himselfe was young, and beleeued the relation of the aged sort of his acquaintance which conuersed familiarly with him: yet cannot this learned Grammarian iustifie where Homer was borne, neither from what countrey Pythagoras came, although in respect, they liued but yesterday: and as touching Moses who liued so many ages, and so great a number of yeares before them, hee decideth the matter so easily, and giueth credite to the reports of antiq itie so slightly, that it appeareth most manifestly that he is but a lyer. As touching the time wherein he saith that Moses led away the blind, leprous, and lame: this diligent author
B accordeth very willingly with that which hee himselfe hath said. For Manethon saith, that the Iewes departed out of Egypt about the raigne of Tethmosis, three hundreth ninty six yeares before Danaus fled out of Greece. Lysimachus, he saith, that this thing hapned during king Bocchoris time, that is to say, one thousand and seuen hundreth yeares before that time; Molon also & some others haue alledged their opinions. But Apion, who pretendeth to bee a man of more credite then the rest, hath precisely and exactly set downe the time, auerring that our departure was about the seuenty Olympiade: nay more, in the first yeare thereof, wherein as he saith Carthage was builded by the Phœnicians. Now hath he only and purposely made mention of Carthage in this place; supposing it to be an infallible argument of the truth of his allegation: yet conceiteth he not that he maketh a rodde for his owne taile, and draweth an argument against himselfe
C by which himselfe may bee conuinced. For if wee may giue credit to the Phœnician Chroniclers as touching this Colonie, it appeareth by them that king Hiram liued more then one hundreth and fifty yeares before the foundation of Carthage. The truth whereof I haue heretofore approued out of the words of the Phœnicians, who report that Hiram was Salomons friend, who builded the Temple in Ierusalem: and that he furnished him with much timber and other matter toward the finishing of that building. Now Salomon builded the Temple six hundreth and twelue yeares after the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt. And after he had inconsideratly reckoned the number of those which were driuen out of Egypt in like manner as Lysimachus had done, namely of one hundreth and ten thousand men, he yeelded a most admirable reason, and such as may be easily beleeued: from whence he pretendeth that the name of Sabbath was
D deriued. For (saith he) after they had trauailed for the space of six daies, there grew certaine inflamations in their groines, by reason whereof they rested on the seuenth day being safely arriued in the country which at this day is called Iudæa, because the Egyptians call Sabatosis an Vlcer that groweth about the groine.

Apions fiction concerning the temple, & Moses is refuted.

The computation of the time is different among the Historiographers.

The friendship between Hiram and Salomon, whereof we made mention in the first booke against Apion in the beginning.

The Egyptians doe call a disease about the priuy parts, Sabatosis.

Who can otherwise chuse but laugh at this foppery? or contrariwise, who would not hate such an impudent custome in writing and coyning of lies? For hee reporteth as farre as a man may coniecture by his writings, that all the Iewes who were to the number of one hundred and tenne thousand persons, had these Vlcers in their secrets. Now had all of them beene haulte, lame, blinde, and sickely as Apion reporteth, they could not haue iournied one day: but since they trauailed through the desart, and vanquished all armies that resisted them, it is no
E likely matter that all of them were sicke of a disease in their priuie parts euery seuenth day: neither is it naturally possible, that such a disease should befall so many thousand men in their iourney, and that they euery day should trauaile a certaine space and a limitted march, neither standeth it with any probability, but rather a manifest absurditie that any such thing should befall them: but this admirable Apion sayeth, that they arriued in Iudæa within the space of sixe daies.

Againe, hee writeth that Moses ascending vp the mount Sinai, which is betwixt Arabia and Egypt, hid himselfe in that place for the space of forty daies, and descending from thence, gaue lawes vnto the Iewes. But how I pray you was it possible for him to remaine fortie daies in a desart without water? or how could all the Iewes within six daies trauel from Egypt, into Iew-
F rie? As for his Grammaticall deriuation of the word Sabbath it sauoureth too much of impudencie, or at least of ignorance: for these words Sabbo and Sabatum do greatly differ: for Sabatum in the Iewes language, signifieth rest from worke; but Sabbo in the Egyptian tongue betokeneth a disease about the priuie parts as Apion saith. See heere what cauilling fictions this Egyptian Apion vseth concerning Moses, and our departure out of Egypt; wherein hee counterfeiteth and coineth absurdities vnthought of by any others. Shall we then wonder if he belie-

our forefathers, who maketh no bones to belie himselfe: for being borne at Oasis a towne in Ægypt, this high vnreputed honour of the Egyptians forsweareth both his countrey and nation, and counterfeiting himselfe to be an Alexandrian, he ratifieth his nations wickednesse. No maruell then though he tearme them Ægyptians whom he hateth and raileth against, for if hee had not been perswaded that the Ægyptians were wicked base people, he would neuer haue denied himselfe to be their countriman: for such as proudly boast of their famous countrey, esteeme it a credit to beare the denomination therof, and reprehend such as without iust cause make themselues of their nation. Wherefore the Ægyptians are one of these two waies affected towards vs Iewes, for either they claime vs to bee their countrimen as glorying of vs and their countrey; or else for that, they and their countrey being infamous, they desire that we should be partakers of their ignominy. But indeed this worthy Apion seemeth so to inueigh against vs, as thereby rewarding the Alexandrians for bestowing their Cities vpon him: and knowing them to be at variance with the Iewes of Alexandria, hee as it were casteth a bone between them, and raileth not onely on the Iewes of that Citie, but on all whersoeuer: but he belyeth both of them most impudently. But let vs examine those hainous and enormous matters, and (as hee saith) such as are not to be suffered, of which he accuseth the Alexandrian Iewes. Comming (quoth he) out of Syria, they seated themselues neere the sea coast, where there was no hauen neere vnto the surges of the water.

Apion raileth against the Iewes, as thereby rewarding the Alexandrians.

The sea coast of Alexandria.

Now if this place which they inhabited were ignominious, yet it followeth not that the Iews owne country was so also: yea herein Apion raileth against Alexandria, which hee maketh his owne country: for the sea coast is part of Alexandria, and as all men iudge the best place therof to dwell in. Now if the Iewes by force of armes so vanquished this place that they could neuer since be driuen out of it: it is no discredit to them, but rather an argument of their valour. But Alexander gaue them that place to inhabit, and the Macedonians did allot them as great priuiledges as the Alexandrians had. I know not what Apion would haue said, if the Iewes had dwelt about Necropolis, and not about the kings seat: their tribes being euen at this time called Macedonians. If therefore Apion haue read the Epistles of king Alexander, and Ptolomæus Lagus, or others their successors kings of Egypt, or seen the pillars that are erected in Alexandria, containng the priuileges that Cæsar the great granted vnto the Iewes; if I say hee knew of these, and yet did presume to write the contrarie, then hee was a bad fellow: but if hee was ignorant hereof, he was then an vnlearned person. The like ignorance also discouereth he, where he wonders that the Iewes that were in Alexandria were called Alexandrians. For all that are one Colonie, though very different people, yet do they all beare the name of their founder: and that I may shun prolixity, the Iewes of Antioch are called Antiochians; for Seleucus the founder made them also citizens, the like may also be said of the Iewes of Ephesus, and at the other Ionia, who by the kings gifts enioy the same priuiledges with the rest of the citizens. The Romans also of their clemencie haue granted the name of their nation which is no small gift, not only to priuate persons, but to great nations in generall. To be short, the ancient Spaniards, the Tyrrhenes, and Sabines, are called Romans; or if Apion will take away this denomination of the Citie wherein men inhabite, let him cease to call himselfe an Alexandrian: for he being borne in the heart of Ægypt, can in no wise be an Alexandrian, if the priuiledge of the Citie be taken from him, as he would haue it from vs. And the Lords of the whole world the Romans, haue amongst all other nations onely prohibited the Egyptians from hauing the priuiledges of any Citie: and so this gallant gentleman being himself incapable of dignitie, endeuoreth likewise to hinder them from it, who haue true right vnto it.

The liberties & priuiledges granted vnto the Iewes.

Alexander.

For Alexander labouring with all diligence to build that Citie, did not make choice of vs for want of people to furnish the same withall; but for that he bestowed the liberty thereof vpon vs as a reward and testimony of our vertue and fidelity, endeuouring indeed to honour and credit our nation thereby: for Hecataus reporteth that Alexander for the Iewes good seruice and fidelitie, bestowed vpon them the countrey of Samaria, and freed them from paying tribute for it.

1. Ptolomæus Lagus.

The same good affection towards the Iewes of Alexandria, Ptolomæus Lagus continued after him, for he deliuered into their hands the strong holds of Egypt (for that he iudged that their valour and fidelity would keep them) and intending to make himselfe Lord of Cyren and other places in Lybia, hee sent certaine Iewes to inhabit the same. After him Ptolomæus Philadelphus did not onely release and set free all captiues of our nation in his countrey, but also did many times remit their paiments of money, and (which was the principal point of all) he desired to be instructed

2. Ptolomæus Philadelphus.

A instructed in our lawes & holy scriptures, & for this cause sent vnto vs, requesting that we would send him some learned men to interpret them vnto him: and that this might be performed with more diligence, he committed the care hereof not to any but Demetrius Phalerius, Andreas and Aristeus, Demetrius being the onely mirror of learning in his age, the other two being Esquires of his owne bodie: neither would he haue euer desired to haue beene instructed in our lawes & customes, if he had despised vs and had not rather admired vs. But Apion knew that almost all the Macedonian kings his successors in order, did peculiarly affect our nation. For Ptolomæus the third which was also called Euergetes, conquering Syria by force, did no sacrifice vnto the gods of Aegypt for his victorie, but came to Ierusalem, and there after our manner sacrificed many hostes vnto our God, & to him dedicated gifts worthy of such a victory. Ptolomæus also surnamed B Philometor and his wife Cleopatra, committed the rule of his whole kingdome vnto the Iewes, and Onias and Dositheus both Iewes, were generals of his army, whose credit Apion detracts: whereas he rather ought to haue admired them, & haue thanked them for deliuering Alexandria wherof he maketh himselfe a citizen.

The seuentie interpreters.

3. Ptolomæus Euergetes.

For when there was a rebellion in Cleopatras kingdome, and all was in perill to bee destroyed, these two men deliuered Alexandria from ciuill warre: But Apion saith that after this, Onias came and brought a little armie into the citie, at such time as Termus, the Romane Embassadour was there present. True it is, and that fact of his was most iust. For Ptolomæus Physcon after the death of his father Ptolomæus Philometor, comming out of Cyrene, endeuoured to expell the Queene Cleopatra, and the kings sons, to the ende that he (contrarie to all iustice) might possesse the king- C dome: and this was the cause why Onias tooke armes against him in Cleopatras behalfe, not forsaking his fidelitie vnto kings in the time of necessitie: yet God himselfe did manifestly witnesse his iustice in this action. For when Ptolomæus Physcon presumed to fight against Onias his armie, & took all the Iewes, their wiues & children that were in the Citie and bound them, and stripping them naked, cast them before Elephants to bee destroyed (and to the intent that the Elephants might the rather tread vpon them, made the said beasts drunken) all things fel out contarie to his expectation: for the Elephants forsaking the Iews which were cast before them, did fal vpō Ptolomæus his friends that stood by, & slew manie of them; which done, there appeared vnto Ptolomæus a most horrible vision forbidding him to harme the Iewes: and his chiefest best beloued concubin (alsowhom som call Ithaca, other Herene) came vnto him and besought him to abstaine D from such impiety: wherupon he being sorie, did penance for that he had alreadie committed, & that which he thought to committe; so that the Iewes of Alexandria celebrate this day in remembrance that vpon it God did manifestly deliuer them; yet Apion (who speaketh well of no man) accuseth the Iewes of impietie for bearing armes against Physcon, wheras indeed he ought rather to haue commended them for it: But Apion extolleth Cleopatra the last Queene of Alexandria, onely for that she was vniust, and ingratefull vnto vs; when he rather ought to haue reproued her, in whom all impietie and wickednes raigned, both concerning her owne kinred and her husbands who loued her, & also generally against all the Romans and the Emperours his benefactors, who killed her owne sister Arsinoe in the temple who had not any wise offended her: she also trecherously slewe her owne brother, and destroyed her auncestors Gods and sepulchers: E and receiuing the kingdome from the first Cæsars gift, she ingratefully rebelled against his son and successour; and infecting Antonie with her poysoned drinks and amorous inchauntments, she made him rebell against his countrey, and to be vnconstant to his own friends, depriuing some of kingly dignitie, and compelling others to be instruments of her impietie. And what else shall we say of her, who in the battaile by sea forced Antonius her owne husband (who also had manie children by her) to yeeld himselfe, the Empire, and armie vnto her, and become one of her followers? Lastly, when Alexandria was taken by Cæsar, shee was so cruelly minded, that not remembring her owne estate, shee accounted this her safetie, if with her owne hand shee might kill the Iewes, that she might be cruell and trothlesse to euerie bodie.

Antonie the husband of Cleopatra.

Is it not a glorie thinke you to vs, that (as Apion reporteth) in the time of dearth and famine, F wheat was so plentifull in Iury, that it was not sold by measure? But Cleopatra was punished as she deserued. And we call great Cæsar himselfe to witnesse of our fidelitie, & the seruice we did him against the Aegyptians, the Senate also and their decrees, and the writings of Augustus Cæsar, wherein our deserts are testified. These letters Apion ought to haue read, and to haue examined all testimonies of vs, which were left first by Alexander, and then by all the Ptolomees, & what the Senate of Rome decreed, and the mightie Emperours. And if so bee Germanicus could not none of the ancient kings beſtowed the liberty of the citie vpon the Ægyptians, neither haue any of the Emperors of Rome beſtowed the priuilege. But Alexander himſelfe brought vs into the citie, the kings after him encreaſed more priuileges, and it hath pleaſed the Romane Em-perour to ratifie and confirme them. But Apion detracteth vs for not erecting ſtatues to the Em-perors, as though the Emperors knew not hereof, or that they needed Apion to ſpeake for them:

The Romans magnanimity towards the Iewes. whereas he ſhould rather admire the Romans magnanimity, and modeſtie, who compell not

A all that our Citie (as others alſo haue) hath by the variable euent of warre, been vexed and troubled, and that Antiochus ſurnamed the god, and Pompey the great, and Licinius Craſſus, and now laſtly Titus Cæſar haue all vanquiſhed one Temple, yet did they neuer find in it any thing as Apino affirmeth, but ſincere pietie, not lawfull for vs to diſcloſe to ſtrangers. And as touching Antiochus, manie writers of good credite report, that he neuer had any iuſt cauſe to ſpoile our temple, but that hee was drawne vnto this fact for want of money; Not for that he was our enemie, but for that as from his friends and fellowes, hee ſought ſupplie, and found nothing in that place that was worthie of deriſion: and thus doe Polybius Megapolitanus, Strabo the Cappadocian, Nicholas Damaſcene, Timagenes Caſtor the Chronicler, and Apollodorus auow, who all doe witnes, that Antiochus wanting money, brake the league he had with the Iewes, and robd and ſpoi-
B led their Temple being full of gold and ſiluer. Apion ought to haue conſidered this, had hee not had an Aſſes heart, and a dogs impudency, which he and his Countrimen worſhip for gods. As for vs, we do neither honour nor reuerence Aſſes, though the Egyptians do their Crocodiles and Aſpes, eſteeming them that are bitten by Aſpes, and deuoured by Crocodiles, to bee happy and fit for God.

But wee eſteeme thoſe to be Aſſes which all our wiſemen do, to wit, them who beare burdens imposed vpon them: and if comming into a field they fall to eat, and doe not that which they ought to doe, wee vſe to beat them with many ſtripes, and force them to till the ground, and do other drudgery. But Apion was either the greateſt Aſſe that euer was, in telling a lie; or elſe hauing begunne to doe it, he could not compaſſe his enterpriſes, in that hee found not any iuſt cauſe of C detraction againſt vs. He addeth another fable of the Greeks detracting vs: to the which I will make only this reply, that it is more commendable and agreeing to piety, and leſſe vncleanneſſe, to paſſe through the Temple, then for Prieſts to come and faine impious words and ſpeechees: which they not reſpecting, laboured rather to excuſe the ſacrilegious Kings, then to write the truth of vs and our Temple; endeuouring to corie fauour with Antiochus, and to couer and hide his ſacriledge, vſed againſt our nation, for that hee wanted money, beleeuing vs euen in things that are to come. And Apion, as prophecying of the reſt, ſaith that Antiochus found a bed in our Temple, and in it a man lying, and a table ſet before him, furniſhed with all foules that vſe either ſea or land, and that the man was hereat aſtoniſhed: And that ſo ſoone as Antiochus came into the Temple, hee adored him as though hee hoped for great helpe from the king, falling
D downe at his feet, and with a ſtretched out arme, craued licence to ſpeake: which the king granting, and willing him to declare what hee was, and why hee dwelt in the Temple, and the cauſe of his meats before him; the man with ſighes and teares bewailed vnto Antiochus his calamity, ſaying, He was a Grecian: and that trauelling in the country to get his liuing, he was ſuddenly ſeized vpon by certaine out-landiſh men, and brought vnto the Temple, and ſhut vp therein, and that no man might ſee him, and that he was there fed or fatted with all dainties that could be prouided: and that at firſt this dainty fare made him ioyful, but afterward he began to ſuſpect it, and laſtly hee was heereat amazed; and then demanding of a Iew that adminiſtred vnto him, for what cauſe he was there kept, hee vnderſtood the Iewes purpoſe, and law not to be reuealed, for the fulfilling whereof hee was there nouriſhed, and that the Iewes were wont to do the like
E euery yeere vpon a day appointed: and to take a Grecian ſtranger, and feed him a yeere, and then to carry him to a wood, and there to kil him, and ſacrifice him according to their rites and ceremonies, and to taſte and eat of his entrailes: and in the ſacrificing of the Grecian, to ſweare to bee enemies to the Greeks, and the reſidue of the murdered man they caſt into a certaine pit. And that then this Greek reported vnto Antiochus, that the time allotted vnto him by the Iewes to liue was now almoſt expired, and therefore requeſted, for the reuerence he bare to the Grecian gods, to ſaue his bloud from beeing ſpilt by the Iewes, and to free him out of that imminent calamity.

Who are accounted Aſſes amongſt the Iewes and other wiſe men.

Certain Hiſtoriographers endeuour to couer & hide Antiochus his periurie and ſacriledge.

That the Iews ought once a yeare to ſacrifice a Grecian

This fable is not only ſtuft full of all tragical cruelty, but alſo mingled with cruel impudency: yet for all this, the firſt deuiſers hereof do not free Antiochus from ſacriledge, as they hoped here-
F by to doe, who writ it purpoſely to flatter him. For that which they report of the Greek found in a bed, did not moue him to come and ſacke our Temple, he not knowing of it before he came and found it ſo (as they ſay.) Antiochus therefore was moſt impious, and not aſſiſted by Gods fauour in that enterpriſe, (whatſoeuer theſe lyers mutter) as it is eaſie to learne of the fact of him committed. For wee doe not onely differ from the Greekes in religion, but a great deale more from the Egyptians, & other nations: and what nation in the world is there, that ſomtime doth not

not trauaile through our Countrie? Is it then probable that we onely renue that conſpiracie a- G gainſt the Greekes? Or how is it poſſible that ſo many thouſand people as are of our owne nation, ſhould all eate of the entrailes of one man as Apion reporteth? Or why did he not name this man whoſoeuer he was? Or why did not the king carry him with trumpets into his coūtry? ſee-ing that in ſo doing he might haue bin eſteemed full of pietie, & a great fauorer of the Greeks, & greatly ſtrengthen himſelfe againſt the hatred of the Iewes by their aide? But I omit to ſpeake more of this: for vnſenſible people voide of all reaſon, muſt not be reprehended in word, but by deedes: for all men that haue ſeene the building of the Temple, canne teſtifie what it was, and the
The deſcription of the Temple and porches. vndefiled puritie thereof. For it had foure porches about, and euerie one of them by our lawes had ſeuerall keepers: and into the outward porch, all people, yea ſtraungers might enter without breach of our lawes, women onely excepted that haue their monethly courſe. Into the ſecond H porch it was lawfull for onely Iewes to come: and all Iewes might goe into it, and their wiues alſo when they were free frō pollution of their flowers. Into the third porch, they onely of our nation that were purified and ſanctified might come. Into the fourth, might onely Prieſts enter, who were cloathed with Prieſtly Stoles, and into the ſecret part of the Temple might onely the high Prieſt come, attired with a Stole proper to him onely: yea we are in all things ſo carefull of pietie, that our Prieſts are appointed howers when to enter into the Temple.

What was in the temple. For in the morning when the Temple was opened, the Prieſts that vvere to ſacrifice the hoſtes which were giuen them, entred into the Temple; and at noone againe when it was ſhut;
yea it was not lawfull to carrie any veſſell into the Temple: but there was only there an Altar, a Table, a Cenſer, and a Candleſticke, as is in our lawe mentioned, and there is no other ſecret I or hidden myſterie done, neither is there in that place any eating, and all the people can teſtifie this which I haue here ſet downe, and our writings doe the like. For notwithſtanding that there Foure Tribes of Prieſts, and of euerie tribe more then fiue thouſand men. are foure rites of Prieſts, and euerie Prieſts tribe containeth aboue fiue thouſand men: yet euery one waiteth on certaine appointed dayes in their turne, and their time of waiting being expired, others ſucceede them in ſacrificing; and the day before they are to finiſh their waiting, they de-liuer vp vnto their ſucceſſours the keyes of the Temple, and all veſſels belonging thereto, in the full number that they receiued them: and nothing is brought into our Temple, pertaining either to meate or drinke: yea, and are forbidden to be offered at our Altar, thoſe things onely excepted, whereof we make our ſacrifice. What then ſhall wee ſay of Apion, who examining nothing of all theſe, hath raiſed ſuch incredible reports of vs? How ignominious a thing it is for a Gram- K marian, not to bee able to deliuer the truth of a Hiſtorie? Well, hee knewe the pietie vſed in our Temple, but hee purpoſely omitted it: yet could hee remember to tell a fained tale of the ſacri-ficing of the Grecke, his daintie fare and that hidden food, that all men alſo that would, paſſed through our Temple: whereas the moſt noble amongſt our whole nation, are not permitted to come there, except they be prieſts.

This therefore is great impietie, and a voluntarie forged lie, to ſeduce them that will not examine the truth. For they haue attempted to ſlander vs by thoſe impieties before mentioned, not to bee ſpoken of. And againe, like one full of all pietie, he derideth the vanitie of theſe fables, and reporteth that at ſuch time as the Iewes for a long time together, warred againſt the Idumæans, Zabidus departing out of a Citie of Idumæa where Apollo was worſhipped, came Another tale deuiſed by Apion of Zabidus. vnto the Iewes, promiſing them to deliuer vnto them Apollo the Dorians god, and bring him L vnto their Temple, if ſo bee that all of them would there aſſemble themſelues together: and that afterwards Zabidus did make a moſt excellent kind of wooden inſtrument, and placed in it three rankes of candles, and put it vpon him, and ſo walked like a ſtarre gliding on the ground (for
" that ſhape he reſembled to them that were afarre off from him.) And that the Iewes hereat (ſee-
" ing this ſtraunge viſion) admired and were aſtoniſhed; and ſtanding afarre off, they were all ſi-
" lent, and how by this ſhift Zabidus eaſily got into their Temple, and tooke away the golden
" Aſſes head (for ſo hee writeth plainly) and ſo to haue returned ſpeedily to Dora. Wherefore
" wee may ſay that Apion leadeth an Aſſe, to wit, himſelfe with fooleries and lies, for he nameth
" places that are not, and ſetteth downe Cities to himſelfe vnknowne: for Idumæa is a Prouince M
" neere vnto vs, and bordering vpon Gara, and there is no Citie in it called Dora: but in Phœnicia
" neere vnto the hill Carmelus there is a Citie of that name, yet nothing conſonant to Apions
Dora is a Citie of Phœnicia & not of Idumæa. ſlaunders, for it is foure dayes iourney from Iudæa.

Why therefore doth he ſo raſhly accuſe vs for not worſhipping the ſame gods that other nations doe, ſeeing (as he ſaith) our predeceſſors did ſo eaſily beleeue that Apollo would come vnto

them,

A them, and that he walked poh the earth with ſtarres vpon his backe? Perhaps indeed they had neuer before ſeene a candle or lampe, themſelues hauing ſo many: or is it likely that he walking thus quite through our country, where ſo many thouſand men are, no one of them all met him? Did he in time of war finde the townes and villages, by which he paſt, without any watchmen? Well, I omit the reſt. The gates of our Temple were threeſcore cubites high, twentie cubites broad, all couered with gold, yea, almoſt all of cleane gold, and theſe gates euery day were ſhut by 2. hundreth men: and it was too impious a thing to leaue them open. Is it then credible that this candlebearer could eaſily open them, who alone was iudged to haue the aſſes head? So that now it remaineth doubtfull whether Zabidus did bring backe againe the aſſes head, or elſe Apion took it of him, and brought it againe to our Temple, that there Antiochus might finde it, and ſo

B Apion might haue another occaſion of lying. He alſo belieth vs concerning the oath which hee ſaith wee Iewes do take, ſwearing by the God of heauen and earth, and ſea, neuer to fauour any ſtranger, and eſpecially the Greeks. This lier might better haue ſaid, not to fauour any ſtranger, and eſpecially the Ægyptians, and ſo his former lies and theſe ſhould haue had better correſpondence with the beginning, if our anceſtors had beene expelled by their predeceſſors out of Ægypt, not for their wickednes, but for their owne calamity. But wee are ſo far from the Greeks, that we ſcarcely euer think of them: ſo that no man can ſay that there is any enmity between vs and the Greekes. But contrariwiſe, many of them haue embraced our religion, and ſome of them therein perſeuered: others again haue forſaken it; yet none of them will ſay that he heard this oath ſpoken of among vs: but it ſhould ſeem that onely Apion heard of it, in that he himſelfe

C indeed forged it. Truely his great wiſdome and prouidence is worthy to bee admired (as ſhall hereafter appeare:) for he, to proue theſe his lies to be true, ſaith, that it is a certaine teſtimony that the laws we obſerue are moſt vniuſt, and that we worſhip not God as we ought to do, in that we were ſubiect to diuers nations, and our City endured many calamities: Whereas touching themſelues, they are of a City that flouriſheth in abſolute authority, accuſtomed to gouerne from the foundation thereof, and not to ſerue the Romans. In effect, who canne reſiſt their valour? Truely no man but Apion would euer haue flouted vs herewith, ſeeing that few Cities ſo flouriſh and raigne ouer other, that they againe at no one time haue been brought into ſubiection. For many nations are ſubiect to others: onely the Ægyptians are freed from the captiuity of ſuch as rule Europe and Aſia, for that (as they ſay) the gods fleeing into their country, were ſaued

D by entring into the bodies of beaſts. Yet haue they not indeed had any one dayes liberty ſince the beginning of the world, neither vnder the gouernment of their owne princes, nor vnder ſtrangers.

I will not ſtand to reckon how often the Perſians haue waſted their City, deſtroied their temples, and ſlaine their ſuppoſed gods. For it is not decent that I ſhould imitate herein Apions fooliſhneſſe: neither am I calling to memory what befell the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, the laſt of which, are recorded to haue beene moſt valiant, and firſt to haue beene moſt deuoute and religious: neither will I reckon vp thoſe moſt godly kings, amongſt whom Craſus was one, who notwithſtanding fell into great calamities. Moreouer, I will not recount how the caſtle of Athens was ſet on fire, and the temples of Epheſus & Delphos likewiſe, and many others. There

E is now one Apion, a new accuſer of the Iewes, who vpbraideth them with their calamities; forgetting quite all miſery that hath befallen his countrimen the Ægyptians: but hee was blinded with the fable of Seſoſtris (whom he ſaith to haue been king of Ægypt.) We could report and boaſt of our kings, Dauid and Salomon, who ſubdued many nations vnto them: but it is not fitte heere to ſpeake of them. But Apion was ignorant of that which all the world knoweth, to wit, that the Ægyptians haue ſerued firſt to the Perſians, and afterwards to the Macedonians, and that as bondſlaues: where wee remaining in free liberty raigned ouer all Cities round about vs 120. yeares, euen vnto the time of Pompey the great; and when all the other kings were ſubdued by the Romans, onely our kings for their fidelity and friendſhip towards them were deare vnto them. Oh, but this ſticketh vpon Apions ſtomacke, that wee haue not had any famous men of

F our nation, who haue inuented arts and ſciences, and beene excellent in wiſedome, ſuch as Socrates, Zeno, Cleanthes, and others, whom he ſetteth downe, were: and which is moſt to bee admired, Apion puts himſelfe in the number of theſe famous men: and ſaith, that Alexandria is bleſſed and happy, that hath deſerued to haue ſuch a Citizen as he is: and great reaſon that he himſelfe ſhould teſtifie that of himſelfe, which all men elſe perceiue in him, to wit, that hee is an impudent deceitfull fellow, both of corrupt life and manners. So that any Alexandrians had iuſt cauſe cauſe to bee ſorry that they euer had any better opinion of him. But that our nation had men G equall at leaſt vnto thoſe whom hee mentioneth, all men knowe that pleaſe to read the booke of our Antiquity. The reſt that his accuſation containeth, it is not amiſſe to let paſſe without anſwer; for that it rather impeacheth the Ægyptians, his owne countrimen, then vs: for he doth complaine of vs for ſacrificing ordinary beaſts, and for abſtaining to eate ſwines fleſh, and greatly laughed at circumciſion. Touching the ſacrificing of theſe beaſts, wee doe as all nations elſe doe: And Apion, inueighing againſt our ſacrificing, ſheweth himſelfe to bee an Ægyptian, for were he either a Græcian or a Macedonian, he would not be herewith offended: for both Greekes and Macedonians doe vow to ſacrifice Hecatombes to their gods, and vſe Prieſts in the banquets; and yet for all this, the world is not deſolate of liuing creatures, as Apion feareth. H

Why the Iews doe ſacrifice cõmon beaſts and do not eat ſwines fleſh.

But were all men ſo mad as the Ægyptians, it would indeed bee deſolate of men, and filled with cruell beaſts, which they (ſuppoſing them to bee gods) do diligently nouriſh. If any man ſhould aſk of Apion, whom of al the Ægyptians he iudged to be a wiſeman and moſt religious towards their gods, no doubt hee would anſwer that the prieſts are. For they ſay, that their firſt kings in the beginning gaue them theſe two commandements in charge: firſt, to ſeek wiſdome; and next, to worſhip the gods: they alſo are all of them circumciſed, and abſtaine from ſwines fleſh, and no other Ægyptian ſacrificeth with them vnto their gods. Apion therefore was ſurely blinde, when, inſtead of detracting vs, hee ſpeaketh ill of them, to gratifie whom, hee tooke all this paines. For the Ægyptians doe not onely vſe thoſe cuſtomes which Apion in vs diſallow-eth, but alſo doe teach others to circumciſe themſelues, as Herodotus reporteth. So that I verely I thinke, that Apion was iuſtly puniſhed for blaſpheaming his countrey lawes and religion. For being forced to circumciſe himſelfe to auoid a great diſeaſe, he was hereby nothing helped, but for all this, his priuy member rotting, hee in extreame griefe and miſery gaue vp the ghoſt. For wiſe men ought to perſeuere in their countrey lawes in all piety, and not to deride and detract others: but Apion forſooke his owne religion, and ſlandered and belied ours. And this was Apions end: and heere alſo ſhould end this booke, but that Apollonius, Molon and Lyſimachus, and certaine others, partly for ignorance, partly for madneſſe, haue moſt iniuriouſly belied our law-maker Moſes, and the lawes hee made, detracting him as a deceitfull Magician, and then as the author of all malice and impiety amongſt vs: and for ſuch as teach no vertue nor goodneſſe at all. I will therefore, as farre as in mee lieth, declare both our conuerſation in generall, and in K particular: for if my iudgement bee any thing, our lawes are moſt forcible both to piety, and to all humanity in generall, as alſo to iuſtice, paines taking, and contempt of death. I onely requeſt this fauour of the Reader, that hee will not with a preiudicate or malicious opinion, peruſe theſe writings: for I doe not write this as a prayſe and vaine oſtentation of our nation, but as a iuſt Apology, refuting the ſlanderous reportes that ſome haue vſed againſt vs.

The defence of Moſes againſt Apollonius and Lyſimachus.

Apollonius doth not continually inueigh againſt vs as Apion doth, but onely heere and there; ſometime affirming vs to be ſomewhiles hated both of God and man, ſometime to be cowards, other ſometimes contrariwiſe complaining of our nations bouldneſſe. Saying moreouer, that wee are more ſottiſh then any barbarous nation: and that therefore wee onely haue had none of our nation founders of arts or ſciences, which are profitable for mans life: all which obiections L are eaſily refuted, if we ſhew the contrary to all theſe by him reported; both that we haue obeied our lawes, and liued in all integrity. If therefore I bee forced to ſhew that other nations haue made contrary lawes, not I, but they are to be blamed, who, comparing ours with them of other nations, affirm ours to be the worſe: neither of which can charge vs, either that theſe laws which I will briefly ſet downe are not ours, or elſe that we haue not perſiſted in them as we ought. Making therefore this beginning, I affirme that they who haue framed themſelues to liue together vnder certain rules and ordinances, and kept them inuiolate, and were the firſt founders of them, were more to be commended for humanity and vertue, then they who liue vnder no rule nor ordinance at all: and euery law-maker endeuoureth ſo to chalenge antiquity for their owne ordi- M nances, as that they may not be thought to imitate others, but to be themſelues the firſt authors thereof, and guides to direct other mens liues. Which beeing ſo, it is the duety of a good law-maker to make choice of that which is beſt, and moſt conuenient for them, who are to obey their lawes, and to ſatisfie them as much as may be, in prooуing their lawes to be good and right, and both in wealth and woe, calamity and felicity, to remaine in them, neuer changing nor altering them.

Wherin Apollonius accuſeth the Iews.

The louers of order & common lawes are excellent in meeknes and vertue.

A them. I therfore auerre that our lawmaker is more auncient then any lawmaker mentioned. For Lycurgus, and Solon, and Seleucus of Locris, and thoſe the Greekes admire, are moderne, of late times in reſpect of him, as it is well knowne. For the Greekes themſelues confeſſe, that in times paſt they wanted the name of law. This Homer can witneſſe, who in his whole works neuer mentioneth this word, law, for the people of thoſe times were not gouerned by lawes, but by indefinite ſentences, and the princes pleaſure, vſing cuſtomes but not written, and altering and chaunging them alſo as occaſion ſerued.

Moſes more ancient then all others lawmakers.

Νομως. This word law is not in Homer.

But our lawmaker being verie auncient (for this is euerie way manifeſt, euen by our aduerſaries owne confeſſions) ſhewed himſelf both a good prince & counſeller vnto his people: for making lawes to direct and gouerne mens liues, hee perſwaded them voluntarily to embrace them,
B and firmely to perſiſt in them with all wiſedome. And firſt of all let vs conſider the workes of his greatneſſe. For he vndertaking the conduct of manie thouſand of our forefathers out of Aegypt into our owne countrey, deliuered them from many calamities, almoſt impoſſible to be auoided: for they being to paſſe through a place wherein was no water, and a verie ſandie ground, being alſo to warre and to keepe their wiues and children, and goods for the variable euent of wars, he in all theſe ſhewed himſelfe a moſt wiſe and prudent counſeller, and a true patron and guide vnto them all: For he made all the multitude ſo to depend vpon him, that he might perſwade them whatſoeuer he pleaſed, and yet in none of all theſe did hee vſurpe any authoritie ouer them: and in that time and place wherein all men of authoritie aſſume power vnto themſelues, & vſe tyrannie, at ſuch time as the people do oftentimes offend and liue in all manner of impietie; he then
C being in authoritie did contrariwiſe vſe all lenitie, and mildneſſe, to the entent that he might bee a patterne of vertue and iuſtice to all the reſt, giuing all thoſe that willingly followed him moſt aſſured ſafetie, vſing in all accidents moſt ſtrange workes. And for this cauſe hee rightly deemed God to be his captaine & counſeller: and firſt examining himſelfe, and finding that all the lawes he had ſet down were ageeable to the wil & pleaſure of God, the chiefeſt care he now had was how to perſwade his people the ſame, which hee himſelfe now knew: for they who direct „ their liues according to the will of God, auoid all ſinne as our lawmaker did, being neither Ma- „ gician nor deceiuer as his enemies iniuriouſly report, but ſuch a one as the Greeks do boaſt „
Minos and others after him to haue beene: for ſome of them affirmed their lawes to bee made by Iupiter, others by Apollo and Delphos Oracle, either ſo beleeuing themſelues, or elſe thinking that
D the people would be eaſily ſo perſwaded. Now who of all the lawmakers made the beſt lawe, & who did moſt rightly thinke of God, hee that compareth all their lawes together may eaſily know; for now occaſion is offered to ſpeake of them: there are therefore an infinite companie of nations and lawes amongſt men, and ſome nations are ruled by Monarches, otherſome by the common conſent of the people. But our lawmaker doing neither of theſe, did as one ſhould ſay therein declare his common wealth to be diuine, chiefely aſſigning all power and principalitie ouer vs to God, cauſing all men to fixe their minds and cogitations on him, as the onely giuer and author of all goodneſſe, giuing them to vnderſtand, that whatſoeuer in their neceſſitie they entreate him for, hee heareth their prayers, and vnderſtandeth what euerie man doth in priuate, yea his verie cogitations; and that hee is one, vnbegotten, and in all times immu-
E table and eternall, differing in a moſt excellent ſhape from all mortall creatures: and this wee knowe, but vvee are altogether ignorant vvhat God is as touching his ſubſtance and eſſence.

Moſes maketh God his guide & counſeller.

The origen of lawes amongſt the Greekes.

And thus the wiſeſt Greeks that euer were, iudged of God, who how learned they were (he giuing the ground of all their knowledge) I now omit to rehearſe: & that theſe things afore rehearſed are beſt and moſt agreeable to the nature and magnificence of God, many do witneſſe, as Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, and Plato, and after them the Stoickes, and almoſt all other Philoſophers haue ſo thought of the diuine nature. But they deliuering this their Philoſophie in ſhort ſpeech, durſt not publiſh the truth of their doctrine among the people, alreadie ſeized vpon by F ſuperſtitious opinions. But our lawmakers works and words ſo agreed, that he ſatisfied at large al his people, and they that were to bee borne of them and their ſucceſſors, inſpiring as it vvere a certain conſtancy into them to perſeuer in the ſame, ſtil referring the cauſe of his lawes to their profit and commoditie. For he did not affirme the worſhip of God onely to be part of vertue, but he aſſigned other parts thereof, to wit, fortitude, iuſtice, and mutuall concord of all his citizens. For all our actions, ſpeeches, and what elſe ſoeuer, are all referred to diuine pietie. Which hee left not touched without any more diſcourſe of it. For theſe two are the methods of all diſciplin

The opinion of the wiſeſt Greekes concerning God.

Moſes cõpared with other lawmakers.

Two methods of moralitie and diſcipline

and

and mortalitie, whereof one frameth and directeth the ſpeech, the other the manners & actions: G which being ſo, other lawmakers were indeed wiſe in aduice and counſaile, and yet they made choice of one of theſe methods, & left the other: For the Lacedemonians were inſtructed in ma-ners, and not in words, as alſo they of Creete were: but the Athenians & almoſt all the Greeks were directed and trained vp by lawes in euerie thing they were to doe, yet neuer could they put their written lawes in practice: but our law maker verie induſtriouſly did conioyne both theſe together, for he neither omitted the training them vp in manners and good exerciſes, neither did he ſurceaſe to leaue them written lawes. And firſt of all, making his entrance from the verie meates, and preſcribing to euerie one a conuenient diet, he left no man libertie amongſt vs to direct himſelfe in the leaſt matter concerning his meat, but he by lawes defined, both from what meats wee were to abſtaine, and what to eate, and what ought to bee our ordinarie diet, as H alſo when wee ought to labour, and when to ceaſe from worke; ſo that wee as it were vnder the gouernment of a father or maſter, might neither ſinne willingly, nor for ignorance: for hee did not appoint puniſhment for them that were ignorant of it, but by law enacted a moſt neceſſarie and milde chaſtiſement for the voluntarie offenders: & for this cauſe he did not onely will that we ſhould once or twice or often heare the lawes, but that once euerie week we all, omitting other buſines, ſhould come to heare the lawes, & ſo learne them perfectly, which things all other law makers as it is well knowne omitted: All which laudable cuſtomes all other law makers haue neglected, and the moſt part of men are ſo farre from liuing according to their owne lawes, that they are altogether ignorant of them: and hauing offended their lawes through ignorance, they Moſes commaunded all the Iewes to come & heare the law. then learn by other mens meanes, that they haue made breach of their lawes, yea the chiefeſt & I moſt eminent men amongſt them, doe profeſſe herein that they are ignorant, cauſing thoſe that are learned and skilfull in their lawes, to ſit as it were in commiſſion with them to direct them. Whereas euerie one of our nation being demaunded of our lawes, canne anſwere as readily as hee can tell his owne name: for euery one of vs learning them as it were ſo ſoone as wee come to the vſe of reaſon, wee haue them as it were written and printed in our mindes, and by this meanes both wee offend more ſeldome, and when wee offend wee are ſure to bee puniſhed.

The concord of the Iewes in religion. And this eſpecially is that which hath cauſed ſuch an vnitie and concord amongſt vs. For to worſhip one God all after the ſame manner, and nothing to differ in manner and conuerſation one from another, is the onely way to eſtabliſh amitie and concord in a common wealth. For K onely amongſt vs no man ſhal hear any different ſpeeches & opinions concerning God, which thing amongſt all nations elſe is moſt frequent and ordinarie: for amongſt them not onely euerie one of the cõmon people doth ſpeak his pleaſure in this point, but diuers Philoſophers alſo preſume to do it, ſome of thẽ with their blaſphemous ſpeeches altogether deſtroying the nature of God, and others with the like impudencie denying him to haue any care of men: neither is there any difference amongſt vs of affairs appertaining to mans life, but al men with vs follow one cõ-mon expreſſe labour, and we all ioyntly affirme the ſonne of God, and that hee hath care of humane affaires, and all our actions and exerciſes: yea any one may learne of our women and children, that all things whatſoeuer, are to be reduced to pietie. Hence it groweth that ſome detract our nation, for that amongſt vs were no men inuente rs of new matters & acts: to whom we will thus anſwer, that other nations account it a glory not to perſiſt in anie thing that their forefathers L vſed, and hould them of moſt account amongſt them, that can beſt tranſgreſſe their forefathers wiſedome. But we contrariwiſe do account it the chiefeſt point of wiſedome and vertue, neither to do, nor thinke any thing contrarie to that which out aunceſtors haue decreed, which is a token that our law was eſtabliſhed by as good aduice as was poſſible. For thoſe lawes that in all points are not as they ought to be, are often by experience found faultie. But amongſt vs who beleeue that our law was firſt eſtabliſhed by the will & pleaſure of Almightie God, nothing is pious and vertuous which may any wiſe impugn the ſame. For who can take away any tittle therof, or adde better in the ſtead? or who is hee that can transferre and carrie vs from the obſeruance of them, and ordaine for vs better lawes to gouerne our common wealth? Or what law can be more iuſt M and better, then that which the wiſedome of God (who is the Lord of all things) hath eſtabliſhed? Hee firſt of all permitted the diſpoſing of all principall affaires to the prieſts in general, and moſt wiſely conſtituted a high prieſt as their head: neither were they choſen to this dignitie by our lawmaker, who either exceld in nobility of birth, or riches: but he appointed ſuch to ſa-

A keep our lawes, and obſerue all other things belonging to their office with all integritie; for our Prieſts are appointed ouer-ſeers of all things, and to iudge all ſtrifes and controuerſies, and to puniſh the offenders. What monarchie then or kingdome can be more holy then this? Or how can God be better honoured then amongſt vs, where all the people are prepared to pietie, and the Prieſts commanded ſo to rule and gouerne the common-wealth, as if they were celebrating ſome feſtiuities? And whereas other nations cannot celebrate their myſteries, which they tearm ſacrifices, in a few daies; we with ioy and pleaſure and immutable wils, do celebrate our ſacrifice continually without intermiſſion: It reſteth now that I ſet downe our precepts and lawes, as arguments of that which I haue ſaid. The firſt is of God: of whom our law ſaith, God hath all things, he is moſt perfect, moſt bleſſed, he is ſufficient both for himſelfe and all things elſe, he is B the beginning, midſt, and ending, famous amongſt all things for his workes and benefits, more manifeſt then any thing elſe, but his ſhape and greatnes is to vs vnſpeakeable, all matters (how precious ſoeuer) being compared with his excellent beauty are nothing worth, and all art compared with his inuention is vnartificiall, we can neither ſee, conceiue, nor imagine any thing like him. He is holy, for we ſee his works; the light, the heauen & the earth: the Sun, the moon, riuers, and ſea, ſo many different ſhapes of liuing creatures, and encreaſe of fruits: All theſe God himſelfe made, not with hands or worke, nor as one needing any to help him, but he ſeeing them to be good, they were preſently made. He is to be followed of all men, who ought to worſhip him by the exerciſing of vertue; for this is the moſt holy way to pleaſe him. We haue one temple, as alſo one God, which temple is common to all men, as hee is the common God of all men. For C ſimilitude alwaies pleaſeth, him doe all our Prieſts honour with ſacrifice, and he amongſt them hath the firſt place, who by birth is the chiefeſt: and he firſt ſacrificeth to God, ſeeth the lawes obſerued, iudgeth controuerſies, and puniſheth thoſe that are conuicted by the law: whoſoeuer diſobeyeth him, ſhall be puniſhed as one that rebells againſt God himſelfe; he offereth ſacrifices not pertaining to gluttonie or drunkennes, for God is not pleaſed with ſuch ſacrifices, but is rather iniured, and ſuperfluous expences are thereby made.

The workes of God.

The ſacrifices of the olde teſtament.

But God loueth them that are temperate, and orderly, and of good behauiour, and eſpecially requireth in vs that ſacrifice, an inuiolable chaſtitie. In our ſacrifices offered for our common good, we firſt of all pray in common, and then euery one for himſelfe, becauſe we are all fellows, and he that delighteth herein more then in his owne life, is moſt acceptable to God. Wee pray D and vow vnto God, not requeſting riches of him, for he of his owne accord beſtoweth them vpon euery one, and left them amongſt vs: but we pray that we may haue part of them, and hauing gotten them may keepe them. Our law hath alſo appointed purifications both from our chamber-bed and carnall copulation, and many other things, which are too long to rehearſe: And this is our ſpeech and opinion of God, who himſelfe is our law. And what concerning marriage? Our law onely alloweth naturall copulation between man and wife, done to the intent to get children. But that men ſhould abuſe one another againſt nature, it altogether diſalloweth, & puniſheth ſuch offenders with death. It cõmandeth vs to marrie, not reſpecting the dowrie, neither muſt we take women violently and by force, nor allure them by deceitfull perſwaſions, but that wee rather obtaine his good will, who may grant and vſe ordinary meanes to perſwade. It E alſo appointeth that a woman ſhall be in all things inferiour to the man, neither is ſhe to obey in committing wickednes, but as one vnder gouernment. For it is God that gaue man this authoritie. With her the husband onely may lawfully accompany, and it is abhomination for her to make trial of another man: and who ſo attempteth this, can no waies auoid death: the like penaltie attendeth him, if he offer violence to a virgine deſpouſed vnto another man, or if by perſwaſions hee ouercome a married woman or other, that hath children vnder her, and all this our law commandeth: It hath alſo interdicted all women from concealing their children being borne, or otherwiſe to deſtroy them, for ſo ſhee ſhould be a child killer, deſtroy ſoules and mankinde: Whoſo therefore vſeth carnall copulation and corruption is vncleane by our lawes, and women after lawfull copulation muſt waſh themſelues, iudging that a part of their ſoule was by this act F defiled, and ſhe being puffed vp was wounded in her bodie, and therefore our law ordained water of purification for them. Neither is it lawfull for them to feaſt and banquet at their childe-birth, whereby an occaſion of drunkennes may grow, but that their beginning ſhould bee temperate: they are likewiſe commanded to train vp their children in learning, that they may learne the law, and actions of their forefathers, and imitate them; that ſo being trained vp in the law, they may not ſinne nor tranſgreſſe them by ignorance.

Our law hath alſo prouided for the buriall of the dead, that our funeralls ſhould neither bee G pompeous, nor our ſepulchers gorgeous, commanding euery houſhold to performe all neceſſa-ries touching the buriall of their dead, permitting all men at any ones death to aſſemble themſelues together, and bewaile the dead: It alſo commandeth euery one (yea euen the dead mans thoſe children that do not ſhew themſelues grateful vnto them, or in any thing do grieue them, that they ſhould be ſtoned to death: It alſo commandeth all young men to reuerence old men, becauſe God is elder to vs all. It permitteth not friends to conceale any impiety; for God is not their friend who doth not diſcloſe them: and if friends fall out that doe know one anothers ſe- H that he himſelfe placed not, and no man muſt take that which is not his owne. No man for lending muſt take vſurie; and many ſuch like things our law commandeth, concerning cauſe of communion between vs and others.

It is alſo not amiſſe to recount how our law-maker prouided for the entertaining of ſtrangers amongſt vs: For he ſeemeth ſo to haue prouided, that to our knowledge we neither corrupt our owne lawes, nor deny to impart them to others: but he entertaineth all liberally that will come and liue vnder our lawes, iudging the community of mans life, not ſo much to conſiſt in the nation whereof we come, as in the vnity of our minds & conuerſation. He forbiddeth others that I are ſtrangers and come not with that intent to be admitted to our ſolemnities; yet he commanded vs to exhibite vnto them, all other things neceſſarie: and that wee ſhould giue vnto all men, their fruit trees. We are alſo forbidden to rob and ſpoile thoſe that are ſlaine in fight, and deale iniuriouſly with our captiues; and eſpecially if they be women: yea he ſo endeauoured to teach vs humanity & mildnes, that he prouided, that we vſe euen vnreaſonable beaſts curteouſly, and only imploy them to ſerue our lawfull need, and no further: for he forbideth vs to kill any tame thing bred in houſes, and that we ſhould not kill the old birds and their young together, and although many wilde beaſts enemies to mankind doe aſſiſt vs in our labours, yet he commanded K to ſpare them alſo. And in euery point hee eſtabliſhed humanity and mildnes, amongſt vs, vſing of, is for the moſt part death: as if any man commit adultery, rauiſh a virgine, vſe the ſin againſt nature with another, or ſuffer himſelfe to be ſo abuſed. We alſo haue lawes concerning our ſer-uants, and our meaſures, and waights, and vnlawfull bargaines and ſales, or deceit, if either one take any thing that is anothers mans, or which is not his owne; all theſe are to be puniſhed not as other nations puniſh them, but much more grieuouſly. But whoſoeuer either iniureth his parents, or committeth impiety againſt God, he ſhall preſently be deſtroied: but they that obſerue this law are rewarded not with gold or ſiluer, nor with a crowne beſet with precious ſtone: but L euery one hauing his conſcience to witnes, doth greatly profit, and gain eternity; as both our lawmaker prophecieth, and God himſelfe doth moſt aſſuredly promiſe to them that obſerue them.

And if it chance that we be forced to ſuffer death for them, yet do we ioyfully go to execution, nothing doubting but that we ſhall ſo exchange this life for a better: I ſhould be loth to report this, if our deeds did not make it manifeſt: for many of our forefathers, only for that they refu-and wonder hereat, conſidering the great mutabilitie amongſt themſelues. To bee ſhort, there are ſome who ſticke not to deride them who haue lately written of the gouernement of Com-

diuine

A diuine Plato amongſt the Greeks, a man who in honeſt life, vertuous ſpeech, and ſound Philoſophie, excelled all others. This man is almoſt contiually ſcoffed at by them, who in their owne conceit are skilfull in ciuill affaires, and brought in as a Vice in a Comedie. Whereas whoſoeuer conſidereth his writings with diligence, ſhall often and eaſily find matter agreable with moſt mens manners: yea this Plato himſelf confeſſeth, that he dare not by reaſon of the common peoples ignorance ſet down the true opinion of God. But many thinke Platoes words full of vanitie, and licentiouſneſſe, and admire Lycurgus, and euery one commendeth the citie of Sparta, for that it ſo long time perſeuered in his lawes. It is therefore an euident demonſtration of vertue to remaine in their lawes. But if thoſe who ſo admire the Lacedemonians doe compare them with vs, and the time during the which their laws were in force, with the time of our cõmon-wealth: B they ſhall finde that ours hath continued more then two thouſand yeares. They ſhall alſo finde that the Lacedemonians did only perfectly obſerue their lawes, during ſuch time as they were in proſperitie and liberty, and that when their fortune changed, they then became vnmindfull of their lawes.

Lycurgus the law-maker amongſt the Lacedemonians.

But we, who haue felt many thouſand miſhaps by reaſon of the often change of Princes in Aſia, haue not in theſe our laſt miſeries and euils forſaken our law. Neither can any man ſay, that liberty and licentious life is the cauſe, why wee ſo diligently obſerue them, ſeeing that whoſo pleaſe may ſee ſufficient proofe, that they tie vs to more ſtrict life and laborious, then thoſe of the Lacedemonians did them. For they neither tilled the earth, nor vſed any handy-craft, but ceaſing from all labours and paines taking, liued in their Citie fat and faire-liking, hauing both C their meate and all other neceſſaries prouided and prepared for them by others, and eſteemed that onely their felicitie to doe or endure any thing, ſo that they might preuaile againſt thoſe againſt whom they enterpriſed warres: and that they failed alſo herein, I omit to rehearſe. For not onely one or two of them at once, but oftentimes whole companies of them, forgetting their owne lawes yeelded themſelues to their enemies. And can any one tell of, I ſay not ſo many, but of one or two of vs that euer was trecherous to his owne lawes, or that feared to die for them? I meane not a common death, ſuch as ſouldiers are ſubiect vnto, but ſuch a death as is effected by all torments and tortures that can be deuiſed. Which I thinke thoſe that preuailed againſt vs impoſed vpon vs, not for hatred, but that they deſired to ſee ſo admirable a matter; and to ſee if wee being but men, and ſuch who eſteemed it the the greateſt impietie poſſible to D doe it, could bee compelled by them to ſpeake or doe any thing contrarie to our lawes. Yet it is no wonder that we for our law doe die with ſuch conſtancy, rather then any other nation: for other nations cannot abide to endure that which wee account a trifle, to wit, labour and ſimple fare, and that no man eat whatſoeuer, or what hee deſireth, to lie with them whom hee ought not, or to be idle (except hee be of noble birth) or goe gallantly attyred: and we are alwaies carefull that when wee fight againſt our enemie, wee obſerue our lawes concerning our meates. And thus we take pleaſure to obſerue and keepe our lawes, and to exerciſe fortitude in obeying them.

The Iewes compared with the Lacedemonians.

The ſtreict lawes of the Iewes.

Let now Lyſimachus or Molonus paſſe, and ſuch as they bee, wicked lying writers, and Sophiſters, deceiuers of young men, and detracters of our owne nation as though wee were the wicE kedeſt people liuing. As for me I will not examine the lawes of other nations: for it is our cuſtome to keep and obſerue our owne, not to detract others; yea and our law-maker openly prohibited vs from blaſpheming ſuch, as other nations hold for gods, only for the name of God attributed vnto them: yet may wee not leaue the obiections of our accuſers vnanſwered, ſeeing that which we are to ſpeake againſt them, is not our owne deuice, but many before vs haue ſpoken it. Who then of all the wiſe Greeks will not condemne the moſt famous Poets, and eſpecially, the law-makers, who at firſt brought and ſettled ſuch vaine opinions of the gods among the common people? affirming the number of them to be ſo many as they thought good, and to be borne at diuers times one of another, allotting to euery one his proper place, as vnto other liuing creatures: ſome to be vnder the earth, others in the ſea, and the ancienteſt amongſt them F in hell, fettered and bound: and thoſe whom they place in heauen, in words, they doe tearme him a father, but in deeds they ſhew him to be a tyrant, and for this cauſe they report that his wife, his brother, and his daughter, whom they affirme to haue been borne of his braine, conſpired againſt him to binde him, and hang him, as they report him alſo, to haue dealt by his father. Againſt theſe vanities all excellent and wiſe men doe worthily inueigh, who beſide this already rehearſed, in deriſion adde, how ſome of the gods are young, and ſome old, and ſome infants, and that which is moſt abhominable of all, doe vſe carnall copulation with mankind, and that theſe women from calamitie, for that deſtiny had obliged him, nor ſee their deaths without teares. This is all good ſtuffe, as alſo is that which followeth, to wit, adulteries committed in H heauen, ſo openly, & impudently amongſt the gods, that ſome profeſſe themſelues to enuy their fellow gods and goddeſſes tied together in ſuch filthineſs. And what ſhould the reſt of them do, when as their king and the moſt ancienteſt amongſt them, could not refraine his luſtfull licen-tiouſneſſe from the company of women? Moreouer, ſome of them became ſeruants vnto men, and ſome built houſes for money, and others became ſhepheards, others like malefactors were chained in hell. What man then that euer was accounted wiſe, would not bluſh at theſe follies, and reprooue the inuentors thereof, and the fooliſh beleeuers alſo? Others preſumed to feigne both terror and feare, and madnes, and ſuch ſimplicitie as that they might be deceiued, and all other naughty paſſions to be found in the nature of their gods, and haue perſwaded whole cities to offer ſacrifices to the moſt noble amongſt them. And they are in great perplexitie, thinking I that ſome of the gods are the giuers of all good things, others againe to be their enemies, and ſo ſeeke to pleaſe them with gifts as they would doe wicked men; and they are verily perſwaded, that they ſhall ſuſtaine great domage by their meanes, except they doe daily pacifie their wrath ſeeke, and ignorant of the nature of God, and that they did not faithfully deliuer vnto their common-wealth, ſo much as themſelues knew concerning this point: but as though it had been a thing of leaſt moment, did wilfully let it paſſe, giuing licence to Poets, and permitting them

Apollonius Molon was one of theſe proude fooles: but thoſe Grecians that followed true Philoſophie, knew all that is already ſaid, and the colde reaſons of this allegorie, and therefore L did iuſtly deſpiſe them, and agreed with vs in the true & decent opinion of Gods nature. Which Plato decreed that no Poet ſhould be permitted in a cõmon wealt Plato well ſeeing, affirmeth that Poets are not to be permitted in a common wealth, and ſendeth
Homer away very honourably crowned and anointed, leaſt that hee with fables ſhould deſtroy or deprane the true opinion of God. For Plato of all others eſpecially imitated our law-maker, as he did herein alſo, commanding all his citizens that all of them ſhould perfectly learne his lawes, and that for no caſualty, any ſtrange forraine cuſtome ſhould bee admitted into their ci-tie, but that their common-wealth ſhould bee pure, and they perſiſt in the obſeruation of their lawes. But Apollonius Molon not reſpecting this, inueigheth againſt vs, for not receiuing into our ſociety men of ſtrange opinions or religion, whereas not onely wee doe ſo, but commonly ſeeing they neither admit ſtrangers to conuerſe with them, nor to inhabit amongſt them, no nor impart their religion vnto them; but wee though not deſirous to learne other nations religion, yet doe we not deny to impart ours to ſtrangers that deſire to embrace it: which if I bee

A not deceiued is a token of magnanimitie, and clemencie in vs: but this ſhall ſuffice concerning the Lacedemonians. Apollonius was ignorant how matters ſtood with the Athenians, who boaſt that their citie is free from all nations: for they did moſt ſeuerely and without all mercie puniſh thoſe that did but ſpeake any word againſt their God. For what was the cauſe of Socrates his death? he neither betraied the citie to enemies, nor deſtroyed their temples, but only ſwore by a ſtrange oath, which as he ſaid (whether in ieſt or in earneſt) a diuell taught him, and for this offence was he put to death, by drinking hemlocke: his accuſers alledging, that hee corrupted young men, and contemned the lawes, and religion of his countrey. And this Socrates ſuſtained being a citizen of Athens.

The Athenians manners.

Socrates a citizen of Athens.

Anaxagoras was of Clazomenia: and for that he affirmed the Sun which the Athenians wor-
B ſhipped for God, to be a fiery ſtone, he was by the ſentence of ſome few condemned to dy. They alſo proclaimed, that whoſoeuer would kill Diagoras of Melus ſhould be rewarded with a talent for his labour, only for that this Diagoras was ſaid to deride their myſteries: Protagoras alſo had bin by them taken and put to death, had he not made quick eſcape, only for that they ſuppoſed him to haue written certain doubts of the Athenian gods. And what wonder is it that they ſo vſed theſe famous men, who ſpared not to vſe the like cruelty vpon women? For they killed a prieſt, for that ſome accuſed her to worſhip ſtrange gods; and their law appointed, that whoſo did introduce ſtrange gods into their citie, ſhould be puniſhed with death. It is therfore euident, that they who enacted ſuch ſtraight laws, beleeued not the gods of other nations to be gods: for had they beleeued in them, they would not haue depriued themſelues of the benefit of many
C gods. The very Scythians (who delight in manſlaughter, ſo that they very little differ from brute beaſts) yet do they think themſelues bound to maintaine their owne lawes, as beſt, ſo that they ſlew Anacharſis a famous Greek, that came vnto them, only for that he ſeemed to attribute too much vnto the Grecian gods, yea thou maiſt finde many among the Perſians, who for this cauſe haue been tortured. And it is euident that Apollonius approued the Perſian lawes: for when the Greeks admired their fortitude and concord of opinions concerning God, I meane the fortitude they ſhewed in burning of their temples, this Apollonius in all things imitated the Perſians, violating other mens wiues, and putting out their childrens eyes; whereas our lawes adiudge him to death that ſo vſeth vnreaſonable beaſts: And neither the feare and terrour of potentates, nor the fauour of them whom all men reuerence, could euer cauſe vs to forſake or aban-
D don theſe lawes: neither doe wee exerciſe fortitude, to the end to depriue other men of their goods and fortunes by warre, but to keep our owne lawes: and wee who patiently put vp all other iniury; yet if any man do in our religion prouoke vs, we preſently ſeek reuenge, not reſpecting our own ability, yea though thereby wee worke our owne vtter ruine, and calamity. What therfore ſhould moue vs to imitate the lawes of other nations, when they that made thoſe lawes (yea euen the lawmakers themſelues) did tranſgreſſe them? Or how can the Lacedemonians auoid reproach for their inhoſpitalitie, and neglecting mariage? Or the Elians and Thebans for accompanying with men, contrary to the law of nature, which fact moſt ſhamefull, they deemed good and neceſſarie. Yea not content to doe ſo themſelues, they alſo aſcribed the like vnto their gods to be done by them (which the Greeks alſo now of late haue done) and for this cauſe
E they refuſed to marry with their owne women, iudging their ſatisfaction to be contrarie to the preſcript of nature: But I wil ſpeak no more of puniſhment, neither how great malefactors thoſe firſt lawmakers freed from puniſhment, being bribed with money, and how vniuſt they were in the lawes appertaining to wedlock. It is long to examine how great occaſions of impiety they gaue. For many haue already long ago forſaken their lawes: which cannot be ſaid of vs, who for our lawes haue ſuffered loſſe of our cities, fortunes & liues, we keeping & perſiſting in our lawes euen vnto death: and if any Iew be in a ſtrange countrie where there is a tyrant King, yet doth not hee ſo feare him that he would for his command in any iot tranſgreſſe our lawes. If therfore we do valourouſly endure thus much for our lawes, all men muſt needs grant our lawes to be verie good: but if they ſay we ſuffer all theſe calamities for to maintaine wicked or naughty lawes,
F what puniſhment are they not worthy of, who hauing (as they ſay) better lawes then we, do ſo eaſily forſake them, whereas we do maintaine ours euen with our owne liues? But ſeeing antiquitie of lawes is the greateſt argument to proue their goodnes, I wil ſet down of what antiquitie our lawes are, together with our lawmakers opinion of the Deitie; if therfore any one compare our lawes with the lawes of all nations, he ſhall finde that ours are of more antiquitie then theirs by many ages. ons: For though the first Greekes did colourably obserue lawes, yet all their Philosophers did G imitate ours, and our opinions of God; and in humility taught others, communion of life, and conuersation: yea the common people did long since imitate our piety: nither is there any nation either Greeks or Barbarians, who haue not after some manner obserued a Sabbath as we doe, and fasting daies, and candlesticks with light, all which they learned of vs; yea many do also obserue our customs concerning their meats, and our vnity & concord, wherein we excell all other nations, our community also and industrie in arts & labours, and sufferance for our lawes. And which is most to be admired, our law, not hauing any to force vs to obserue it, hath so obliged our hearts, that as God is of all the world honoured without compulsion, so are our lawes amongst vs all, we not forced thereunto: And whosoeuer doth diligently consider his owne nation and family, shal find that which I haue reported, to be true. the voluntary malice of all men: for either they meane that we hauing these good lawes do yet little esteeme them, and follow worse, or if they do not so meane, let them hold their malicious tongue from any further calumniation. For I do not take vpon me the defence of this cause, for that I beare any hatred to any man, but for that I and all the Iewes do honor and reuerence our lawmaker, and beleeue that whatsoeuer he prophecied proceeded from God: yea although our selues did not know the goodnes of our laws, yet the multitude of them that imitate them were a sufficient motiue to induce vs thereunto. But I haue at large and with all sincerity discoursed of our lawes, and common-wealth in my Bookes of our Antiquitie. And I now againe haue made

Our aduersaries affirme vs to haue come of Egyptians: I haue shewed that our forefathers came into Egypt out of some other place. They alledge that we were expelled Egypt for their miserie, in that they were infected with disease; I haue prooued that they came from thence to their owne countrie, by meanes of their own prowesse and force, of their own accord: Others labour to defame our lawmaker as a wicked person, whose vertue many of ancient times, and so long time as hath been since him, do witnesse. It is not needfull to speake more largely of our lawes: for they by themselues appeare pious and good, and such as do not inuite or incite vs to K the hatred of other nations, but rather to communion and friendship, being both enemies to iniquitie, and commanders of iustice, banishers of luxuriousnes, and teachers of frugalitie and labour: forbidding all wars enterprised for auarice, and preparing the people to shew fortitude in them, and for them; inflicting ineuitable punishment vpon their transgressors, not easily to bee deceiued by glosing speeches; and executing in action, all that they in word command: yea amongst vs the execution of them and obseruation is more readie then the words of them: I therfore confidently affirme that we doe teach more pious and vertuous maners then other nations doe. For what can be better then inuiolate pietie? What more iust then to obey the lawe? what more profitable and commodious, then to be at vnitie and peace amongst our selues, and neither to forsake one another in calamitie, nor iniure one another in prosperity, to contemne and de- L spise death in time of warre, and in peace to labour and till our grounds, and to vse other arts and workes, and alwaies to thinke and beleeue, that God beholdeth all our actions, and ruleth and disposeth all things? If this be either written or reserued by any one before this time, wee are then to thank them as being their schollers: but if they are knowne neuer before to haue beene extant, then we are knowne to be the first authors and inuenters of it. Let therefore all Apions and Molons goe, and all others that with them are conuicted of lying and slandering. And this booke is written to thee Ephaphroditus who loueſt the truth, and to others who by thee will, or are desirous to know the same.

Haue not grudged, vertuous Father, to dedicate vnto thee a daies labour; wherein I haue perused, and what in mee lieth, amended the booke which Ioseph writ of the seauen Maccabees brethren: And would it had lien in my power more aboundantly to haue answered your expectation: I haue now (for that I counted the Greek copy) by the Latin coniectur'd the Greek, and altered some things, yet but very few. Ioseph doth not falsly boast himselfe to haue attained to the excellency of the Greeke tongue, and this book will sufficiently witnes the same; wherein he shewed both great vanity and Emphasis, insomuch as he esteemeth to haue handled that famous worke with eloquent stile, and the ornament of discourse. Saint Ierome for this cause entitleth this book, Great eloquence; Suidas ἐνάρετος πανυ; D out of them both we amend the corrupted stile, and call it περὶ αὐτοκρατορος λογισμος, that is, the rule of reason: for the scope of this book tendeth all to proue, that Reason is of no force in man, except it beare soueraignty ouer all inordinate appetites. This is most euidently proued by the bookes of the Maccabees, in the Scripture: which bookes the Iewes did not receiue as Canonicall, yet do they account it among their sacred writ. I cannot but congratulate this worthy Colledge (which though famous for many other things, yet is more happy) for that it is so blessed, as to enioy so worthy and vnspeakable a treasure: Or rather all Colonia Agrippina, that happy & fortunate City; yet in nothing more happy, then for that it alone doth in her bosome shrine so many, so sacred, and excellent pledges of piety: yet should it be more happy if it could expresse their vertues, whose sacred relickes it so religiously keepeth, and imitate their manners whose bodies it possesseth, to wit, if in sincerity of religion it imitated the piety of three kings, and the sacred purity of the eleuen Virgines, if it resembled the most valiant E young men, the Maccabees, and the inuincible courage of that woman, whose valourous constancy no misery could conquer. And this best portion and part of her felicity, this worthy City might bestowe vpon her selfe, yea and double the same. Do thou go forward in that vvhich thou hast in hand, to vvit, in spreading the praise of those Martyrs, making that vertuous example more commendable, & your City more famous.

FLAVIVS IOSEPHVS H

OF THE RVLE OF REASON; A MOST ELOQVENT BOOK, CORRECTED BY DESIDERIVS ERASMVS, MOST LIVELY SETTING DOVVNE THE Martyrdome of the Maccabees.

I

I Am at the inſtant requeſt of Polybius of Megalopolis, to put in writing the conſtant ſuffring of the Maccabees, worthy all admiration, not in a Rhetoricall and pleaſing ſtile, but rather after our owne Country faſhion, thereby to exhort our nation to patience in their calamities. But firſt of all, it is neceſſary for vs to ſpeak ſomthing of reaſon, and aſſigne vnto it the power and vertue to deliberate. For hee who hath once fully determined to ſuffer all miſery for Gods ſake, is in my opinion already a Martyr: it is therefore a great merit once to haue ſo determined; and therefore, as is aboue ſaid, reaſon beareth the rule of all inferiour paſſions; and then if deſtiny deny vs K opportunity to ſuffer, yet haue we ſuffred all, becauſe we purpoſed to ſuffer all. Whoſo therefore will renounce the world and aſpire onely to celeſtiall things, he muſt exerciſe ſobriety, baniſh glutteny, with his page laſciuiouſnes, and all other ſuch like vices as may poſſeſſe and captiue the minde: hee muſt likewiſe mount vp to the top of Vertues tower, that after, he may from thence war againſt the vices of this body, griefe and fear; the firſt wherof aſſaulteth vs when we begin, the laſt when we haue begun. There are many examples of the valiant ſouldiers of God, which I would vſe, but that the ornaments ſprung from the wombe of one woman may ſuffice me, which ſhee brought forth, not at one birth, but with the ſame piety and zeale. And firſt I will ſpeak of Eleazar, the cauſe and example of their paſſion, and then I wil relate what tortures and torments their mother endured: yet cannot man, but onely God deter- L mine, who amongſt them was firſt, and who laſt in this noble agony. They therefore, beeing all ſettled in one opinion, reſembling one another more in minde then they did in body, duly conſidered the frailty of this life, and therefore neither delighted in the flatteries of the world, nor any alluring enchantments thereof. They ſhewed themſelues not to eſteeme of torments, fetters, nor no other ſort of tortures impoſed vpon them: and to returne to our firſt ſaying, they premeditated patience, to endure whatſoeuer the Iudges cruelty could deuiſe. I will therefore what I may, praiſe the fortitude of theſe brethren, or rather I will with all truth rehearſe the moſt worthy agony of theſe holy men, which deſerues all commendations; and ſetting al adulation apart, proſecute with a bare hiſtoricall narration the manner of their martyrdome.

Reaſon hath dominion ouer our paſsions.

The death of the 7. brethren and their mother.

But before I begin to declare the death of Nobility, I will a little entreat of reaſon, which as I M haue affirmed is no ſmall motiue to martyrdome. Reaſon it is, that maketh vs obſerue faſts and vſe abſtinence; it is reaſon that makes vs deſpiſe mony, and by it we are taught not to account of dignities and honours, which all men generally aime at, yea reaſons gift it is that we do reſiſt the heat of luſtfull deſires. Hence commeth it, that hauing once ouercom ſuch things as the fleſh delights in, we find our ſelues a little able to reſiſt, we alſo learn to deſpiſe paines and torments, and

The deſcription of reaſon & wiſdome.

ſo

A so resolue to suffer all things that shall be imposed vpon vs. Which, that it may more plainly appeare, let vs search out the cause of this order, and we shal finde wisdome to be the cause hereof. For no man can determine and distinguish good from euill, that is not endued with wisedome; this wisdome is alwaies accompanied with iustice, and iustice is still ioined with vertue, and vertue and temperance cannot be separated; so that this wisedome consisteth vpon foure parts. Besides these, there are two things that either do cause or hinder passion, to wit, paine and pleasure: one of which we do alwaies refuse, and the other we alwaies desire; yet where pleasure ariseth, and is presently by reasons rule put away, the minde is there strengthened; and paine compared with glory, is through hope of a greater reward contemned before it come; and being come, B our minde is ashamed not to suffer that which before it was resolued to do. Reason therefore is the guide of all our actions, and by it we despise torments, and detest vice, which like a skilfull husbandman pruneth and cutteth away superfluous branches, and killeth the heat of all corrupt and hurtfull humors, onely leauing that to remaine in vse, which may some way be profitable to vs.

Griefe and paine cause or hinder passiō

Reason resembleth a skilfull gardener.

Thus reason purifieth vs by passion, encouraging to suffer, and in our suffering and agony strengthening vs. Who is not desirous to eat of the flesh of wilde beasts and fishes? And who lusteth not to eat of feathered foules? nay, do not the dainty dishes got either in sea or land inuite vs to eat of them? What then causeth vs to abstain from them? that all men desire them, yet no man eats them? Euen in this thing the mind is taught to ouercome it selfe in delightful obiects, and to to bridle all pleasure, that when occasion of martyrdome is offred, the minde setting aside C all vanities, will not for a little pleasure forget his accustomed vertue.

For this cause was Ioseph iustly praised in that he was not ouercome by lust, which reigneth in a youthfull body: this reason so worketh with sound aduice and mature counsell, that it againe recouereth lost friendship, and getteth new, and suffreth no cruelty to be committed. Of this we haue also the example of Moses, who had he not iust occasion to be angry against Dathan and Abiram, reason (no doubt) would haue caused him to haue smothered all griefe of minde. Did not our father Iacob with great vehemency reproue his sonnes, Simeon and Leui, that without reason they had vsed such cruelty, saying, Cursed be your anger? Which anger and wrath of theirs had it been bridled with reason, neither had they been cursed, nor the other had perished. For this cause, God, the maker of mankinde, when hee fashioned vs and our manners, hauing finished all D lineaments of the body, he now placed the minde to bee in it, and to rule it, leauing it certaine precepts to obserue and keep, to wit, temperance, and to imbrace and follow that which is good, and cleaue vnto iustice, and rule and bridle all passions in the body subiect vnto it, & obserue the precepts of God.

An instance of Iosephs chastity.

But some will aske mee wherefore wee offer to commit wickednes, seeing that reason ruleth our passion? But it is a ridiculous thing to thinke that reason so ruleth, for reasons rule cannot hinder the appetite from desire, but onely correct desire, and so preuaile that it suffer with patience the losse or abstinence from such things as it desired. For example sake, reason cannot hinder thee from being angry, but it can so worke that thou commit no impiety when thou art angry: in like manner, it cannot hinder thee from desiring filthy pleasure, yet can it cause thee not E to yeeld vnto it.

Reason therefore cannot vtterly extinguish vice, but onely bridleth it. Witnesse in this the example of holy Dauid, who fighting against strangers with great successe, and being at euening weary and faint, he came vnto his princely tabernacle, that was guarded by his souldiers, where he found them all at meat: yet himselfe being thirsty, durst not drinke, notwithstanding water was hard by, onely for that religion disswaded him, for he had vowed not to drink before he had conquered his enemies. Hee also forbade his men to drink, so that they might fight more courageously, if not for that they were valiant, at least for that so they might haue drinke. Whilst thus his thirst encreased, three young men of strong bodies armed themselues, and taking with them a vessell to put water in, they went vnto the enemies camp, and there assaulted the watchmen, who for feare of death fled, and so they past through the camp till such time as they came where the water was, and taking some from thence, they brought it to the king. But holy Dauid so bridled his humane appetite, that by reason hee quenched his desire, and shewed an excellent token of patience, teaching how the feare of God was to be prefered before all things. For taking the water he had much wished for, and which had been gotten with such danger, hee presently powred it on the ground, as a sacrifice to God, chusing rather to die for thirst, then to offend the diuine maiesty: yet reason is not so forcible, that it is able without due cõsideration to G represse the inordinate motions of the minde, and mitigate the griefe of the body. But it is now time to come to our history, yet is not this former discourse to be thought impertinent, for that Seleucus and Nicanor. it is some what appertaining to the matter ensuing. Such was the wisedome and fidelity of our forefathers, that Seleucus, king of Asia, enriched our priests, and being a man of another religion, did ascribe all his actions and worthy deeds to the religion and faith of our ancestors. But wicked mens madnes could not herewith be satisfied. For one Simon, hating the high priest Onias, Simon a traytor to his country. and finding no waies or meanes to be reuenged of him in his own country, went vnto Apollonius, Gouernor of Syria, Phœnicia and Cilicia, and before him in a publike assembly told him, that he could help the king to an infinite treasure, for (quoth he) there is hidden in Ierusalem an infinite deale of gold and siluer, which by right belongeth vnto king Seleucus: Apollonius hearing H this, praised and commended Simon, and confiscated the gold and siluer to the treasure-house of Apollonius, captain of Syria, came with an army to Ierusalem. Seleucus; and hauing authority from the king to get it, hee leuied an army, and so accompanied with Simon, came vnto our country, purposing if any violence were offred, to vse the defence of his souldiers.

When the treasure-house of our Temple was now a sacking, Onias wept bitterly, and said, that it was a heauy sight to them to whom this treasure was committed, to see it, or any part of it taken away. But Apollonius, neither respecting the teares and intreaties of the ould men, women, nor children, presed into the Temple, they all praying God to punish him, and to defend their Temple. Being now with a great guard of armed men entred into the holy temple, there appea-Angels vpon horses, shining with fiery brightnes. red certaine Angels on horseback with weapons in their hands, and shining with a fierie flame I about them, & they daunted the courage of this Infidell Apollonius, who presently fell downe flat vpon his face; and lying so a great while, at last he came a little to himselfe: and rising vp, he leaned vpon his shoulder who kept the temple, not being able to stand alone, he was so terrified with the vision he had seen. When he came a little to himselfe, and was in some hope of recouery, he stretched both his hands towards heauen, and himselfe despairing to obtaine pardon for his offence committed, he besought the Hebrews (whose temple he came to spoile) to make intercession for him, himselfe with teares crauing pardon for his offence, and not onely acknowledging his fault, but also confessing himselfe to haue deserued death, and all punishment possi-Onias by praier obtained Apollonius his life. ble. Holy Onias seeing this, and fearing also that if Apollonius should then dy, the Hebrews would be suspected to haue made him away, he made praiers to God for him, and so obtained his ene- K mies life. Apollonius presently hasted to Seleucus to let him vnderstand what had happened, but when he came hee found Seleucus dead, and Antiochus raigning in his steed, a man of tyrannous Antiochus his rage against the Iewes. nature, who bare an ancient grudge to Onias the high priest: and therefore made Iason his brother high priest in his stead; Iason promising Antiochus, in lieu of this good turne, to pay him 3660. talents of siluer euery yeare.

This Iason beeing now made high priest, and chiefe amongst all the nation of the Iewes, hee presently forced all the people to impiety, and to forsake religion; so that to build baths, he hindred the defence and building of the Temple, and all Doctors of our nation conspired with him in this iniquity. But hereat God was presently wroth: who being displeased, it was not needfull to seek forraine enemies, for Antiochus himselfe was incited to rage against them. Who war- L ring against Ptolomeus, king of Egypt, hee heard it reported that the Iewes did deeme him to be dead, yet was hee very gallantly entertained by the inhabitants of Ierusalem: and presently after the fight, he made an edict, that whoso amongst the Iewes refused to offer sacrifice to the gods, hee should presently die vpon the wheele. But the godly minded of our nation did little esteem this edict, yea the women circumcising their infants (as our law requireth) did afterward cast themselues downe headlong, to the end that they might so obtaine a present death without longer delay. Antiochus perceiuing that the seuerity of his Edict could not compell the Hebrewes to forsake their religion, but that men voluntarily did chuse death; hee sitting in an eminent place from whence all the Iews might behold him, calling all of them together, he cau-

A ſwines fleſh: for it is contrary to all wiſe mens aduice to credit the Iews opinions, and to refuſe that meat which nature hath as well ordained for mankinde as any other. Wee ſhew our ſelues vngratefull for Gods benefits, who contemne his graces, and make difference where nature hath made none; or what reaſon is there to ſhew that this beaſt is more abhominable then others? Either all beaſts are to be eaten, or elſe all to be eſchewed: it is ſuperſtition and idleneſs to bar our ſelues from any thing by a law, when we haue no other for it but our will. Set apart thoſe vaine and ſottiſh opinions, and at leaſt in this venerable age change thy opinion into better. Or ſuppoſe your lawes are forcible and to bee obſerued, yet will they excuſe thee, ſeeing thou doſt not ſin voluntarily, but by compulſion.

Eleazars answer to Antiochus.

B Eleazar, being permitted to ſpeake, thus replied to Antiochus, who both exhorted and forced him to breach of his lawes. We, Antiochus, do not follow a vaine report, but we obſerue the verity of religion which our fathers kept, and feare of torments cannot make vs embrace another religion, and forſake our own: yea, ſuppoſe our religion deliuerd to vs by our fathers had no firm grounds, yet would I in nothing, no not compelled by torments, forſake it. Doe not eſteeme it a ſmall matter to eat impious meat, and to taſte of that which is ſacrificed to Idols, for it is a profane thing to touch things that are profane. Our law condemneth your Philoſophy, wherein he is moſt ignorant that thinketh himſelfe moſt wiſe. We are taught to embrace ſobriety, to ſubdue in vs all inordinate appetite, to keep our bodies chaſte, and to ſuffer with patience whatſoeuer for Gods ſake is inflicted vpon vs, and not to deny the truth, iuſtice or piety, or GOD, who alone is true: and therefore I refuſe this profane meat, well knowing what I ought to eat, as warranted

C therein by the precept of Almighty God, whoſe lawes I haue learned to obey, and eſchew all meats ſacrificed to Idols, and embrace with all my force that which is expedient for the ſoule: it is open tyranny to compell any one to that which religion forbiddeth, and to command that which is contrary to iuſtice. Do what thou wilt, mock at thy pleaſure, yet ſhalt thou be more derided then thou thy ſelfe derideſt. I will perſiſt in the holy ſteps of my forefathers; notwithſtanding thou therefore with tyrannous hands pluck out mine eies, and with a ſharp knife rip vp my entrailes, thou ſhalt neuer conquer me. I will dy ſafe and ſound, and patient in the loue of God; neither flatter thy ſelfe for that I am aged, and that my body is now feeble: if need bee that I muſt be ſacrificed for Gods ſake, thou ſhalt finde me in theſe yeers as luſty as a childe, as conſtant as a young man, yea and moſt ioyfull in torments: and prepare an extraordinary fire for mee, or

D what elſe ſoeuer, thou ſhalt finde mee more conſtant amidſt torments, then now I am before I come to them. O ſacred religion! I will neuer violate thee the foundation of my ſaluation, the defence of the beleeuer, the ground of faith; neuer will I lift vp my hands contrary to thy precepts, neuer will I beleiue any thing to be iuſt, which is repugnant to that which thou haſt taught me: I will not loſe the merit of ſo many yeeres, nor relinquiſh the faith I haue hitherto embraced. The chaſte, pure, and deuout company of fathers ſhall receiue me into their number, where I ſhall not feare (O impious king) thy threats. But thou haſt changed the name of king to tyrant, yet thou ſhalt neuer alledge againſt mee my deed, my conſent, my word.

Eleazars conſtancy.

Eleazar cruelly whipped.

Whil'ſt Eleazar, full of conſtancy and liberty, ſpake thus, the ſouldiers that ſtood there about haled him to be tortured; and ſtripping him naked, they hangd him vp, and whipped him, and

E whil'ſt on either ſide he was beaten, a crier with an impious voice ſtill cried vnto him, Obey the kings pleaſure and command. But worthy Eleazar was not ouercome by torments, but ſuffered all tortures, as though hee had been in reſt and ſleep, and did manfully and without feare endure all torments: and fixing his venerable eies vpon heauen, he knew in whom he beleeued, and to whom he ſacrificed his ſoule; and beholding the fleſh on each ſide rent and torn from his body, and the bloud iſſuing out in great aboundance, he admired his owne patience, and thanked God the author thereof. At laſt, ſeeing in himſelfe the frailty of all fleſh (which is ſcarcely able to endure ſo ſharp torments) he fell vpon his face, which with ſtripes was all rent and torne, ſtil glorifying God, as he did before his fal. Then one of the ſoldiers to gratifie the king, did like a mad man ſpurn and tread vpon him, thereby to increaſe his torments more. But Eleazar, both ſtrong

F in body and minde, did like a right champion of the true GOD, neuer ſhrinke at thoſe paines, but this patient ould man did by patience ouercome the cruelty of his tormenters, ſo that euen the torturers themſelues admired, that hee endured ſo many torments. Then the kings officers coming vnto him, ſaid, How lõg Eleazar wilt thou neglect to obey the king, & to free thy ſelf frõ torments? eat of the fleſh of ſwine, & redeem thy ſelfe from all thou endureſt. Eleazar, although in this martyrdome hee had been ſilent, yet could he not without anſwering endure to heare ſo

All which this reuerend old man did moſt willingly ſuffer, and ſo was conſumed with the flame: yet when nature began to faile, hee ſpake after this manner, lifting vp his dazeled eies to heauen: Thou art he (O God) from whom life H and ſaluation proceedeth: behold, I dy for obſeruing thy lawes, be mercifull to this thy nation,

Eleazars laſt words in the fire.

It is moſt true therefore which we at firſt affirmed, to wit, that the enduring of paines and torments is wrought by our reaſons lore: which once determined and reſolued, maketh a proſperous ſuffering of paines with all patience, which wiſely aduiſing men to that which is beſt, doth ſettle and confirme our opinions to follow it. If therefore reaſon and the inferiour powers bee at variance, we muſt ſubiect them to reaſon if wee will make a perfect victory. With this guide of I reaſon our father Eleazar was moſt ſafely directed, neither to bee ouercome with paines, nor to giue place vnto vnlawfull inticements and allurements, he ſaued the ſhippe of his body from all ſhipwracke that might ariſe by the tempeſtuous ſtormes of vanity, and ſuffered himſelfe with no contrary wind to be driuen from the right courſe: yea, though it was toſſed vpon the waues of tyranny, yet did it remaine ſound and vnbroken, and keeping a direct courſe, arriued in the hauen of ſaluation. Neuer any man did ſeeke ſo valiantly to defend his city from an enemy, as this holy old man did his ſoule, who amongſt ſtripes, croſſes and flames, was ſtill the ſame man he was before. For as the toppe of a high rocke ſtandeth ſafe, and reſiſteth the waue without any domage vnto it ſelfe; euen ſo did the rocke of reaſon in this man beat backe the rage of thoſe tempeſtuous waues that did bear againſt his body, not permitting them to breake in and pearce K
the celeſtiall and diuine power of the ſoule. O happy old man, more bleſſed then all of thy age, O prieſt more ſacred then all other prieſts, who didſt not pollute thy ſacred lippes with profane meats; impiety found no entrance that way, from whence ſo many prayers to God had proceeded. The tyrants cruelty could not preuaile againſt thee, thou therefore art made an example for all prieſts of God to imitate. Such a one behooued it a prieſt to bee, more ſtrong then torments, more able to ſuffer then the torturers to inflict puniſhment, more forcible then Princes commands, yea and more potent then the fire, wherein thou didſt periſh: and finally, thou waſt ordained to be crowned with the lawrell of martyrdome for thy ſufferance. Thou haſt ſurpaſſed all antiquity, thou ſhalt be an example to all poſterity. If then feeble old age, wherin all ſtrength and heat of body was extinguiſhed, now vnfit to ſuffer torments (as beeing already broken with L age) could by the aduice of reaſon endure ſo many torments, ſo many miſeries, who dare deny reaſon to be the chiefe cauſe of our ſufferance? Wee haue ſeene that all cruelty hath been ouercome by a determination to perſiſt in the ſeruice and feare of God: yet many affirme, that not all men who vſe the aduice of reaſon are able to vndergo ſuch agonies; but their aſſertion is vaine, and of no force: for moſt euident it is, that he onely is ouercome by paine, whom wiſdom hath not armed with patience. And no maruel if he, who raſhly enterpriſeth ſo waighty a matter, and without due conſideration, do at laſt forſake and repent himſelf of that which he ſo vnaduiſedly vndertooke. But if wee with due aduice and deliberation arme our ſelues, it is not an eaſie matter to remooue vs by any misfortune from our determination; when we make account that miſfortune will betide vs, we are not eaſily diſmaied thereat when it doth betide, for that nothing M befell vs that we expected not.

Reaſons victorie.

A ſimilitude taken from the rocke.

Eleazars praiſe.

Therefore he that is wiſe and valiant is able to conquer his paſſions, for that he doth well deliberate, and when he commeth to his agony can put his determination in execution. Neither is the wiſdome of this old man ſo much to be admired, ſeeing children, and as it were infants, haue ſo deſerued commendations in this point, that they did work aſtoniſhment in their tormentors;

for

A for the courage and cruelty of Antiochus, being ouercome by the wisedome of old age, was now the more increased, and by wicked counsell caused seuen worthy children of the Hebrewes to be brought vnto Antioch, out of their Castle Sosandrum, who being yong in yeares, and so as he thought weake and vnable to suffer torments, his hope was that either by perswasions or terror of tortures, he might force them to renounce their religion. He therfore commanded these seuen, together with their mother Salomona who now grew well in yeares, to be brought before him: so they according to his command were brought, being of excellent beauty and worthy children of so vertuous a mother; yea they resembled Angels, their faces shining like the cleare light of the Sun, their eyes sparkled in most comely and decent manner, as testifying that they surpassed in vertue all other of humane race and condition. She was descended of most vertuous
B and noble parentage, and so she her selfe had continued and liued; but that excellent feature of bodie, enriched with nobility of blood and dignity, was now also made more noble by vertue & fortitude, wherein she passed all other things that could be said in her commendations. The tyrant beholding them and their mother amongst them, with merry and gladsome countenance, he thus craftily spake vnto the children. I wish your good (O admirable yong men) for so both your beautie of bodie and noble parentage perswade me: doe not therefore like mad men resist my command, auoid not onely torments but death also. For I desire not only to exalt you vnto honour, but also to encrease your riches and possessions; contemne the superstitious and superfluous beliefe of your countrimen, and imbrace our religion: Which if you refuse to do (as I hope you will not) I will deuise all torments, whereby I may by a lingring and painefull death
C consume you. And to the end to terrifie them the more, hee commanded all instruments of torment to bee presented vnto their view and eye-sight. So wheeles, rods, hookes, rakes, rackes, caudrons, cages, gridirons, were brought forth; and engines to torment the fingers and hands, gauntlets, awles, bellowes, brazen pots, and frying pans: for these are the names which we find. For that which I tearme bellowes, was a thin plate of iron to kindle or blow the fire with, like a fan, and farre more horrible deuices of torments were shewed vnto them, too long to rehearse: whereof they hauing had a sight, Antiochus said.

Antiochus caused seuen noble young men of the Hebrewes & their mother to be brought to Antioch. 2. Macc. 7.

The kings exhortation to the seuen brethren.

Consent vnto me, O prudent young men: for if that I command you to commit a sinne; yet doe not you offend in doing it, seeing you commit it onely vpon compulsion. But the young youthes inflamed with a diuine spirit and sense, contemned so many kinds of torments, and
D despised the tyrants threats and flatteries; and most godly (for they gaue him no iust occasion) they did driue the tyrant into a great rage. And by this it is euident how reason is master ouer passion: for if any sloathfull man not before trained vp to it, should of a sudden come to such a push, at the very sight of such torments his minde would haue been troubled, and his countenance appalled, his legs vnder him would haue trembled, and he with feare confounded: so that he would presently haue stept back from such an agony, & would forthwith haue alledged himself vnable to beare so many and so grieuous torments, saing. My self being vnwise, what should » I haue made choice of? Whether to endure those torments, or accept of the promised benefits? » Whether should I haue been mooued to pitie mine owne age, or to compassionate my mother? » God would not haue denyed pardon for this deed, I being forced thereunto: and by dooing it »
E though against my will, I shall get the Kings fauour. But where reason and aduice taketh place, » and hath well trained the minde to perfection, the other consequently followeth: As by the ex- » ample of these brethren I will declare, who as it were all with one voice denied to eate of the sa- » crificed swines flesh, as they were commanded. Wherefore (said they) O tyrant dost thou per- » secute vs that are innocent? We both desire and wish to die, and will vntill such time as death » expelleth life, firmely keep that which God commanded and Moses taught vs. And thou tyrant, » do not seek to seduce vs by protesting feined loue towards vs: thou louer of iniustice, master of » cruelty, deuiser of iniquitie, the pardon which thou doest offer is to vs more painefull then pu- » nishment: wee are armed with contempt of death, and esteeme not thy words, as being by our » late master Eleazar taught to despise them. Why then doest thou esteeme such pusillanimity to »
F be in vs yong men seeing of late thou foundst such courage in an old man? We follow him: thou » canst not try and know our minds, except by tearing our bodies thou search them out: we will » safely and securely suffer for our God any thing, and leauing this earth wee shall be entertained » into heauen; and thou for so tyrannizing most cruelly vpon innocent soules shalt be reserued to » eternall fire.

The young mens constancy.

The 7. brethren reply to Antiochus.

The tyrant greatly mooued, to see that he could neither preuaile by faire promises, nor by threatnings, he cauſed them to be beaten with buls peaſels: and firſt of all he commanded Maccabeus, the eldeſt of the ſeuen brethren, to be ſtript, and ſtretched out vpon a racke, and his hands to be bound behinde him, and then to be moſt cruelly beaten, who wearied his tormenters by ſuffering (ſo great the force of vertue is) ſo that they deſired more to leaue beating him, then he requeſted they ſhould leaue. This done, he was put vpon a wheele, and a waight hanged at his feet, and ſo ſtretched round about it, that his ſinewes and entrailes brake, and ſo his paines increaſed: yet he being ouercome with paine, his mouth was not for all this ſtopped or hindered from calling vpon God, who beheld all; and reprouing the tyrant who deuiſed thoſe torments for the innocents, and taking ſtrength, he is ſaid to haue cried out after this manner; Bloudy tyrant, who perſecuteſt the Maieſty of God: I, whom thou thus tormenteſt, am no Witch, nor one who haue murdered and killed another man, but one who dies for iuſtice obſeruing the law, and for charity. Then when the torturers, ouercome with compaſſion, willed him to ſubmit himſelfe vnto the kings pleaſure, he anſwered: O ye wicked miniſters of tyranny! your wheels are not ſo ſharp and cruell, that I thereby will be forced to forſake heauen, whereon my mind is fixed: teare my fleſh; yea, if ſo you pleaſe, roſt it at the fire: torture and torment each parcell of my body with ſeuerall cruelty; you ſhall for all this finde your ſelues vnable to force vs young men to impiety.

Antiochus cõmanded Maccabeus to be racked.

The death of the elder brother.

As hee thus ſpake, a fire was kindled, and hee, as hee was vpon the wheele racked, was ſo throwne into the fire: and thus he was by flames and torments ſo burned, that his bowels appeared; his mind nothing moued when his fleſh yielded ouercome with paines, who amidſt his pangs cryed thus vnto his brethren: O beloued brethren, learne of mee an example of vertue, conſider the ſtrength of an inuincible courage, contemne and deſpiſe the alluring baits of this world, and rather obey God then this tyrant, who can if he pleaſe humble the proud and mighty, and exalt the lowly and deiected. As thus hee ſpake, hee was taken out of the flame, and ſleane aliue, his tongue was pulled out of his mouth, and hee put into a frying panne, and ſo he departed out of this life to the great admiration of all that beheld him, and the ioy of his brethren and mother; and went before them to heauen, there to prepare a kingdome for himſelfe and them.

The ſecond brother brought.

After him, the ſecond brother, called Aber, was haled by the ſouldiers: and before the tyrant asked him whether he would relent, he cauſed all thoſe torments to be ſhewed him, thereby to terrifie him: but he nothing thereat moued, and denying to eat of that foreſaid ſacrifice, his hands were bound with iron chaines, and hee being hanged vp by them, the skinne of his body was ſleane from the crowne of his head vnto his knees: ſo that the entrailes in his breaſt appeared naked; yet in ſuch manner, as yet he might abide greater torments. For hee was caſt before a cruell Libard thirſting moſt extreamely after bloud, to the intent that he might deuoure with his teeth the reſt of his body: but the beaſt ſmelling of him (no doubt by the great handy worke of Almighty God) forgot his cruelty, and turning away his face, hee did no hurt to the Martyr.

But heereat the tyrants rage increaſed; and the Martyr, by ſuffering ſuch torments, was made more conſtant, crying aloud: O how pleaſant is that death vnto me, which is cauſed by all ſorts of torments for Gods ſake! yea, ſo much the more pleaſant, for that I aſſuredly hope to finde reward for it in heauen. Let theſe torments inflicted vpon mee (O tyrant) ſatisfie thy cruelty, for my paine is not by thy tortures increaſed, but rather my pleaſure, as thou ſhalt finde by my patience in this agony. More willing am I to ſuffer then thou to puniſh, yea my paine in ſuffering is leſſe then thine by inflicting the ſame vpon me. I am tormented for vertue & obſeruing the law, and the iuſtice of God ſhall baniſh thee from thy regall ſeat: thou by tormenting art tormented, and almoſt conſumed, thy wrath and fury being almoſt ſpent vpon me in vaine, thou ſhalt not eſcape the day of iudgement: eternall torments are there prepared for thee, which neither thy profane minde is able to indure, nor thy cruelty of power to decline, thy ſinfull ſoule being condemned to eternall puniſhments. Thus, remaining conſtant in his faith, and animated by his brothers example, he departed to heauen.

Machir the third brother is brought.

Then Machir the third ſon was brought, whom all men now pitied for the death of his two brethren, & many exhorted him by his brothers examples to deſiſt from his opinion, & ſo auoid puniſhmẽt: but he being angry hereat, thus replied; One father begat vs, one mother bore vs, one maſter inſtructed vs, we are all of one minde, and all like affected, do therefore no longer prolong the time in vaine. I came hither to ſuffer, and not to ſpeake, vſe all your tyranny poſſible againſt

A this body: for you haue no power at all ouer my ſoule. The tyrant hereat moued to ſee this third nothing relent by his brothers death, he deuiſed more cruelty then humane wit alone could inuent. Wherefore he commanded a globe to be brought, and tied the holy martyr about it in ſuch ſort, that all his bones were ſet out of ioint, and diſplaced: wherat the holy martyr was nothing diſmaid. The skin alſo of his head and face was pild off, and then he was put on the wheele: but he could not be rackt any worſe; for that all his bones were diſplaced, and did hang one ſeparated from another in moſt pitifull manner: and when bloud iſſued from him aboundantly, hee was depriued of the vſe of his hands and feet; but perceiuing his life to be ſpent, hee ſpake thus and died. We, O tyrant, endure this torment for the loue of God, and thou the author of ſuch iniuſt cruelty ſhalt ſuffer euerlaſting paine. Then his tongue being cut out of his mouth, he was put
B into a frying pan, and ſo amidſt thoſe torments yeelded vp the ghoſt.

Next after, followed Iudas, the fourth brother, whom all the people perſwaded and entreated to obey the king: but he, contemning their praiers and exhortations, ſaid thus with all conſtancy: Your fire ſhall neither ſeparate nor ſeuer mee from the law of God, nor from my brethren, who inſtead of this mortall life enioy life euerlaſting. I denounce vnto thee, O tyrant, deſtructiō and ouerthrow; but to ſuch as beleeue, ſaluation: make trial of me therefore thou cruel wretch, and ſee if God will forſake me, who hath with open and ſtretched out armes receiued my three brethren that are gone before mee, and whom the wombe of ſo holy a mother at ſeuerall times brought forth vnto glory. The cruel tyrant hearing this, was much moued, and leapt down from his chaire to torment this martyr himſelfe, that ſo he might ouercome him, and in his fury com-
C manded his tongue to be cut forth: but he heereat not terrified ſaid to Antiochus, This cruelty will nothing auaile thee, neither ſhalt thou heereby tyrant, as thou ſuppoſeſt, conquer mee. Our God needs not by voice to be awakened, but rather by ſecret cogitation to be praid vnto to help his ſeruants: he prouideth for them that hold their peace, and heareth the prayers of ſuch as do call vpon him, if they deſerue to be heard, and only requireth purity of ſoul. For our God knoweth all things before we ask; and before we our ſelues enter into cogitation therof, he vnderſtandeth our neceſſity: cut out my tongue, thou canſt not cut out my mind while my life remaineth. Thoſe praiers which by it I haue vttered to Almighty God, haue taught it to ſuffer: would God thou wouldſt ſo ſanctifie all parts of my body by puniſhing them, for thou therein inflicteſt puniſhment on thy ſelfe, and reward vpon me, and think not that thou ſhalt thus eſcape
D long vnpuniſhed. When he had thus ſpoken, his tong was cut out of his mouth, and he bound to a ſtake, and there he was beaten with ropes ends: and he did patiently endure this, notwithſtanding the colour of his face became dead and warme. Being looſed from thence, he was put vpon the whele: and then praying for his countrimen, hee by death went vnto the reſt of his brethren.

Iudas, the fourth brother, is brought.

The death of the fourth brother.

I Then Achas, the fift brother, before he was haled to torments, ſpake in this manner; Behould (thou tyrant) I come to be puniſhed before thou command mee, hope not therefore any iot to alter his minde, who as thou ſeeſt deſireth to be tormented. The bloud of my four innocent brethren, which thou haſt ſhed, hath condemned thee to hell fire: I am to make them vp the number of fiue, that by it thy paines may be encreaſed. Tell me (bloudy wretch) for what offence by E vs cōmitted doſt thou thus puniſh vs? for what impiety doſt thou ſo perſecute vs? what villany haue we committed? what wickednes, what naughtineſſe haue wee attempted? This is all thou canſt alledge againſt vs, that we honor God our Creator, & liue iuſtly in obedience of his lawes, and therefore do not eſteem thy puniſhments: but they are to vs honour and ſaluation, and not puniſhment: wee ſhall be greatly rewarded by God, if no part of vs bee left free from torment. Whil'ſt thus he ſpake, his executioners by the kings command took him and caſt him into a brazen pot, and was preſt down in it, his head to his feet: and afterward he ſuffred all other tormēts, which his brethren had endured; yet not amazed hereat, he ſodainly ſtarted vp, and thus bitterly inueighed againſt the tyrant: Cruell tyrant, how great benefits doſt thou againſt thy will beſtow vpon vs! yea, the more thou art incenſed againſt vs, the more acceptable to God ſhalt thou
F make vs: yea, I ſhould be ſory if thou ſhewedſt mercy vpon me. This ſhort affliction gaineth vs life euerlaſting; if this temporall death ſhould not betide me, euerlaſting life could not befal me. And thus he finiſht his agony, and died.

Achas, the fift brother preſented himſelfe to torments before hee was called.

Then the tormenters laid hands vpon the ſixt brother, who was called Areth, whom the tyrant permitted either to chuſe honour or puniſhment: but hee aggrieued at his offer, ſaid; Although tyrant I be younger in yeers then my martyred brethren, yet my conſtancy of mind to theirs humors running into it might cause ache: and this don, he caused a fire to be made so far off him, that it could not burne him, but rost him. He also commanded him as he hung to be pricked with awles, that so the heat might pearce into the holes they made in his flesh. Whil'st thus he was tormented, much bloud like froth gatherd about his head and face, and he then spake in this maner;

O noble fight! O valiant war! O strife betweene piety and impiety! These men haue past their

A expect any fauour at thy hands, I will follow my bretheren, and remaine conſtant in our lawe. The tyrant hearing this, was wroth, and cauſed him to bee tormented: but his mother in torment comforted him, and with her kinde hands held his head, when with violence of the tortures blood iſſued out of his mouth, noſe and priuie parts, the tormente ſhot ceaſing till life in him was almoſt ſpent: but they (by Gods appointment) gaue ouer, and ſo he tooke ſtrength againe to endure more then any of his brethren had done; at laſt, his hands and armes being cut off, hee lifted vp his eyes to heauen, and cryed; O Adonai, O Sabaor bee mercifull vnto me, and receiue mee into the company of my brethren, let thy wrath now ceaſe and grant them mercy; who by vs doe make interceſſion to thee; hauing ſaid thus, his tongue being pulled out, hee of his owne accord went into the fiery frying-pan; and ſo to the great admiration of Antiochus died. The death of the youngeſt brother.

B Behold how euident it is, that reaſon can rule our affections, ſeeing that children heereby ſhewed more conſtancy then the tyrant could ſhew cruelty. For, it was reaſons force that wrought in them that determination to ſuffer all torments, rather then to forſake the way of ſaluation. Theſe conſtant young men doe fitly reſemble inexpugnable towers; and them, who after a great tempeſt and ſhipwrack, do ſafely enter the harbour of ſaluation, who guiding their courſe amidſt the boyſterous waues, at laſt obtaine the wiſhed ſhoare. For euery one of them ſtrengthened the other by aduice and good counſell, and none of them was like an effeminate perſon, loth to ſuffer martyrdome. None vſed delay herein, but one followed anothers exam-
C ple. Let vs therefore die for our lawe, and imitate the three children, whom the Aſſyrians fury condemned to the fiery furnace, whoſe patience ſpread their fame euen vnto heauen. Whileſt thus one of them exhorted the other, it came to paſſe, that none of them offended, but each one reſolute in his religion, tooke example of the vertue, courage, and conſtancy of their forefather Iſaac, who vnderſtanding that is was Gods will he ſhould be ſacrificed, he refuſed not to ſubmit his bodie to his fathers ſword. Let vs (quoth they) yeeld our ſoules to him, of whom wee receiued both ſoule and body: It is a ſmall matter for vs to ſuffer loſſe of theſe members, ſeeing that wee ſhall in lieu of them receiue euerlaſting bliſſe. Abraham, Iſaac, and Iacob doe ioyfully expect vs, as coheires of their kingdome: let vs glorifie that wombe wherein wee were for ten moneths ſpace, let none of vs be more coward then the other, nor none of vs degenerate from the other. Wee that were all begotten of one father, and ſucked of one milke, muſt in D all things reſemble one another: we had one teacher, and one law inuiolate. And in this golden bond of concord were theſe brethren linked together, and none of them mourned to ſee the other tormented, but all reioyced at the others death. O children, whoſe dignity farre ſurpaſſeth the royaltie of Kings and Princes, whoſe glory and vertue is vnſpeakeable! None of you were terrified with feare, but you ſo haſtened to your deaths, as though you had onely beene to goe to bliſſe and felicity: you were truely brethren, who euen by death were linked together. God hath greatly in you magnified our nation, and in you ſhewed vs all an example of fortitude: whom therefore I thinke he cauſed to be ſo many in number, as were the daies wherein he created the world, ſo that theſe ſeauen brethren may reſemble the ſeauen daies, wherein all things were made. And why ſhould we ſo admire this fortitude in theſe young men, when a woman
E armed her ſelfe with contempt of death? Who indeed is not to bee called a mother, but to be honoured with a higher title then humane frailty can affoord, who bare into this world ſo many triumphs. Reaſon miſtris of our affections. A ſimilitude of the waues. The ſeauen brethren exhort one another to ſuffer death manfully. True brotherhood. A pledge and ſigne of brotherly amity.

For the mother ſeeing her children dead, was with a kinde and godly zeale inflamed alſo to ſuffer: and no maruell, ſeeing that the very brute beaſts, if they perceiue violence offered to their yong, do oppoſe themſelues to perils in their defence, and protect them with their wings, teeth, and tallons: yea and euery one that is any way able to make reſiſtance, oppoſeth herſelfe to the enemy to defend her young. And not onely brute beaſts doe this, but euen Bees doe defend not only their young, but alſo their hony, threatning their ſtings to them that offer to taſte thereof, and more eſteeming the good of their young then their owne liues. But this zealous mo-
F ther directed by the ſpirit of God, & reaſons lore, haſted that her children might die before her, who not being to liue depriued of her children, choſe rather to ſee them die ioyfully then to periſh in care and ſorrow. Therfore when all her family had ſuffered, ſhe then the laſt and glory of them all, came to her agony, deſpiſing the tyrants threats, & offering her motherly breaſt to thoſe torments which her children had ſuffered. vertue, and religion; and that you ſo in all things reſemble her, that you are euery way equal vnalſo as conſtant in her owne martyrdome as you in yours. Shee therefore herein excelled you, ther thou bare theſe children in thy wombe, or created them, who could with dry eyes looke vpon them whileſt they were torn in peeces: yea I ſay little, affirming that thou patiently didſt behold theſe ſights, for euen thou thy ſelfe didſt exhort them thereunto, thou reioycedſt to ſee one of them torne in peeces with fleſhhooks, the other to be racked vpon the wheel, & the third H to be bound and beaten: thou ioyfully admiredſt the others burning, and exhortedſt the reſt not to be terrified herewith, and although whileſt thou beheldſt their torments, thy griefe was greater then that which thou hadſt in childbirth, yet didſt thou frame a lightſome and merry countenance, as though it had been one triumphing. While they were a killing thou didſt laugh, and ſeeing only one of all thy children left, hereat thou didſt nothing relent. Can I deſcribe how e-uery one periſhed, ſeeing thou their mother didſt laugh at their deaths, and when their ſinewes were cut in two, their heads ſleane, their tongues pulled forth by the roots, their hands broken, their bodies in the fire, and caſt vpon iron plates red hot, and vpon wheels, and their ribs pulled in ſunder, and many other torments for which we want names? Neuer was any Swanne, which (by the report of antiquity) ſung ſo ſweet a note before her death (ſweeter then the moſt melo- I dious harmony, and the moſt pleaſant voice) as were the funerall verſes of thoſe thy children that periſhed.

You children were not ouercome by the fabulous Syrens enchantments, who to honor God doubted not to leaue your mother without children: And ſhe, ſprung of noble ſtock, choſe rather to want you all for a ſhort time, then to incurre eternall damnation, wiſhing rather that the bodies of her children ſhould be tormented then their ſoules. Well ſhe knew, that nothing was more fraile and infirme then our bodies: which though perſecution be wanting, are often killed with agues, and abundance of blood or fluxes: And who is ignorant of ſhipwrack incident to ſai-lers, hazard of life vnto them that trauaile, and ſudden death to thoſe that liue in eaſe? ſudden caſualty by fire, and by the hands of theeues, and a thouſand other waies to diſpatch our liues? K Seeing then that our mortall bodies are ſubiect to ſo many miſeries to bring vs to our end, who would not make choyce of a quick diſpatch, whereby we loſe the goods of this world, and gain life euerlaſting? O thou moſt reuerend of all women, the credit of thy nation, and honor of our religion, who like the Arke of Noe didſt perſiſt inuiolate amongſt ſuch ſtormy waues! for as it

Behold of what force and efficacy reaſon is, which oftentimes maketh vs men inferior to women. For neither was Daniel ſo terrified at the ſight of the Lions, nor the 3. children with the fie-rie furnace, as this woman was grieued at the death of all her children before ſhe came to her L owne agony. What would another woman & mother haue done in this caſe, but wept & with pitifull lamentations haue cried: Ah wretch that I am, moſt vnhappy, and miſerable of all that breath, who therfore bare ſo many children into this world, that their ſeueral deaths might be ſo many ſeuerall occaſions of my griefe & ſorrow! ſhe would haue iterated her frequent births, and her toile in her ten moneths bearing them, ſhe would haue bewailed her hapleſſe fortune who brought forth ſo many deaths and dangers, ſhe would haue recounted the milk wherewith ſhe fed them, and their meat ſhe had prepared for them, the paines ſhe had taken with them, how ſhe had carried them in her armes, and ſung to them & taught them to ſpeake, her cares, her watchings, her feare, leaſt any miſhap ſhould betide them: and with weeping teares would haue ſaid, ſhall I a grandmother embrace your children? who a while agoe was too fruitfull a mother, and M am now depriued of you all? If this day I die, I haue none to bury me. But this handmaide of The mothers ſpeech exhorting her ſeuen ſons to ſuffer. God forgot all theſe laments that another mother would haue had, and with an adamant ſenſe ſtouter then the neuer yeelding rocks, did neither forſake her children in their torments, nor in their death, but in a manner compelled them to periſh, and neuer ſorrowed thereat. For being apprehended together with her ſeuen ſonnes, ſhee conſidering Eleazars martyrdome, did thus exhort

A exhort them in the Hebrew tongue. O my moſt deare and louing children, let vs haſten to that agony wherein we may bee a credit to our nation, and gaine of God an euerlaſting reward: let vs without feare preſent our ſelues vnto thoſe torments which Eleazars aged body endured: call to mind our father Abraham of worthy memory, who hauing but one onely ſonne, did ſacrifice him being willed by God ſo to doe, and feared not to bring him to the Altar whom he ſcarcely in his age obtained. Iſaac alſo was willing to be ſacrificed by his father, knowing that God was to be obeyed in all things, the like may be ſaid of Daniel and the three children: beleeue me, we are rather tried then tormented. For whatſoeuer this world affordeth, is mortall and like a ſhadowe.

Thus did this mother arme her childrens mindes with fortitude, and ſhe a woman wrought
B in men manlike mindes. Laſt of all, her children being all dead, ſhe, a worthy mother of ſo many champions, kneeling downe in the place of torment, beſought of God an end of this life, proteſting, that ſhee had not for loue of life ſo long deferred to die, but onely for her childrens ſake, and that now ſhe had ſeene them all ſeuen triumphing. The fury of Antiochus now wexed hot, and he cõmanded this worthy mother to be tormented, who was (as the tyrant wild) ſtripped naked, and hanged vp by the hands, and moſt cruelly whipped: her dugges and pappes were pulled off, and ſhee put into the red hote frying-pan, being moſt willing to follow her childrens ſteps in torment; and lifting vp her eyes and hands to heauen, ſhee prayed for all women with childe, and ſo yeelded her chaſte ſoule to God. But Antiochus was ſtricken with fire from heauen. O miſtris of iuſtice, who followed thy triumphing children! O conqueror of tyrants, and C a looking glaſſe for all Martyrs! O example of patience! not only to women but to all men that ſhall be after thee, reuerenced of them that now are, and to bee worſhipped of them that are to come, and to be admired not onely of our nation, but of all other people. Thy light obſcureth the bright ſhining Moone: and though ſhee fill the world with her brightneſſe, yet is ſhee not comparable to thy ſhining light. Seauen lights enuiron thee about, dazeling the brightnes of the ſeauen Planets: could any Painter expreſſe, or any hand in writing declare the torments of your paſſions? None could with dry eie read or behold them; all people would flock about to ſee it, all people would praiſe and eſteeme him to haue offered a great gift, who to Gods glorie had painted that golden ſtratageme. And if any skilfull workman ſhould engraue this Tragedy vpon a ſepulchre or in his houſe, doubtleſſe he ſhould be freed from all plague and misfortune.
D But where could a ſtone be found able to containe ſo many torments? Therefore the ould man Eleazar, the mother and her 7. ſons, are for their nobility graced with a ſepulchre, and great reuerence is done vnto them of all men, yea euen by men that are not of our religion: and there is a conſtellation of 8. ſtars ordained as an argument of their iuſtice, and Angels did execute their funerals. The tyrant himſelfe was aſtoniſhed to ſee the conſtancy of ſuch godly mindes. And thus haue they found ſuch fauour in the ſight of God, that they haue obtained remiſſion of the ſins of our nation: For preſently after, the tyrant was deſtroied, and Iſrael there was freed from his tyranny.

But Antiochus, ſeeing the greatnes of their faith, and their contempt of death, gathered an army of footmen out of the Hebrewes, by whoſe help he terrified his enemies, and got great re-
E nowne. O bleſſed ſeed of Abraham! behold what benefit the agony of the mother and her ſeuen ſons brought to vs their countrimen: let vs perſiſt in this piety, that ſo we may be like our forefathers: behold, the death of a few did end all the miſeries & ſins of our whole nation, and you by your countrimens hands vanquiſhed your perſecutours enemies, and after that victory our ſins were remitted; and laſt of all, Antiochus being mad, and his entrailes deuoured with worms, hee ſmelling moſt like carrion, gaue vp the ghoſt: and was euer after death puniſhed for his offence. For when he could not make the Citizens of Ieruſalem to forſake their law, he made war againſt the Perſians, and there receiued that which he deſerued.

It now remaineth that we briefely repeat all that is before ſaid. For in her agony, this ſacred mother ſaid thus vnto the ſtanders by; Whil'ſt it was lawfull for me, I kept my ſelfe a virgin, and F then I married and liued a chaſte wife, and forſooke not my owne houſe, I brought forth ſuch ſonnes as I need not be aſhamed of; and though daunted with my husbands death, yet I did not forſake my faith: this, and many things elſe ſhe recounted. And what more? She ſet before her childrens eies the exãples of the Prophets, how Abel by his brother was ſlain, Iſaac to be offred inſtead of a ſacrifice, how Iacob was baniſhed, Ioſeph kept in priſon, Daniel caſt before the Lions, the three children into the fiery furnace: ſhe rehearſed alſo vnto them the book of Eſaias, where it is ſaid: Although thou do go through the fire, the flame ſhall not burne thee. That of Dauid, The iuſt ſhall haue much tribulation; and Salomon, who propoſeth the tree of life to ſuch as doe the will of God; not omitting that of Ezechiel, Theſe dry and withered bones ſhall liue againe: Alſo that of Moſes Canticle, I will kill and reſtore to life, and the length of your daies is in my hand. Vnhappy tyrant, what did thy cauldrons red hot, and thy torments profit thee? what auailed thee to cut away their eielids, and to pul out their tongues? thou thy ſelfe for ſo doing doſt now endure farre worſe then all theſe. And they whom thou killedſt (beleeue mee) enioy euerlaſting comfort, and are now ſecure of bliſſe and reuenge. For they who ſuffer for Gods ſake ſhall haue happy ſucceſſe, when God the Father of all things ſhall reward them with life euerlaſting that follow him. Thus haue I conſecrated theſe worthy memorials, which I find in the holy Scriptures of the ſacred Maccabees, to the reading of all men, that ſhall liue in any age hereafter.

The ioy of the bleſſed in euerlaſting life.
